Daisy Miller is here given in the original version; around 1905-1906, James made the style of this work, and of other early works, conform more nearly to that of his "later manner." (The revised version of Daisy Miller can be consulted in the New York edition, Vol XVIII) A comparison in styles between Daisy Miller as here given, and "The Middle Years," which follows, will afford the student an opportunity of measuring James' stylistic development between 1878 and 1895. For the general nature of James later revisions, the student should read "The Painter's Sponge and Varnish Bottle" in F. O. Matthiessen's Henry James. The Major Phase

At the little town of Vevey, in Switzerland, there is a particularly comfortable hotel. There are, indeed, many hotels, for the entertainment of tourists is the business of the place, which, as many travellers will remember is seated upon the edge of a remarkably blue lake—a lake that it behooves every tourist to visit. The shore of the lake presents an unbroken array of establishments of this order, of every category, from the "grand hotel" of the newest fashion, with a chalk-white front, a hundred balconies, and a dozen flags flying from its roof, to the little Swiss pension of an elder day, with its name inscribed in German-looking lettering upon a pink or vellow wall, and an awkward summer-house in the angle of the garden. One of the hotels in Vevey, however, is tamous, even classical, being distinguished from many of its upstart neighbors by an air both of luxury and of maturity In this region, in the month of June, American travellers are extremely numerous, it may be said, ; indeed, that Vevey assumes at this period some of the characteristics of an American watering-place There are sights and sounds which evoke a vision, an echo, of Newport and Saratoga There is a flitting hither and thither of "stylish" young girls, a rustling of muslin flounces, a rattle of dance-music in the morning hours, a sound of high-pitched voices at all times You receive an impression of these things at the excellent inn of the "Trois Couronnes,' and are transported in fancy to the Ocean House or to Congress Hall But at the "Trois a Couronnes," it must be added, there are other features that are much at variance with these suggestions neat German waiters, who look like secretaries of legation, Russian princesses sitting in the garden, little Polish boys walking about, held by the hand, with their governors; a view of the sunny crest of the Dent du Midi and the picturesque towers of the Castle of Chillon

I hardly know whether it was the analogies or the differences that were uppermost in the mind of a young American, who, two or three years ago, sat in the garden 33 of the 'Trois Couronnes," looking about him, rather idly, at some of the graceful objects I have mentioned It was a beautiful summer morning, and in whatever tashion the young American looked at things, they must have seemed to him charming. He had come from Geneva the day before, by the little steamer, to see his aunt, who was staying at the hotel-Geneva having been for a long time his place of residence. But his aunt had a headache-his aunt had almost always a headache-and now she was shut up in her room, smelling camphor, so 4) that he was at liberty to wander about. He was some seven-and-twenty years of age, when his friends spoke of him, they usually said that he was at Geneva, "studying." When his enemies spoke of him, they said-but, after all, he had no enemies, he was an extremely amiable fellow, and universally liked What I should say is, simply, that when certain persons spoke of him they affirmed that the reason of his spending so much time at Geneva was that he was extremely devoted to a lady who lived there—a foreign lady—a person older than himself. Very few Americans—indeed I think none— so had ever seen this lady, about whom there were some singular stories. But Winterbourne had an old attachment for the little metropolis of Calvinism, he had been put to school there as a boy, and he had atterwards gone to college there—circumstances which had led to his forming a great many youthful friendships. Many of these he had kept, and they were a source of great satisfaction to him.

After knocking at his aunt's door and learning that she was indisposed, he had taken a walk about the town, so and then he had come in to his breakfast. He had now finished his breakfast, but he was drinking a small cup of coffee, which had been served to him on a little table in the garden by one of the waiters who looked like an attaché. At last he finished his coffee and lit a cigarette Presently a small boy came walking along the path—an urchin of nine or ten The child, who was diminutive for his years, had an aged expression of countenance a pale complexion, and sharp little features dressed in knickerbockers, with red stockings, which dis- 70 played his poor little spindleshanks, he also wore a brilliant red cravat. He carried in his hand a long alpenstock, the sharp point of which he thrust into everything that he approached—the flower-beds, the garden-benches, the trains of the ladies' dresses In front of Winterbourne he paused, looking at him with a pair of bright, penetrating little eyes

"Will you give me a lump of sugar?" he asked, in a sharp, hard little voice—a voice immature, and yet, somehow, not young.

Winterbourne glanced at the small table near him, on which his coffee-service rested, and saw that several morsels of sugar remained "Yes, you may take one," he answered, "but I don't think sugar is good for little boys."

This little boy stepped forward and carefully selected three of the coveted fragments, two of which he buried in the pocket of his knickerbockers' depositing the other as promptly in another place. He poked his alpenstock, lance-fashion, into Winterbourne's bench, and tried to crack the lump of sugar with his teeth.

"Oh, blazes, it's har-r-d!" he exclaimed, pronouncing the adjective in a peculiar manner.

Winterbourne had immediately perceived that he might have the honour of claiming him as a fellow-countryman "Take care you don't hurt your teeth," he said, paternally

"I haven't got any teeth to hurt out I have only got seven teeth My mother counted them last night, and one came out right afterwards. She said she'd slap me if any more came out I can't help it. It's this old Europe. It's the climate that makes them come out. In America they didn't come out. It's these hotels."

Winterbourne was much amused, "If you eat three lumps of sugar, your mother will certainly slap you," he said

"She's got to give me some candy, then," rejoined his young interlocutor "I can't get any candy here—any American candy American candy's the best candy"

"And are American little boys the best little boys?" asked Winterbourne

"I don't know I'm an American boy,' said the child "I see you are one of the best!" laughed Winterbourne

"Are you an American man?" pursued this vivacious infant. And then, on Winterbourne's affirmative reply—"American men are the best," he declared

His companion thanked him for the compliment, and the child, who had now got astride of his alpenstock, stood looking about him while he attacked a second 30 lump of sugar. Winterbourne wondered if he himself had been like this in his infancy, for he had been brought to Europe at about this age.

"Here comes my sister!" cried the child, in a moment. "She's an American girl"

Winterbourne looked along the path and saw a beautiful young lady advancing "American girls are the best girls," he said, cheerfully, to his young companion

"My sister ain't the best" the child declared "She's always blowing at me"

"I imagine that is your fault, not hers," said Winterbourne. The young lady meanwhile had drawn near She was dressed in white muslin, with a hundred frills and flounces, and knots of pale-colored ribbon. She was bare-headed, but she balanced in her hand a large parasol, with a deep border of embroidery, and she was strikingly, admirably pretty. "How pretty they are!" thought Winterbourne, straightening himself in his seat, as if he were prepared to rise.

The young lady paused in front of his bench, near the parapet of the garden, which overlocked the lake. The $_{\mathfrak{V}}$ little boy had now converted his alpenstock into a vaulting-pole, by the aid of which he was springing about in the gravel, and kicking it up not a little

"Randolph," said the young lady, "what are you doing?"
"I'm going up the Alps," replied Randolph "This is the way!" And he gave another little jump, scattering the pebbles about Winterbourne's ears

"That's the way they come down," said Winterbourne "He's an American man!" cried Randolph, in his little hard voice

The young lady gave no heed to this announcement, but looked straight at her brother "Well, I guess you had better be quiet," she simply observed

It seemed to Winterbourne that he had been in a manner presented He got up and stepped slowly towards the young girl, throwing away his cigarette "This little boy and I have made acquaintance,' he said, with great civility In Geneva, as he had been perfectly aware, a young man was not at liberty to speak to a young unmarried lady except under certain rarely-occurring con- 73 ditions, but here at Vevey, what conditions could be better than these?—a pretty American girl coming and standing in front of you in a garden. This pretty American girl, however, on hearing Winterbourne's observation, simply glanced at him, she then turned her head and looked over the parapet, at the lake and the opposite mountains He wondered whether he had gone too far, but he decided that he must advance farther. rather than retreat. While he was thinking of something else to say, the young lady turned to the little boy again s

"I should like to know where you got that pole,"

"I bought it!" responded Randolph

"You don't mean to say you're going to take it to Italy"

"Yes, I am going to take it to Italy!" the child declared The young girl glanced over the front of her dress and smoothed out a knot or two of ribbon Then she rested her eyes upon the prospect again "Well, I guess you had better leave it somewhere," she said, after a moment.

"Are you going to Italy?" Winterbourne inquired, in a tone of great respect.

The young lady glanced at him again "Yes, sir," she replied And she said nothing more

Are you—a—going over the Simplon?" Winter-bourne pursued, a little embarrassed

"I don't know," she said "I suppose it's some mountain Randolph, what mountain are we going over?"

"Going where?" the child demanded

"To Italy," Winterbourne explained

"I don't know," said Randolph "I don't want to go to Italy I want to go to America"

'Oh, Italy is a beautiful place' rejoined the young man 'Can you get candy there?' Randolph loudly inquired. I hope not," said his sister "I guess you have had though candy, and mother thinks so too."

I haven't had any for ever so long—for a hundred weeks'" cried the boy, still jumping about

The young lady inspected her flounces and smoothed her ribbons again, and Winterbourne presently risked an observation upon the beauty of the view. He was ceasing to be embarrassed, for he had begun to perceive that she was not in the least embarrassed herself There had not been the slightest alteration in her charming complexion, she was evidently neither offended nor fluttered If she looked another way when he spoke to her, and seemed not particularly to hear him, this was simply . her habit, her manner Yet, as he talked a little more. and pointed out some of the objects of interest in the view, with which she appeared quite unacquainted, she gradually gave him more of the benefit of her glance, and then he saw that this glance was perfectly direct and unshrinking. It was not however, what would have been called an immodest glance, for the young girl's eyes were singularly honest and fresh. They were wonderfully pretty eyes, and, indeed, Winterbourne had not seen for a long time anything prettier than his fair counvarious features-her complexion, her nose, her ears, her teeth He had a great relish for feminine beauty, he was addicted to observing and analyzing it; and as regards this young lady's face he made several observations It was not at all insipid, but it was not exactly expressive; and though it was eminently delicate Winterbourne mentally accused it-very forgivinglyof a want of finish. He thought it very possible that Master Randolph's sister was a coquette, he was sure she had a spirit of her own, but in her bright, sweet, superficial little visage there was no mockery, no irony. 50 Before long it became obvious that she was much disposed towards conversation. She told him that they were going to Rome for the winter-she and her mother and Randolph She asked him if he was a "real American", she shouldn't have taken him for one, he seemed more like a German—this was said after a little hesitation, especially when he spoke Winterbourne, laughing, answered that he had met Germans who spoke like Americans but that he had not, so far as he remembered, met an American who spoke like a German. Then he asked 60 her if she should not be more comfortable in sitting upon the bench which he had just quitted. She answered that she liked standing up and walking about, but she presently sat down She told him she was from New York State-"if you know where that is 'Winterbourne learned more about her by catching hold of her small, slippery brother and making him stand a few minutes by his side.

"Tell me your name, my boy,' he said

"Randolph C Miller," said the boy, sharply "And I'll tell you her name," and he levelled his alpenstock at 70 his sister

"You had better wait till you are asked!" said this young lady, calmly

"I should like very much to know your name," said Winterbourne

Her name is Dusy Miller!" cried the child "But that isn't her real name, that isn't her name on her cards."

"It's a pity you haven't got one of my cards'" said Miss Miller

"Her real name is Annie P Miller," the boy went on 80 "Ask him bis name," said his sister, indicating Winterbourne

But on this point Randolph seemed perfectly indifferent, he continued to supply information in regard to his own family "My father's name is Ezra B Miller," he announced "My father ain't in Europe, my father's in a better place than Europe"

Winterbourne imagined for a moment that this was the manner in which the child had been taught to intimate that Mr Miller had been removed to the sphere of celestial rewards But Randolph immediately added, "My father's in Schenectady He's got a big business My father's rich, you bet"

"Well!" ejaculated Miss Miller, lowering her parasol and looking at the embroidered border. Winterbourne presently released the child, who departed, dragging his alpenstock along the path. "He doesn't like Europe," said the young girl. "He wants to go back."

"To Schenectady, you mean?"

"Yes, he wants to go right home He hasn't got any boys here. There is one boy here, but he always goes round with a teacher, they won't let him play."

"And your brother hasn't any teacher?" Winterbourne inquired

"Mother thought of getting him one to travel round with us There was a lady told her of a very good teacher, an American lady—perhaps you know her—Mrs Sanders I think she came from Boston She told her of this teacher, and we thought of getting him to travel round with us But Randolph said he didn't want a teacher travelling round with us He said he wouldn't have lessons when he was in the cars. And we are in the cars about half the time. There was an English lady we met in the cars—I think her name was Miss Featherstone, perhaps you know her. She wanted to know why I didn't give Randolph lessons—give him 'instructions,' she called it. I guess he could give me more instructions than I could give him. He's very smart."

"Yes," said Winterbourne, "he seems very smart" "Mother's going to get a teacher for him as soon as we get to Italy Can you get good teachers in Italy?"

"Very good, I should think,' said Winterbourne

"Or else she's going to find some school He ought to learn some more He's only nine He's going to college." And in this way Miss Miller continued to converse upon the affairs of her family, and upon other topics. She sait there with her extremely pretty hands, ornamented with very brilliant rings, folded in her lap, and with her pretty eyes now resting upon those of Winterbourne, now wandering over the garden, the people who passed by, and the beautiful view. She talked to Winterbourne as if she had known him a long time. He found it very pleasant It was many years since he had heard a young girl talk so much. It might have been said of this unknown young lady, who had come and sat down beside him upon a bench, that she chattered She was very quiet, she sat in a charming tranquil attitude, but her lips and her eves were constantly moving She had a soft, slender, agreeable voice, and her tone was decidedly sociable. She gave Winterbourne a history of her movements and intentions, and those of her mother and brother, in Europe and enumerated, in particular, the various hotels at which they had stopped "That English lady, in the cars," she said-"Miss Featherstone-asked me if we didn't all live in hotels in America I told her I had never been in so many hotels in my life as since I came to Europe I have never seen so many—it's nothing but hotels" But Miss Miller did not make this remark with a querulous accent, she appeared to be in the best humor with every thing She declared that the hotels were very good when once you got used to their ways, and that Europe was perfectly sweet. She was not disappointed-not a bit Perhaps it was because she had heard so much about it before. She had ever so many intimate friends that had been there ever so many times And then she had had ever so many dresses and things from Paris Whenever she put on a Paris dress she felt as if she were in Europe

"It was a kind of a wishing-cap," said Winterbourne "Yes," said Miss Miller, without examining this analogy, "it always made me wish I was here. But I needn't have done that for dresses I am sure they send all the pretty ones to America, you see the most frightful things here The only thing I don't like," she proceeded, is the society There isn't any society, or, if there is I don't know where it keeps itself. Do you? I suppose there is some society somewhere, but I haven't seen any thing of it. I'm very fond of society, and I have always had a great deal of it I don't mean only in Schenectady. but in New York I used to go to New York every winter In New York I had lots of society Last winter I had seventeen dinners given me, and three of them were by gentlemen," added Daisy Miller "I have more friends in New York than in Schenectady-more gentle men friends, and more young lady friends too," she re sumed in a moment. She paused again for an instant. she was looking at Winterbourne with all her prettiness in her lively eyes and in her light, slightly monotonous smile "I have always had," she said, "a great deal of gentlemen's society."

cidedly charmed He had never yet heard a young girl express herself in just this fashion, never, at least, save in cases where to say such things seemed a kind of demonstrative evidence of a certain laxity of deportment And yet was he to accuse Miss Daisy Miller of actual or potential inconduite, as they said at Geneva? He felt that he had lived at Geneva so long that he had lost a good deal, he had become dishabituated to the American rone Never, indeed, since he had grown old enough to appreciate things, had he encountered a young American girl of so pronounced a type as this Certainly she was very charming, but how deucedly sociable! Was she simply a pretty girl from New York State-were they all like that, the pretty girls who had a good deal of gentlemen's society? Or was she also a designing, an audacious, an unscrupulous young person? Winterbourne had lost his instinct in this matter, and his reason could not help him Miss Daisy Miller looked extremely innocent Some people had told him that, after all, American girls were exceedingly innocent, and others had told him that, after all, they were not He was inclined to think Miss Daisy Miller was a flirt-a pretty American flirt He had never, as yet, had any relations with young ladies of this category He had known, here in Europe, two or three women—persons older than Miss Daisy Miller, and provided, for respectability's sake, with husbands-who were great coquettes-dangerous, terrible women, with whom one's relations were liable to take a serious turn. But this young girl was not a coquette in that sense, she was very unsophisticated, she was only a pretty American flirt. Winterbourne was almost grateful for having found the formula that applied to Miss Daisy Miller He leaned back in his seat. he remarked to himself that she had the most charming nose he had ever seen, he wondered what were the regular conditions and limitations of one's intercourse with a pretty American flirt. It presently became apparent that he was on the way to learn

"Have you been to that old castle?" asked the young girl, pointing with her parasol to the far-gleaming walls of the Château de Chillon

"Yes, formerly, more than once," said Winterbourne "You too, I suppose, have seen it?"

'No, we haven't been there I want to go there dreadfully Of course I mean to go there I wouldn't go away from here without having seen that old castle" "It's a very pretty excursion," said Winterbourne, "and very easy to make You can drive, you know, or you can go by the little steamer"

'You can go in the cars," said Miss Miller

"Yes, you can go in the cars," Winterbourne assented.

"Our courier says they take you right up to the castle," the young girl continued "We were going last week, but my mother give out. She suffers dreadfully from dyspepsia. She said she couldn't go. Randolph wouldn't go either, he says he doesn't think much of old castles. But I guess we'll go this week if we can get Randolph."

"Your brother is not interested in ancient monuments?" Winterbourne inquired, smiling

"He says he don't care much about old castles He's 60 only nine. He wants to stay at the hotel Mother's afraid to leave him alone, and the courier won't stay with him, so we haven't been to many places. But it will be too bad if we don't go up there." And Miss Miller pointed again at the Château de Chillon

"I should think it might be arranged," said Winterbourne "Couldn't you get some one to stay—for the afternoon—with Randolph?"

Miss Miller looked at him a moment, and then, very placidly, "I wish you would stay with him!" she said

Winterbourne hesitated a moment "I should much rather go to Chillon with you"

"With me?" asked the young girl, with the same

She didn't rise, blushing as a young girl at Geneva would have done, and yet Winterbourne, conscious that he had been very bold, thought it possible she was offended "With your mother," he answered, very respectfully

But it seemed that both his audacity and his respect 80 were lost upon Miss Daisy Miller. "I guess my mother won't go after all," she said. "She don't like to ride round in the afternoon. But did you really mean what you said just now, that you would like to go up there?"

"Most earnestly," Winterbourne declared

"Then we may arrange it If morber will stay with Randolph, I guess Eugenio will"

"Eugenio?" the young man inquired

⁶ inconduite, misconduct • 41 Château de Chilion, made famous by Byron's poem, "The Prisoner of Chillon"

"Eugenio's our courier He doesn't like to stay with Randolph, he's the most fastidious man I ever saw But he's a splendid courier 1 guess he'll stay at home with Randolph if mother does, and then we can go to the castle."

Winterbourne reflected for an instant as lucidly as possible—"we" could only mean Miss Daisy Miller and himself. This programme seemed almost too agreeable for credence, he felt as if he ought to kiss the young lady's hand. Possibly he would have done so—and quite spoiled the project, but at this moment another person—presumably Eugenio—appeared. A tall, handsome man, with superb whiskers, wearing a velvet morning-coat and a brilliant watch-chain, approached. Miss Miller, looking sharply at her companion. "Oh, Eugenio!" said Miss Miller, with the friendliest accent.

Eugenio had looked at Winterbourne from head to foot, he now bowed gravely to the young lady "I have the honour to inform mademoiselle that luncheon is upon the table"

Miss Miller slowly rose. "See here, Eugenio," she said "I'm going to that old castle, anyway"

"To the Château de Chillon, mademoiselle?" the courier inquired "Mademoiselle has made arrangements?" he added, in a tone which struck Winterbourne as very impertinent.

Eugenio's tone apparently threw, even to Miss Miller's own apprehension, a slightly ironical light upon the young girl's situation. She turned to Winterbourne, 30 blushing a little—a very little. "You won't back out?" she said.

"I shall not be happy till we go!" he protested

"And you are staying in this hotel?" she went on.
"And you are really an American?"

The courier stood looking at Winterbourne, offensively. The young man, at least, thought his manner of looking an offence to Miss Miller, it conveyed an imputation that she "picked up" acquaintances. "I shall have the honour of presenting to you a person who will tell you all about me," he said, smiling, and referring to his aunt.

"Oh, we'll, we'll go some day," said Miss Miller And she gave him a smile and turned away She put up her parasol and walked back to the inn beside Eugenio Winterbourne stood looking after her, and as she moved away, drawing her muslin furbelows over the gravel.

said to himself that she had the tournure of a princess

He had, however, engaged to do more than proved feasible, in promising to present his aunt, Mrs Costello to Miss Daisy Miller. As soon as the former lady had got better of her headache he waited upon her in her apartment, and, after the proper inquiries in regard to her health, he asked her if she had observed, in the hotel, an American family—a mamma, a daughter, and a little boy

"And a courier?" said Mrs Costello "Oh, ves, I have observed them Seen them-heard them-and kept out of their way." Mrs Costello was a widow with a fortune, a person of much distinction, who frequently intimated that, if she were not so dreadfully liable to sickheadaches, she would probably have left a deeper impress upon her time. She had a long pale face, a high nose and a great deal of very striking white hair, which she wore in large puffs and rouleaux over the top of her head She had two sons married in New York, and another who was now in Europe This young man was amusing himself at Hombourg, and, though he was on his travels was rarely perceived to visit any particular city at the moment selected by his mother for her own appearance there Her nephew, who had come up to Vevey expressly to see her, was therefore more attentive than those who, as she said, were nearer to her He had imbibed at Geneva the idea that one must always be attentive to one's aunt Mrs Costello had not seen him for many years, and she was greatly pleased with him. manifesting her approbation by initiating him into many of the secrets of that social sway which, as she gave him to understand, she exerted in the American capital She admitted that she was very exclusive, but, if he were acquainted with New York, he would see that one had to be And her picture of the minutely hierarchical con stitution of the society of that city, which she presented to him in many different lights, was, to Winterbournes imagination, almost oppressively striking

He immediately perceived, from her tone, that Miss Daisy Miller's place in the social scale was low "I am afraid you don't approve of them," he said

"They are very common," Mrs Costello declared "They

⁴⁷ tournure, figure and style • 64 rouleaux, coils • 67 Hombourg, a watering place in Prussia, famous for its mineral springs are the sort of Americans that one does one's duty by not—not accepting"

The young girl is very pretty," said Winterbourne, in a moment.

"Of course she's pretty But she is very common."

I see what you mean, of course," said Winterbourne, after another pause

She has that charming look that they all have," his aunt resumed "I can't think where they pick it up, and she dresses in perfection—no, you don't know how well she dresses I can't think where they get their taste"

"But, my dear aunt, she is not, after all, a Comanche savage"

'She is a young lady," said Mrs Costello, "who has in intimacy with her mamma's courier"

'An intimacy with the courier?" the young man

Oh, the mother is just as bad! They treat the courier like a familiar friend—like a gentleman I shouldn't wonder if he dines with them Very likely they have never seen a man with such good manners, such fine clothes, so like a gentleman He probably corresponds to the young lady's idea of a count He sits with them in the garden. In the evening I think he smokes"

Winterbourne listened with interest to these disclosures, they helped him to make up his mind about Miss Daisy Evidently she was rather wild

Well," he said, "I am not a courier, and yet she was very charming to me"

'You had better have said at first," said Mrs Costello with dignity, "that you had made her acquaintance"

We simply met in the garden, and we talked a bit Tout bonnement! And pray what did you say?"

I said I should take the liberty of introducing her to $m_{\rm I}$ admirable aunt "

"I am much obliged to you"

It was to guarantee my respectability," said Win-

And pray who is to guarantee hers?"

Ah, you are cruel! said the young man "She's a very nice young girl"

You don't say that as if you believed it,' Mrs Costello observed.

"She is completely uncultivated," Winterbourne went on "But she is wonderfully pretty, and, in short, she is very nice—To prove that I believe it, I am going to take her to the Château de Chillon"

"You two are going off there together? I should say it proved just the contrary How long had you known her, may I ask, when this interesting project was formed? You haven't been twenty-four hours in the house"

"I had known her half an hour' said Winter-bourne, smiling

"Dear met cried Mis Costello "What a dreadful girll"

Her nephew was silent for some moments "You really think, then," he began, earnestly, and with a 60 desire for trustworthy information—"you really think that—" But he paused again

"Think what, sir' said his aunt

"That she is the sort of young lady who expects a man—sooner or later—to carry her off?"

"I haven't the least idea what such young ladies expect a man to do But I really think that you had better not meddle with little American girls that are uncultivated, as you call them. You have lived too long out of the country. You will be sure to make some great mistake. 70 You are too innocent."

"My dear aunt, I am not so innocent," said Winter-bourne, smiling and curling his moustache

"You are too guilty, then!"

Winterbourne continued to curl his moustache, meditatively "You won't let the poor girl know you, then?" he asked at last

"Is it literally true that she is going to the Château de Chillon with you?"

"I think that she fully intends it "

"Then, my dear Frederick," said Mrs Costello, "I must decline the honour of her acquaintance I am an old woman, but I am not too old—thank Heaven—to be shocked!"

"But don't they all do these things—the young girls in America". Winterbourne inquired

Mrs Costello stared a moment 'I should like to see my granddaughters do them!" she declared, grimly

This secmed to throw some light upon the matter,

³⁶ Tout bonnement! very well!

for Winterbourne remembered to have heard that his pretty cousins in New York were "tremendous flirts." If, therefore, Miss Daisy Miller exceeded the liberal margin allowed to these young ladies, it was probable that anything might be expected of her Winterbourne was impatient to see her again, and he was vexed with himself that, by instinct, he should not appreciate her justly.

Though he was impatient to see her, he hardly knew what he should say to her about his aunt's refusal to become acquainted with her, but he discovered, promptly enough, that with Miss Daisy Miller there was no great need of walking on tiptoe. He found her that evening in the garden, wandering about in the warm starlight, like an indolent sylph and swinging to and fro the largest fan he had ever beheld. It was ten o'clock. He had dined with his aunt, had been sitting with her since dinner, and had just taken leave of her till the morrow. Miss Daisy Miller seemed very glad to see him, she de-20 clared it was the longest evening she had ever passed.

"Have you been all alone?" he asked

"I have been walking round with mother But mother gets tired walking round," she answered

"Has she gone to bed?"

"No, she doesn't like to go to bed," said the young girl
"She doesn't sleep—not three hours. She says she doesn't know how she lives. She's dreadfuily nervous. I guess she sleeps more than she thinks. She's gone somewhere after Randolph, she wants to try to get him to go to bed.

30 He doesn't like to go to bed."

"Let us hope she will persuade him," observed Winterbourne

"She will talk to him all she can, but he doesn't like her to talk to him," said Miss Daisy, opening her fan "She's going to try to get Eugenio to talk to him. But he isn't afraid of Eugenio Eugenio's a splendid courier, but he can't make much impression on Randolph! I don't believe he'll go to bed before eleven." It appeared that Randolph's vigil was in fact triumphantly prolonged, for Winterbourne strolled about with the young girl for some time without meeting her mother. "I have been looking round for that lady you want to introduce me to," his companion resumed. "She's your aunt." Then, on Winterbourne's admitting the fact, and expressing some curiosity as to how she had learned it, she said she had heard all about Mrs. Costello from the chambermaid She was very quiet, and very comme il faut: she wore white puffs, she spoke to no one, and she never dined at the table d'hôte. Every two days she had a headache "I think that's a lovely description, headache and all!" said Miss Daisy, chattering along in her thin gay voice "I want to know her ever so much I know just what jour aunt would be, I know I should like her She would be very exclusive I like a lady to be exclusive, I'm dying to be exclusive myself. Well, we see exclusive, mother and I. We don't speak to every one—or they don't speak to us. I suppose it's about the same thing Anyway, I shall be ever so glad to know your aunt

Winterbourne was embarrassed "She would be most happy," he said, "but I am afraid those headaches will interfere"

The young girl looked at him through the dusk "But I suppose she doesn't have a headache every day," she said, sympathetically

Winterbourne was silent a moment "She tells me she does," he answered at last—not knowing what to say

Miss Daisy Miller stopped, and stood looking at him Her prettiness was still visible in the darkness, she was opening and closing her enormous fan "She doesn't want to know me!" she said, suddenly "Why don't you say so? You needn't be afraid. I'm not afraid!" And she gave a little laugh

Winterbourne fancied there was a tremor in her voice he was touched, shocked, mortified by it "My dear young lady," he protested, "she knows no one "Ir's her wretched health"

The young girl walked on a few steps, laughing still "You needn't be afraid," she repeated "Why should she want to know me?" Then she paused again, she was close to the parapet of the garden, and in front of her was the starlit lake. There was a vague sheen upon its surface, and in the distance were dimly-seen mounting forms. Daisy Miller looked out upon the mysterious prospect, and then she gave another little laugh. "Gracious' she it exclusive!" she said. Winterbourne wondered whether she was seriously wounded, and for a monification make it becoming in him to attempt to reassure and comfort her. He had a pleasant sense that she would be very approachable for consolatory purposes He felt then, for the instant, quite ready to sacrifice his aunt. conversationally, to admit that she was a proud. rude woman, and to declare that they needn't mind her But before he had time to commit himself to this perilous mixture of gallantry and impiety, the young lady, resuming her walk, gave an exclamation in quite another tone Well, here's mother! I guess she hasn't got Randolph to go to bed." The figure of a lady appeared, at a distance, very indistinct in the darkness and advancing with a slow and wavering movement Suddenly it seemed to

"Are you sure it is your mother? Can you distinguish her in this thick dusk?" Winterbourne asked

'Well'" cried Miss Daisy Miller, with a laugh, "I guess I know my own mother And when she has got on my shawl, too! She is always wearing my things"

The lady in question, ceasing to advance, hovered vaguely about the spot at which she had checked her steps "I am afraid your mother doesn't see you," said Winterbourne "Or perhaps," he added-thinking, with Miss Miller, the joke permissible—"perhaps she feels guilty about your shawl"

Oh, it's a fearful old thing!" the young girl replied, serenely "I told her she could wear it She won't come here because she sees you"

'Ah, then," said Winterbourne, "I had better leave

"Oh, no, come on!" urged Miss Daisy Miller

I'm afraid your mother doesn't approve of my walking with you"

Miss Miller gave him a serious glance "It isn't for me, it's for you—that is, it's for her Well, I don't know who it's for! But mother doesn't like any of my gentlemen friends She's right down timid She always makes a fuss if I introduce a gentleman But I do introduce them-almost always If I didn't introduce my gentlemen friends to mother,' the young girl added, in her little soft, flat monotone, "I shouldn't think I was natural"

To introduce me, said Winterbourne, "you must know my name.' And he proceeded to pronounce it.

Oh, dear, I can't say all that!" said his companion, with a laugh. But by this time they had come up to Mrs Miller, who as they drew near, walked to the parapet of the garden and leaned upon it, looking intently at the lake, and turning her back to them "Mother!" said the young girl, in a tone of decision. Upon this the elder lady turned round "Mr Winterbourne," said Miss Daisy Miller, introducing the young man very frankly and prettily "Common" she was, as 50 Mrs Costello had pronounced her, yet it was a wonder to Winterbourne that, with her commonness, she had a singularly delicate grace

Her mother was a small, spare, light person, with a wandering eye, a very exiguous nose, and a large forehead, decorated with a certain amount of thin, muchfrizzled hair Like her daughter, Mrs Miller was dressed with extreme elegance, she had enormous diamonds in her ears. So far as Winterbourne could observe, she gave him no greeting-she certainly was not looking at him 60 Daisy was near her, pulling her shawl straight "What are you doing, poking round here?" this young lady inquired, but by no means with that haishness of accent which her choice of words may imply

"I don't know," said her mother, turning towards the lake again

I shouldn't think you'd want that shawl! Daisy ex-

Well—I do!" her mother answered, with a little

'Did you get Randolph to go to bed?' asked the young girl

"No, I couldn't induce him," said Mrs Miller, very gently 'He wants to talk to the waiter. He likes to talk to that waiter"

'I was telling Mr Winterbourne," the young girl went on, and to the young man's car her tone might have indicated that she had been uttering his name all

'Oh, yes!" said Winterbourne, 'I have the pleasure 80 of knowing your son"

Randolph's mamina was silent, she turned her attention to the lake But at last she spoke "Well, I don't see how he lives!"

"Anyhow, it isn't so bad as it was at Dover," said Daisy Miller

'And what occurred at Dover'" Winterbourne asked "He wouldn't go to bed at all I guess he sat up all night-in the public parlour. He wasn't in bed at twelve o'clock, I know that"

"It was half-past twelve," declared Mrs Miller, with mild emphasis

"Does he sleep much during the day?" Winterbourne demanded

"I guess he doesn't sleep much," Daisy rejoined

"I wish he would!" said her mother "It seems as if he couldn't."

"I think he's real tiresome," Daisy pursued

Then, for some moments, there was silence 'Well, Daisy Miller," sud the elder lady, presently, 'I shouldn't think you'd want to talk against your own brother!"

"Well, he is tiresome, mother," said Daisy, quite without the asperity of a retort

"He's only nine," urged Mrs Miller

"Well, he wouldn't go to that castle," said the young girl "I'm going there with Mr Winterbourne"

To this announcement, very placidly made, Daisy's mamma offered no response. Winterbourne took for granted that she deeply disapproved of the projected excursion, but he said to himself that she was a simple, easily-managed person, and that a few deferential protestations would take the edge from her displeasure "Yes," he began, "your daughter has kindly allowed me the honour of being her guide."

Mrs Miller's wandering eyes attached themselves, with a sort of appealing air, to Daisy, who, however, strolled a few steps farther, gently humming to herself. "I presume you will go in the cars," said her mother

"Yes, or in the boat," said Winterbourne

"Well, of course, I don't know," Mrs Miller rejoined "I have never been to that casile"

"It is a pity you shouldn't go said Winterbourne, beginning to feel reassured as to her opposition. And yet he was quite prepared to find that, as a matter of course, she meant to accompany her daughter.

"We've been thinking ever so much about going, she pursued, "but it seems as if we couldn't. Of course Daisy—she wants to go round. But there's a lady here—I don't know her name—she says she shouldn't think we'd want to go to see castles here, she should think we'd want to wait till we got to Italy. It seems as if there would be so many there," continued. Mrs. Miller, with an air of increasing confidence. "Of course, we only want to see the principal ones. We visited several in England," she presently added.

"Ah, yes' in England there are beautiful castles, said Winterbourne "But Chillon, here, is very well worth seeing "Well, if Daisy feels up to it—," said Mrs Miller in a tone impregnated with a sense of the magnitude of the enterprise "It seems as if there was nothing she wouldn't undertake"

"Oh, I think she'll enjoy it!" Winterbourne declared And he desired more and more to make it a certainty that he was to have the privilege of a tête:à-tête with the young lady, who was still strolling along in front of them, softly vocalizing "You are not disposed madam, he inquired, "to undertake it yourself?"

Daisy's mother looked at him, an instant, askance, and then walked forward in silence Then—"I guess she had better go alone, she said, simply Winterbourne observed to himself that this was a very different type of maternity from that of the vigilant matrons who massed themselves in the forefront of social intercourse in the dark old city at the other end of the lake But his meditations were interrupted by hearing his name very distinctly pronounced by Mrs Miller's un protected daughter

"Mr Winterbourne!" murmured Daisy

'Mademoiselle!" said the young man

"Don't you want to take me out in a boat?"

"At present?" he asked

"Of course" said Daisy

"Well, Annie Miller!" exclaimed her mothei

"I beg you, madam, to let her go,' said Winterbourne ardently, for he had never yet enjoyed the sensation of guiding through the summer starlight a skiff freighted with a fresh and beautiful young girl

I shouldn't think she'd want to," said her mother "I should think she'd rather go indoois

"I'm sure Mr Winterbourne wants to take me, ' $D^{\rm mix}$ declared "He's so awfully devoted! '

"I will row you over to Chillon, in the starlight

"I don't believe it!" said Daisy

'Well'" ejaculated the elder lady again

"You haven't spoken to me for half an hour, her daughter went on

"I have been having some very pleasant conversation with your mother," said Winterbourne

"Well I want you to take me out in a boat! Daisi repeated. They had all stopped, and she had turned round and was looking at Winterbourne. Her face wore a charming smile, her pretty eyes were gleaming she was swinging her great fan about. No, it's in possible to be prettier than that, thought Winterbourne.

"There are half a dozen boats moored at that landing-plice," he said, pointing to certain steps which descended from the garden to the lake "If you will do me the honour to accept my arm, we will go and select one of them"

Daisy stood there smiling, she threw back her head and gave a little, light laugh "I like a gentleman to be formal!" she declared

'I assure you it's a formal ofter '

'I was bound I would make you say something," Daisy went on

"You see it's not very difficult," said Winterbourne.
"But I am afraid you are chaffing me"

'I think not, sir," remarked Mrs Miller, very gently Do, then, let me give you a row,' he said to the oung girl

'It's quite lovely, the way you say that!" cried Daisy 'It will be still more lovely to do it."

"Yes, it would be lovely!" said Daisy But she made no movement to accompany him, she only stood there laughing

'I should think you had better find out what time it is," interposed her mother

It is eleven o'clock, madam, said a voice, with a foreign accent, out of the neighbouring darkness, and Winterbourne, turning, perceived the florid personage who was in attendance upon the two ladies. He had apparently just approached

Oh, Eugenio," said Daisy, "I am going out in a boat!"
Eugenio bowed. "At eleven o'clock, mademoiselle?"
"I am going with Mr Winterbourne This very

"Too tell her she can't," said Mrs Miller to the courier "I think you had better not go out in a boat, mademoiselle," Eugenio declared

Winterbourne wished to Heaven this pretty girl were not so familiar with her courier, but he said nothing

"I suppose you don't think it's proper!" Daisy exclaimed 'Eugenio doesn't think anything's proper!"

I am at your service," said Winterbourne

"Does mademoiselle propose to go alone" asked Eugenio of Mrs. Miller

"Oh, no, with this gentleman!" answered Daisy's

The courier looked for a moment at Winterbourne-

the latter thought he was smiling—and then, solemnly, with a bow. 'As mademoiselle pleases!" he said

"Oh, I hoped you would make a fuss!" said Daisy.
"I don't care to go now"

"I myself shall make a fuss if you don't go," said Winterbourne

"That's all I want—a little fuss!' And the young girl began to laugh again

"Mr Randolph has gone to bed!" the courier announced, frigidly

"Oh, Daisy, now we can go! said Mrs Miller

Daisy turned away from Winterbourne, looking at him, smiling, and fanning herself. Good-night," she said, I hope you are disappointed, or disgusted, or something!

He looked at her, taking the hand she offered him "I am puzzl d, he answered

"Well I hope it won't keep you awake!" she said very smortly and, under the escort of the privileged Eugenio, the two ladies passed towards the house

Winterbourne stood looking after them, he was indeed puzzled. He lingered beside the lake for a quarter of an hour turning over the mystery of the young girls sudden familiarities and caprices. But the re only very definite conclusion he came to was that he should enjoy deucedly 'going off' with her somewhere

Two days afterwards he went off with her to the Castle of Chillon He waited for her in the large hall of the hotel, where the couriers, the servants, the foreign tourists were lounging about and stering. It was not the place he should have chosen, but she had appointed it She came tripping downstairs, buttoning her long gloves, squeezing her folded parasol against her pretty figure dressed in the perfection of a soberly elegant 80 travelling-cosiume Winterbourne was a man of imagination and, as our ancestors used to say, sensibility, as he looked at her dress and, on the great staircase, her little rapid, confiding step, he felt as if there were something romantic going torward. He could have believed he was going to elope with her He passed out with her among all the idle people that were assembled there, they were all looking at her very haid, she had begun to chatter as soon as she joined him Winterbourne's

preference had been that they should be conveyed to Chillon in a carriage, but she expressed a lively wish to go in the little steamer, she declared that she had a passion for steamboats. There was always such a lovely breeze upon the water, and you saw such lots of people The sail was not long, but Winterbourne's companion found time to say a great many things. To the young man himself their little excursion was so much of an escapade-an adventure-that, even allowing for her 10 habitual sense of freedom, he had some expectation of seeing her regard it in the same way. But it must be confessed that, in this particular, he was disappointed Daisy Miller was extremely animated, she was in charming spirits, but she was apparently not at all excited, she was not fluttered, she avoided neither his eyes nor those of any one else, she blushed neither when she looked at him nor when she felt that people were looking at her People continued to look at her a great deal, and Winterbourne took much satisfaction in his pretty 20 companion's distinguished air. He had been a little afraid that she would talk loud, laugh overmuch, and even, perhaps, desire to move about the boat a good deal. But he quite forgot his fours, he sit smiling, with his eyes upon her face, while, without moving from her place, she delivered herself of a great number of original reflections. It was the most charming garrulity he had ever heard. He had assented to the idea that she was "common", but was she so, after all, or was he simply getting used to her commonness? Her conversation was 30 chiefly of what nietaphysicians term the objective cast, but every now and then it took a subjective turn

"What on earth are you so grave about?" she suddenly demanded, fixing her agreeable eyes upon Winterbourne's

"Am I grave?" he asked "I had an idea I was grinning from ear to ear"

"You look as if you were taking me to a funeral. If that's a grin, your ears are very near together."

"Should you like me to dance a hornpipe on the deck?"
"Pray do, and I'll carry round your hat It will pay the expenses of our journey"

"I never was better pleased in my life," murmured Winterbourne

She looked at him a moment, and then burst into a little laugh "I like to make you say those things! You're a queer mixture!"

In the castle, after they had landed, the subjective element decidedly prevailed Daisy tripped about the vaulted chambers, rustled her skirts in the corkscrew staircases, flirted back with a pretty little cry and a shudder from the edge of the oubliettes, and turned a singularly well-shaped ear to everything that Winterbourne told her about the place. But he saw that she cared very little for feudal antiquities, and that the dusks traditions of Chillon made but a slight impression upon her They had the good fortune to have been able to walk without other companionship than that of the custodian, and Winterbourne arranged with this functionary that they should not be hurried—that they should linger and pause wherever they chose The custodian interpreted the bargain generously-Winterbourne, on his side, had been generous-and ended by leaving them quite to themselves. Miss Miller's observations were not remarkable for logical consistency, for anything she wanted to say she was sure to find a pretext. She found a great many pretexts in the rugged embrasures of Chillon for acking Winterbourne sudden questions about himself--his family, his previous history, his tastes, his habits, his intentions--and for supplying information upon corresponding points in her own personality Of her own tastes, habits, and intentions Miss Miller was prepared to give the most definite, and, indeed, the most favourable, account

'Well I hope you know enough!" she said to her companion, after he had told her the history of the unhappy Bonnivard "I never saw a man that knew so much!" The history of Bonnivard had evidently, as they say, gone into one ear and out of the other. But Daiss went on to say that she wished Winterbourne would travel with them, and "go round" with them, they might know something in that case. "Don't you want to come and teach Randolph? she asked. Winterbourne said that nothing could possibly please him so much, but that he had unfortunately other occupations. "Other occupations? I don't believe it! said Miss Daisy "What do you mean? You are not in business." The young man admitted that he was not in business, but he had engagements which, even within a day or two, would force him to go back to Geneva "Oh, bother!" she said, "I don't believe it" and she began to talk about something else But a few moments later, when he was pointing out to her the pretty design of an antique fireplace, she broke out irrelevantly, "You don't mean to say you are going back to Geneva?"

"It is a melancholy fact that I shall have to return to-morrow"

"Well, Mr Winterbourne," said Daisy, "I think you're horrid!"

"Oh don't say such dreadful things!" said Winter-bourne—"just at the last!"

"The last!" cried the young girl, "I call it the first I have half a mind to leave you here and go straight back to the hotel alone" And for the next ten minutes she did nothing but call him horrid Poor Winterbourne was tairly bewildered, no young lady had as yet done him the honour to be so agitated by the announcement of his movements His companion, after this, ceased to pay any attention to the curiosities of Chillon or the beauties of the lake, she opened fire upon the mysterious charmer in Geneva, whom she appeared to have instantly taken for granted that he was hurrying back to see How did Miss Daisy Miller know that there was a charmer in Geneva? Winterbourne, who denied the existence of such a person, was quite unable to discover, and he was divided between amazement at the rapidity of her induction and amusement at the frankness of her perviflage She seemed to him, in all this an extraordinary mixture of innocence and crudity "Does she never allow you more than three days at a time?" asked Daisy, ironically "Doesn't she give you a vacation in summer? There is no one so hard worked but they can get leave to go off somewhere at this season. I suppose, if you stay another day, she'll come after you in the boat. Do wait over till Friday, and I will go down to the landing to see her arrive!" Winterbourne began to think he had been wrong to feel disappointed in the temper in which the e young lady had embarked. If he had missed the personal accent, the personal accent was now making its appearance It sounded very distinctly, at last, in her telling him she would stop "teasing" him if he would promise her solemnly to come down to Rome in the winter

"That's not a difficult promise to make," said Winter-bourne. "My aunt has taken an apartment in Rome for the winter, and has already asked me to come and see her."

"I don't want you to come for your aunt," said Daisy,
"I want you to come for me" And this was the only so allusion that the young man was ever to hear her make to his invidious kinswoman. He declared that, at any rate, he would certainly come. After this Daisy stopped teasing. Winterbourne took a carriage, and they drove back to Vevey in the dusk, the young girl was very quiet

In the evening Winterbourne mentioned to Mrs Costello that he had spent the afternoon at Chillon with Miss Daisy Miller

"The Americans—of the courier? asked this lady
"Ah, happily," said Winterbourne, "the courier stayed 60 at home."

'She went with you all alone?'

"All alone"

Mrs Costello sniffed a little at her smelling-bottle "And that," she exclaimed, "is the young person whom you wanted me to know!"

PART II

Winterbourne, who had returned to Geneva the day after his excursion to Chillon, went to Rome towards the end of January. His aunt had been established there for several weeks, and he had received a couple of letters 70 from hei. "Those people you were so devoted to last summer at Vevey have turned up here, courier and all," she wrote. "They seem to have made several acquaintances, but the courier continues to be the most mitme. The young lady, however, is also very intimate with some third-rate. Italians, with whom she rackets about in a way that makes much talk. Bring me that pictty novel of Cherbuliez's—Paule. Méré—and. don't come later than the 23rd."

In the natural course of events, Winterbourne, on 80 arriving in Rome, would presently have ascertained Mrs Miller's address at the American banker's, and have gone to pay his compliments to Miss Daisy "After what happened at Vevey I think I may certainly call upon them," he said to Mrs Costello

"If, after what happens-at Vevey and everywhere-

⁷⁸ Cherbuliez, Victor Cherbuliez (1829-1899), French novelist

you desire to keep up the acquaintance, you are very welcome Of course a man may know every one Men are welcome to the privilege!"

"Pray what is it that happens-here, for instance?" Winterbourne demanded.

"The girl goes about alone with her foreigners. As to what happens further, you must apply elsewhere for information She has picked up half-a-dozen of the regular Roman fortune-hunters, and she takes them 10 about to people's houses When she comes to a party she brings with her a gentleman with a good deal of manner and a wonderful moustache"

"And where is the mother?"

"I haven't the least idea. They are very dreadful people"

Winterbourne meditated a moment "They are very ignorant-very innocent only Depend upon it they are not bad"

"They are hopelessly vulgar," said Mrs Costello 20 "Whether or no being hopelessly vulgar is being bad is a question for the metaphysicians. They are bad enough to dislike, at any rate, and for this short life that is quite enough"

The news that Daisy Miller was surrounded by halfa-dozen wonderful moustaches checked Winterbourne's impulse to go straightway to see her He had perhaps not definitely flattered himself that he had made an ineffaceable impression upon her heart, but he was annoved at hearing of a state of affairs so little in harmony 30 with an image that had lately flitted in and out of his own meditations, the image of a very pretty girl looking out of an old Roman window and asking herself urgently when Mr Winterbourne would arrive. If, however, he determined to wait a little before reminding Miss Miller of his claims to her consideration, he went very soon to call upon two or three other friends. One of these friends was an American lady who had spent several winters at Geneva, where she had placed her children at school. She was a very accomplished woman, 40 and she lived in the Via Gregoriana Winterbourne found her in a little crimson drawing-room, on a third floor; the room was filled with southern sunshine He had not been there ten minutes when the servant came in, announcing "Madame Mila!" This announcement was presently followed by the entrance of little Randolph Miller, who stopped in the middle of the room and stood staring at Winterbourne. An instant later his pretty sister crossed the threshold, and then, after a considerable interval, Mrs Miller slowly advanced.

"I know you!" said Randolph

'I'm sure you know a great many things," exclaimed Winterbourne, taking him by the hand "How is your education coming on?"

Daisy was exchanging greetings very prettily with her hostess, but when she heard Winterbourne's voice she quickly turned her head "Well, I declare" she said

"I told you I should come, you know," Winterbourne rejoined, smiling

"Well—I didn't believe it," said Miss Daisy

"I am much obliged to you," laughed the young man .

"You might have come to see me!" said Daisy.

"I arrived only yesterday"

"I don't believe that!" the young girl declared

Winterbourne turned with a protesting smile to her mother, but this lady evaded his glance, and, seating herself, fixed her eyes upon her son "We've got a bigger place than this," said Randolph "It's all gold on

Mrs Miller turned uneasily in her chair "I told you if I were going to bring you, you would say something!" she murmu1ed

"I told you!" Randolph exclaimed "I tell you, sir" he added, jocosely, giving Winterbourne a thump on the knee "It is bigger, too!"

Daisy had entered upon a lively conversation with her hostess, and Winterbourne judged it becoming to address a few words to her mother "I hope you have been well since we parted at Vevey," he said

Mrs Miller now certainly looked at him-at his chin "Not very well, sir," she answered

"She's got the dyspepsia," said Randolph "I've got it, too Father's got it I ve got it most!"

This announcement, instead of embarrassing Mrs Miller, seemed to relieve her "I suffer from the liver," she said "I think it's this climate, it's less bracing than Schenectady, especially in the winter season. I don't know whether you know we reside at Schenectady I was saying to Daisy that I certainly hadn't found any one like Dr Davis, and I didn't believe I should Oh, at Schenectady he stands first they think everything of him He has so much to do, and yet there was nothing he wouldn't do for me He said he never saw anything like my dyspepsia, but he was bound to cure it. I'm sure there was nothing he wouldn't try. He was just going of try something new when we came off. Mr. Miller winted Daisy to see Europe for herself. But I wrote to Mr. Miller that it seems as if I couldn't get on without Di. Davis. At Schenectady he stands at the very top, and there's a great deal of sickness there, too. It affects my sleep."

Winterbourne had a good deal of pathological gossip with Dr Davis's patient, during which Daisy chattered arremittingly to her own companion. The young man sked Mis Miller how she was pleased with Rome Well, I must say I am disappointed," she answered We had heard so much about it, I suppose we had heard too much. But we couldn't help that. We had been led to expect something different."

Ah, wait a little, and you will become very fond of it said Winterbourne

Thate it worse and woise every day!" cried Randolph You are like the infant Hannibal, said Winterpourne

No, I am't'" Randolph declared, at a venture

You are not much like an infant," said his mother. But we have seen places," she resumed, "that I should put a long way before Rome" And in reply to Winterbourne's interrogation, "There's Zurich," she conduded, "I think Zurich is lovely, and we hadn't heard half so much about it"

The best place we've seen is the City of Richmond!" and Randolph

He means the ship," his mother explained "We crossed in that ship Randolph had a good time on the (11) of Richmond."

It's the best place I've seen," the child repeated Only it was turned the wrong way."

Well, we've got to turn the right way some time," and Mrs Miller, with a little laugh Winterbourne expressed the hope that her daughter at least found some gratification in Rome, and she declared that Daisy was quite carried away "It's on account of the society—the society's splendid. She goes round everywhere, she has made a great number of acquaintances. Of course, she goes round more than I do. I must say they have been very sociable, they have taken her right in And then she knows a great many gentlemen. Oh, she thinks there's nothing like Rome. Of course, it's a great deal pleasanter for a young lady if she knows plenty of gentlemen"

By this time Daisy had turned her attention again to Winterbourne "I've been telling Mrs Walker how 50 mean you were!" the young girl announced

"And what is the evidence you have offered?" asked Winterbourne, rather annoyed at Miss Miller's want of appreciation of the zeal of an admirer who on his way down to Rome had stopped neither at Bologna nor at Florence, simply because of a certain sentimental impatience. He remembered that a cynical compatriot had once told him that American women—the pretty ones, and this gave a largeness to the axiom—were at once the most exacting in the world and the least endowed on with a sense of indebtedness.

"Why, you were awfully mean at Vevey," said Daisy. "You wouldn't do anything You wouldn't stay there when I asked you"

"My dearest young lady," cried Winterbourne, with eloquence, "have I come all the way to Rome to encounter your reproaches?"

"Just hear him say that!" said Daisy to her hostess, giving a twist to a bow on this lady's dress "Did you ever hear anything so quaint?"

"So quaint, my dear?" murmured Mrs Walker, in a tone of a partisan of Winterbourne

"Well, I don't know, said Dosy, fingering Mrs Walker's ribbons "Mrs Walker I want to tell you something"

"Mother-r," interposed Randolph, with his rough ends to his words, "I tell you you've got to go I ug.moll raise—something!"

"I'm not afraid of Eugenio," said Dusy, with a toss of her head. "Look here, Mrs. Wadter," she went on, "you so know I'm coming to your party."

"I am delighted to hear it"

"I've got a lovely dress!"

"I am very sure of that"

20 like

"But I want to ask a favour—permission to bring a friend"

"I shall be happy to see any of your friends," said Mrs Walker, turning with a smile to Mrs Miller

Oh, they are not my friends,' answered Daisy's mamma, smiling shyly, in her own fashion "I never spoke to them"

"It's an intimate friend of mine—Mr Giovanelli," said Daisy, without a tremor in her clear little voice, or a shadow on her brilliant little face

Mrs Walker was silent a moment, she gave a rapid glance at Winterbourne "I shall be glad to see Mr. Giovanelli," she then said

"He's an Italian," Daisy pursued, with the prettiest serenity "He's a great friend of mine—he's the hand-somest man in the world—except Mr Winterbourne! He knows plenty of Italians, but he wants to know some Americans He thinks ever so much of Americans He's tremendously clever. He's perfectly lovely!"

It was settled that this brilliant personage should be brought to Mrs Walker's party, and then Mrs Miller prepared to take her leave "I guess we'll go back to the hotel." she said

"You may go back to the hotel, mother, but I'm going 20 to take a walk," said Daisy

"She's going to walk with Mr Giovanelli," Randolph proclaimed

"I am going to the Pincio," said Daisy, smiling

"Alone, my dear—at this hour?" Mrs Walker asked The afternoon was drawing to a close—it was the hour for the throng of carriages and of contemplative pedestrians "I don't think it's safe, my dear," said Mrs Walker

"Neither do I,' subjoined Mrs Miller 'You'll get 30 the fever, as sure as you live Remember what Dr Davis told you'

"Give her some medicine before she goes said Randolph

The company had risen to its feet, Daisy, still showing her pretty teeth, bent over and kissed her hostess "Mrs Walker, you are too perfect," she said "I'm not going alone, I am going to meet a friend."

"Your friend won't keep you from getting the fever,"

Mrs. Miller observed.

"Is it Mr Giovanelli?" asked the hostess

Winterbourne was watching the young girl, at this question his attention quickened. She stood there smiling and smoothing her bonnet ribbons, she glanced at Winterbourne. Then, while she glanced and smiled, she answered, without a shade of hesitation, "Mr Giovanelli—the beautiful Giovanelli."

"My dear young friend," said Mrs. Walker, taking her hand, pleadingly, "don't walk off to the Pincio at this hour to meet a beautiful Italian"

"Well, he speaks English," said Mrs Miller.

"Gracious me!" Daisy exclaimed, "I don't want to do anything improper. There's an easy way to settle it She continued to glance at Winterbourne. "The Pincio is only a hundred yards distant, and if Mr Winterbourne were as polite as he pretends, he would offer to wilk with me!"

Winterbourne's politeness hastened to affirm itself and the young girl gave him gracious leave to accompany her They passed down stairs before her mother and at the door Winterbourne perceived Mrs. Millers carriage drawn up, with the ornamental courier whose acquaintance he had made at Vevey seated within "Good-bye, Eugenio!" cried Daisy, "I'm going to take a walk." The distance from the Via Gregoriana to the beautiful garden at the other end of the Pincian Hill is in fact, rapidly traversed. As the day was splendid, how ever, and the concourse of vehicles, walkers, and loungers numerous the young Americans found their progress much delayed. This fact was highly agreeable to Winterbourne, in spite of his consciousness of his singular situation. The slow-moving idly-gazing Roman crowd bestowed much attention upon the extremely pretty young foreign lidy who was passing through it upon his arm, and he wondered what on earth had been in Daisy's mind when she proposed to expose herselt unattended, to its appreciation. His own mission, to her sense, apparently, was to consign her to the hands of Mr Giovanelli, but Winterbourne, at once annoyed and gratified, resolved that he would do no such thing

"Why haven't you been to see me?" asked Dust "You can't get out of that"

"I have had the honour of telling you that I have only just stepped out of the train."

"You must have stayed in the train a good while after it stopped!" cried the young girl, with her little laugh "I suppose you were asleep. You have had time to go to see Mrs. Walker."

"I knew Mrs Walker—" Winterbourne began to explain

²³ Pincio, Monte Pincio, a small hill just within the walls of Rome

I know where you knew her You knew her at Geneva She told me so Well, you knew me at Vevey That's just as good So you ought to have come" She isked him no other question than this, she began to prattle about her own affairs "We've got splendid rooms at the hotel, Eugenio says they're the best rooms in Rome We are going to stay all winter, if we don't die of the fever, and I guess we'll stay then It's a great deal nicer than I thought, I thought it would be fearfully quiet, I was sure it would be awfully poky I was $_{\rm M}$ re we should be going round all the time with one of those dreadful old men that explain about the pictures and things. But we only had about a week of that, and now I m enjoying myself I know ever so many people, and they are all so charming. The society's extremely select There are all kinds-English, and Germans, and Inlans I think I like the English best I like their style of conversation. But there are some lovely Americans Inever saw anything so hospitable. There's something or her every day. There's not much dancing, but I must sa I never thought dancing was everything. I was alwas fond of conversation I guess I shall have plenty at Mrs Walker's-her rooms are so small " When they had passed the gate of the Pincian Gardens, Miss Miller began to wonder where Mr Giovanelli might be 'We had better go straight to that place in front," she said, where you look at the view"

I certainly shall not help you to find him,' Winter-bourne declared

Then I shall find him without you, 'said Miss Daisy You certainly won't leave me'" cried Winterbourne. She burst into her little laugh "Are you afraid you'll get lost—or run over? But there's Giovanelli, leaning gainst that tree. He's staring at the women in the carriages, did you ever see anything so cool?"

Winterbourne perceived at some distance a little man standing with folded arms, nursing his cane. He had a handsome face, an artfully poised hat, a glass in one eye, and a nosegay in his buttonhole. Winterbourne looked it him a moment, and then said, "Do you mean to speak to that man?"

Do I mean to speak to him? Why, you don't suppose I mean to communicate by signs?"

Pray understand, then," said Winterbourne, "that I intend to remain with you"

Daisy stopped and looked at him, without a sign of troubled consciousness in her face, with nothing but the presence of her charming eyes and her happy dimples. "Well, she's a cool one" thought the young man.

"I don't like the way you say that," said Daisy "It's 50 too imperious"

"I beg your pardon if I say it wrong. The main point is to give you an idea of my meaning."

The young girl looked at him more gravely, but with eyes that were prettier than ever "I have never allowed a gentleman to dictate to me, or to interfere with anything I do"

"I think you have made a mistake," said Winter-bourne "You should sometimes listen to a gentleman—the right one"

Daisy began to laugh again. "I do nothing but listen to gentlement" she exclaimed. "Tell me if Mr. Giovanelli is the right one."

The gentleman with the nosegay in his bosom had now perceived our two friends, and was approaching the young girl with obsequious rapidity. He bowed to Winterbourne as well as to the latter's companion, he had a brilliant smile, an intelligent eye, Winterbourne thought him not a bad-looking fellow. But he nevertheless said to Daisy, "No, he's not the right one"

Daisy evidently had a natural talent for performing introductions, she mentioned the name of each of her companions to the other She strolled along with one of them on each side of her, Mr Giovanelli, who spoke English very cleverly—Winterbourne afterwards learned that he had practised the idiom upon a great many American heiresses-addressed to her a great deal of very polite nonsense, he was extremely urbane, and the young American, who said nothing, reflected upon that profundity of Italian cleverness which enables people to 80 appear more gracious in proportion as they are more acutely disappointed Giovanelli, of course, had counted upon something more intimate, he had not bargained for a party of three But he kept his temper in a manner which suggested far-stretching intentions. Winterbourne flattered himself that he had taken his measure "He is not a gentleman," said the young American, "he is only a clever imitation of one. He is a music-master, or a penny-a-liner, or a third-rate artist. Damn his good looks!" Mr Giovanelli had certainly a very pretty face, but Winterbourne felt a superior indignation at his own lovely fellow-country woman's not knowing the difference between a spurious gentleman and a real one Giovanelli chattered and jested, and made himself wonderfully agreeable. It was true that, if he was an imitation, the imitation was brilliant "Nevertheless," Winterbourne said to himself, 'a nice girl ought to know!" And then he came back to the question whether to this was, in fact, a nice girl Would a nice girl-even allowing for her being a little American flirt-make a rendezvous with a presumably low-lived foreigner? The rendezvous in this case, indeed, had been in broad daylight, and in the most crowded corner of Rome, but was it not possible to regard the choice of thesc circumstances as a proof of extreme cynicism? Singular though it may seem. Winterbourne was vexed that the young girl, in joining her amoroso, should not appear more impatient of his own company, and he was vexed 20 because of his inclination. It was impossible to regard her as a perfectly well-conducted young lady, she was wanting in a certain indispensable delicacy. It would therefore simplify matters greatly to be able to treat her as the object of one of those sentiments which are called by romancers "lawless passions". That she should seem to wish to get rid of him would help him to think more lightly of her, and to be able to think more lightly of her would make her much less perplexing. But Daisy, on this occasion, continued to piesent herself as an in-30 scrutable combination of audacity and innocence

She had been walking some quarter of an hour, attended by her two cavaliers, and responding in a tone of very childish guety, as it seemed to Winterbourne, to the pretty speeches of Mr Giovanelli, when a carriage that had detached itself from the revolving train drew up beside the path. At the same moment Winterbourne perceived that his friend Mrs Walker—the lady whose house he had lately left—was seated in the vehicle, and was beckening to him. Leaving Miss Miller's side, 40 he hastened to obey her summons. Mrs Walker was flushed, she wore an excited air. "It is really too dreadful," she said. 'That gill must not do this sort of thing. She must not walk here with you two men. Fifty people have noticed her.'

Winterbourne raised his eyebrows "I think it's a pity to make too much fuss about it"

"It's a pity to let the girl ruin herself!"

"She is very innocent, said Winterbourne

"She's very crazy!" cried Mrs Walker "Did you ever see anything so imbecile as her mother? After you had all left me, just now, I could not sit still for thinking of it. It seemed too pitiful not even to attempt to save her. I ordered the carriage and put on my bonnet, and came here as quickly as possible. Thank Heaven I have found you!"

'What do you propose to do with us?" asked Winterbourne, smiling

"To ask her to get in, to drive her about here for half-an-hour, so that the world may see that she is not running absolutely wild, and then to take her safely home"

I don't think it's a very happy thought," said Winter-bourne, 'but you can try''

Mrs Walker tried The young man went in pursuit of Mrss Miller, who had simply nodded and smiled at his interlocutor in the carriage, and had gone her wait with her companion. Daisy, on learning that Mrs Walker wished to speak to her, retraced her steps with a perfect good grace and with Mrs Giovanelli at her side. She declared that she was delighted to have a chance to present this gentleman to Mrs Walker. She immediately achieved the introduction and declared that she had never in her life seen anything so lovely as Mrs. Walkers carriage-rug.

"I am glad you admire it," said this lady, smiling sweetly "Will you get in and let me put it over you?"

"Oh no, thank you," said Daisy "I shall admire it much more as I see you driving round with it."

"Do get in and drive with me!" said Mrs Walker

"That would be charming, but it's so enchanting just as I am!" and Daisy gave a brilliant glance at the gentle men on either side of her

'It may be enchanting, dear child, but it is not the custom here," urged Mrs Walker, leaning forward in her victoria, with her hands devoutly clasped

"Well, it ought to be, then!" said Daisy "If I didnt walk I should expire"

"You should walk with your mother, dear," cried the lady from Geneva, losing patience

"With my mother, dear" exclaimed the young g rl Winterbourne saw that she scented interference Mis mother never walked ten steps in her life And then you know," she added, with a laugh, "I am more than five years old."

You are old enough to be more reasonable You are old enough, dear Miss Miller, to be talked about"

Daisy looked at Mrs. Walker, smiling intensely Talked about? What do you mean?"

Come into my carriage, and I will tell you

Daisy turned her quickened glance again from one of the gentlemen beside her to the other Mi Giovanelli was bowing to and fro, rubbing down his gloves and laughing very agreeably, Winterbourne thought it a most unpleasant scene. "I don't think I want to know what you mean," said Daisy, presently. "I don't think I should like it."

Winterbourne wished that Mrs Walker would tuck in her carriage-rug and drive away, but this lady did not enjoy being defied, as she afterwards told him Should you prefer being thought a very reckless girl?" she demanded Gracious' exclaimed Daisy She looked again at Mr Giovanelli, then she turned to Winterbourne There was a little pink flush in her cheek, she was tremendously pretty. Does Mr Winterbourne think," she isked slowly, smiling, throwing back her head and glancing at him from head to foot, "that—to save my reputation—I ought to get into the carriage?"

Winterbourne coloured, for an instant he hesitated greatly. It seemed so strange to hear her speak that way of her "reputation." But he himself, in fact, must speak in accordance with gallantry. The finest gallantry here was simply to tell her the truth, and the truth for Winterbourne—as the few indications I have been able to give have made him known to the reader—was that Daisy Miller should take Mrs Walker's advice. He looked at her exquisite prettiness, and then said, very cently. I think you should get into the carriage."

Daisy gave a violent laugh 'I never heard anything so stiff! If this is improper, Mrs Walker," she pursued, then I am all improper, and you must give me up Good-bye, I hope you'll have a lovely ride! and, with Mr Giovanelli, who made a triumphantly obsequious salute, she turned away

Mrs Walker sat looking after her, and there were tears in Mrs Walker's eyes "Get in here, sir," she said to Winterbourne, indicating the place beside her. The toung man answered that he felt bound to accompany

Miss Miller, whereupon Mrs Walker declared that if he refused her this favour she would never speak to him again. She was evidently in earnest Winterbourne overtook Daisy and her companion, and, offering the young girl his hand, told her that Mrs Walker had made an imperious claim upon his society. He expected that in answer she would say something rather free, something to commit herself still further to that "recklessness" from which Mrs Walker had so charitably endeavoured to dissuade her. But she only shook his hand, hardly looking at him, while Mr. Giovanelli bade him farewell with a too emphatic flourish of the hat

Winterbourne was not in the best possible humour as he took his seat in Mrs Walkers victoria. "That was 60 not clever of you," he said, candidly while the vehicle mingled again with the throng of carriages.

"In such a case," his companion answered, "I don't wish to be clever, I wish to be earnest?"

'Well, your earnestness has only offended her and put her off "

It has happened very well," said Mis Walker "If she is perfectly determined to compromise herself, the sooner one knows it the better, one can act accordingly."

"I suspect she meant no harm," Winterbourne rejoined "So I thought a month ago But she his been going too far"

"What has she been doing,"

"Everything that is not done here. Flirting with any man she could pick up, sitting in corners with mysterious Italians, dancing all the evening with the same partners, receiving visits at eleven o'clock at night. Her mother goes away when visitors come."

"But her brother," said Winterbourne, laughing, "sits 80 up till midnight"

"He must be edified by what he sees I'm told that at their hotel every one is talking about her, and that a smile goes round among all the servants when a gentleman comes and asks for Miss Miller"

"The servants be hanged!" said Winterbourne, angrily "The poor girl's only fault," he presently added, "is that she is very uncultivated"

"She is naturally indelicate," Mrs Walker declared
"Take that example this morning How long had you 90 known her at Vevey?"

"A couple of days"

Daisy Miller 577

"Fancy, then, her making it a personal matter that you should have left the place!"

Winterbourne was silent for some moments, then he said, "I suspect, Mrs Walker, that you and I have lived too long at Geneva!" And he added a request that she should inform him with what particular design she had made him enter her carriage

"I wished to beg you to cease your relations with Miss Miller—not to flut with her—to give her no further 10 opportunity to expose herself—to let her alone, in short."

"I'm afraid I can't do that," said Winterbourne "I like her extremely"

"All the more reason that you shouldn't help her to make a scandal"

"There shall be nothing scandalous in my attentions to her"

"There certainly will be in the way she takes them But I have said what I had on my conscience," Mrs Walker pursued "If you wish to rejoin the young lady 20 I will put you down Heic, by-the-way, you have a chance"

The carriage was traversing that part of the Pincian Garden that overhangs the wall of Rome and overlooks the beautiful Villa Borghese. It is bordered by a large parapet, near which there are several seats. One of the seats, at a distance, was occupied by a gentleman and a lady, towards whom Mrs Walker gave a toss of her head At the same moment these persons rose and walked towards the parapet. Whaterbourne had asked the 30 coachman to stop, he now descended from the carriage His companion looked at him a moment in silence, then, while he raised his hat, she drove majestically away Winterbourne stood there he had turned his eyes towards Daisy and her cavalier They evidently saw no one, they were too deeply occupied with each other. When they reached the low garden-wall they stood a moment looking off at the great flat-topped pine-clusters of the Villa Borghese, then Giovanelli seated himself familiarly upon the broad ledge of the wall. The western sun in the op-40 posite sky sent out a brilliant shaft through a couple of cloud-bars, whereupon Daisy's companion took her parasol out of her hands and opened it. She came a little nearer, and he held the parasol over her, then, still holding it, he let it rest upon her shoulder, so that both of their heads were hidden from Winterbourne This young man lingered a moment, then he began to walk But he walked—not towards the couple with the parasol—towards the residence of his aunt, Mrs Costello.

He flattered himself on the following day that there was no smiling among the servants when he, at least, s asked for Mrs Miller at her hotel This lady and her daughter, however, were not at home, and on the next day after, repeating his visit, Winterbourne again had the misfortune not to find them Mrs Walker's party took place on the evening of the third day, and, in spite of the frigidity of his last interview with the hostess. Winterbourne was among the guests Mrs Walker was one of those American ladies who, while residing abroad, make a point, in their own phrase, of studying European society, and she had on this occasion collected several specimens of her diversely-born fellow-mortals to serve. as it were, as text-books. When Winterbourne arrived, Daisy Miller was not there, but in a few moments he saw her mother come in alone, very shyly and ruefully Mis Millers hair above her exposed-looking temples was more frizzled than ever As she approached Mrs Walker, Winterbourne also drew near

"You see I've come all alone. said poor Mrs Miller "I'm so frightened I don't know what to do It's the first time I've ever been to a party alone, especially in this country. I wanted to bring Randolph, or Eugenio, or some one, but Daisy just pushed me off by myself. I ain tused to going round alone."

"And does not your daughter intend to favour us with her society?" demanded Mrs. Walker, impressively

Well, Daisy's all dressed, said Mrs Miller, with that accent of the dispassionate, if not of the philosophic historian with which she always recorded the current incidents of her daughter's career. "She got dressed on purpose before dinner. But she's got a friend of hers there, that gentleman—the Italian—that she wanted to bring. They've got going at the piano, it seems as if they couldn't leave off. Mr. Giovanelli sings splendidly. But I guess they'll come before very long, concluded Mrs. Miller, hopefully.

"I'm sorry she should come—in that way," said Mrs Walker

"Well, I told her that there was no use in her getting dressed before dinner if she was going to wait three hours," responded Daisy's mamma. "I didn't see the use of her putting on such a dress as that to sit round with Mr. Giovanelli."

"This is most horrible!" said Mrs Walker, turning away and addressing herself to Winterbourne "Elle ...i.h.be It's her revenge for my having ventured to remonstrate with her When she comes I shall not speak to her"

Daisy came after eleven o clock, but she was not, on such an occasion, a young lady to wait to be spoken to She rustled forward in radiant loveliness, smiling and chattering, carrying a large bouquet, and attended by Mr Giovanelli Every one stopped talking, and turned and looked at her She came straight to Mrs Walker Im afraid you thought I never was coming, so I sent mother off to tell you I wanted to make Mr Giovanelli practise some things before he came, you know he sings beautifully, and I want you to ask him to sing. This is Mr Giovanelli, you know I introduced him to you, he's got the most lovely voice, and he knows the most charming set of songs. I made him go over them this evening on purpose, we had the greatest time at the hotel." Of all this Daisy delivered herself with the sweetest, brightest audibleness, looking now at her hostess and now round the room, while she gave a series of little pats round her shoulders to the edges of her dress "Is there any one I know?" she asked

I think every one knows you!" said Mrs Walker, pregnantly, and she gave a very cursory greeting to Mr Giovanelli. This gentleman bore himself gallantly. He smiled and bowed, and showed his white teeth, he curled his moustaches and rolled his eves, and performed all the proper functions of a handsome Italian at an evening party. He sang very piettily half-a-dozen songs, though Mrs Walker afterwards declared that she had been quite unable to find out who asked him. It was apparently not Daisy who had given him his orders. Daisy sat at a distance from the piano, and though she had publicly, as it were, professed a high admiration for his singing, talked, not inaudibly, while it was going on

It's a pity these rooms are so small, we can't dance," she said to Winterbourne, as if she had seen him five minutes before

"I am not sorry we can't dance," Winterbourne answered, "I don't dance"

Of course you don't dance, you're too stiff," said Miss Daisy "I hope you enjoyed your drive with Mrs.Walker!"

No, I didn't enjoy it, I preferred walking with you" We paired off, that was much better," said Daisy.

"But did you ever hear anything so cool as Mrs. Walker's wanting me to get into her carriage and drop poor Mr Giovanelli, and under the pietext that it was proper? People have different ideas! It would have been most 50 unkind, he had been talking about that walk for ten days."

"He should not have talked about it at all," said Winterbourne "he would never have proposed to a young lady of this country to walk about the streets with him"

"About the streets?" cried Daisy, with her pretty stare 'Where then, would he have proposed to her to walk? The Pincio is not the streets, either, and I, thank goodness, am not a young lady of this country. The young ladies of this country have a dreadfully poky time of it, so far as I can learn, I don't see why I should change my 60 habits for them."

"I am afraid your habits are those of a flirt," said Winterbourne, gravely

"Of course they are," she cried, giving him her little smiling stare again. "I'm a fearful, frightful flirt! Did you ever hear of a nice girl that was not? But I suppose you will tell me now that I am not a nice girl."

"You're a very nice girl, but I wish you would flirt with me, and me only," said Winterbourne

'Ah! thank you—thank you very much, you are the 70 last man I should think of flirting with As I have had the pleasure of informing you, you are too stiff."

"You say that too often," said Winterbourne

Daisy gave a delighted laugh "If I could have the sweet hope of making you angry, I should say it again."

"Don't do that, when I am angry I m stiffer than ever But if you won't flirt with me, do cease, at least, to flirt with your friend at the piano, they don't understand that sort of thing here"

"I thought they understood nothing else!" exclaimed 80 Daisy

"Not in young unmarried women"

'It seems to me much more proper in young unmarried women than in old married ones," Daisy declared

"Well," said Winterbourne, "when you deal with natives you must go by the custom of the place Flirting is a purely American custom, it doesn't exist here. So when you show yourself in public with Mr Giovanelli, and without your mother—"

² Elle s'affiche She is seeking notoriety

"Gracious! poor mother!" interposed Daisy

"Though you may be flirting, Mr Giovanelli is not, he means something else"

"He isn't preaching, at any rate," said Daisy with vivacity "And if you want very much to know, we are neither of us flirting, we are too good friends for that, we are very intimate friends."

"Ah!" rejoined Winterbourne, "if you are in love with each other it is another affair."

She had allowed him up to this point to talk so frankly that he had no expectation of shocking her by this ejaculation, but she immediately got up, blushing visibly, and leaving him to exclaim mentally that little American flirts were the queerest creatures in the world 'Mr Giovanelli, at least,' she said, giving her interlocutor a single glance, "never says such very disagreeable things to me"

Winterbourne was bewildered, he stood staring. Mr Grovancili had finished singing, he left the piano and 20 came over to Daisy. Won't you come into the other room and have some tea? he asked, bending before her with his ornamental smile.

Daisy turned to Winterbourne, beginning to smile again. He was still more perplexed for this inconsequent smile made nothing clear, though it seemed to prove, indeed, that she had a sweetness and softness that reveited instinctively to the pardon of offences. "It has never occurred to Mr. Winterbourne to offer me any tea," she said, with her little tormenting manner.

"I have offered you advice," Winterbourne rejoined

"I prefer weak teat" cried Daisy, and she went off with the brilliant Giovanelli. She sat with him in the adjoining room, in the embrasure of the window, for the rest of the evening. There was an interesting performance at the piano, but neither of these young people gave heed to it. When Daisy came to take leave of Mrs Walker, this lady conscientiously repaired the weakness of which she had been guilty at the moment of the young girl's arrival She turned her back straight upon 40 Miss Miller and left her to depart with what grace she might. Winterbourne was standing near the door, he saw it all Daisy turned very pale and looked at her mother, but Mrs Miller was humbly unconscious of any violation of the usual social forms. She appeared, indeed, to have felt an incongruous impulse to draw attention to her own striking observance of them 'Good-night, Mrs

Walker," she said; "we've had a beautiful evening You see, if I let Daisy come to parties without me, I don't want her to go away without me." Daisy tuined away looking with a pale, grave face at the circle near the door, Winterbourne saw that, for the first moment, she was too much shocked and puzzled even for indignation. He on his side was greatly touched.

"That was very cruel," he said to Mrs Walker.

"She never enters my drawing room again!" replied his hostess

Since Winterbourne was not to meet her in Mis Walker's drawing-room, he went as often as possible to Mrs Miller's hotel The ladies were rarely at home, but when he found them the devoted Giovanelli was always present. Very often the brilliant little Roman was in the drawing-room with Daisy alone, Mrs Miller being apparently constantly of the opinion that discretion is the better part of surveillance. Winterbourne noted, at first with surprise, that Daisy on these occasions was never embarrassed or annoyed by his own entrance, but he very presently began to feel that she had no morsurprises for him, the unexpected in her behaviour wis the only thing to expect. She showed no displeasure at her tîte-a-tête with Giovanelli being interrupted, she could charter as freshly and freely with two gentlemen as with one, there was always, in her conversation the same odd mixture of audacity and puerility. Winterbourne remarked to himself that if she was seriously interested in Giovanelli it was very singular that che should not take more trouble to preserve the sanctity of their interviews, and he liked her the more for her inno cent-looking indifference and her apparently inexhausti ble good humour He could hardly have said why, but she seemed to him a girl who would never be jealous At the risk of exciting a somewhat derisive smile on the reader's part, I may affirm that with regard to the women who had hitherto interested him, it very often seemed to Winterbourne among the possibilities that, given certuin contingencies, he should be afraid-literally afraidthese ladies, he had a pleasant sense that he should never be afraid of Daisy Miller It must be added that th sentiment was not altogether flattering to Daisy, it was part of his conviction, or rather of his apprehension, that she would prove a very light young person

But she was evidently very much interested in G_{10V} nelli. She looked at him whenever he spoke, she was perpetually telling him to do this and to do that; she wis constantly "chaffing" and abusing him. She appeared completely to have forgotten that Winterbourne had said anything to displease her at Mrs. Walker's little party. One Sunday afternoon, having gone to St. Peter's with his aunt. Winterbourne perceived Daisy strolling about the great church in company with the inevitable Giovanelli. Presently he pointed out the young girl and her cavalier to Mrs. Costello. This lady looked at them a moment through her eyeglass, and then she said,

'That's what makes you so pensive in these days, eh?"
"I had not the least idea I was pensive," said the young man

You are very much pre-occupied, you are thinking of something"

"And what is it," he asked, "that you accuse me of thinking of?"

"Of that young lady's—Miss Baker's, Miss Chandler's—what's her name?—Miss Miller's intrigue with that 0 little barber's block"

Do you call it an intrigue," Winterbourne asked—an affair that goes on with such peculiar publicity?"

'That's their folly," said Mrs Costello, "it's not their merit"

'No," rejoined Winterbourne, with something of that pensiveness to which his aunt had alluded. I don't believe that there is anything to be called an intrigue."

"I have heard a dozen people speak of it, they say she is quite carried away by him"

"They are certainly very intimate," said Winterbourne. Mrs Costello inspected the young couple again with her optical instrument "He is very handsome One easily sees how it is She thinks him the most elegant man in the world, the finest gentleman. She has never seen anything like him, he is better even than the courier. It was the courier, probably, who introduced him, and if he succeeds in marrying the young lady, the courier will come in for a magnificent commission."

"I don't believe she thinks of marrying him," said Winterbourne, "and I don't believe he hopes to marry her"

"You may be very sure she thinks of nothing She goes on from day to day, from hour to hour, as they did in the Golden Age. I can imagine nothing more vulgar And at the same time," added Mrs Costello, "depend upon it that she may tell you any moment that she is engaged."

"I think that is more than Giovanelli expects," said Winterbourne.

"Who is Giovanelli?"

"The little Italian I have asked questions about him 50 and learned something. He is apparently a perfectly respectable little man. I believe he is, in a small way, a cavaliere avvocato. But he doesn't move in what are called the first circles I think it is really not absolutely impossible that the courier introduced him. He is evidently immensely charmed with Miss Miller If she thinks him the finest gentleman in the world, he, on his side, has never found himself in personal contact with such splendor, such opulence, such expensiveness, as this young lady's And then she must seem to him wonder- 60 fully pretty and inveresting. I rather doubt that he dreams of marrying her. That must appear to him too impossible a piece of luck. He has nothing but his handsome face to offer, and there is a substantial Mr. Miller in that mysterious land of dollars Giovanelli knows that he hasn t a title to offer. If he were only a count or a marchese! He must wonder at his luck, at the way they have taken him up"

"He accounts for it by his handsome face, and thinks Miss Miller a young lady qui se passe ses fantament?" 70 said Mrs Costello

"It is very true," Winterbourne pursued, "that Daisy and her mamma have not yet risen to that stage of—what shall I call it?—of culture, at which the idea of catching a count or a matchese begins. I believe that they are intellectually incapable of that conception."

"Ah! but the avvocato can't believe it," said Mrs Costello

Of the observation excited by Daisy's "intrigue," Winterbourne gathered that day at St. Peter's sufficient eviewedence. A dozen of the American colonists in Rome came to talk with Mrs. Costello, who sat on a little portable stool at the base of one of the great pilasters. The vesper service was going forward in splendid chants and organ-tones in the adjacent choir, and meanwhile, between Mrs. Costello and her friends, there was a great deal said about poor little Miss Miller's going really "too far." Winterbourne was not pleased with what he heard;

but when, coming out upon the great steps of the church, he saw Daisy, who had emerged before him, get into an open cab with her accomplice and roll away through the cynical streets of Rome, he could not deny to himself that she was going very far indeed. He felt very sorry for her-not exactly that he believed that she had completely lost her head, but because it was painful to hear so much that was pretty, and undefended, and natural, assigned to a vulgar place among the categories of dis-10 order He made an attempt after this to give a hint to Mrs Miller He met one day in the Corso a frienda tourist like himself, who had just come out of the Doria Palace, where he had been walking through the beautiful gallery His friend talked for a moment about the superb portrait of Innocent X, by Velasquez, which hangs in one of the cabinets of the palace, and then said, "And in the same cabinet, by-the-way, I had the pleasure of contemplating a picture of a different kind-that pretty American girl whom you pointed out to me last 20 week" In answer to Winterbourne's inquiries, his friend narrated that the pretty American girl-prettier than ever-was seated with a companion in the secluded nook in which the great papal portrait was en-

"Who was her companion?" asked Winterbourne.

"A little Italian with a bouquet in his button-hole. The girl is delightfully pretty, but I thought I understood from you the other day that she was a young lady du meilicur monde."

"So she is!" answered Winterbourne; and having assured himself that his informant had seen Daisy and her companion but five minutes before, he jumped into a cab and went to call on Mrs. Miller She was at home; but she apologized to him for receiving him in Daisy's absence

"She's gone out somewhere with Mr. Giovanelli," said Mrs. Miller "She's always going round with Giovanelli."

"I have noticed that they are very intimate," Winter-bourne observed.

"Oh, it seems as if they couldn't live without each other!" said Mrs. Miller. "Well, he's a real gentleman, anyhow. I keep telling Daisy she's engaged!"

"And what does Daisy say?"

"Oh, she says she isn't engaged. But she might as well be!" this impartial parent resumed "She goes on as if she was But I've made Mr. Giovanelli promise to tell me, if she doesn't I should want to write to Mr. Miller about it—shouldn't you?"

Winterbourne replied that he certainly should, and the state of mind of Daisy's mamma struck him as so un-5, precedented in the annals of parental vigilance that he gave up as utterly irrelevant the attempt to place her upon her guard

After this Daisy was never at home, and Winterbourne ceased to meet her at the houses of their common acquaintances because, as he perceived, these shrewd people had quite made up their minds that she was going too far. They ceased to invite her, and they intimated that they desired to express to observant Europeans the great truth that, though Miss Daisy Miller was a young . American lady, her behaviour was not representativewas regarded by her compatriots as abnormal Winterbourne wondered how she felt about all the cold shoulders that were turned towards her, and sometimes it annoyed him to suspect that she did not feel at all. He said to himself that she was too light and childish, too uncultivated and unreasoning, too provincial, to have reflected upon her ostracism, or even to have perceived it Then at other moments he believed that she carried about in her elegant and irresponsible little organism a defiant, passionate, perfectly observant consciousness of the impression she produced He asked himself whether Daisy's defiance came from the consciousness of innocence, or from her being, essentially, a young person of the reckless class It must be admitted that holding one s self to a belief in Daisy's "innocence" came to seem to Winterbourne more and more a matter of fine-spun gallantry As I have already had occasion to relate, he was angry at finding himself reduced to chopping logic about this young lady, he was vexed at his want of instinctive certitude as to how far her eccentricities were generic, national, and how far they were personal. From either view of them he had somehow missed her, and now it was too late. She was "carried away" by Mr. Giovanelli.

A few days after his brief interview with her mother he encountered her in that beautiful abode of flowering desolation known as the Palace of the Caesars. The early Roman spring had filled the air with bloom and perfume, and the rugged surface of the Palatine was muffled with tender verdure. Daisy was strolling along the top of one of those great mounds of ruin that are embanked with mossy marble and paved with monumental inscriptions. It seemed to him that Rome had never been so lovely as just then. He stood looking off at the enchanting harmony of line and colour that remotely encircles the city, inhaling the softly humid odours, and feeling the freshness of the year and the antiquity of the place reaffirm themselves in mysterious interfusion. It seemed to him, also, that Daisy had never looked so pretty; but this had been an observation of his whenever he met her Giovanelli was at her side, and Giovanelli, too, woie an aspect of even unwonted brilliancy.

"Well," said Dassy, "I should think you would be lonesome!"

"Lonesome?" asked Winterbourne

"You are always going round by yourself Can't you get any one to walk with you?"

"I am not so fortunate," said Winterbourne, "as your companion"

Giovanelli, from the first, had treated Winterbourne with distinguished politeness, he listened with a deferential air to his remarks, he laughed, punctiliously, at his pleasantries, he seemed disposed to testify to his belief that Winterbourne was a superior young man. He carried himself in no degree like a jealous wooer, he had obviously a great deal of tact, he had no objection to your expecting a little humility of him. It even seemed to Winterbourne at times that Giovanelli would find a certain mental relief in being able to have a private understanding with him-to say to him, as an intelligent man that, bless you, he knew how extraordinary was this young lady, and didn't flatter himself with delusive-or, at least, too delusive-hopes of matrimony and dollars On this occasion he strolled away from his companion to pluck a sprig of almond-blossom, which he carefully arranged in his button-hole Glovanelli. "Because you that," said Daisy, watching with him." And she nodded at her attendant.

"Every one thinks so—if you care to know," said Winterbourne

"Of course I care to know!" Daisy exclaimed, seriously "But I don't believe it. They are only pretending to be shocked. They don't really care a straw what I do. Besides, I don't go round so much"

"I think you will find they do care. They will show it—disagreeably."

Daisy looked at him a moment "How—disagreeably?" "Haven't you noticed anything?" Winterbourne asked.

"I have noticed you But I noticed you were as stiff as an umbrella the first time I saw you'

"You will find I am not so stiff as several others," said Winterbourne, smiling

"How shall I find 1t?"

"By going to see the others."

"What will they do to me?"

"They will give you the cold shoulder. Do you know & what that means?"

Daisy was looking at him intently, she began to colour "Do you mean as Mrs Walker did the other night?"

"Exactly! said Winterbourne

She looked away at Giovanelli, who was decorating himself with his almond-blossom. Then, looking back at Winterbourne. 'I shouldn't think you would let people be so unkind!" she said.

"How can I help it?" he asked

"I should think you would say something"

"I did say something," and he paused a moment "I say that your mother tells me that she believes you are engaged"

"Well, she does," said Daisy very simply Winterbourne began to laugh "And does Randolph believe it?" he asked

"I guess Randolph doesn't believe anything," said Daisy Randolph's scepticism excited Winterbourne to further hilarity, and he observed that Giovanelli was coming back to them Daisy, observing it too, addressed herself again to her countryman "Since you have mentioned it," she said, "I am engaged" Winterbourne looked at hei, he had stopped laughing "You don't believe it!" she added

He was silent a moment, and then, "Yes, I believe it," he said

"Oh, no, you don't" she answered "Well, then—I am not!"

The young girl and her cicerone were on their way to the gate of the enclosure, so that Winterbourne, who had but lately entered, presently took leave of them A week afterwards he went to dine at a beautiful villa on the Caelian Hill, and, on arriving, dismissed his hired vehicle. The evening was charming, and he promised himself the satisfaction of walking home beneath the Arch of Constantine and past the vaguely-lighted monuments of the Forum. There was a waning moon in the sky, and her radiance was not brilliant, but she was veiled 10 in a thin cloud-curtain which seemed to diffuse and equalize it When, on his return from the villa (it was eleven o'clock). Winterbourne approached the dusky circle of the Colosseum, it occurred to him, as a lover of the picturesque, that the interior, in the pale moonshine, would be well worth a glance He turned aside and walked to one of the empty arches, near which, as he observed, an open carriage-one of the little Roman streetcabs—was stationed Then he passed in, among the cavernous shadows of the great structure, and emerged upon the clear and silent arena. The place had never seemed to him more impressive One-half of the gigantic circus was in deep shade, the other was sleeping in the luminous dusk. As he stood there he began to murmur Byron's famous lines, out of "Manfred", but before he had finished his quotation he remembered that if nocturnal meditations in the Colosseum are recommended by the poets, they are deprecated by the doctors. The historic atmosphere was there certainly, but the historic atmosphere, scientifically considered, was no better than a 30 villainous miasma Winterbourne walked to the middle of the arena, to take a more general glance, intending thereafter to make a hasty retreat. The great cross in the centre was covered with shadow, it was only as he drew near it that he made it out distinctly. Then he saw that two persons were stationed upon the low steps which formed its base. One of these was a woman, seated, her companion was standing in front of her

Presently the sound of the woman's voice came to him distinctly in the warm night-air. "Well, he looks at us as one of the old lions or tigers may have looked at the Christian martyrs!" These were the words he heard, in the familiar accent of Miss Daisy Miller.

"Let us hope he is not very hungry," responded the ingenious Giovanelli. "He will have to take me first you will serve for dessert!"

Winterbourne stopped, with a sort of horror, and, it must be added, with a sort of relief It was as if a sudden illumination had been flashed upon the ambiguity of Daisy's behaviour, and the riddle had become easy to read. She was a young lady whom a gentleman need no s longer be at pains to respect. He stood there looking at her-looking at her companion, and not reflecting that though he saw them vaguely, he himself must have been more brightly visible He felt angry with himself that he had bothered so much about the right way of regarding Miss Daisy Miller Then, as he was going to advance again, he checked himself, not from the fear that he was doing her injustice, but from the sense of the danger of appearing unbecomingly exhilarated by this sudden revulsion from cautious criticism. He turned away towards the entrance of the place, but, as he did so, he heard Daisy speak again.

"Why, it was Mr. Winterbourne! He saw me—and he cuts me!"

What a clever little reprobate she was, and how smartly she played at injured innocence! But he wouldn't cut her. Winterbourne came forward again, and went towards the great cross. Daisy had got up, Giovanelli lifted his hat. Winterbourne had now begun to think simply of the craziness, from a sanitary point of view, of a delicate young girl lounging away the evening in this nest of malaria. What if she were a clever little reprobate? that was no reason for her dying of the permicional "How long have you been here?" he asked, almost brutally.

Daisy, lovely in the flattering moonlight, looked at him a moment. Then—"All the evening," she answered gently...."I never saw anything so pretty"

"I am afraid," said Winterbourne. "that you will not think Roman fever very pretty This is the way people catch it. I wonder," he added, turning to Giovanelli "that you, a native Roman, should countenance such a terrible indiscretion"

"Ah," said the handsome native, "for myself I am not afraid"

"Neither am I—for you! I am speaking for this young lady."

Giovanelli lifted his well-shaped eyebrows and showed

²⁴ Byron's "Manfred" See the passage in Act III, sc. iv • 70 perniciosa, malaria

his brilliant teeth. But he took Winterbourne's rebuke with docility. "I told the signorina it was a grave indiscretion, but when was the signorina ever prudent?"

"I never was sick, and I don't mean to be!" the signorina declated "I don't look like much, but I'm healthy! I was bound to see the Colosseum by moonlight, I shouldn't have wanted to go home without that; and we have had the most beautiful time, haven't we, Mr Giovanelli? If there has been any danger, Eugenio can give me some pills He has got some splendid pills"

I should advise you," said Winterbourne, "to drive home as fast as possible and take one!"

'What you say is very wise," Giovanelli rejoined "I will go and make sure the carriage is at hand." And he went forward rapidly.

Daisy followed with Winterbourne. He kept looking at her, she seemed not in the least embarrassed. Winterbourne said nothing, Daisy chattered about the beauty of the place. "Well, I have seen the Colosseum by moonlight" she exclaimed. "That's one good thing." Then, noticing Winterbourne's silence, she asked him why he didn't speak. He made no answer, he only began to laugh. They passed under one of the dark archways; Giovanelli was in front with the carriage. Here Daisy stopped a moment, looking at the young American. "Did you believe I was engaged the other day?" she asked

"It doesn't matter what I believed the other day," said Winterbourne, still laughing.

"Well, what do you believe now?"

"I believe that it makes very little difference whether you are engaged or not!"

He felt the young girl's pretty eyes fixed upon him dirough the thick gloom of the archway, she was apparently going to answer. But Giovanelli hurried her torward "Quick! quick!" he said, "if we get in by midnight we are quite safe."

Daisy took her seat in the carriage, and the fortunate Itulian placed himself beside her "Don't forget Eugenio's pillst" said Winterbourne, as he lifted his hat.

"I don't care," said Daisy, in a little strange tone, whether I have Roman fever or not!" Upon this the ob-driver cracked his whip, and they rolled away over the desultory patches of the antique pavement.

Winterbourne—to do him justice, as it were—mentioned to no one that he had encountered Miss Millei, at midnight, in the Colosseum with a gentleman, but, nevertheless, a couple of days later, the fact of her having been there under these circumstances was known to every member of the little American circle, and commented accordingly. Winterbourne reflected that they had of 50 course known it at the hotel, and that, after Daisy's return, there had been an exchange of remarks between the porter and the cab-driver But the young man was conscious, at the same moment, that it had ceased to be a matter of serious regret to him that the little American flirt should be "talked about" by low-minded menials. These people, a day or two later, had serious information to give the little American flirt was alarmingly ill. Winterbourne, when the rumour came to him, immediately went to the hotel for more news He found that 60 two or three charitable friends had preceded him, and that they were being entertained in Mrs Miller's salon by Randolph

"It's going round at night," said Randolph—"that's what made her sick. She's always going round at night. I shouldn't think she'd want to—it's so plaguy dark. You can't see anything here at night, except when there's a moon! In America there's always a moon!" Mrs. Miller was invisible, she was now, at least, giving her daughter the advantage of her society. It was evident that Daisy 70 was dangerously ill.

Winterbourne went often to ask for news of her, and once he saw Mrs Miller, who, though deeply alarmed, was-rather to his surprise-perfectly composed, and, as it appeared, a most efficient and judicious nurse. She talked a good deal about Dr Davis, but Winterbourne paid her the compliment of saying to himself that she was not, after all, such a monstrous goose "Daisy spoke of you the other day," she said to him "Half the time she doesn't know what she's saying, but that time I think 80 she did She gave me a message, she told me to tell you -she told me to tell you that she never was engaged to that handsome Italian I am sure I am very glad, Mr Giovanelli hasn't been near us since she was taken ill I thought he was so much of a gentleman; but I don't call that very polite! A lady told me that he was afraid I was angry with him for taking Daisy round at night Well, so I am, but I suppose he knows I'm a lady. I would scorn to scold him Anyway, she says she's not engaged I don't know why she wanted you to know, 90 but she said to me three times, 'Mind you tell Mr. Winterbourne.' And then she told me to ask if you remembered the time you went to that castle in Switzerland. But I said I wouldn't give any such messages as that. Only, if she is not engaged, I'm sure I'm glad to know it."

But, as Winterbourne had said, it mattered very little. A week after this the poor girl died; it had been a terrible case of the fever. Daisy's grave was in the little Protestant cemetery, in an angle of the wall of the imperial Rome, beneath the cypresses and the thick spring-flowers. Winterbourne stood there beside it, with a number of other mourners—a number larger than the scandal excited by the young lady's career would have led you to expect. Near him stood Giovanelli, who came nearer still before Winterbourne turned away. Giovanelli was very pale, on this occasion he had no flower in his button-hole; he seemed to wish to say something. At last he said, "She was the most beautiful young lady I ever saw, and the most amiable." And then he added in a moment, "and she was the most innocent."

Winterbourne looked at him, and presently repeated 20 his words, "And the most innocent?"

"The most innocent!"

Winterbourne felt sore and angry. "Why the devil," he asked, "did you take her to that fatal place?"

Mr Giovanelli's urbanity was apparently imperturbable He looked on the ground a moment, and then he said, "For myself, I had no fear, and she wanted to go." "That was no reason!" Winterbourne declared.

The subtle Roman again dropped his eyes "If she had lived, I should have got nothing. She would never have married me. I am sure."

The Middle Years

"The Middle Years" first appeared in Scribner's Magazine in 1893, it was collected with other stories in Terminations in 1895.

Technically, the story is an interesting example of James' mature mastery of "point of view". Although told in the third person, the narrative is managed, carefully and con-

"She would never have married you?"

"For a moment I hoped so But no, I am sure."

Winterbourne listened to him, he stood staring at the raw protuberance among the April daisies. When he turned away again, Mr. Giovanelli with his light, slow step, had retired.

Winterbourne almost immediately left Rome; but the following summer he again met his aunt, Mrs Costello, at Vevey Mrs Costello was fond of Vevey In the interval Winterbourne had often thought of Daisy Miller and her mystifying manners. One day he spoke of her to his aunt—said it was on his conscience that he had done her injustice.

"I am sure I don't know," said Mrs. Costello. "How did your injustice affect her?"

"She sent me a message before her death which I didn't understand at the time. But I have understood π since. She would have appreciated one's esteem."

"Is that a modest way," asked Mrs Costello, "of saying that she would have reciprocated one's affection?"

Winterbourne offered no answer to this question, but he presently said, "You were right in that remark that you made last summer. I was booked to make a mistake I have lived too long in foreign parts."

Nevertheless, he went back to live at Geneva, whence there continue to come the most contradictory accounts of his motives of sojourn a report that he is "studying hard—an intimation that he is much interested in a very clever foreign lady.

sistently, from the point of view of a single character. Placing himself at the center of Dencombe's consciousness, the author surveys the scene through Dencombe's—never another's—eyes. The conversation is reported as Dencombe hears it. At no point in the story does the reader know for certain more than Dencombe himself knows. The management is especially ingenious in the opening paragraphs, where Dencombe, upon the basis of the evidence at hand, makes conjectures, tentative and sometimes incorrect, concerning the "group of three persons." The rich potentialities of the restricted point of view were to be more fully realized in the late novels, notably in The Wings of the Dove, The Ambassadors, and The Golden Bowl.

Like several of James' best stories, "The Middle Years" has for its subject the life of the creative artist in literature Two points are stressed in the following story, the artist's desire for perfection and the artist's desire for intelligent appreciation.

Dencombe's life has been one of complete devotion to his art. The mastery of his art has been achieved slowly and with great difficulty. He is a perfectionist. Although he reads his latest book with a good deal of pride, it does not completely satisfy him. He makes numerous small revisions of style: "Dencombe was a passionate corrector, a fingerer of style, the last thing he ever arrived at was a form final for himself." Moreover, he looks forward to even better work in the future: "a certain splendid 'last manner,' the very citadel, as it would prove, of his reputation." This characterization of Dencombe is applicable to James himself.

A second point of emphasis is Dencombe's feeling that his work is not rightly understood or appreciated by the reading public. Even Dr. Hugh, the only enthusiastic admirer whom he has chanced to meet, "fails to guess" Dencombe's "intention" in his latest novel. Possibly we are to infer that "poor Dencombe" dies of the sheer lack of appreciation. The autobiographical parallel here, of course, is much less close. Although the story probably reflects the author's disappointment at the failure of his works to win a large audience, James has never been without discerning readers. Moreover, James did not die of frustration, he lived actually to accomplish what Dencombe could only grandly envisage: "the jewels rare, strings of pearls, he would hang between the columns of his temple."

The April day was soft and bright, and poor Dencombe, happy in the conceit of reasserted strength, stood in the garden of the hotel, comparing, with a deliberation in which, however, there was still something of languot the attractions of easy strolls. He liked the feeling of the south, so far as you could have it in the north, he liked the sandy cliffs and the clustered pines, he liked even the colorless sea. "Bournemouth as a health resort" had sounded like a mere advertisement, but now he was reconciled to the prosaic. The sociable country postman, passing through the garden, had just given him a small parcel, which he took out with him leaving the hotel to the right and creeping to a convenient bench that he knew of, a safe recess in the cliff—It looked to the south, to the tinted walls of the Island, and was protected behind by the sloping shoulder of the down. He was tired enough when he reached it, and for a moment he was disappointed, he was better, of course, but better, after all, than what? He should never again, as at one or two great moments of the past, be better than himself. The 20 infinite of life had gone, and what was left of the dose was a small glass engraved like a thermometer by the apothecary. He sat and stared at the sea, which appeared all surface and twinkle, far shallower than the spirit of man. It was the abyss of human illusion that was the real, the tideless deep. He held his packet, which had come by book post, unopened on his knee, liking, in the lapse of so many joys (his illness had made him feel his age), to know that it was there, but taking for granted there could be no complete renewal of the pleasure, dear to young experience, of seeing oneself "just out" Dencombe who had a reputation, had come to out too often and knew too well in advance how he should look.

His postponement associated itself vaguely, after a little, with a group of three persons, two ladies and a young man, whom, beneath him, straggling and seemingly silent, he could see move slowly together along the sands The gentleman had his head bent over a book, and was occasionally brought to a stop by the chaim of this volume, which, as Dencombe could perceive even at a distance, had a cover alluringly red Then his com-20 panions, going a little further, waited for him to come up, poking their parasols into the beach, looking around them at the sea and sky, and clearly sensible of the beauty of the day. To these things the young man with the book was still more clearly indifferent, lingering, credulous, absorbed, he was an object of envy to an observer from whose connection with literature all such artlessness had faded One of the ladies was large and mature, the other had the spareness of comparative youth and of a social situation possibly inferior. The large lady carried back 30 Dencombe's imagination to the age of crinoline she wore a hat of the shape of a mushroom, decorated with a blue veil, and had the air, in her aggressive amplitude, of clinging to a vanished fashion or even a lost cause Presently her companion produced from under the folds of a mantle a limp, portable chair which she stiffened out and of which the large lady took possession This act, and something in the movement of either party, instantly characterized the performers—they performed for Dencombe's recreation—as opulent matron 40 and humble dependent What, moreover, was the use of being an approved novelist if one couldn't establish a relation between such figures, the clever theory, for instance, that the young man was the son of the opulent matron, and that the humble dependent the daughter of a clergyman or an officer, nourished a secret passion for him? Was that not visible from the way she stole behind her protectress to look back at him? back to where he had let himself come to a full stop when his mother sat down to rest. His book was a novel, it had the catch-penny cover, and while the romance of life stood neglected at his side he lost himself in that of the circulating library. He moved mechanically to where the sand was softer, and ended by plumping down in it to finish his chapter at his ease. The humble dependent, discouraged by his remoteness, wandered, with a martyred droop of the head, in another direction and the exorbitant lady, watching the waves, offered a confused resemblance to a flying machine that had broken down

When his drama began to fail Dencombe remembered ε that he had, after all, another pastime Though such promptitude on the part of the publisher was rare, he was already able to draw from its wrapper his "latest," perhaps his last. The cover of The Middle Years was duly meretricious, the smell of the fresh pages the very odor of sanctity, but for the moment he went no further —he had become conscious of a strange alienation He had forgotten what his book was about Had the assault of his old ailment, which he had so fallaciously come to Bournemouth to ward off, interposed utter blankness is to what had preceded it? He had finished the revision of proof before quitting London, but his subsequent fortnight in bed had passed the sponge over color. He couldn't have chanted to himself a single sentence couldn't have turned with curiosity or confidence to any particular page. His subject had already gone from him leaving scarcely a superstition behind. He uttered a low moan as he breathed the chill of this dark void so desperately it seemed to represent the completion of a sinister process. The tears filled his mild eyes, something precious had passed away. This was the pang that had been sharpest during the last few years-the sense of ebbing time, of shrinking opportunity, and now he felt not so much that his last chance was going as that it was gone indeed. He had done all that he should ever do, and yet he had not done what he wanted This was the laceration-that practically his career was over it was as violent as a rough hand at his throat. He rosc from his seat nervously, like a creature hunted by a dread, then he fell back in his weakness and nervously opened his book. It was a single volume, he preferred single volumes and aimed at a rare compression. He began to read, and little by little, in this occupation, he was pacified and reassured Everything came back to him, but came back with a wonder, came back, above all with a high and magnificent beauty. He read his own prose, he turned his own leaves, and had, as he sat there with the spring sunshine on the page, an emotion peculiar and intense. His career was over, no doubt, but it was over, after all, with that.

He had forgotten during his illness the work of the previous year, but what he had chiefly forgotten was that it was extraordinarily good. He lived once more into his story and was drawn down, as by a siren's hand, to where, in the dim underworld of fiction the great glazed tank of art, strange, silent subjects float. He recognized his motive and surrendered to his talent. Never probably had that talent, such as it was, been so fine. His difficulties were still there, but what was also there, to his perception, though probably, alast to nobody's clse, was the art that in most cases had surmounted them In his surprised enjoyment of this ability he had a glimpse of a possible reprieve. Surely its force was not spent-there were life and service in it yet. It had not come to him easily, it had been backward and roundbout It was the child of time, the nursling of delay. he had struggled and suffered for it, making sacrifices not to be counted, and now that it was really mature was it to cease to yield, to confess itself brutally beaten? There was an infinite charm for Dencombe in feeling as he had never felt before that diligence vincit omnia. The result produced in his little book was somehow a result beyond his conscious intention it was as if he had planted his genius, had trusted his method, and they had grown up and flowered with this sweetness. If the schievement had been real, however, the process had been manful enough. What he saw so intensely today, what he felt as a nail driven in, was that only now, at the very last, had he come into possession. His development had been abnormally slow, almost grotesquely gradual He had been hindered and retarded by experience, and for long periods had only groped his way It had taken too much of his life to produce too little of his art. The art had come, but it had come after everything else. At such a rate a first existence was too short-long enough only to collect material; so that to fructify, to use the material, one must have a second age, an extension This extension was what poor Dencombe sighed for As he turned the last leaves of his 50 volume he murmured Ah, for another go! ah, for a better chance!

The three persons he had observed on the sands had vanished and then reappeared, they had now wandered up a path an artificial and easy ascent, which led to the top of the cliff Dencombes bench was halfway down, on a sheltered ledge, and the large lady, a massive, heterogeneous person, with bold black eyes and kind red cheeks, now took a few moments to rest. She wore dirty gauntlets and immense diamond earrings, at first she 60 looked vulgar, but she contradicted this announcement in an agreeable offhand tone. While her companions stood waiting for her she spread her skirts on the end of Dencombe's seat. The young man had gold spectacles, through which, with his finger still in his red-covered book, he glanced at the volume, bound in the same shade of the same color, lying on the lap of the original occupant of the bench After an instant Dencombe understood that he was struck with a resemblance, had recognized the gilt stamp on the crimson cloth, was 70 reading The Middle Years, and now perceived that somebody else had kept pace with him. The stranger was startled, possibly even a little ruffled, to find that he was not the only person who had been favored with an early copy The eyes of the two proprietors met for a moment, and Dencombe borrowed amusement from the expression of those of his competitor, those, it might even be inferred, of his admirer They confessed to some resentment—they seemed to say "Hang it, has he got it already? Of course he's a brute of a reviewer!" Den- 80 combe shuffled his copy out of sight while the opulent matron, rising from her repose, broke out. "I feel already the good of this air!"

"I can't say I do," said the angular lady "I find myself quite let down"

"I find myself horribly hungry At what time did you order lunch?" her protectress pursued

The young person put the question by "Dr. Hugh always orders it"

³² vincit omnia, conquers all things

'I ordered nothing today—I'm going to make you diet," said their comrade.

"Then I shall go home and sleep Qui dort, dine!"
"Can I trust you to Miss Vernham?" asked Dr Hugh of his elder companion

"Don't I trust you?" she archly inquired.

"Not too much!" Miss Vernham, with her eyes on the ground, permitted herself to declare "You must come with us at least to the house," she went on, while the personage on whom they appeared to be in attendance began to mount higher. She had got a little out of earshot, nevertheless Miss Vernham became, as far as Dencombe was concerned, less distinctly audible to murmur to the young man. 'I don't think you realize all you owe the countess!"

Absently, a moment, Dr Hugh caused his goldrimmed spectacles to shine at her

"Is that the way I strike you? I see-I see!"

"She's awfully good to us," continued Miss Vernham, compelled by her interlocutor's immovability to stand there in spite of his discussion of private matters. Of what use would it have been that Dencombe should be sensitive to shades had he not detected in that immovability a strange influence from the quiet old convalescent in the great tweed cape? Miss Vernham appeared suddenly to become aware of some such connection, for she added in a moment. "If you want to sun yourself here you can come back after you've seen us home."

Dr Hugh, at this, hesitated, and Dencombe, in spite of a desire to pass for unconscious, risked a covert glance at him. What his eyes met this time, as it happened, was on the part of the young lady a queer stare, naturally vitreous, which made her aspect remind him of some figure (he couldn't name it) in a play or a novel, some sinister governess or tragic old maid. She seemed to scrutinize him, to challenge him, to say, from general spite "What have you got to do with us?" At the same instant the rich humor of the countess reached them 40 from above "Come, come, my little lambs, you should follow your old bergère!" Miss Vernham turned away at this, pursuing the ascent, and Dr Hugh, after another mute appeal to Dencombe and a moment's evident demur, deposited his book on the bench, as if to keep his place or even as a sign that he would return, and bounded without difficulty up the rougher part of the cliff.

Equally innocent and infinite are the pleasures of observation and the resources engendered by the habit of analyzing life. It amused poor Dencombe, as he dawdled in his tepid air bath, to think that he was s waiting for a revelation of something at the back of a fine young mind He looked hard at the book on the end of the bench, but he wouldn't have touched it for the world It served his purpose to have a theory which should not be exposed to refutation. He already felt better of his melancholy, he had, according to his old formula, put his head at the window A passing countess could draw off the fancy when, like the elder of the ladies who had just retreated, she was as obvious as the giantess of a caravan. It was indeed general views that so were terrible, short ones, contrary to an opinion sometimes expressed, were the refuge, were the remedy Dr Hugh couldn't possibly be anything but a reviewer who had understandings for early copies with publishers or with newspapers. He reappeared in a quarter of an hour, with visible relief at finding Dencombe on the spot, and the gleam of white teeth in an embarrassed but generous smile He was perceptibly disappointed at the eclipse of the other copy of the book, it was a pretext the less for speaking to the stranger. But he ? spoke notwithstanding, he held up his own copy and broke out pleadingly:

"Do say, if you have occasion to speak of it, that it's the best thing he has done yet!"

Dencombe responded with a laugh "Done yet" was so amusing to him, made such a grand avenue of the future. Better still, the young man took him for a reviewer. He pulled out The Middle Years from under his cape, but instinctively concealed any telltale look of fatherhood. This was partly because a person was always a fool for calling attention to his work. "Is that what you're going to say yourself?" he inquired of his visitor.

"I'm not quite sure I shall write anything. I don't as a regular thing—I enjoy in peace But it's awfully fine

Dencombe debated a moment If his interlocutor had begun to abuse him he would have confessed on the spot to his identity, but there was no harm in drawing him on a little to praise. He drew him on with such success that in a few moments his new acquaintance, seated by his side, was confessing candidly that Dencombe's novels were the only ones he could read a second time He had come the day before from London, where a friend of his. a journalist, had lent him his copy of the last-the copy sent to the office of the journal and already the subject of a "notice" which, as was pretended there (but one had to allow for "swagger"), it had taken a full quarter of an hour to prepare. He intimated that he was ashamed for his friend, and in the case of a work to demanding and repaying study, of such inferior manners, and, with his fresh appreciation and inexplicable wish to express it, he speedily became for poor Dencombe a remarkable, a delightful apparition. Chance had brought the weary man of letters face to face with the greatest admirer in the new generation whom it was supposable he possessed The admirer, in truth, was mystifying, so rare a case was it to find a bristling young doctor-he looked like a German physiologist-enamored of literary form. It was an accident, but happier than most accidents, so that Dencombe, exhilarated as well as confounded, spent half an hour in making his visitor talk while he kept himself quiet. He explained his premature possession of The Middle Years by an allusion to the friendship of the publisher, who, knowing he was at Bournemouth for his health, had paid him this graceful attention. He admitted that he had been ill for Dr Hugh would infallibly have guessed it, he even went so far as to wonder whether he mightn t look for some hygienic "tip" from a personage combining so bright an enthusiasm with a presumable knowledge of the remedies now in vogue. It would shake his faith a little perhaps to have to take a doctor seriously who could take him so seriously, but he enjoyed this gushing modern youth, and he felt with an acute pang that there would still be work to do in a world in which such odd combinations were presented. It was not true, what he had tried for renunciation's sake to believe, that all the combinations were exhausted They were not, they were not-they were infinite, the exhaustion was in the a miserable artist.

Dr Hugh was an ardent physiologist, saturated with the spirit of the age—in other words he had just taken his degree, but he was independent and various, he talked like a man who would have preferred to love literature best. He would fain have made fine phrases, but nature had denied him the trick. Some of the finest in The Muddle Years had struck him inordinately, and he took the liberty of reading them to Dencombe in support of his plea. He grew vivid, in the balmy air, to his companion, for whose deep refreshment he 50 seemed to have been sent, and was particularly ingenuous in describing how recently he had become acquainted, and how instantly infatuated, with the only man who had put flesh between the ribs of an art that was starving on superstitions. He had not yet written to him-he was deterred by a sentiment of respect. Dencombe at this moment felicitated himself more than ever on having never answered the photographers. His visitor's attitude promised him a luxury of intercourse, but he surmised that a certain security in it, for Dr Hugh, would 60 depend not a little on the countess He learned without delay with what variety of countess they were concerned, as well as the nature of the tie that united the curious trio The large lady, an Englishwoman by birth and the daughter of a celebrated baritone, whose taste, without his talent, she had inherited, was the widow of a French nobleman and mistress of all that remained of the handsome fortune, the fruit of her father's carnings, that had constituted her dower Miss Vernham, an odd creature but an accomplished pianist, was attached to 70 her person at a salary The countess was generous, independent, eccentric, she traveled with her minstrel and her medical man Ignorant and passionate, she had nevertheless moments in which she was almost irresistible Dencombe saw her sit for her portait in Dr Hugh's free sketch, and felt the picture of his young friend's relation to her frame itself in his mind. This young friend, for a representative of the new psychology, was himself easily hypnotized, and if he became abnormally communicative it was only a sign of his real subjection. Den- 80 combe did accordingly what he wanted with him, even without being known as Dencombe

Taken ill on a journey in Switzerland the countess had picked him up at an hotel, and the accident of his happening to please her had made her offer him, with her imperious liberality, terms that couldn't fail to dazzle a practitioner without patients and whose resources had been drained dry by his studies. It was not the way he would have elected to spend his time, but it was time that would pass quickly, and meanwhile she was wonderfully kind. She exacted perpetual attention, but it was impossible not to like her. He gave details about his queer patient, a "type" if there ever was one, who had in connection with her flushed obesity and in addition to the morbid strain of a violent and aimless will a grave organic disorder, but he came back to his loved novelist, whom he was so good as to pronounce more essentially a poet than many of those who went in for verse, with a zeal excited, as all his indiscretion had been excited, by the happy chance of Dencombe's sympathy and the coincidence of their occupation Dencombe had confessed 10 to a slight personal acquaintance with the author of The Middle Years, but had not felt himself as ready as he could have wished when his companion, who had never yet encountered a being so privileged, began to be eager for particulars He even thought that Dr. Hugh's eve at that moment emitted a glimmer of suspicion But the young man was too inflamed to be shrewd, and repeatedly caught up the book to exclaim "Did you notice this?" or "Weren't you immensely struck with that?" "There's a beautiful passage toward the end," he broke 20 out, and again he laid his hand upon the volume As he turned the pages he came upon something else while Dencombe saw him suddenly change color. He had taken up, as it lay on the bench, Dencombe's copy instead of his own, and his neighbor immediately guessed the reason of his start Dr Hugh looked grave an instant; then he said "I see you've been altering the text!" Dencombe was a passionate corrector, a fingerer of style, the last thing he ever arrived at was a form final for himself His ideal would have been to publish secretly, and then, 30 on the published text, treat himself to the terrified revise, sacrificing always a first edition and beginning for posterity and even for the collectors, poor dears, with a second This morning, in The Middle Years, his pencil had pricked a dozen lights. He was amused at the effect of the young man's reproach, for an instant it made him change color He stammered, at any rate, ambiguously, then, through a blur of ebbing consciousness, saw Dr Hugh's mystified eyes. He only had time to feel he was about to be ill again-that emotion, ex-40 citement, fatigue, the heat of the sun, the solicitation of the air, had combined to play him a trick, before, stretching out a hand to his visitor with a plaintive cry, he lost his senses altogether.

Later he knew that he had fainted and that Dr. Hugh had got him home in a bath chair, the conductor of which, prowling within hail for custom, had happened to remember seeing him in the garden of the hotel. He had recovered his perception in the transit, and had in bed, that afternoon, a vague recollection of Dr. Hughs young face, as they went together, bent over him in a si comforting laugh and expressive of something more than a suspicion of his identity. That identity was ineffaceable now, and all the more that he was disappointed, disgusted. He had been rash, been stupid, had gone out too soon, stayed out too long He oughtn't to have exposed himself to strangers, he ought to have taken his servant. He felt as if he had fallen into a hole too deep to descry any little patch of heaven. He was confused about the time that had elapsed—he pieced the fragments together. He had seen his doctor, the real a one, the one who had treated him from the first and who had again been very kind. His servant was in and out on tiptoe, looking very wise after the fact. He said more than once something about the sharp young gentleman. The rest was vagueness, in so far as it wasn't despair. The vagueness, however, justified itself by dreams, dozing anxieties from which he finally emerged to the consciousness of a dark room and a shaded candle

"You'll be all right again—I know all about you . now," said a voice near him that he knew to be young Then his meeting with Dr Hugh came back He was too discouraged to joke about it yet, but he was able to perceive, after a little, that the interest of it was intense for his visitor. "Of course I can't attend you professionally-you've got your own man, with whom I ve talked and who's excellent," Dr. Hugh went on "But you must let me come to see you as a good friend I've just looked in before going to bed You're doing beautifully, but it's a good job I was with you on the cliff 1 : shall come in early tomorrow. I want to do something for you I want to do everything You've done a tremendous lot for me" The young man held his hand, hanging over him, and poor Dencombe, weakly aware of this living pressure, simply lay there and accepted his devotion He couldn't do anything less-he needed help too much

The idea of the help he needed was very present to him that night, which he spent in a lucid stillness, an intensity of thought that constituted a reaction from his hours of stupor. He was lost, he was lost—he was lost if he couldn't be saved. He was not afraid of suffering of death, he was not even in love with life, but he had had a deep demonstration of desire. It came over him in the long, quiet hours that only with The Middle Years had he taken his flight, only on that day, visited by soundless processions, had he recognized his kingdom He had had a revelation of his range What he dreaded was the idea that his reputation should stand on the untinished It was not with his past but with his future that it should properly be concerned Illness and age rose before him like specters with pitiless eyes how was he to bribe such fates to give him the second chance? He had had the one chance that all men have—he had had the chance of life He went to sleep again very late, and when he awoke Dr Hugh was sitting by his head. There was already, by this time, something beautifully tamiliar in him

"Don't think I've turned out your physician," he said, I'm acting with his consent. He has been here and seen tou. Somehow he seems to trust me. I told him how we happened to come together yesterday, and he recognizes that I've a peculiar right."

Dencombe looked at him with a calculating earnestness "How have you squared the countess?"

The young man blushed a little, but he laughed 'Oh, never mind the countess'"

'You told me she was very exacting"

Dr Hugh was silent a moment 'So she is'

"And Miss Vernham's an intrigante."

"How do you know that?"

"I know everything One has to, to write decently!"

"I think she's mad," said limpid Dr. Hugh

"Well, don't quarrel with the countess—she's a present LIp to you" $\hfill {}^{\prime\prime}$

"I don't quarrel," Dr Hugh replied "But I don't get on with silly women" Presently he added You seem very much alone

'That often happens at my age I've outlived, I've lost by the way."

Dr Hugh hesitated, then surmounting a soft scruple
- Whom have you lost?"

'Everyone "

'Ah, no!" the young man murmured, laying a hand on his arm

"I once had a wife—I once had a son My wife died when my child was born, and my boy, at school, was Carried off by typhoid."

"I wish I'd been there!" said Dr. Hugh simply.

"Well—if you're here! Dencombe answered, with a smile that, in spite of dimness, showed how much he liked to be sure of his companion's whereabouts.

"You talk strangely of your age You're not old."

"Hypocrite-so early!"

"I speak physiologically"

"That's the way I've been speaking for the last five years, and it's exactly what I've been saying to myself It isn't till we are old that we begin to tell ourselves we're not!"

"Yet I know I myself am young," Dr Hugh declared.

"Not so well as I' laughed his patient, whose visitor indeed would have established the truth in question 60 by the honesty with which he changed the point of view, remarking that it must be one of the charms of age-at any rate in the case of high distinction-to feel that one has labored and achieved Di Hugh employed the common phrase about earning one's rest, and it made poor Dencombe, for an instant, almost angry He recovered himself, however, to explain, lucidly enough, that if he, ungraciously, knew nothing of such a balm, it was doubtless because he had wasted mestimable years. He had followed Literature from the first, but he had taken a 70 lifetime to get alongside of her Only today, at last, had he begun to see, so that what he had hitherto done was a movement without a direction. He had ripened too late, and was so clumsily constituted that he had had to teach himself by mistakes

"I prefer your flowers, then, to other people's fruit, and your mistakes to other people's successes," said gallant Dr. Hugh "It's for your mistakes I admire you."

"You're happy—you don't know," Dencombe answered.

Looking at his watch the young man had got up, he named the hour of the afternoon at which he would return. Dencombe warned him against committing himself too deeply, and expressed again all his dread of making him neglect the countess—perhaps incur her displeasure

"I want to be like you—I want to learn by mistakes!" Dr. Hugh laughed

"Take care you don't make too grave a one! But do come back," Dencombe added, with the glimmer of a 90 new idea

"You should have had more vanity!" Dr Hugh spoke as if he knew the exact amount required to make a man of letters normal.

"No, no—I only should have had more time I want another go."

"Another go?"

"I want an extension."

"An extension?" Again Dr. Hugh repeated Dencombe's words, with which he seemed to have been struck

"Don't you know?—I want to what they call 'live'"

The young man, for good-by, had taken his hand, which closed with a certain force They looked at each other hard a moment "You will live," said Dr. Hugh.

"Don't be superficial It's too serious!"

"You shall live!" Dencombe's visitor declared, turning pale

"Ah, that's better!" And as he retired the invalid, with a troubled laugh, sank gratefully back

All that day and all the following night he wondered 20 if it mightn't be arranged. His doctor came again, his servant was attentive, but it was to his confident young friend that he found himself mentally appealing His collapse on the cliff was plausibly explained, and his liberation, on a better basis, promised for the morrow; meanwhile, however, the intensity of his meditations kept him tranquil and made him indifferent. The idea that occupied him was none the less absorbing because it was a morbid fancy. Here was a clever son of the age, ingenious and ardent, who happened to have set him 30 up for connoisseurs to worship This servant of his altar had all the new learning in science and all the old reverence in faith, wouldn't he therefore put his knowledge at the disposal of his sympathy, his craft at the disposal of his love? Couldn't he be trusted to invent a remedy for a poor artist to whose art he had paid a tribute? If he couldn't, the alternative was hard Dencombe would have to surrender to silence, unvindicated and undivined The rest of the day and all the next he toyed in secret with this sweet futility. Who would work the 40 miracle for him but the young man who could combine such lucidity with such passion? He thought of the fairy tales of science, and charmed himself into forgetting that he looked for a magic that was not of this world. Dr Hugh was an apparition, and that placed him above the law He came and went while his patient, who sat up, followed him with supplicating eyes. The interest of knowing the great author had made the young man begin The Middle Years afresh, and would help him to find a deeper meaning in its pages. Dencombe had told him what he "tried for", with all his intelligence, on a first perusal, Dr. Hugh had failed to guess it. The baffled celebrity wondered then who in the world would guess it; he was amused once more at the fine, full way with which an intention could be missed. Yet he wouldn't rail at the general mind today—consoling as that ever had been, the revelation of his own slowness had seemed to make all stupidity sacred.

Dr Hugh, after a little, was visibly worried, confessing, on inquiry, to a source of embarrassment at home "Stick to the countess-don't mind me," Dencombe said repeatedly, for his companion was frank enough about the large lady's attitude She was so jealous that she had fallen ill-she resented such a breach of allegiance. She paid so much for his fidelity that she must have it all, she refused him the right to other sympathies, charged him with scheming to make her die alone, for it was needless to point out how little Miss Vernham was a resource in trouble. When Dr. Hugh mentioned that the countess would already have left Bournemouth if he hadn't kept her in bed, poor Dencombe held his arm tighter and said with decision "Take her straight away" They had gone out together, walking back to the sheltered nook in which, the other day, they had met The young man, who had given his companion a personal support, declared with emphasis that his conscience was clear-he could ride two horses at once Didn't he dream for his future, of a time when he should have to ride five hundred? Longing equally for virtue, Dencombe replied that in that golden age no patient would pretend to have contracted with him for his whole attention. On the part of the countess was not such an avidity lawful? Dr Hugh denied it, said there was no contract, but only a free understanding, and that a sordid servitude was impossible to a generous spirit, he liked moreover to talk about art, and that was the subject on which, this time, as they sat together on the sunny bench, he tried most to engage the author of The Middle Years. Dencombe, soaring again a little on the weak wings of convalescence and still haunted by that happy notion of an organized rescue, found another strain of eloquence to plead the cause of a certain splendid "last manner," the very citadel, as it would prove, of his reputation, the stronghold into which his real treasure would be gathered While his listener gave up the morning and the great, still sea appeared to wait, he had a wonderful explanatory hour Even for himself he was inspired as he told of what his treasure would consist—the precious metals he would dig from the mine, the iewels rare. strings of pearls, he would hang between the columns of his temple. He was wonderful for himself, so thick his convictions crowded, but he was still more wonderful 10 for Dr. Hugh, who assured him, none the less, that the very pages he had just published were already encrusted with gems. The young man, however, panted for the combinations to come, and, before the face of the beautiful day renewed to Dencombe his guarantee that his protession would hold itself responsible for such a life. Then he suddenly clapped his hand upon his watch pocket and asked leave to absent himself for half an hour Dencombe waited there for his return, but was at last recalled to the actual by the fall of a shadow across n the ground The shadow darkened into that of Miss Vernham, the young lady in attendance on the countess, whom Dencombe, recognizing her, perceived so clearly to have come to speak to him that he rose from his bench to acknowledge the civility Miss Vernham indeed proved not particularly civil, she looked strangely agitated, and her type was now unmistakable

"Excuse me if I inquire," she said, "whether it's too much to hope that you may be induced to leave Dr. Hugh alone." Then, before Dencombe, greatly disconcerted, so could protest "You ought to be informed that you stand in his light, that you may do him a terrible injury."

"Do you mean by causing the countess to dispense with his services?"

"By causing her to disinherit him" Dencombe stared at this, and Miss Vernham pursued, in the gratification of seeing she could produce an impression. "It has depended on himself to come into something very handsome He has had a magnificent prospect, but I think you've succeeded in spoiling it."

"Not intentionally, I assure you. Is there no hope that the accident may be repaired?" Dencombe asked

"She was ready to do anything for him She takes great fancies, she lets herself go—it's her way. She has no relations, she's free to dispose of her money, and she's very ill."

"I'm very sorry to hear it," Dencombe stammered.

"Wouldn't it be possible for you to leave Bournemouth? That's what I've come to ask of you."

Poor Dencombe sank down on his bench. "I'm very ill myself, but I ll try!"

Miss Vernham still stood there with her colorless eyes and the brutality of her good conscience "Before it's too late, please" she said, and with this she turned her back, in order, quickly, as it it had been a business to which she could spare but a precious moment, to pass out of his sight

Oh, yes! after this Dencombe was certainly very ill Miss Vernham had upset him with her rough, fierce news, it was the sharpest shock to him to discover what was at stake for a penniless young man of fine parts. He 60 sat trembling on his bench, staring at the waste of waters, feeling sick with the directness of the blow He was indeed too weak too unsteady, too alarmed, but he would make the effort to get away, for he couldn't accept the guilt of interference, and his honor was really involved. He would hobble home, at any rate, and then he would think what was to be done. He made his way back to the hotel and, as he went, had a characteristic vision of Miss Vernham's great motive The countess hated women, of course, Dencombe was lucid about that, so 70 the hungry pianist had no personal hopes and could only console herself with the bold conception of helping Dr Hugh in order either to marry him after he should get his money or to induce him to recognize her title to compensation and buy her off. If she had befriended him at a fruitful crisis he would really, as a man of delicacy, and she knew what to think of that point, have to reckon with her

At the hotel Dencombe's servant insisted on his going back to bed. The invalid had talked about catching a so train and had begun with orders to pack, after which his humming nerves had yielded to a sense of sickness. He consented to see his physician, who immediately was sent for, but he wished it to be understood that his door was irrevocably closed to Dr. Hugh. He had his plan, which was so fine that he rejoiced in it after getting back to bed. Dr. Hugh, suddenly finding nimself snubbed without mercy, would, in natural disgust and to the joy of Miss Vernham, renew his allegiance to the countess. When his physician arrived Dencombe learned that he so was feverish and that this was very wrong, he was to cultivate calmness and try, if possible, not to think. For the rest of the day he wooed stupidity; but there was an ache that kept him sentient, the probable sacrifice of his "extension," the limit of his course His medical adviser was anything but pleased, his successive relapses were ominous. He charged this personage to put out a strong hand and take Dr Hugh off his mind-it would contribute so much to his being quiet. The agitating name, in his room, was not mentioned again, but his security was a smothered fear, and it was not confirmed by the 10 receipt, at ten o'clock that evening, of a telegram which his servant opened and read for him and to which, with an address in London, the signature of Miss Vernham was attached "Beseech you to use all influence to make our friend join us here in the morning Countess much the worse for dreadful journey, but everything may still be saved." The two ladies had gathered themselves up and had been capable in the afternoon of a spiteful revolution. They had started for the capital, and if the elder one, as Miss Vernham had announced, was very 20 ill, she had wished to make it clear that she was proportionately reckless Poor Dencombe, who was not reckless, and who only desired that everything should indeed be "saved," sent this missive straight off to the young man's lodging and had on the morrow the pleasure of knowing that he had quitted Bournemouth by an early train

Two days later he pressed in with a copy of a literary journal in his hand. He had returned because he was anxious and for the pleasure of flourishing the great review of The Middle Years. Here at least was something 30 adequate-it rose to the occasion, it was an acclamation, a reparation, a critical attempt to place the author in the niche he had fairly won Dencombe accepted and submitted, he made neither objection nor inquiry, for old complications had returned and he had had two atrocious days He was convinced not only that he should never again leave his bed, so that his young friend might pardonably remain, but that the demand he should make on the patience of beholders would be very moderate indeed Dr Hugh had been to town, and he tried to 40 find in his eyes some confession that the countess was pacified and his legacy clinched; but all he could see there was the light of his juvenile joy in two or three of the phrases of the newspaper. Dencombe couldn't read them, but when his visitor had insisted on repeating them more than once he was able to shake an unintoxicated head "Ah, no! but they would have been true of what I could have done!"

"What people 'could have done' is mainly what they've in fact done," Dr. Hugh contended.

"Mainly, yes, but I've been an idiot!" said Dencombe Dr. Hugh did remain, the end was coming fast. Two days later Dencombe observed to him, by way of the feeblest of jokes, that there would now be no question whatever of a second chance At this the young man stared, then he exclaimed "Why, it has come to pass—it has come to pass! The second chance has been the public's—the chance to find the point of view, to pick up the pearl!"

"Oh, the pearl!" poor Dencombe uneasily sighed. A smile as cold as a winter sunset flickered on his drawn ε lips as he added "The pearl is the unwritten—the pearl is the unalloyed, the rest, the lost!"

From that moment he was less and less present, heedless to all appearance of what went on around him. His disease was definitely mortal, of an action as relentless, after the short arrest that had enabled him to fall in with Dr. Hugh, as a leak in a great ship. Sinking steadily, though this visitor, a man of rare resources, now cordially approved by his physician, showed endless art in guarding him from pain, poor Dencombe kept no reck-roning of favor or neglect, betrayed no symptom of regret or speculation. Yet toward the last he gave a sign of having noticed that for two days Dr. Hugh had not been in his room, a sign that consisted of his suddenly opening his eyes to ask of him if he had spent the interval with the counters.

"The countess is dead," said Dr Hugh. "I knew that in a particular contingency she wouldn't resist. I went to her grave."

Dencombe's eyes opened wider. "She left you 'some- $\ensuremath{^{8}}$ thing handsome'?"

The young man gave a laugh almost too light for a chamber of woe. "Never a penny! She roundly cursed me"

"Cursed you?" Dencombe murmured.

"For giving her up I gave her up for you. I had to choose," his companion explained

"You chose to let a fortune go?"

"I chose to accept, whatever they might be, the consequences of my infatuation," smiled Dr. Hugh Then, as a larger pleasantry. "A fortune be hanged! It's your own tault if I can't get your things out of my head."

The immediate tribute to his humor was a long, beaildered moan; after which, for many hours, many days, Dencombe lay motionless and absent. A response so absolute, such a glimpse of a definite result, and such a sense of credit worked together in his mind and producing a strange commotion, slowly altered and transfigured his despair. The sense of cold submersion left him—he seemed to float without an effort. The incident was extraordinary as evidence, and it shed an intenser light. At the last he signed to Dr. Hugh to listen, and, when he was down on his knees by the pillow, brought him very near.

"You've made me think it all a delusion"

"Not your glory, my dear friend," stammered the young man

"Not my glory—what there is of it! It is glory—to have been tested, to have had our little quality, and cast our little spell. The thing is to have made somebody care. You happen to be crazy, of course, but that doesn't affect the law."

"You're a great success!" said Dr. Hugh, putting into his young voice the ring of a marriage bell.

Dencombe lay taking this in, then he gathered strength to speak once more. "A second chance—that's the delusion There never was to be but one. We work in the dark—we do what we can—we give what we have. Our doubt is our passion, and our passion is our task. The rest is the madness of art"

"If you've doubted, if you've despaired, you've always done it," his visitor subtly argued.

"We've done something or other," Dencombe conceded.

"Something or other is everything. It's the feasible. It's you!"

"Comforter!" poor Dencombe ironically sighed.

"But it's true," insisted his friend

"It's true It's frustration that doesn't count."

"Frustration's only life," said Dr Hugh

"Yes it's what passes" Poor Dencombe was barely audible, but he had marked with the words the virtual end of his first and only chance

REALISTS AND NATURALISTS: Howe, Kirkland, Garland, Frederic, Crane, Norris, Dreiser

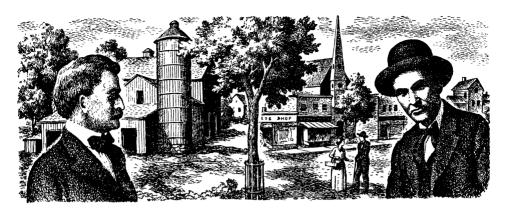

Edgar Watson Howe

The printer's case, where so many American writers in the latter half of the nineteenth century were schooled in writing, was the Harvard and Yale of Edgar Watson Howe Born in Indiana, Howe, as a child, moved to Fairview, Missouri. His brief common-school education was broken off at the age of eleven when, having to tend for himself, he learned the printer's trade. He set up type for newspapers in Missouri, Nebraska, Colorado, Iowa, and Kansas and eventually became a journalist.

Howe was editor of the Atchison (Kansas) Daily Globe when he wrote The Story of a Country Town, his first novel, in evenings after work. Unable to find a publishing house willing to accept the realistic manuscript, he printed the book in his own printshop in 1883.

So successful was the book—If a claim which he made later is to be credited—that several publishers' readers were dismissed for having rejected it. A number of other books, none so noteworthy, followed. Howe continued his association with the Globe until 1927, building up a national reputation for the newspaper. He died in 1937.

By the time Howe began to write his novel, realistic methods had evidently become so widespread that he could employ them without any great amount of self-consciousness. His brand of realism was, for the time, particularly frank and grim in its portrayal of the harshness of life in a pioneer Western community. In the days of Edgar Lee Masters' Spoon River Anthology (1914), a book of poetry which won sensational fame for its stern pictures of rural life, Howe was rediscovered as a pioneer in the movement Carl Van Doren has called "revolt from the Village." He was thus an initiator of a development which culminated in writings by Zona Gale and Sinclair Lewis and a number of other authors

The Story of a Country Town

"The sternest, the grimmest of American novels," Carl Van Doren said in 1921, was The Story of a Country Town. "I became early impressed," says the narrator, Ned Westlock, "with the fact that our people seemed to be miserable and discontented, and frequently wondered that they did not ... move away from a place which made all the men surly and rough, and the women pale and fretful The chief characters in the novel, John Westlock and Jo Erring, were tragic figures. John, Ned's father, for instance, often sat for hours grimly thinking—"tempted and beckoned by the invisible and mysteriously potent forces he pretended to despise"; and eventually he yielded to temptation and eloped with a vulgar woman whom he cid not love. Jo ended his unhappy life by committing suicide. A quiet, rather colorless style and an easy-going narrative method gave the novel much of its impact. The following portion of one chapter is not a high point in the book but a typical passage which shows the shallow religion, the poverty, the unhappiness, and the aimlessness of Twin Mounds and which gives a revealing glimpse of the discontented John Westlock.

Chapter XVI

MORE OF THE VILLAGE OF TWIN MOUNDS

In Twin Mounds the citizens spent their idle time in religious discussions, and although I lived there a great many years I do not remember that any of the questions in dispute were ever settled They never discussed politics with any animation, and read but little, except in the Bible to find points to dispute, but of religion they never tired, and many of them could quote the sacred word by the page. No two of them ever exactly agreed in their ideas, for men who thought alike on baptism violently quarrelled when the resurrection was mentioned, and two of them who engaged a hellredemptionist one night would in all probability fail to agree themselves the next, on the atonement The merchants neglected their customers, when they had them, to discuss points in the Bible which I used to think were not of the slightest consequence, and in many instances the men who argued the most were those who chased deer with hounds on Sunday, and ran horse races, for they did not seem to discuss the a subject so much on account of its importance as because of its fitness as a topic to quarrel about.

There was always a number of famous discussions going on, as between the lawyer and the storekeeper, or the blacksmith and the druggist, or the doctor and the carpenter, and whenever I saw a crowd gathering hurriedly in the evening I knew that two of the disputants had got together again to renew their old difficulty, which they kept up until a late hour, in the Presence of half the town.

There was a certain man who kept a drug store, who was always in nervous excitement from something a fat blacksmith had said to him in their discussions, and who had a habit of coming in on him suddenly in the middle of the day, and whenever I went into the place of business of either one of them I heard them telling those present how they had triumphed the night before, or intended to triumph on a future occasion. Some of the greatest oaths I have ever heard were uttered by these men while discussing religion, and frequently the little and nervous drug-store keeper had to be forcibly 40 prevented from jumping at his burly opponent and striking him. The drug store was not far away from the office where I worked, and whenever loud and boisterous talking was heard in that direction a smile went round, for we knew the blacksmith had suddenly come upon his enemy, and attacked him with something he had thought up while at his work. I never knew exactly what the trouble between them was, though I heard enough of it, but I remember that it had some reference to a literal resurrection, and a new so body, and I often thought it queer that each one was able to take the Bible and establish his position so clearly Whenever I heard the blacksmith talk I was sure that the druggist was wrong, but when the druggist called upon the blacksmith to stop right there, and began his argument, I became convinced that, after all, there were two sides to the question.

These two men, as well as most of the others, were members of a church known then as the Campbellite, for I do not remember that there was an infidel or 60 unbeliever in the place. There were a great many backsliders, but none of them ever questioned religion itself, though they could never agree on doctrine. It has occurred to me since that if one of them had thought to dispute the inspiration of the Bible, and argued about that, the people would have been entirely happy, for the old discussions in time became very tiresome.

The people regarded religion as a struggle between the Campbellite church and the Dovil, and a sensation 70 was developed one evening when my father remarked to the druggist, in the presence of the usual crowd—he happened to be in the place on an errand, as he never engaged in the amusement of the town—that sprinkling answered every purpose of baptism. The druggist became very much excited immediately and prepared for a discussion, but my father only laughed at him and walked away. The next Sunday, however, he preached a sermon on the subject in the court-house, and attacked the town's religion with so much vigor that the excitement was very intense

Most of the citizens of Twin Mounds came from the surrounding country, and a favorite way of increasing the population was to elect the county officers from 10 the country, but after their terms expired a new set moved in, for it was thought they became so corrupt by a two years' residence that they could not be trusted to a re-election. The town increased in size a little in this manner, for none of these men ever went back to their farms again, though they speedily lost standing after they retired from their positions. Many others who left their farms to move to the town said in excuse that the school advantages were better, and seemed very anxious for a time that their children should be ed-20 ucated, but once they were established in Twin Mounds they abused the school a great deal, and said it was not satisfactory, and allowed their children to remain away if they were so inclined

There was the usual number of merchants, professional men, mechanics, etc., who got along well enough, but I never knew how at least one half the inhabitants lived Some of them owned teams, and farmed in the immediate vicinity, others "hauled," and others did whatever offered, but they were all poor, and were con-30 stantly changing from one house to another. These men usually had great families of boys, who grew up in the same indifferent fashion, and drifted off in time nobody knew where, coming back occasionally, after a long absence, well-dressed, and with money to rattle in their pockets. But none of them ever came back who had business of sufficient importance elsewhere to call them away again, for they usually remained until their good clothes wore out, the delusion of their respectability was broken, and they became town loafers again, or 40 engaged in the hard pursuits of their fathers. The only resident of Twin Mounds who ever distinguished himself ran away with a circus and never came back, for although he was never heard of it was generally believed that he must have become famous in some way to induce him to forego the pleasure of returning home in good clothes, and swaggering up and down the street to allow the people to shake his hand.

This class of men never paid their debts, and to get credit for an amount was equal to earning it, to their way of thinking, and a new merchant who came in did a great business until he found them out. I have said they never paid, they did sometimes, but if they paid a dollar on account they bought three or four times that amount to go on the books.

They always seemed to me to be boys yet, surprised at being their own masters, and only worked when they had to, as boys do They engaged in boys' amusements, too, for most of them owned packs of dogs, and short-distance racehorses, and it was one of their greatest accomplishments to drive a quarter-horse to a woodwagon to some out-of-the-way neighborhood, match it against a farmer's horse threatened with speed, and come back with all the money owned in that direction I suppose they came West to grow up with the country, like the rest of us, but they were idle where they came from, and did not improve in the West, because work was necessary, whereupon the thought no doubt occurred to them that they could have grown rich in that way anywhere.

A few of them were away most of the time—I never knew where, but so far away that they seldom came home—and their families supported themselves as best they could, but were always expecting the husbands and fathers to return and take them away to homes of luxury Occasionally news came that they were killed by Indians, and occasionally this was contradicted by the certainty that they were locked up for disreputable transactions, or hanged. Whenever a Twin Mounds man died away from home otherwise than honorably it was always said that he had been killed by the Institutions.

All of this, and much more, I learned during the first three years of my residence there

During this time I had mastered the mystery of the boxes [of the printer's case] so well that I wondered how it was possible I had puzzled my brain over them, they seemed so simple and easy, and if I improved the time well, I am sure it was due to the kindly encouragement and help of Martin, who was not only a very clever printer, but an intelligent man besides. It had always been a part of his work, I believe, to write the few local trems of the town, and he taught me to help him, making me do it my way first, and then, after he had explained the errors, I wrote them all over again. If I employed a bad sentence, or an inappropriate word, he explained his objections at length, and I am certain that had I been less dull I should have become a much better writer than I am, for he was very competent to

0 My father, as an editor, was earnest and vigorous, and the subjects of which he wrote required columns for expression, so that his page of the paper was always tull I spent a quite recent rainy holiday in a dusty attic looking over an old file of the "Union of States" when he was its editor, and was surprised at the ability he displayed The simple and honest manner in which he discussed the questions of the day became very popular, for he always advocated that which was right, and there was always more presswork to do every week, which he seemed to regard as an imposition on Martin, who had formerly had that hard part of the work to perform, and on the plea of needing exercise he early began to run the press himself, and in the history of the business at that time no man was known who could equal him in the rapid and steady manner in which he went

Soon after my introduction into the office I had learned to ink the forms so acceptably with a hand roller that I was forced to keep at it, for a suitable successoi o could not be found, but at last we found a young man who had a passion for art (it was none other than my old enemy, Shorty Wilkinson; I fought him regularly every week during the first year of my residence in town, but we finally agreed to become friends), and after that Martin and I spent a portion of the two press days of the week in adorning our page with paragraphs of local happenings, or rather in rambling through the town hunting for them. Sometimes we invented startling things at night, and spent the time n given us in wandering through the woods like idle boys, bathing and fishing in the streams in summer, and visiting the sugar-camps in early spring, where we heard many tales of adventure which afterwards appeared in print under great headings.

By reason of the fact that it was conducted by a careful and industrious man, and the great number of law advertisements which came in from that and two of the adjoining counties, the "Union of States" made a good deal of money, and certainly it was improved under my father's proprietorship. Before it came into 50 his possession it was conducted by a man who had ideas, but not talents, beyond a country newspaper, who regarded it as a poor field in which to expect either reputation or money, but my father made it as readable as he could and worked every day and night at something designed to improve it. The result was that its circulation rapidly extended, and the business was very profitable.

His disposition had not changed with his residence, except that he turned me over entirely to Martin, and 60 a room had been fitted up in the building where the paper was printed for our joint occupancy, where we spent our evenings as we saw fit, but always to some purpose, for the confidence reposed in Martin was deserved.

From my mother, who was more lonely than ever in the stone house in which we lived, I learned occasionally that the Rev. John Westlock still read and thought far into every night. Into the room in which he slept was brought every evening the dining-table, 70 and sitting before this, spread out to its full size, he read, wrote, or thought until he went to bed, which was always at a late hour

It occurred to me once or twice, in an indifferent sort of way, that a man who had no greater affairs than a country printing office, and a large amount of wild land constantly increasing in value, had no reason to think so much as he did, but I never suspected what his trouble was until it was revealed to me, as I shall presently relate

When I rambled through the town at night, and passed that way, if I looked in at his window, which was on the ground floor, he was oftener thinking than reading or writing, leaning back in his chair, with a scowl on his face which frightened me. Whether the procession of forbidden pictures was still passing before him, and the figures accompanying them were still beckoning, will never be known until the Great Book of Men's Actions, said to be kept in Heaven, is opened, and I hope that those who are permitted to look at the 90 writing under the head of John Westlock will be able to read, through the mercy of God. "Tempted and tried; but forgiven."

Almost every Saturday afternoon he drove away into the country without explanation, and did not return until Sunday night or early Monday morning. Where he went we never knew, but we supposed he had gone to preach in some of the country churches or schoolhouses, for persons who came into the office through the week 10 spoke in a way which led us to believe that such was the case, although he was not often at Fairview lo told me, but he heard of him frequently in the adjoining neighborhoods

During the latter part of the second year of our residence in Twin Mounds, my father came home one Monday morning in an unusually bad humor, and though he went away occasionally after that, it was usually late in the evening, and I came to understand somehow that he did not preach any more, the result 20 of some sort of a misunderstanding. Even had I been anxious to know the particulars, there was no one to inform me, as no one seemed to know, and in a little while I ceased to think about it entirely, for he at once gave me more to do by teaching me the details of the business. The men who came to the office to see him after that annoyed him, and made him more irritable, therefore he taught me the routine of his affairs, that I might relieve him of them. We all usually worked together, but after this he took whatever he had to do 30 into the room where Martin had his bed, and when the people came in I was expected to attend to them From my going into the bedroom to ask him questions about his land business, which I did not so well understand, it came to be believed that he was failing in health, and his old friends frequently expressed the hope that he any one, he came out impatiently, and acted as if he would like to pitch the man into the street, for his affairs were always straight and honest, and there was 40 no occasion for trouble Frequently he would propose to work in my place if I would go out in town, and solicit business, and when there were bills to collect, I was put about it, so that for weeks at a time he did not see any one, and trusted almost everything to me

When my father was away, I was expected to stay at home, and I could not help noticing that my mother was growing paler and weaker, and that the old trouble of which she had spoken to Jo was no better The house in which we lived was built of square blocks of stone and the walls were so thick, and the windows so small . that I used to think of her as a prisoner shut up in it The upper part was not used, except when I went there to sleep, and it was such a dismal and lonely place that I was often awakened in the night with bad dreams. but I always had company, for I found her sleeping on a pallet by the side of my bed, as though she was glad to be near me. I never heard her come, or go away, but if I awoke in the night I was sure to find her by my side.

"There is a great change in you, Ned,' she said to me. one evening when I had gone to stay with her, 'since coming to town"

I replied that I was glad to hear her say so, as I was very ignorant when I went into the office to work

"The rest of us are unchanged," she said "We are no happier here than in Fairview, just the same, I think"

It was the only reference she had ever made to the subject to me, and I did not press it for I feared she would break down and confess the sorrow which filled her life A great many times afterwards I could have led her up to talk about it, fully and freely, I think, but I dreaded to hear from her own lips how unhappy sho really was Had I those days to live over-how often are those words said and written, as though there is a consciousness with every man of having been unwise as well as unhappy in his youth—I would pursue a different course, but it never occurred to me then that I could be of more use to her than I was, or that I could in any way lessen her sorrow. She never regretted that I no longer slept in the house, nor that I was growing as cold toward her as my father, which must have been the case, so I never knew that she cared much about it Indeed, I interpreted her unhappiness as indifference toward me, and it had been that way since I could remember Had she put her arms around me, and asked me to love her because no one else did, I am sure l should have been devoted to her, but her quietness convinced me that she was so troubled in other ways that there was no time to think of me, and while I believe I was always kind and thoughtful of her, I feat I was never affectionate. 1880

Details in the biography of Joseph Kirkland in the vears before he became an author hardly suggest that he was preparing for a literary career. He was born in Geneva, New York, January 7, 1830. In his early boyhood, he moved westward to Michigan with his family. His formal education was confined to a few years. In 1843 he returned east with his family—to New York City; in 1847 he took a trip to England. Shortly after that he began a career in business, interrupted by a few years of service in the United States army during the Civil War. He was a clerk in New York, an auditor, a coal-mine operator, a worker in an Internal Revenue office in Illinois. At fifty, after study in night school, he was admitted to the bar, and he practiced law until his death in 1894.

The outline does not indicate any preparation for authorship, but there had been preparation, nevertheless. His parents had both been schoolteachers, and they had given him a good deal of informal education at home. His mother, furthermore, was the author Caroline Kirkland who, in the 1840's, had written several books about life on the Michigan frontier. During the trip to England, at seventeen, Kirkland had carefully kept a journal in which he had attempted to write vividly of his experiences. He had long been interested in literature, and had come to believe that the best fiction was the sort which drew most directly upon life and which "told the truth." His belief was that earlier fictionists dealing with the Middle West had great faults. Eggleston had been too humorous to be accurate, Howe, too "melodramatic."

He thought that by writing more nearly in the fashion of Thomas Hardy and by drawing upon his own rich experience, he could improve upon their work So he wrote the novel Zury: The Meanest Man in Spring County, published in 1887, when he was in his late fifties. Hamlin Garland, pleased with the book, visited its author in Chicago He found that Kirkland was "a small man, alert and humorous, with keen, black eyes." "His," said Garland, "was the keenest mind I had ever met in the West." When Garland asked him how he happened to write his book, Kirkland explained that he had lived almost all his life in Illinois, part of the time in a small town. "I am the son of a pioneer woman writer, Caroline Kirkland," he said, "and I know farm life All the characters in Zury have their prototypes in my down-state acquaintances. The book is as true as I could make it. Many of its incidents are literally exact." Howells, in his review of the novel, indicated that it conformed to his own theories about fiction which was a "transcript from life": "Those gaunt, sallow, weary, work-worn women, those tireless, rude, independent, and mutually helpful men, belong to a period now driven to the furthest frontier; their look and speech are caught here with a certainty that can come only of personal knowledge. But personal knowledge alone does not suffice in such a case, and we are to be glad of an artist with clear eyes and an honest hand in the author of Zury—one incapable of painting life other than he has found it."

The general approval that Zury received from critics encouraged Kirkland to devote an increasing amount of his time to literature He wrote plays, historical books about Chicago, magazine articles, and numerous book reviews More notable achievements, however, were two novels The first was The McVeys (1888), a sequel to Zury which pictured life in rural Illinois The second was The Captain of Company K (1891) This book was based upon Kirkland's experiences during the Civil War, which he had entered as a private, following the first call for volunteers, and from which he had emerged, in 1863, as a major. The book was dedicated "to the surviving men of the firing line, the men who could see the enemy in front of them with the naked eye while they would have needed a field-glass to see the history-makers behind them." The dedication shows something of the spirit of the book written mainly from the point of view of the common soldier, it was a pioneer work in its realistic account of some of the less glamorous aspects of the war

Kirkland is probably more important historically than he is when judged by positive standards. He was not untouched by romanticism, he was not particularly skilled as a storyteller, and he did not have a great deal of power. Yet he could write better than average dialogue, he had a flair for setting down details, and he could attract attention as a writer whose creed was that fiction should tell the truth. Undoubtedly he was very important as a trail blazer for the American realistic movement.

Zury: The Meanest Man in Spring County

Chapter V

HOW THE MEANEST MAN GOT SO MEAN, AND HOW MEAN HE GOT

E phraim wanted Zury to marry, but it was with "a sharp eye to the main chance" Property and personal service at no wages might both be secured by a judicious choice Girls were not plenty, but at the Peddicombs' there were three of marriageable age Their place was only three miles from Prouder's, and they were still the nearest neighbors Mrs Peddicomb had not long survived the birth of her three daughters She died (as was and is common among farmers' wives) at not much over thirty years of age, just when her life ought to have been in its prime

She was called a "Come-gals kind of woman" by neighbors, partly in ridicule of her enthusiasm, and partly in admiration of her energy. It was told of her that she would get up before light on Monday, "fly raound," uncover the fire, hang on the kettle, and call up the ladder to the loft,—

"Come gals' Dew git up 'n' start in' To-day's Monday, to-morrow's Tuesday, 'n' next day's Wednesday, 'n' then comes Thursday, Friday, 'n' Saturday,—the hull week gone 'n' nothin' done"

The two younger girls had been cared for by the oldest, and so had retained some girlish freshness and delicacy, but as for Mary (the caretaker after her mother's death), she was "good-looking" only because she looked good

On this marriage subject Ephraim took occasion to speak to Zury.

"Mary Peddicomb, she's a likely gal"

"Mary? Why not S'manthy 'n' Flory?"

"Oh, yes, they're all right tew Th' ol' man he's got th' best part of a section Some stawk, tew; 'n' th' haouse 'n' barn's fust rate." 'Ya-as Ef th' haouse 'n' barn worn't so good he'd have more stawk th't 'd pay him right smart better'n th' haouse 'n' barn dooz."

"Peddicomb ain't like t' marry ag'in Mary she'll have her sheer"

"Any more'n th' others?"

Oh, no. All same But I reck'n Mary she'd be more of a manager She kin work I've watched her ever sence she wuz knee-high to a hoppy-toad, 'n' I tell ye she kin work!"

"Ef ye mean more manageable ye mought's well say so"

"Wal, I dew 'llaow she'd be full 's little likely t' be uppish 's th' others"

"Ye 'llaow 't humbly and humble goes t'gether?"

"Wal, yes, 'mongst the wimmin folks, substantially Nothin' sets 'em so bad up 's bein' ha'ans'm Spiles 'em ter use abaout the place Th' humbly ones take t' milkin' more willin' like, 'n' I don't see but what the caows give daown tew 'em full 's well 's tew the ha'ans'm ones 'N' then when ther' looks goes the' 're apt t' kick'"

"What, the caows?"

"No, the wimmin"

("Humbly" in country parlance is a corruption of "homely," the opposite of handsome, plain, ungainly. 'Humbly as a hedge fence.")

Zury pondered on this shrewd counsel from time to time, but took no step toward marrying

"Right smart o' things t' think on afore th' 'll be any hurry 'baout a-gittin' marr'd Th' feller th't 's in an orfle sweat t' marry, he 's li'ble t' be the very feller th't 's behind-hand with everythin' else Takes Time by the forelock 'baout gittin' a wife, 'n' by the fetlock 'baout gittin' suthin' fer her t' eat"

The boy was wedded to his idols quite as faithfully, if not quite so sordidly, as was his father. Their dispositions were much alike. No draft on their powers of endurance and self-denial could be too great.

As to niggardliness, there was a confessed rivalry between them Each would tell of the money-making and money-saving exploits of the other, and of his efforts to surpass them

"Dad's a screamer t' save money! D' ye ever see him withe a plaow-pint ontew a plaow? Give him a hickory grub, 'n' he kin dew it so it'll run a good half a day, 'n' then withe it on agin in noon-spell whilst th' team

's a eatin', 'n' then withe it on agin come night so 's t' be ready fer nex' morn'n', 'n' keep it up fer a week that-away, sooner 'n pay th' smith a cent t' rivit it fast"

"Thasso, thasso, Zury Hickory twigs is cheaper ner so iron any day"

"Ya-as, dad, but then I kin make a shillin' while ye 're a savin' a cent Look at it wunst. I upped 'n' sold the smith a half an acre, 'n' took a mortgage on it, 'n' made him dew all aour repairin' b' way of interest on the mortgage, 'n' then foreclosed th' mortgage when it come dew, 'n' got th' land back, shop 'n' all. Business is business!"

Ephraim always wanted to buy at the shop where they wrapped up the purchases with the largest and strongest so paper and twine, and the harnesses on the farm gradually grew to be largely composed of twine Zury could buy everything at wholesale, half price, including merchandise, paper, twine, harnesses, and all.

One day Zury came across a poor little boy carrying a poorer little puppy and crying bitterly

"What 's the matter, sonny?"

"Our folks gimme a dime t' draownd this h'yer purp, 'n' I—I—I—hate t' dew it"

"Wal, ne' mind, bub, gimme the dime 'n' I'll draownd 70 him fer ye."

Whereupon he took the cash and the pup and walked to the mill-pond, while the boy ran home Zury threw the little trembling creature as far as he could into the pond A few seconds of wildly waving small ears, legs, and tail, and then a splash, and then nothing but widening ripples But out of one of the ripples is poked a little round object, which directs itself bravely toward the shore Nearer and nearer struggles the small black nozzle, sometimes under water, and sometimes on top, 80 but always nearer

"Ye mıs'able, ornery little fyce, ye! Lemme ketch ye swimmin' ashore' I'll throw ye furder nex' time''

At last poor little roly-poly drags itself to the land and squats down at the very water's edge, evidently near to the end of its powers. Zury picks it up and swings it for a mighty cast, but stops and studies it a moment

"Looks fer all the world like a sheep-dawg-purp."

Whereupon he slipped it into his pocket and carried it home, where it grew up to be a fit mate to old Shep, 90 and the ancestress of a line of sheep dogs which ornament Spring County to this day

Later, when the same boy, grown older, applied to Zury for one of the pups, he charged him the full price, fifty cents, took all he had, thirty-six cents, and his note on interest for the balance, the dog being pledged as security. The note being unpaid when due, Zury took back the dog 'Business is business!"

Years passed and it came time for the old man to be gathered to his fathers and the son to reign in his stead When Ephraim lay on his deathbed, he whispered to Zury —

"What day 's to-day?"

"Tuesday, father"

"I hope I'll live ontel Thursday, 'n' then ye kin hev the fun'r'l Sunday, 'n' not lose a day's work with the reams"

He did not die till Saturdav night, but Zury had the funeral on Sunday all the same, like a dutiful son as he was, bent on carrying out his father's last request

After Zury had grown to be a prosperous farmer, Chi20 cago became the great market for the sale of grain Teams by the score would start out from far down the State, and, driving during the day and camping at night, make the long journey. They would go in pairs or squads so as to be able to double teads over the bad places. Forty or fifty bushels could thus be carried in one load, when the chief parts of the roads were good, and "the ready john" (haid cash), could be got for the grain, at twenty or thirty cents a bushel for corn or wheat. This sum would provide a barrel oi two of salt, and perhaps a plow and a bundle of dry goods and knickknacks for the women folks, the arrival of which was a great event in the lonely farm-houses.

Zury had now working for him (beside Jule, who kept house and attended to the live stock), a young fellow who became a score of years afterward private, corporal, sergeant, lieutenant, and captain in the —th Illinois Volunteer Infantry in the great war. From his stories, told in bivouacs and beside camp fires, to toiling, struggling, suffering "boys in blue," these tales are taken almost verbatim (Some of them have already found their way into print)

"Zury always wanted to get onto the road with farmers whose housekeeping was good, because his own was—well, wuss thin what we git down here in Dixie, an there's no need of that. Well, when they'd halt for noon-spell, Zury he'd happen along promiscuous-like, an' most generally some of 'em would make him stop an' take a bite. He was good company if he was so near 'N' then a man's feed warn't counted fer much, unless it was some store-truck or boughten stuff.

"But one day they jest passed the wink and sot it up on him, and come noon-spell nobody asked Zury an' me to eat Zury left me to take care of both teams while he walked up and down the line of wagins. Everybody who hadn't 'jest eat,' warn't 'quite ready' yet, an' by the next time he came to those who hadn't been 'quite ready,' they'd 'jest eat'

"Wal, Zury swallered his disappointment and I swallered all the chawed wheat I could git away with, and the first settlement we passed Zury went and bought a monstrous big bag of sody-crackers, and we eat them for supper and breakfast. And still we were not happy

"Next noon-spell Zury said, 'Boys, s'posin' we kinder whack up 'n' mess together' Wal, the others 'd had enough of their joke, and so they all agreed, and chipped in. Ham, pickles, pies, cakes, honey, eggs, apples, and one thing another Ye see every man's o' woman knew that when they got together, her housekeep would be compared with everybody else's, so these long drives were like donation parties, or weddings, or funerals,—well fed

"Of course, Zury's sody-crackers went in with the rest, an me an' Zury always ate some anyhow for appearance sake. I could see the fellers were all makin' fun of Zury's cute dodge of gettin' a dozen good meals for him an' me at the price of a few pounds of sody-crackers. But then, they did n't know Zury so well as they thought they did. By an' by the trip was done an' settlin'-up-time came, when each man was called on for his share of pasturage, ferriage, an' one thing another. Zury paid his but he deducted out twenty-five cents paid for sody-crackers. Said it was one of the cash outlays for the common good, an' if any of the rest of 'em spent money and did n't put it in, more fools they. Business is business.

So Zury in the soda-cracker episode came out "top of the heap" as usual. The top of the heap was his accustomed place, but still he perceived that he was living under one useless disability, and, with his quick adaptation of means to ends and remedies to deficiencies, he simply—married. In doing this, he was guided by his father's shrewd words, counsel which had lain fallow in his memory for years.

Zury's marriageability had, of course, not been unobserved in the household of the three daughters. Peddicomb had remarked what a good "outin'" the Prouders had made in their purchase of swine from him, and cherished the same kind of feeling toward them that most of us experience when some other person has done better in a joint transaction than we did

"Them Praouders, the' 'Il skin outer the land all the' kin skin, 'n' then sell offen the place all 't anybody 'Il bu', n then feed t' the hawgs all a hawg 'Il eat, 'n' then give th rest t' th' dawg, 'n' then what th dawg won t tech the' 'Il live on theirselves'"

"Yew bet,' tittered Samantha, the second "That thar ornery Zury Praouder he'd let a woman starve t' death ef he could 'N' o' man Praouder wuz th' same way, tew Th' o' woman she wuz near abaout skin 'n bone when the buried her I seen her in her coffin, n' I know."

"Oh, don't yew be scaret, S'manthy I hain't saw Zuiy a-lookin' over it your side o' the meetin'-haouse, no gre't," kindly rejoined Flora, the youngest daughter

"Who, me' He knows better! Not ef husbands wuz

'Six hundred 'n' forty acres o' good land, all fenced n paid fer, 'n' a big orchard, 'n' all well stocked, tew'' (He added this with a pang, remembering once more the pig-purchase, which by this time had grown to a mighty drove, in spite of many sales)

"Don't care ef he owned all ou' doors Th' more the' ve got, th' more it shows haow stingy the' be "

Then the meek Mary ventured a remark

'Mebbe ef Zury wuz t' marry a good gal it 'd be the makin' on him "

"Oh, Mary, jew hain't no call t' stan' up fer Zury! The o' man he 'd a ben more in yewr line"

"No, Zury would n't want me, ner no other man, I don't expect," she answered with a laugh—and a sigh

One Sunday afternoon Zury rode over to Peddicomb's to get a wife. He tried to decide which girl to ask, but his mind would wander off to other subjects,—crops, live stock, bargains, investments. He did n't much think that either girl he asked would say no, but if she did, he could ask the others. When he came near the house he caught sight of one of the girls, in her Sunday clothes, picking a "posy" in the "front garding." It was Mary

'Good day, Mary Haow 's all the folks?"

"Good day, Zury—Mr. Praouder, I s'pose I should say Won't ye 'light'"

"Wal, I guess not I jes' wanted t' speak abaout a little matter"

"Wal, father he 's raoun' some 'ers Haow 's the folks t' your 'us?"

"All peart, that is t' say th' ain't no one naow ye know, but me 'n' Jule 'n' Mac That makes a kind of a bob-tail team, ye know, Mary Nobody but Jule t' look out fer things Not b't what he 's a pretty fair of a nigger as niggers go He c'd stay raoun' 'n' help some aoutside"

"Whatever is he a-drivin' at?" thought Mary, but she said nothing

"The's three of you gals to hum Ye don't none of ye so seem t' go off yit, tho' I sh'd a-thought Flory she 'd a-ben picked up afore this, 'n' S'manthy tew fer that matter"

Neither of them saw the unintended slur this rough speech cast upon poor Mary

"Don't ye think we'd better git married, Mary?"
"What me?"

"Wal, yes" He answered this in a tone where she might have detected the suggestion, "Or one of your sisters," if she had been keen and critical. But she was neither. She simply rested her work-worn hand upon the 70 gate post and her chin upon her hand, and looked dreamily off over the prairie. She pondered the novel proposition for some time, but fortunately not quite long enough to cause Zury to ask if either of her sisters was at home, as he was quite capable of doing

She looked up at him, the blood slowly mounting to her face, and considered how to say yes. He saw that she meant yes, so he helped her out a little. He wanted to have it settled and go

"Wal, Mary, silence gives consent, they say When 80 shall it be?"

"Oh, yew ain't in no hurry, Zury, I don't expect"

He was about to urge prompt action, but the thought occurred to him that she must want to get her "things" ready, and the longer she waited the more "things" she would bring with hei. So he said —

"Suit yerself, Mary III drop over 'n' see ye nex' Sunday, 'n' we 'll fix it all up'"

Mary had no objection to urge, though possibly in her secret heart she wished there had been a little more so sentiment and romance about it. No woman likes "to be cheated out of her wooing," but then this might come later. He called for her with the wagon on the appointed day, and they drove to the house of a justice of the peace who lived a good distance away. This was not for the sake of making a wedding trip, but because this particular justice owed Zury money, as Zury carefully explained.

And so Mary went to work for Zury very much as Jule did, only it was for less wages, as Jule got a dollar a month besides his board and clothes, while Mary in did not.

For a year or two or three after marriage (during which two boys were born to them) Zury found that he had gained, by this investment, something more than mere profit and economy—that affection and sympathy were realities in life. But gradually the old dominant mania resumed its course, and involved in its current the weak wife as well as the strong husband. The general verdict was that both Zury and Mary were "jest 's near 's they could stick 'n' live." "They 'd skin a flea fer its 20 hide 'n' taller"

"He gin an acre o' graound fer the church 'n' sculehouse, 'n' it raised the value of his hull farm more 'n' a dollar an acre 'N' when he got onto the scule-board she 'llaowed she had n't released her daower right, 'n' put him up t' tax the deestrick fer the price of that same acre o' ground."

So Zury, claiming the proud position of "the meanest ma-an in Spring Caounty," would like to hear his claim disputed. If he had a rival he would like to have him pointed out, and would "try pootty hard but what he 'd x match him."

Strange as it may seem, these grasping characteristics did not make Zury despised or even disliked among his associates. His "meanness" was not underhanded.

"Th' ain't nothin' mean abaout Zury, mean 's he is Gimme a man as sez right aout 'look aout fer yerself.' 'n' I kin git along with him. It 's these h'yer sneakin' fellers th't 's one thing afore yer face 'n' another behind yer back th't I can't abide. Take ye by th' beard with one hand 'n' smite ye under th' fifth rib with t' other! He expays his way 'n' dooz 's he 'grees every time. When he buys 'taters o' me, I 'd jest 's live 's hev him measure 'em' 's measure 'em myself with him a-lookin' on. He knows haow t' trade, 'n' ef yew don't, he don't want ye t' trade with him, that 's all, ner t' grumble if ye git holt o' the hot eend o' th' poker arter he 's give ye fair notice. Better be shaved with a sharp razor than a dull one."

On an occasion when the honesty of a more pretentious citizen was compared with Zury's to the advantage of the latter, he said —

"Honest? Me² Wal, I guess so. Fustly, I would n't be noth'n' else, nohaow; seck'ndly, I kin 'fford t' be seein' 's haow it takes a full bag t' stand alone; thirdly I can't 'fford t' be noth'n' else, coz honesty 's th' best policy."

He was evidently quoting, unconsciously but by direct inheritance, the aphorisms of his fellow Pennsylvanian, Dr. Franklin.

In peace as in war strong men love "foemen worthy of their steel" Men liked to be with Zury and hear his gay, shrewd talk, to trade with him, and meet his frankly brutal greed. He enjoyed his popularity, and liked to do good turns to others when it cost him nothing. When elected to local posts of trust and confidence he served the public in the same efficient fashion in which he served himself, and he was therefore continually elected to school directorships and other like "thank 'ee jobs"

In the battle of the realists against "effete romanticism" in the 1890's, William Dean Howells had perhaps his most militant ally in Hamlin Garland, a large-framed and indefatigable Middlewesterner For Garland, indeed, "realism" was too tame a term, he preferred to call himself a "veritist" or truth stater and his first important book, Main-Travelled Roads (1891), came close to being the most completely honest volume of its decade Garland lacked the deep-rooted convictions and infinite patience that Howells had, he fought with pitchforks and was easily discouraged. To most critics, therefore, Garland's is a story of failure, of giving way to economic and social pressure, he has been called an 'author of wax"

The details of Garland's life are to be found in numerous autobiographical books, of which the most notable is A Son of the Middle Border (1917). Born in 1860 on a farm in western Wisconsin, he moved with his family first to northeastern Iowa, where he attended Cedar Valley Seminary at Osage, and then to northeastern South Dakota As a boy he learned the endless routine of the dirt farmer-caring for stock, plowing, dragging, sowing, cultivating, harvesting found farmwork drudgery, although he liked the prairies and the clear blue Western skies The world of books was more attractive, and at an early age, encouraged by his mother, he determined to make himself a teacher. Yet he was twenty-four before, mortgaging the homestead he had staked out, he really broke with farming He chose to study in Boston and there, between 1884 and 1887, he quickly educated himself in the theaters, in the homes of friendly writers, actors, and artists, most of all in the Boston Public Library He discovered Herbert Spencer and Henrik Ibsen and impressionism and the new novelists of Europe, realists most of them. Gradually he made friends and found modest employment as a lecturer, teacher, and reviewer Unsophisticated and far from intellectually radical, he was nevertheless deeply influenced by the restlessness of the age, perhaps because he fell among the young men who were sensing literary and artistic revolution in the air Although he had practically no money and failed to make much impression by the poems, essays, and sketches which he sent around to the magazines, he was stirred by many enthusiasms, awakened almost overnight to the excitement of ideas

Then, in 1887, he returned to South Dakota to visit his parents. Very probably he would have been shocked at the meanness of the life in which he had grown up had he seen it at its best, but his visit was to a West suffering the ills which were soon to call forth the People's Party and the oratory of William Jennings Bryan. Garland had acquired enough perspective to see that farm life was far from idyllic and that the frontier had not fulfilled its promise. When he returned to Boston he wrote the tales collected in Main-Travelled Roads.

Garland's tragedy was that he never surpassed this initial effort. For a time, encouraged by the friendship of B O Flower, editor of The Arena, he thought of himself as a reformer, his anger at the plight of his native section and his reading of Henry George found expression in several political novels in 1892. None was really well written, perhaps because Garland was more fascinated by the rôle of prophet. With the World's Columbian Exposition being advertised, he envisioned a great literary renaissance centering in Chicago and described the shape of things to come in the essays collected as Crumbling Idols (1894) For nearly twenty years he devoted himself to exemplifying the virtues of Western literature, only to find that Western themes and Western scenes were of themselves no guarantee of greatness. He wrote sixteen novels between 1895 and 1916 They show an increasing command of structure and are perhaps as good as the better magazine fiction of the period Not one of them, however, is truly memorable and some are almost gushingly sentimental. The best that can be said for them is that Garland treated the American Indian with objective fairness and provided many colorful pictures of the high plains and mountains. In his search for fresh local color he failed to correct his greatest weakness as a novelisthis thin characterization. It is obvious that Garland's fondness for family and club life, for travel, for literary friendships, however satisfying to him personally, cost him much as an artist. The power which he had briefly in the years between 1887 and 1891 was largely gone. He himself admitted in 1924 (see "Limitations of Authorship in America," The Bookman, May) that he had compromised to keep his market. All through his later life he showed a tendency to deplore the constantly lowering standards of public taste and the commercialization of literature.

After 1916, when he moved to New York, Garland attained a new popularity by turning to autobiography The writer who had insisted that "the present is the vital theme" ransacked his journals and notebooks and memory for five volumes dealing with the "Middle Border" and four volumes of literary gossip. In 1922 A Daughter of the Middle Border won the Pulitzer Prize for biography Social and literary historians will doubtless find these books invaluable. They make it clear, however, that Garland was never really a rebel What seemed like revolt was an intensely personal emotional reaction to a particular situation, the true Garland was respectful of tradition and of success, wher ever he found them He was interested, moreover, in many things, perhaps too many for his artistic salvat.on Veritism was only one cause among many, and although he tried to present life truthfully he never had an irrepressible passion to say something important supremely well

Mrs. Ripley's Trip

In a Foreword to Main-Travelled Roads written in 1922 Garland told of his trip to South Dakota in 1887, after three years in Boston On his way he stopped in Chicago to visit Joseph Kirkland (see p 603), who suggested that Garland ought to write fiction (see A Son of the Middle Border) The farther he got beyond Chicago the more depressing he found the landscape, and when he got to Ordway, South Dakota, he found his mother "imprisoned in a small cabin on the enormous sunburnt, treeless plain, with no expectation of ever living anywhere else" "In that hot little house," he added in Roadside Meetings, "I wrote my first story, a sketch descriptive of the life I had known as a boy. It was in truth only the amplification of a tale which my mother retold of an old neighbor in lowa who, after many years of border life, went 'back to York State' on a visit. "Mrs. Ripley was probably thinking of "The Revolt of Mother" "] and I wrote nearly two thousand words of her story one Sunday fore noon." Completed after Garland's return to Boston, "Mrs. Ripley's Trip" was accepted by Harper's Weekly and printed in the issue for November 24, 1888. Garland was paid seventy dollars for it, half of which he sent his mother as coauthor. Although not so bitter as some of the stories written a few months later, "Mrs. Ripley's Trip" is an excellent example of the regard for truthful depiction of farm life which made Garland's early work outstanding

The night was in windy November, and the blast, threatening rain, roared around the poor little shanty of Uncle Ripley, set like a chicken-trap on the vast Iowa prairie. Uncle Ethan was mending his old violin, with many York State "dums!" and "I gol darns!" totally oblivious of his tireless old wife, who, having "finished the supper-dishes," sat knitting a stocking, evidently for the little grandson who lay before the stove like a cat

Neither of the old people wore glasses, and their light was a tailow candle, they couldn't afford "none o' them new-fangled lamps". The room was small, the chairs were wooden, and the walls bare—a home where poverty was a never-absent guest. The old lady looked pathetically little, weazened, and hopeless in her ill-fitting garments (whose original color had long since vanished), intent as she was on the stocking in her knotted, stiffened fingers, and there was a peculiar sparkle in her little black eyes, and an unusual resolution in the straight line of her withered and shapeless lips.

Suddenly she paused, stuck a needle in the spare knob.

Suddenly she paused, stuck a needle in the spare knob of her hair at the back of her head, and looking at Ripley, said decisively. "Ethan Ripley, you'll haff to do your own cooking from now on to New Year's I'm goin' back to Yaark State"

The old man's leather-brown face stiffened into a look of quizzical surprise for a moment, then he cackled, incredulously: "Ho! Ho! har! Sho! be y', now? I want to know if y' be"

"Well, you'll find out."

"Goin' to start to-morrow, mother?"

"No, sir, I ain't, but I am on Thursday I want to get to Sally's by Sunday, sure, an' to Silas's on Thanksgivin'." There was a note in the old woman's voice that

There was a note in the old woman's voice that brought genuine stupefaction into the face of Uncle Rupley Of course in this case, as in all others, the money consideration was uppermost

"Howgy 'xpect to get the money, mother? Anybody died an' left yeh a pile?"

"Never you mind where I get the money, so 's 't you don't haff to bear it. The land knows if I'd 'a' waited for 40 you to pay my way—"

"You needn't twit me of bein' poor, old woman," said Ripley, flaming up after the manner of many old people "I've done my part t' get along. I've worked day in and day out—"

"Oh! I am't done no work, have I' snapped she, laying down the stocking and levelling a needle at him, and putting a frightful emphasis on "I"

"I didn't say you hadn't done no work."

"Yes, you did!"

"I didn't neither I said-"

"I know what you said"

"I said I'd done my part" roared the husband, dominating her as usual by superior lung power. "I didn't say you hadn't done your part," he added with an unfortunate touch of emphasis

"I know y' didn't say it, but y' meant it. I don't know what y' call doin' my part, Ethan Ripley; but if cookin' for a drove of harvest hands and thrashin' hands, takin' care o' the eggs and butter, 'n' diggin' 'taters an' milkin' 60 ain't my part, I don't never expect to do my part, 'n' you might as well know it fust 's last

"I'm sixty years old," she went on, with a little break in her harsh voice, dominating him now by woman's logic, "an' I've never had a day to myself, not even Fourth o' July If I've went a-visitin' 'r to a picnic, I've had to come home an' milk 'n' get supper for you menfolks I ain't been away t' stay overnight for thirteen years in this house, 'n' it was just so in Davis County for ten more. For twenty-three years, Ethan Ripley, I've 70 stuck right to the stove an' churn without a day or a night off."

Her voice choked again, but she rallied, and continued impressively, "And now I'm a-goin' back to Yaark State"

Ethan was vanquished He stared at her in speechless surprise, his jaw hanging It was incredible.

"For twenty-three years," she went on, musingly, "I've just about promised myself every year I'd go back an' see my folks." She was distinctly talking to herself now, and her voice had a touching, wistful cadence. "I've 80 wanted to go back an' see the old folks, an' the hills where we played, an' eat apples off the old tree down by the well I've had them trees an' hills in my mind days and days—nights, too—an' the girls I used to know, an' my own folks—"

She fell into a silent muse, which lasted so long that the ticking of the clock grew loud as a gong in the man's ears, and the wind outside seemed to sound drearier than usual. He returned to the money problem, kindly, though.

"But how y' goin' t' raise the money? I ain't got no extra cash this time. Agin Roach is paid, an' the interest paid, we ain't got no hundred dollars to spare, Jane, not by a jugful."

"Wal, don't you lay awake nights studyin' on where I'm a-goin' to get the money," said the old woman, taking delight in mystifying him. She had him now, and he couldn't escape. He strove to show his indifference, however, by playing a tune or two on the violin.

"Come, Tukey, you better climb the wooden hill,"

Mrs Ripley said, a half-hour later, to the little chap on the floor, who was beginning to get drowsy under the influence of his grandpa's fiddling "Pa, you had orta 'a' put that string in the clock to-day—on the 'larm side the string is broke," she said, upon returning from the boy's bedroom "I orta git up early to-morrow, to git some sewin' done Land knows, I can't fix up much, but they is a little I c'n do I want to look decent"

They were alone now, and they both sat expectantly "You pear to think, mother, that I m agin yer goin"

"Wal, it would kinder seem as if y' hadn't hustled 30 yerself any t' help me git off "

He was smarting under the sense of being wronged "Wal, I m just as willin' you should go as I am for myself, but if I ain't got no money I don't see how I'm goin' to send—"

"I don't want ye to send, nobody ast ye to, Ethan Ripley I guess if I had what I've earnt since we came on this farm I'd have enough to go to Jericho with"

"You've got as much out of it as I have," he replied gently. "You talk about your goin back. Ain't I been wantin' to go back myself? And ain't I kep' still 'cause I see it wa'n't no use? I guess I've worked jest as long and as hard as you, an' in storms an in mud an' heat, ef it comes t' that."

The woman was staggered, but she wouldn't give up, she must get in one more thrust

"Wal, if you'd 'a' managed as well as I have, you'd have some money to go with." And she rose and went to mix her bread and set it "raisin'."

He sat by the fire twanging his fiddle softly. He was plainly thrown into gloomy retrospection, something quite unusual for him. But his fingers picking out the bars of a familiar tune set him to smiling, and whipping his bow across the strings, he forgot all about his wifes resolutions and his own hardships. "Trouble always slid off his back like punkins off a haystack, anyway," his wife said.

The old man still sat fiddling softly after his wife disappeared in the hot and stuffy little bedroom off the kitchen. His shaggy head bent lower over his violin. He heard her shoes drop—one, two. Pretty soon she called

"Come, put up that squeakin' old fiddle, and go to bed Seems as if you orta have sense enough not to set there keepin' everybody in the house awake"

"You hush up," retorted he "I'll come when I git ready, and not till I'll be glad when you're gone---"

"Yes, I warrant that."

With which amiable good-night they went off to sleep, or at least she did, while he lay awake pondering on "where under the sun she was goin' t' raise that money

The next day she was up bright and early, working away on her own affairs, ignoring Ripley entirely, the fixed look of resolution still on her little old wrinkled face. She killed a hen and dressed and baked it. She fried up a pan of doughnuts and made a cake. She was engaged in the doughnuts when a neighbor came in, one of these women who take it as a personal affront when any one in the neighborhood does anything without asking their advice. She was fat, and could talk a man blind in three minutes by the watch. Her neighbor said.

"What's this I hear, Mis' Ripley?"

"I dun know I expect you hear about all they is goin" on in this neighborhood," replied Mrs Ripley, with crushing bluntness, but the gossip did not flinch

"Well, Sett Turner told me that her husband told her that Ripley told him this mornin' that you was goin' back East on a visit."

"Wal, what of it?"

"Well, air yeh?"

"The Lord willin' an' the weather permittin', I expect 's I be"

"Good land, I want to know! Well, well! I never was so astonished in my whole life I said, says I, 'It can't be' 'Well,' see', 'tha's what she told me,' see' 'But,' says I, she is the last woman in the world to go gallavantin' off East, see I 'An', see he, 'but it comes from good authority,' see he 'Well, then, it must be so,' see I But, land sakes! do tell me all about it How come you to make up y'r mind? All these years you've been kind a' tilkin it over, an' now y'r actshelly goin'—well, I never! I s'pose Ripley furnishes the money,' see I to him 'Well, no, see e 'Ripley says he'll be blowed if he sees where the money's coming from,' see 'e, and see I, 'But maybe she's jest jokin', 'see I 'Not much,' he says S' 'e 'Ripley believes she's goin' fast enough He's jest as anxious to find out as we be—'"

Here Mrs Doudney paused for breath, she had walked so fast and rested so little that her interminable flow of 'ses I's" and "ses he's" ceased necessarily. She had reached, moreover, the point of most vital interest—the money

An' you'll find out jest 'bout as soon as he does," was the dry response from the figure hovering over the stove, and with all her manoeuvring that was all she got

All day Ripley went about his work exceedingly thoughtful for him. It was cold blustering weather. The wind rustled among the cornstalks with a wild and mournful sound, the geese and ducks went sprawling down the wind, and the horses' coats were ruffled and backs raised.

The old man was husking all alone in the field, his spare form rigged out in two or three ragged coats, his hands inserted in a pair of gloves minus nearly all the fingers, his thumbs done up in "stalls," and his feet thrust into huge coarse boots. The "down ears" wet and chapped his hands, already worn to the quick. Toward night it grew colder and threatened snow. In spite of all these attacks he kept his cheerfulness, and though he was very tired, he was softened in temper.

Having plenty of time to think matters over, he had come to the conclusion that the old woman needed a play-spell. "I ain't likely to be no richer next year than I am this one, if I wait till I'm able to send her she won't never go I calc'late I c'n git enough out o' them shoats to send her I'd kind a' lotted on eat n' them pigs done up in sassengers, but if the ol' woman goes East, Tukey an' me'll kind a' haff to pull through without 'em We'll have a turkey I'r Thanksgivin', an' a chicken once 'n a while Lord' but we'll miss the gravy on the flapjacks."

(He smacked his lips over the thought of the lost dainty) "But let er rip' We can stand it Then there is my buffalo overcoat I'd kind a calc'lated on havin' a so buffalo—but that's gone up the spout along with them sassengers"

These heroic sacrifices having been determined upon, he put them into effect at once

This he was able to do for his coin-rows ran alongside the road leading to Cedarville, and his neighbors were passing almost all hours of the day

It would have softened Jane Ripley's heart could she have seen his bent and stiffened form among the cornrows, the cold wind piercing to the bone through his 60 threadbare and insufficient clothing. The rising wind sent the snow rattling among the moaning stalks at intervals. The cold made his poor dim eyes water, and he had to stop now and then to swing his arms about his chest to warm them. His voice was hoarse with shouting at the shivering team.

That night as Mrs Ripley was clearing the dishes away she got to thinking about the departure of the next day, and she began to soften She gave way to a few tears when little Tewksbury Gilchrist, her grandson, came up 70 and stood beside her

"Gran'ma, you ain't goin' to stay away always, are

"Why, course not, Tukey What made y' think that?"
"Well, y ain't told us nawthin' 't all about it An' yeh kind o' look 's if yeh was mad"

"Well, I ain't mad, I'm jest a-thinkin', Tukey Y' see, I come away from them hills when I was a little girl a'most, before I married y'r grandad And I ain't never been back 'Most all my folks is there, sonny, an' we've 80 been s' poor all these years I couldn't seem t' never git statted Now, when I'm most ready t' go, I feel kind a queer—'s if I'd cry'"

And cry she did, while little Tewksbury stood patting her trembling hands Hearing Ripley's step on the porch, she rose hastily and, drying her eyes, plunged at the work again

Ripley came in with a big armful of wood, which he colled into the wood-box with a thundering crash. Then he pulled off his mittens, slapped them together to knock 50 off the ice and snow, and laid them side by side under the stove. He then removed cap, coat, blouse, and finally his boots, which he laid upon the wood-box, the soles turned toward the stove-pipe.

As he sat down without speaking, he opened the front doors of the stove, and held the palms of his stiffened hands to the blaze. The light brought out a thoughtful look on his large, uncouth, yet kindly, visage. Life had laid hard lines on his brown skin, but it had not entirely soured a naturally kind and simple nature. It had made him penurious and dull and iron-muscled, had stifled all the slender flowers of his nature, yet there was warm soil somewhere hid in his heart.

"It's snowin' like all p'ssessed," he remarked finally "I guess we'll have a sleigh-ride to-morrow. I calc'late t' drive y' daown in scrumptious style. If you must leave, why, we'll give yeh a whoopin' old send-off—won t we, Tukey?"

Nobody replying, he waited a moment "Tve ben a-thinkin' things over kind o' t'-day, mother, an I've come t' the conclusion that we have been kind o' hard on 20 yeh, without knowin' it, y' see Y' see I'm kind o' easygoin', an' little Tuke he's only a child, an' we ain't c'nsidered how you felt."

She didn't appear to be listening, but she was, and he didn't appear, on his part, to be talking to her, and he kept his voice as hard and dry as he could.

"An' I was tellin' Tukey t'-day that it was a dum shame our crops hadn't turned out better. An' when I saw ol' Hatfield go by I hailed him, an' asked him what he'd gimme for two o' m' shoats. Wal, the upshot is, I sent t' town for some things I calc'late you'd need. An' here's a ticket to Georgetown, and ten dollars. Why, ma, what's up?"

Mrs Ripley broke down, and with her hands all wet with dishwater, as they were, covered her face, and sobbed She felt like kissing him, but she didn't. Tewksbury began to whimper too, but the old man was astonished. His wife had not wept for years (before him). He rose and walking clumsily up to her timidly touched her hair—

"Why, mother! What's the matter? What've I done now? I was calc'latin' to sell them pigs anyway. Hatfield jest advanced the money on 'em."

She hopped up and dashed into the bedroom, and in a few minutes returned with a yarn mitten, tied around the wrist, which she laid on the table with a thump, saying: "I don't want yer money. There's money enough to take me where I want to go."

"Whee—ew! Thunder and gimpsum root! Where 'd ye get that? Didn't dig it out of a hole?"

"No, I jest saved it—a dime at a time—see!"

Here she turned it out on the table—some bills, but mostly silver dimes and quarters.

"Thunder and scissors! Must be two er three hundred dollars there," he exclaimed.

"They's jest seventy-five dollars and thirty cents; jest about enough to go back on Tickets is fifty-five dollars, goin' and comin'. That leaves twenty dollars for other expenses, not countin' what I've already spent, which is six-fifty," said she, recovering her self-possession. "It's plenty"

"But y' ain't calc'lated on no sleepers nor hotel bills"
"I ain't goin' on no sleeper Mis' Doudney says it's jest scandalous the way things is managed on them cars
I'm goin' on the old-fashioned cars, where they ain't no half-dressed men runnin' around"

"But you needn't be afraid of them, mother; at your age--"

"There! you needn't throw my age an' homeliness into my face, Ethan Ripley If I hadn't waited an' tended on you so long, I'd look a little more's I did when I married yeh."

Ripley gave it up in despair. He didn't realize fulls enough how the proposed trip had unsettled his wifes nerves. She didn't realize it herself.

"As for the hotel bills, they won't be none. I ain't agoin' to pay them pirates as much for a day's board as we'd charge for a week's, and have nawthin' to eat but dishes. I'm goin' to take a chicken an' some hard-boiled eggs, an' I'm goin' right through to Georgetown."

"Wal, all right, mother, but here's the ticket I got" "I don't want yer ticket"

"But you've got to take it."

"Well, I haint."

"Why, yes, ye have. It's bought, an' they won't take it back."

"Won't they?" She was perplexed again

"Not much they won't. I ast 'em A ticket sold is sold "Wal, if they won't---"

"You bet they won't"

"I s'pose I'll haff to use it." And that ended it.

They were a familiar sight as they rode down the road toward town next day. As usual, Mrs. Ripley sat up straight and stiff as "a half-drove wedge in a white-oak log." The day was cold and raw. There was some snow on the ground, but not enough to warrant the use of sleighs. It was "neither sleddin' nor wheelin'." The old people sat on a board laid across the box, and had an old quilt or two drawn up over their knees. Tewksbury lay in the back part of the box (which was filled with hay), where he jounced up and down, in company with a queer old trunk and a brand-new imitation-leather hand-bag

There is no ride quite so desolate and uncomfortable as a ride in a lumber-wagon on a cold day in autumn, when the ground is frozen, and the wind is strong and raw with threatening snow. The wagon-wheels grind along in the snow, the cold gets in under the seat at the calves of one's legs, and the ceaseless bumping of the bottom of the box on the feet is almost intolerable.

There was not much talk on the way down, and what httle there was related mainly to certain domestic regulations, to be strictly followed, regarding churning, pickles, pancakes, etc. Mrs. Ripley wore a shawl over her head, and carried her queer little black bonnet in her hand. Tewksbury was also wrapped in a shawl. The boy's teeth were pounding together like castanets by the time they reached Cedarville, and every muscle ached with the fatigue of shiking.

After a few purchases they drove down to the station, a frightful little den (common in the West), which was always too hot or too cold. It happened to be hot just now—a fact which rejoiced little Tewksbury.

"Now git my trunk stamped 'r fixed.' r whatever they call it," she said to Ripley, in a commanding tone, which gave great delight to the inevitable crowd of loafers beginning to assemble "Now remember, Tukey, have grandad kill that biggest turkey night before Thanksgiving, an' then you run right over to Mis' Doudney's—she's got a nawful tongue, but she can bake a turkey hist-rate—an' she'll fix up some squash-pies for yeh You can warm up one o' them mince-pies. I wish ye could be with me, but ye can't, so do the best ye can".

Ripley returning now, she said "Wal, now, I've fixed things up the best I could I ve baked bread enough to a last a week, an' Mis' Doudney has promised to bake for yeh—"

"I don't like her bakin'"

'Wal, you'll haff to stand it till I get back, 'n' you'll find a jar o' sweet pickles an' some crab-apple sauce down suller, 'n' you'd better melt up brown sugar for lasses, 'n' for goodness' sake don't eat all them mincepies up the fust week, 'n' see that Tukey ain't froze goin to school An now you'd better get out for home Goodby! an remember them pies

As they were riding home, Ripley roused up after a so long silence

"Did she—a—kiss you good-by, Tukey?"

"No, sir," piped Tewksbury

"Thunder! didn't she'" After a silence "She didn't me, neither 1 guess she kind a' sort a' forgot it, bein' so flustrated, y' know"

One cold, windy, intensely bright day, Mrs Stacey, who lives about two miles from Cedarville, looking out of the window, saw a queer little figure struggling along the road, which was blocked here and there with drifts 60 lt was an old woman laden with a good half-dozen parcels, which the wind seemed determined to wrench from her

She was dressed in black, with a full skirt, and her cloak being short, the wind had excellent opportunity to inflate her garments and sail her off occasionally into the deep snow outside the track, but she held out bravely till she reached the gate. As she turned in, Mrs. Stacey cried

"Why! it's Gran'ma Ripley, just getting back from her trip Why! how do you do? Come in Why! you 70 must be nearly frozen Let me take off your hat and veil"

'No, thank ye kindly, but I can't stop," was the given reply "I must be gittin' back to Ripley I expec' that man has jest let ev'rything go six ways f'r Sunday"

"Oh, you must sit down just a minute and warm'

Wal, I will, but I've got to git home by sundown sure I don't s'pose they's a thing in the house to eat," she said solemnly

"Oh, dear' I wish Stacey was here, so he could take you home An' the boys at school—"

"Don't need any help, if 't wa'nt for these bundles an' things I guess I'll jest leave some of 'em here, an'—Here' take one of these apples I brought 'em from Lizy Jane's suller, back to Yaark State"

'Oh' they're delictous! You must have had a lovely time"

"Pretty good But I kep thinkin of Ripley an Tukey all the time I s'pose they have had a gay time of it" (she meant the opposite of gay) "Wal, as I told Lizy Jane, I've had my spree, an now I've got to git back to 90 work. They ain't no rest for such as we are. As I told Lizy Jane, them folks in the big houses have Thanksgivin dinners every day of their lives, and men an women in splendid clo's to wait on 'em, so 't Thanksgivin' don't mean anything to 'em, but we poor critters, we make a great to-do if we have a good dinner onct a year. I've saw a pile o' this world, Mrs Stacey—a pile of it! I didn't think they was so many big houses in the world as I saw b'tween here an' Chicago Wal, I can't set here gabbin'" She rose resolutely "I must get home to Ripley Jest kind o' stow them bags away I'll take two an' leave them three others Good-by' I must be gittin' to home to Ripley He'll want his supper on time"

And off up the road the indomitable little figure trudged, head held down to the cutting blast—little snow-fly, a speck on a measureless expanse, crawling along with painful breathing, and slipping, sliding steps—"Gittin' home to Ripley an' the boy"

Ripley was out to the barn when she entered, but Tewksbury was building a fire in the old cook-stove He sprang up with a cry of joy, and ran to her. She seized him and kissed him, and it did her so much good she to hugged him close, and kissed him again and again, crying hysterically

"Oh, gran'ma, I'm so glad to see you! We've had an awful time since you've been gone"

She released him, and looked around A lot of dirty dishes were on the table, the table-cloth was a "sight to behold" (as she afterward said), and so was the stove—kettle-marks all over the table-cloth, splotches of pancake batter all over the stove.

"Wal, I sh'd say as much," she dryly assented, untying her bonnet-strings

When Ripley came in she had her regimentals on the stove was brushed, the room swept, and she was elbow-deep in the dish-pan "Hullo, mother! Got back, hev yeh?"

"I sh'd say it was about time," she replied curtly, without looking up or ceasing work. "Has ol' 'Crumpy' dried up yit?" This was her greeting

Her trip was a fact now, no chance could rob her of it. She had looked forward twenty-three years toward it, and now she could look back at it accomplished. She took up her burden again, never more thinking to lay it down.

42 down. The only extensive revision of the Harper's Weekly text was Garland's fortunate omission of the following ending:

. till her poor work-weary, bony hands should be folded finally on her lean, pothetic old bosom. Her next trip will be so far away she will never return—for post the gotes of space and time.

From

Crumbling Idols

Crumbling Idols: Twelve Essays on Art Dealing Chiefly with Literature, Painting and the Drama, published by the newly founded firm of Stone and Kimball in 1894, was an expansion, revision, and rearrangement of various critical articles and (presumably) lectures which Garland had written in the preceding several years. Although he was inclined in his later life to be a little scornful of his violence and youthfulness, Crumbling Idols is historically important. It reflects Garland's acceptance of Howells' faith in realism, his conviction (which he later recanted) that the literary center of the future was to be Chicago, his awareness of the interrelation of the arts, and the characteristic enthusiasms of the 1890's for Ibsen, impressionism, and local color. If there was any "manifesto defending the general position of the local colorists, this book contained it. Of the two chapters here reprinted, "Local Color in Art" seems not to have been printed previously, but "The Local Novel" was apparently part of a lecture delivered as early as 1891 (see Roadside Meetings, p. 189) and is substantially the same as "The Future of Fiction," which had appeared in The Arena for April 1893. Other portions of the book had appeared in The Arena and The Forum.

Local color in fiction is demonstrably the life of fiction It is the native element, the differentiating element lt corresponds to the endless and vital charm of individual peculiarity. It is the differences which interest us, the similarities do not please, do not forever stimulate and teed as do the differences. Literature would die of dry for if it chronicled the similarities only, or even largely.

Historically, the local color of a poet or dramatist is of the greatest value. The charm of Horace is the side light he throws on the manners and customs of his time. The vital in Homer lies, after all, in his local color, not in his abstractions. Because the sagas of the North delineate more exactly how men and women lived and wrought in those days, therefore they have always appealed to me with infinitely greater power than Homer.

Similarly, it is the local color of Chaucer that interests us to-day. We yawn over his tales of chivalry which were in the manner of his contemporaries, but the Miller and the Priest interest us. Wherever the man of the past in literature showed us what he really lived and loved, he moves us. We understand him, and we really feel an interest in him.

Historically, local color has gained in beauty and suggestiveness and humanity from Chaucer down to the present day Each age has embodied more and more of its actual life and social conformation until the differentiating qualities of modern art make the best paintings of Norway as distinct in local color as its fiction is vital and indigenous.

Every great moving literature to-day is full of local color. It is this element which puts the Norwegian and Russian almost at the very summit of modern novel writing, and it is the comparative lack of this distinctive flavor which makes the English and French take a lower place in truth and sincerity.

Everywhere all over the modern European world, men are writing novels and dramas as naturally as the grass or corn or flax grows The Provençal, the Hun, the Catalonian. the Norwegian, is getting a hearing This literature is not the literature of scholars, it is the literature of lovers and doers, of men who love the modern and who have not been educated to despise common things

These men are speaking a new word. They are not hunting themes, they are struggling to express.

Conventional criticism does not hamper or confine them They are rooted in the soil They stand among the corn-fields and they dig in the peat-bogs They concern themselves with modern and very present words and themse, and they have brought a new word which to divide in half the domain of beauty.

They have made art the re-creation of the beautiful and the significant. Mere beauty no longer suffices. Beauty is the world-old aristocrat who has taken for 50 mate this mighty young plebeian Significance. Their child is to be the most human and humane literature ever seen.

It has taken the United States longer to achieve independence of English critics than it took to free itself from old-world political and economic rule. Its political freedom was won, not by its gentlemen and scholars, but by its yeomanry, and in the same way our national literature will come in its fulness when the common American rises spontaneously to the expression of his concept of of life.

The fatal blight upon most American art has been, and is to-day, its imitative quality, which has kept it characterless and factitious,—a forced rose-culture rather than the free flowering of native plants.

Our writers despised or feared the home market. They rested their immortality upon the "universal theme," which was a theme of no interest to the public and of small interest to themselves

During the first century and a half, our literature had 70 very little national color. It was quite like the utterance of corresponding classes in England But at length Bryant and Cooper felt the influence of our mighty forests and prairies. Whittier uttered something of New England boy-life, and Thoreau prodded about among newly discovered wonders, and the American literature got its first start

Under the influence of Cooper came the stories of wild life from Texas, from Ohio, and from Illinois. The wild, rough settlements could not produce smooth and so cultured poems or stories, they only furnished forth rough-and-ready anecdotes, but in these stories there were hints of something fine and strong and native.

As the settlements increased in size, as the pressure of the forest and the wild beast grew less, expression rose to a higher plane, men softened in speech and manner All preparations were being made for a local literature raised to the level of art.

The Pacific slope was first in the line. By the exceptional interest which the world took in the life of the gold fields, and by the forward urge which seems always to surprise the pessimist and the scholiast, two young men were plunged into that wild life, led across the plains set in the shadow of Mount Shasta, and local to literature received its first great marked, decided impetus.

To-day we have in America, at last, a group of writers who have no suspicion of imitation laid upon them. Whatever faults they may be supposed to have, they are at any rate, themselves American critics can depend upon a characteristic American literature of fiction and the drama from these people

The corn has flowered, and the cotton-boll has broken into speech

Local color—what is it? It means that the writer spon-20 taneously reflects the life which goes on around him. It is natural and unstrained art.

It is, in a sense, unnatural and artificial to find an American writing novels of Russia or Spain or the Holy Land He cannot hope to do it so well as the native. The best he can look for is that poor word of praise, "He does it very well, considering he is an alien"

If a young writer complain that there are no themes at home, that he is forced to go abroad for perspective and romance, I answer there is something wrong in his education or his perceptive faculty. Often he is more anxious to win a money success than to be patiently one of art's unhurried devotees.

I can sympathize with him, however, for criticism has not helped him to be true. Criticism of the formal kind and spontaneous expression are always at war, like the old man and the youth. They may politely conceal it, but they are mutually destructive.

Old men naturally love the past, the books they read are the master-pieces, the great men are all dying off, they say; the young man should treat lofty and universal themes, as they used to do. These localisms are petty. These truths are disturbing. Youth annoys them. Spontaneousness is formlessness, and the criticism that does not call for the abstract and the ideal and the beautiful is leading to destruction, these critics say.

And yet there is a criticism which helps, which tends to keep a writer at his best, but such criticism recognizes the dynamic force of a literature, and tries to spy outtendencies. This criticism to-day sees that local color means national character, and is aiding the young writer to treat his themes in the best art.

I assert it is the most natural thing in the world for a man to love his native land and his native, intimate surroundings. Born into a web of circumstances, enmeshed in common life, the youthful artist begins to think All the associations of that childhood and the love-life of youth combine to make that web of common affairs, threads of silver and beads of gold, the near-at-hand things are the dearest and sweetest after all.

As the reader will see, I am using local color to mean something more than a forced study of the picturesque scenery of a State.

Local color in a novel means that it has such quality of texture and back-ground that it could not have been written in any other place or by any one else than a valve.

It means a statement of life as indigenous as the plant-growth. It means that the picturesque shall not be seen by the author,—that every tree and bird and mountain shall be dear and companionable and necessary, not picturesque, the tourist cannot write the local novel

From this it follows that local color must not be put in for the sake of local color. It must go in, it will go in, because the writer naturally carries it with him half unconsciously, or conscious only of its significance, its interest to him.

He must not stop to think whether it will interest the reader or not. He must be loyal to himself, and put it in because he loves it. If he is an artist, he will make his reader feel it through his own emotion.

What we should stand for is not universality of theme, but beauty and strength of treatment, leaving the writer to choose his theme because he loves it.

Here is the work of the critic. Recognizing that the theme is beyond his control, let him aid the young writer to delineate simply and with unwavering strokes Even here the critic can do little, if he is possessed of the idea that the young writer of to-day should model upon Addison or Macaulay or Swift

There are new criterions to-day in writing as in painting, and individual expression is the aim. The critic can do much to aid a young writer to not copy an old master or any other master. Good criticism can aid him to be trivid and simple and unhackneyed in his technique, the subject is his own affair.

⁷ two young men, presumably Bret Harte (see p 386) and Joaqu Miller (18412-1913) • 9 Mount Shasta, in northern California

I agree with him who says, Local art must be raised to the highest levels in its expression; but in aiding this perfection of technique we must be careful not to cut into the artist's spontaneity. To apply ancient dogmas of criticism to our life and literature would be benumbing to aitist and fatal to his art.

VΙ

THE LOCAL NOVEL

The local novel seems to be the heir-apparent to the kingdom of poesy. It is already the most promising of all literary attempts to-day, certainly it is the most sincere. It seems but beginning its work. It is "hopelessly contemporaneous", that is its strength. It is (at its best) unaffected, natural, emotional. It is sure to become all-powerful. It will redeem American literature, as it has already redeemed the South from its conventional and highly wrought romanticism.

By reason of growing truth and sincerity the fiction of the South has risen from the dead. It is now in the spring season of shooting wilding plants and timorous blades of sown grains. Its future is assured. Its soil is fertilized with the blood of true men. Its women are the repositories of great, vital, sincere, emotional experiences which will inevitably appear in their children, and at last in art, and especially in fiction. The Southern people are in the midst of a battle more momentous than the Rebellion, because it is the result of the Rebellion, that is, the battle of intrenched privilege against the swiftly-spreading democratic idea of equality before the law and in the face of nature.

They have a terribly, mightily dramatic race-problem on their hands. The South is the meeting-place of winds It is the seat of swift and almost incalculable change, and this change, this battle, this strife of invisible powers. Is about to enter their fiction.

The Negro has already entered it. He has brought a musical speech to his masters, and to the new fiction He has brought a strange and pleading song into music The finest writers of the New South already find him a never-failing source of interest. He is not, of course, the only subject of Southern fiction, nor even the principal figure, but he is a necessary part, and a most absorbingly interesting part.

The future of fiction in the South will also depict the unreconstructed rebel unreservedly, and the race-problem without hate or contempt of anger, for the highest art will be the most catholic in its sympathy. It will delineate so vast contending forces, and it will be a great literature

The Negro will enter the fiction of the South, first, as subject, second, as artist in his own right. His first attempts will be imitative, but he will yet utter himself, as surely as he lives. He will contribute a poetry and a novel as peculiarly his own as the songs he sings. He may appear, also, in a strange half-song, half-chant, and possibly in a drama peculiar to himself, but in some form of fiction he will surely utter the sombre and darkly-florid genius for emotional utterance which of characterizes him.

In the North the novel will continue local for some time to come. It will delineate the intimate life and speech of every section of our enormous and widely scattered republic. It will catch and fix in charcoal the changing, assimilating races, delineating the pathos and humor and the infinite drama of their swift adjustment to new conditions. California, New Mexico, Idaho, Utah, Oregon, each wonderful locality in our Nation of Nations will yet find its native utterance. The superficial work of the tourist and outsider will not do. The real novelist of these sections is walking behind the plow or trudging to school in these splendid potential environments.

This local movement will include the cities as well, and St Louis, Chicago, San Francisco, will be delineated by artists born of each city, whose work will be so true that it could not have been written by any one from the outside. The real utterance of a city or a locality can only come when a writer is born out of its intimate so heart. To such an one, nothing will be "strange" or "picturesque," all will be familiar, and full of significance or beauty. The novel of the slums must be written by one who has played there as a child, and taken part in all its amusements, not out of curiosity, but out of pleasure seeking. It cannot be done from above nor from the outside. It must be done out of a full heart and without seeking for effect.

The artist should not look abroad to see how others are succeeding. Success does not always measure merit. It took nearly a third of a century for Whitman and Monet to be recognized. The great artist never conforms. He does not trail after some other man's success. He works out his individual perception of things.

The contrast of city and country, everywhere growing sharper, will find its reflection in this local novel of the immediate future,—the same tragedies and comedies, with the essential difference called local color, and taking place all over the land, wherever cities arise like fungi, unhealthy, yet absorbing as subjects of fictional art.

As I have elsewhere pointed out, the drama will join the novel in this study of local conditions. It will be derived from fiction, and in many cases the dramatist and novelist will be the same person. In all cases the sincerity of the author's love for his scenes and characters will find expression in tender care for truth, and there will be made to pass before our eyes wonderfully suggestive pictures of other lives and landscapes. The drama will grow in dignity and importance along these lines

Both drama and novel will be colloquial. This does not mean that they will be exclusively in the dialects, but the actual speech of the people of each locality will unquestionably be studied more closely than ever before. Dialect is the life of a language, precisely as the common people of the nation form the sustaining power of its social life and art.

And so in the novel, in the short story, and in the drama—by the work of a multitude of loving artists, 30 not by the work of an over-topping personality—will the intimate social, individual life of the nation be depicted Before this localism shall pass away, such a study will have been made of this land and people as has never been made by any other age or social group,—a literature from the plain people, reflecting their unrestrained outlook on life, subtle in speech and color, humane beyond precedent, humorous, varied, simple in means, lucid as water, searching as sunlight.

To one who believes each age to be its own best interpreter, the idea of "decay of fiction" never comes. That which the absolutist takes for decay is merely change.
The conservative fears change, the radical welcomes it.
The conservative tries to argue that fundamentals cannot change, that they are the same yesterday, to-day, and tomorrow. If that were true, then a sorrowful outlook on the future would be natural. Such permanency would be death. Life means change.

As a matter of fact, the minute differentiations of literature which the conservative calls its non-essentials, are really its essentials. Vitality and growth are in these "non-essentials." It is the difference in characters, not their similarity, which is forever interesting. It is the subtle coloring individuality gives which vitalizes land-scape art, and so it is the subtle differences in the interpretation of life which each age gives that vitalizes its literature and makes it its own.

The individuality of the artist is the saving grace of art, and landscape painting will not be fantastic so long as men study nature. It will never be mere reproduction so long as the artist represents it as he sees it. The fact will correct the fantasy. The artist will color the fact

The business of the present is not to express fundamentals, but to sincerely present its own minute and characteristic interpretation of life. This point cannot be too often insisted upon. Unless a writer add something to the literature of his race, has he justification. Is there glory in imitation? Is the painter greatest who copies old masters, or is it more praiseworthy to embody an original conception? These are very important questions for the young artist.

To perceive the hopelessness of absolutism in literature, you have but to stop a moment to think Admit that there are perfect models to which must be referred all subsequent writing, and we are committed to a barren round of hopeless imitations. The young writer is disheartened or drawn off into imitations, and ruined for any real expression. This way of looking at literature produced our Barlows and Coltons and Hillhouses, with their "colossi of cotton-batting," and it produces blankverse dramas to-day.

But the relativists in art are full of hope. They see that life is the model,—or, rather, that each man stands accountable to himself first, and to the perceived fact of life second. Life is always changing, and literature changes with it. It never decays; it changes. Poetry—that is to say impassioned personal outlook on life—is in no more danger of extinction to-day than in the days of Edmund Spenser. The American novel will continue to grow in truth to American life without regard to the form and spirit of the novel or drama of the past. Consciously or unconsciously, the point of view of the modern writer is that of the veritist, or truth stater

Once out of the period of tutelage, it is natural for youth to overleap barriers. He naturally discards the wig and cloak of his grandfathers. He comes at last to reject, perhaps a little too brusquely, the models which conservatism regards with awe. He respects them as history, but he has life, abounding, fresh, contiguous life, life that stings and smothers and overwhelms and exalts, like the salt, green, snow-tipped ocean surf, life, with its terrors and triumphs, right here and now, its infinite drama, its allurement, its battle, and its victories life is the model, truth is the master, the heart of the man himself his motive power. The pleasure of re-creating in the image of nature is the artist's unfailing regular.

To him who sees that difference, not similarity, is the vitalizing quality, there is no sorrow at change. The future will take care of itself. In the space of that word

"difference" lies all the infinite range of future art. Some elements are comparatively unchanging. The snow will fall, spring will come, men and women love, the stars will rise and set, and grass return again and again in vast rhythms of green, but society will not be the same.

The physical conformation of our nation will change It will lose its wildness, its austerity. Its unpeopled plains will pass away, and gardens will bloom where the hot sand now drifts. Cities will rise where now the elk and the mountain lions are. Swifter means of transportation will bring the lives of different sections into closer relationship. It will tend to equalize intellectual opportunities. The physical and mental life of men and women will be changed, the relation of man to man, and man to woman, will change in detail, and the fiction 40 of the future will express these changes.

To the veritist, therefore, the present is the vital theme. The past is dead, and the future can be trusted to look after itself. The young men and maidens of that time will find the stars of their present brighter than the stars of '92, the people around them more absorbing than books, and their own outlook on life more reasonable than that of dead men. Their writing and painting, in proportion to its vitality and importance, will reflect this, their natural attitude, toward life and history.

Harold Frederic

1856 • 1898

Dutch, French, and New England blood flowed in the veins of Harold Frederic, though his birthplace was Utica, New York The boy was eighteen months old when his father died, and his mother thereafter supported the family by operating a dairy. During his school days, Frederic helped her. "I spent my boyhood," he recalled later, "in getting out of bed at five in the morning to look after the cattle, and until I was fourteen, I drove a milk wagon as a 'side issue' in my agricultural duties." Later, he was successively an office boy, a retoucher of photographs, and a farm hand. At twenty he became a reporter, at twenty-four an editor, on a Utica newspaper. From 1884 to the year of his death, he served as a London correspondent for the New York Times.

It was while Frederic was abroad that he wrote his best-known fictional works, alternating days on which he toiled over his novels with days devoted to journalism Vivid memories of the life he had seen during his varied career in upstate New York entered into his writings. His novels include Seth's Brother's Wife (1887), which exposes the seamy side of farm life and rural politics, The Lawton Gul (1890), based on the conflict between capital and labor in a manufacturing town, and The Copperhead (1893), which indicts political intolerance More notable than any of these, and more notable, too, than several novels concerned with American history or with British backgrounds, is The Damnation of Theron Ware (1896), published two years before Frederic's early death.

The careful method of writing typical of Frederic was exemplified by his work on this novel Believing that it was his duty to know everything each of his characters did, he spent five years making detailed studies of their fields of special interest. Since one was a biologist, for instance, he learned everything he could about appropriate aspects of science. And since the main character was a Methodist preacher, Frederic taught himself, as he said, "all the details of a Methodist minister's work, obligations, and daily routine, and all the machinery of his church." In addition he drew freely upon his recollections of the folk whom he had known during his boyhood. The result was that he wrote a novel which went beyond others of the period in its authenticity Because the book which was thus carefully written treated religion critically, it caused something of a furor in its day and was much discussed. It was reprinted as recently as 1924, and even today historians of American fiction consider it an outstanding achievement.

The Dannation of Theron Ware

The protagonist in Frederic's best novel is a young Methodist minister, Theron Ware, sincere, ambitious, but half-educated, impressionable, and unstable Assigned by the bishop to serve in the raw little town of Octavius, in central New York, Ware undergoes a moral transformation Acquaintanceship with a group of characters of a very different background from his makes him poignantly aware of his own limitations, and at the same time his growing insight into the pettiness and emotionalism of small-town Methodism causes his faith to waver. In the end, thanks to the common-sense advice of a revivalist, he makes a halfway recovery from his "damnation" Chapter III of the nevel offers a sample of the author's saturical realism (The title has been supplied by the editors)

THE TRUSTEES AND THE REV MR WARE

When the three trustees had been shown in by the Rev Mr Ware, and had taken seats, an awkward little pause ensued The young minister looked doubtingly from one face to another, the while they glanced with inquiring interest about the room, noting the pictures and appraising the furniture in their minds and shut with vice-like firmness, the short snub nose. and the little eyes squinting from half-closed lids beneath slightly marked brows, seemed scarcely to arrain to the dignity of features, but evaded attention instead, as if feeling that they were only there at all from plain necessity, and ought not to be taken into account Mr Pierce's face did not know how to smile. what was the use of smiles?—but its whole surface radiated secretiveness. Portrayed on canvas by a master brush with a ruff or a red robe for masquerade, generations of imaginative amateurs would have seen in it vist-reaching plots, the skeletons of a dozen dynastic cupboards, the guarded mysteries of half a century's mernational diplomacy. The amateurs would have been wrong again There was nothing behind Mr Pierce's juiceless countenance more weighty than a general determination to exact seven per cent for his money. and some specific notions about capturing certain brickvards which were interfering with his quarry-sales But Octavius watched him shamble along its sidewalks quite as the Vienna of dead and forgotten vesterday might have watched Metternich.

Erastus Winch was of a breezier sort,—a florid, stout, and sandy man, who spent most of his life driving over evil country roads in a buggy, securing orders for dairy turniture and certain allied lines of farm utensils. This practice had given him a loud voice and a deceptively hearty manner, to which the other avocation of cheesebuyer, which he pursued at the Board of Trade meetings every Monday afternoon, had added a considerable command of persuasive yet non-committal language. To look at him, still more to hear him, one would have sworn he was a good fellow, a trifle rough and noisy, perhaps, but all right at bottom. But the County Clerk of Dearborn County could have told you of agriculturists who knew Erastus from long and unhappy experience, and who held him to be even a tighter man than Loren Pierce in the matter of a mortgage

The third trustee, Levi Gorringe, set one wondering at the very first glance what on earth he was doing in that company. Those who had known him longest had the least notion; but it may be added that no one knew him well. He was a lawyer, and had lived in Octavius for upwards of ten years; that is to say, since early manhood. He had an office on the main street, just under the Principal photograph gallery. Doubtless he was sometimes in this office; but his fellow-townsmen saw him more often in the street doorway, with the stairs behind him, and the flaring show-cases of the photographer on either side, standing with his hands in his pockets and 50 an unlighted cigar in his mouth, looking at nothing in particular. About every other day he went off after breakfast into the country roundabout, sometimes with a rod, sometimes with a gun, but always alone. He was a bachelor, and slept in a room at the back of his office, cooking some of his meals himself, getting others at a restaurant close by Though he had little visible practice, he was understood to be well-to-do and even more, and people tacitly inferred that he "shaved notes." The Methodists of Octavius looked upon him as a queer 60 fish, and through nearly a dozen years had never quite outgrown their hebdomadal tendency to surprise at seeing him enter church. He had never, it is tiue, professed religion, but they had elected him as a trustee now for a number of terms, all the same-partly because he was their only lawyer, partly because he, like both his colleagues, held a mortgage on the church edifice and lot In person, Mr Gorringe was a slender man, with a skin of a clear, uniform citron tint, black waving hair, and dark gray eyes, and a thin, high-featured face 70 He wore a mustache and pointed chin-tuft, and, though he was of New England parentage and had never been further south than Ocean Grove, he presented a general effect of old Mississippian traditions and tastes startlingly at variance with the standards of Dearborn County Methodism. Nothing could convince some of the elder sisters that he was not a drinking man

The three visitors had completed their survey of the room now; and Loren Pierce emitted a dry, harsh little cough, as a signal that business was about to begin At so this sound, Winch drew up his feet, and Gorringe untied a parcel of account-books and papers that he held on his knee. Theron felt that his countenance must be exhibiting to the assembled brethren an unfortunate sense of helplessness in their hands. He tried to look more resolute, and forced his lips into a smile

"Brother Gorringe allus acts as 'eckertary," said Erastus Winch, beaming broadly upon the minister, as if the mere mention of the fact promoted jollity "That's it, Brother Gorringe,—take your seat at Brother Ware's 90 desk. Mind the Dominie's pen don't play tricks on you, an' start off writin' out sermons instid of figgers." The humorist turned to Theron as the lawyer walked over to the desk at the window "I allus have to caution him about that," he remarked with great joviality. "An' do you look out afterwards, Brother Ware, or else you'll catch that pen o' yours scribblin' lawyer's lingo in place o' the Word."

Theron felt bound to exhibit a grin in acknowledgment of this pleasantry. The lawyer's change of position had involved some shifting of the others' chairs, and the young minister found himself directly confronted by Brother Pierce's hard and colorless old visage. Its little eyes were watching him, as through a mask, and under their influence the smile of politeness fled from his lips. The lawyer on his right, the cheese-buyer to the left, seemed to recede into distance as he for the moment returned the gaze of the quarryman. He waited now for him to speak, as if the others were of no importance.

"We are a plain soit o' folks up in these parts," said Brother Pierce, after a slight further pause. His voice 20 was as dry and rasping as his cough, and its intonations were those of authority. "We walk here," he went on, eying the minister with a sour regard, "in a meek an' humble spirit, in the straight an' narrow way which leadeth unto life. We ain't gone traipsin' after strange gods, like some people that call themselves. Methodists in other places. We stick by the Discipline an' the ways of our fathers in Israel. No new-fangled notions can go down here. Your wife'd better take them flowers out of her bunnit afore next Sunday."

Silence possessed the room for a few moments, the while Theron, pale-faced and with brows knit, studied the pattern of the ingrain carpet. Then he lifted his head, and nodded it in assent "Yes," he said, "we will do nothing by which our 'brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak."

Brother Pierce's parchment face showed no sign of surprise or pleasure at this easy submission "Another thing We don't want no book-learnin or dictionary words in our pulpit," he went on coldly "Some folks may stomach em, we won't Them two sermons o' yours, praps they'd do down in some city place; but they're like your wife's bunnit here, they're too flowery to suit us What we want to hear is the plain, old-fashioned Word of God, without any palaver or hems and ha's. They tell me there's some parts where hell's treated as played-out,—where our ministers don't like to talk much about it because people don't want to hear about it Such preachers ought to be put out They ain't Methodists at all. What we want here, sir, is straight-out, flat-footed hell,—the burnin' lake o' fire an brimstone. Pour it into 'em, hot an' strong We can't have too much of it. Work in them awful deathbeds of Voltaire an' Tom Paine, with the Devil right there in the room, reachin' for 'em, an' they yellin' for fright, that's what fills the anxious seat an' brings in souls hand over fist."

Theron's tongue dallied for an instant with the temptation to comment upon these old-wife fables, which were so dear to the rural religious heart when he and I were boys. But it seemed wiser to only nod again and let his mentor go on

"We ain't had no trouble with the Free Methodists here," continued Brother Pierce, "jest because we kept to the old paths, an' seek for salvation in the good old way Everybody can shout 'Amen' as loud and as long as the Spirit moves him, with us. Some one was sayin you thought we ought to have a choir and an organ No, sirree! No such tom-foolery for us! You'll only stir up feelin' agin yourself by hintin' at such things And then, too, our folks don't take no stock in all that pack o' nonsense about science, such as tellin' the age of the earth by crackin' up stones. I've b'en in the quarry line all my life, an' I know it's all humbug! Why, they say some folks are goin' round now preachin' that our grandfathers were all monkeys That comes from departin from the ways of our forefathers, an' puttin' in organs an' choirs, an' deckin' our women-folks out with gewgaws, an' apin' the fashions of the worldly. I should not wonder if them kind did have some monkey blood in 'em You'll find we're a different sort here"

The young minister preserved silence for a little, until it became apparent that the old trustee had had his sw out. Even then he raised his head slowly, and at last made answer in a hesitating and irresolute way.

"You have been very frank," he said "I am obliged to you. A clergyman coming to a new charge cannot be better served than by having laid before him a clear statement of the views and—and spiritual tendencies—of his new flock, quite at the outset I feel it to be of especial value in this case, because I am young in years and in my ministry, and am conscious of a great weakness of the flesh. I can see how daily contact with neople so attached to the old, simple, primitive Methodism of Wesley and Asbury may be a source of much strength to me. I may take it, he added upon second thought, with an inquiring glance at Mr. Winch, "that Brother Pierce's description of our charge, and its tastes and needs, meets with your approval?"

Erastus Winch nodded his head and smiled expansively. "Whatever Brother Pierce says, goes!" he declared. The lawyer, sitting behind at the desk by the window, said nothing.

"The place is jest overrun with Irish," Brother Pierce began again "They've got two Catholic churches here now to our one, and they do jest as they blamed please it the charter elections. It'd be a good idee to pitch into Catholics in general whenever you can You could make a hit that way I say the State ought to make 'em pay taxes on their church property. They've no right to be exempted, because they ain't Christians at all They're idolaters, that's what they are! I know 'em' I've had em in my quairies for years, an' they ain't got no idee of decency or fair dealin' Every time the price of stone went up, every man of 'em would tine to screw more wages out o' me Why, they used to keep account o' the amount o' business I done, an' figger up my profits. in' have the face to come an' talk to me about 'em, as it that had anything to do with wages. It's my belief their priests put 'em up to it People don't begin to reelize,-that church of idolatry'll be the ruin o' this country, if it ain't checked in time. Jest you go at 'em himmer'n' tongs! I've got Eyetalians in the quarries now They're sensible fellows they know when they're well off, a dollar a day, an' they're satisfied, an' everything goes smooth"

But they re Catholics, the same as the Irish," suddenly interjected the lawyer, from his place by the window. Theron pricked up his ears at the sound of his voice. There was an anti-Pierce note in it, so to speak, which it did him good to hear. The consciousness of sympathy began on the instant to inspire him with courage.

I know some people say they are," Brother Pierce Suardedly retorted, "but I've summered an' wintered both kinds, an' I hold to it they're different. I grant ye, the Eyetalians are some given to jabbin' knives into tach other, but they never git up strikes, an' they don't grumble about wages. Why, look at the way they live,— jest some weeds an' yarbs dug up on the roadside, an' stewed in a kettle with a piece o' fat the size o' your finger, an' a loat o' bread, an' they're happy as a king. There's some sense in that; but the Irish, they've got to so have meat an' potatoes an' butter jest as if—as if—"

"As if they'd b'en used to 'em at home," put in Mr. Winch, to help his colleague out.

The lawyer ostentatiously drew up his chair to the desk, and began turning over the leaves of his biggest book "It's getting on toward noon, gentlemen," he said, in an impatient voice

The business meeting which followed was for a considerable time confined to hearing extracts from the books and papers read in a swift and formal fashion 60 by Mr Gorringe If this was intended to inform the new pastor of the exact financial situation in Octavius, it lamentably failed of its purpose. Theron had little knowledge of figures, and though he tried hard to listen, and to assume an air of comprehension, he did not understand much of what he heard In a general way he gathered that the church property was put down at $12,000, on which there was a debt of $4,800. The annual expenses were $2,250, of which the principal items were $800 for his salary, $170 for the rent of the 70 parsonage, and $319 for interest on the debt. It seemed that last year the receipts had fallen just under $2,000, and they now confronted the necessity of making good this deficit during the coming year, as well as increasing the regular revenues. Without much discussion, it was agreed that they should endeavor to secure the services of a celebrated "debt-raiser," early in the autumn, and utilize him in the closing days of a revival,

Theron knew this "debt-raiser," and had seen him at work,—a burly, bustling, vulgar man who took possession of the pulpit as if it were an auctioneer's block, and pursued the task of exciting liberality in the bosoms of the congregation by alternating prayer, anecdote, song, and cheap buffoonery in a manner truly sickening Would it not be preferable, he feebly suggested, to raise the money by a festival, or fair, or some other form of entertainment which the ladies could manage?

Brother Pierce shook his head with contemptuous emphasis "Our women-folks ain't that kind," he said "They did try to hold a sociable once, but nobody came, 50 and we didn't raise more'n three or four dollars. It ain't their line They lack the worldly arts. As the Discipline commands, they avoid the evil of putting on gold and costly apparel, and taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus."

Well—of course—it you prefer the 'debt-raiser'—" Theron began, and took the itemized account from Gorringe's knee as an excuse for not finishing the hateful sentence

He looked down the foolscap sheet, line by line, with no special sense of what it signified, until his eye caught 10 upon this little section of the report, bracketed by itself in the Secretary's neat hand

INTEREST CHARGE

First mortgage (1873) $1,000 (E Winch) @ 7 $ 70 Second mortgage (1876) 1,700 (L Gorringe) @ 6 102 Third mortgage (1878) 2,100 (L Pierce) @ 7 147 $34,800

It was no news to him that the three mortgages on the church property were held by the three trustees. But as he looked once more, another feature of the thing struck him as curious.

"I notice that the rates of interest vary," he remarked without thinking, and then wished the words unsaid, for the two trustees in view moved uneasily on their seats.

"Oh, that's nothing," exclaimed Erastus Winch, with 20 a boisterous display of jollity. It's only Brother Gorringe's pleasant little way of making a contribution to our funds. You will notice that, at the date of all these mortgages, the State rate of interest was seven per cent Since then it's b'en lowered to six. Well, when that happened, you see, Brother Gorringe, not being a professin' member, and so not bound by our rules, he could just as well as not let his interest down a cent. But Brother Pierce an' me, we talked it over, an' we made up our minds we were tied hand an' foot by our contract. You 30 know how strong the Discipline lays it down that we must be bound to the letter of our agreements. That bein' so, we seen it in the light of duty not to change what we'd set our hands to. That's how it is, Brother Ware

"I understand," said Theron, with an effort at polite calmness of tone "And—is there anything else?"

"There's this," broke in Brother Pierce "we're commanded to be law-abiding people, an seven per cent was the law—an' would be now if them ragamuffins in the Legislation—"

"Surely we need n't go further into that,' interrupted the minister, conscious of a growing stiffness in his moral spine "Have we any other business before us?"

Brother Pierce's little eyes snapped, and the wrinkles in his forehead deepened angrily 'Business'" he demanded. "Yes, plenty of it. We've got to reduce expenses We're nigh onto $300 behind-hand this minute Besides your house-rent, you get $800 free an' clear—that is $15 38 every week, an' only you an' your wife to keep out of it. Why, when I was your age, young man, and after that too, I was glad to get $6 a week.

"I don't think my salary is under discussion. Mr Pierce—"

"Brother Pierce!" suggested Winch, in a half-chuck ling undertone

"Brother Pierce, then!" echoed Theron, impatiently "The Quarterly Conference and the Estimating Committee deal with that The trustees have no more to do with it than the man in the moon"

"Come, come, Brother Ware," put in Erastus Winch "we must n't have no hard feelin's Brotherly love is what we're all lookin' after Brother Pierce's meanin was n't agin your drawin' your full salary, every cent of it, only—only there are certain little things connected with the parsonage here that we feel you ought to bear Fr instance, there is the new sidewalk we had to lay in front of the house here only a month ago. Of course if the treasury was flush we would n't say a word about it. An then there's the gas bill here. Seein' as you get your rent for nothin', it don't seem much to ask that you should see to lightin' the place yourself."

No. I don't think that either is a proper charge upon me, interposed Theron "I decline to pay them"

"We can have the gas shut off," remarked Brother Pierce, coldly

"As soon as you like," responded the minister, sitting erect and tapping the carpet nervously with his foot "Only you must understand that I will take the whole matter to the Quarterly Conference in July I already see a good many other interesting questions about the financial management of this church which might be appropriately discussed there"

"Oh, come, Brother Ware!" broke in Trustee Winch, with a somewhat agitated assumption of good-feeling "Surely these are matters we ought to settle amongst our selves. We never yet asked outsiders to meddle with our business here. It sour motto, Brother Ware. I savif you've got a motto, stand by it."

Well, my motto," said Theron, "is to be behaved decently to by those with whom I have to deal, and I also propose to stand by it."

Brother Pierce rose gingerly to his feet, with the hesitation of an old man not sure about his knees. When he had straightened himself, he put on his hat, and eyed the minister sternly from beneath its brim

The Lord gives us crosses grievous to our natur'," he said, "an' we're told to bear 'em cheerfully as long as they're on our backs, but there ain't nothin' said agin our unloadin' 'em in the ditch the minute we git the chance. I guess you won't last here more 'n a twelve-month'.

He pulled his soft and discolored old hat down over his brows with a significantly hostile nod, and, turning, stumped toward the hall-door without offering to shake hands

The other trustees had risen likewise, in tacit recognition that the meeting was over. Winch clasped the minister's hand in his own broad, hard palm, and squeezed it in an exuberant grip. "Don't mind his little ways, Brother Ware," he urged in a loud, uncruous whisper, with a grinning backward nod "he's a trifle skittish sometimes when you don't give him free rein; but he's all wool an' a yard wide when it comes to right-down hard-pan religion. My love to Sister Ware," and he followed the senior trustee into the hall.

Mr Gorringe had been tying up his books and papers. He came now with the bulky parcel under his arm, and his hat and stick in the other hand. He could give little 30 but his thumb to Theron to shake. His face wore a grave expression, and not a line relaxed as, catching the minister's look, he slowly covered his left eye in a deliberate wink.

"Well?—and how did it go off?" asked Alice, from where she knelt by the oven door, a few minutes later

For answer, Theron threw himself wearily into the big old farm rocking-chair on the other side of the stove, and shook his head with a lengthened sigh

"If it was n't for that man Gorringe of yours," he 40 said dejectedly, 'I think I should feel like going off—and learning a trade."

Stephen Crane

1871 · 1900

Stephen Crane has been called "the Chatterton of American literature —a comparison which implies that, like the young English poet, he was (in Wordsworth's phrase) a "marvelous boy" who "perished in his pride." Although Crane himself would not have liked such a romantic rag, it contains an element of truth, a writer of indisputable genius, Crane died prematurely, leaving a body of work which, while excellent in itself, gave promise of still better work to come.

Crane was born in Newark, New Jersey, the son of a Methodist preacher He spent one year at Lafayette College, where he shocked his English professor by declaring that Tennyson's poetry was 'swill', and another year at Syracuse University, where he planed shortstop on the varsity nine Believing earnestly that he must devote his life to "the business of writing," he began with journalism His brief career as a newspaper writer gave him rich and varied opportunities for observation in the New York Bowery, in Texas and Mexico, and—under war conditions—in Greece and in Cuba After his marriage in 1896 he lived in England, one of his close friends there was Joseph Conrad Crane died in the Black Forest, in Germany, where he had gone with the hope of improving his health

His fame rests upon a few poems, several short stories, and two short novels-Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (1893) and The Red Badge of Courage (1895) As a poet, Crane is an interesting link between Emily Dickinson and the Imagists of the 1910's As a writer of fiction, he is important both as an early naturalist and as an expert craftsman Maggie has been called the first naturalistic American novel An honest picture of the brutal and sordid life of the New York slums, the book was such a novelty in 1893 that the author had to publish it at his own expense The Red Badge is remarkable in both substance and technique. It is nominally the story of a battle in the Civil War, but any war and any battle would have served, because there is no attempt at localization At the time of writing, Crane knew nothing of war at first hand After his experiences in Greece and Cuba, he could say to a friend, "The Red Badge is all right!" Later experience had confirmed the truth first apprehended chiefly by the imagination. Henry Fleming, the soldier, ran panic-stricken when the enemy charged, but with experience, he gained courage. Before the end of the story, "he had been to touch the great death, and found that, after all, it was but the great death." The $Red\ Badge$ is an acute psychological study of the raw recruit in action Technically, the book is comparable with James' mature work in that the story, though written in the third person, is managed consistently from the point of view of the distraught soldier

Crane was above all else (and in a sense applicable to comparatively few American writers) the disinterested artist. He aimed at complete honesty of treatment He wrote with economy, restraint, and a respect for point of view. He chose words precisely and created images (in prose as well as in verse) which are colorful and impressionistic. He was a master of irony, he saw ironical implications everywhere. It was ironical that a nice girl like Maggie should have "blossomed in a mud puddle." It was ironical that the soldier, Henry Fleming, should have gained courage through an accidental knock on the head. Man's self-importance, to Crane, and his self-ipity were ironical in a universe indifferent to man

The Open Boat

A Tale intended to be after the Fact.

Being the Experience of Four Men from the Sunk Steamer 'Commodore'

In December 1896, the steamer Commodore, carrying ammunition and a party of Cuban insurrectionists, sailed from Jacksonville, Florida, for Cuba, where a revolution was in progress Crane was on board as war correspondent for a newspaper syndicate. The ship went down off the Florida coast, and Crane got into the last of the boats to leave the sinking vessel, the other men in the open boat were the ship's cook, the oiler, and the injured captain. Crane's story is based upon his actual experiences, it is indeed "after the fact."

The story is told from the point of view of the men in the boat, more especially from the point of view of the correspondent, who was Crane himself. If there are a few violations of this rule (as when the author intrudes to say that "there was not a life-saving station within twenty miles") the violations are designed to heighten the de sired effect (in the instance cited, the effect of irony). "The Open Boat" is Crane at his best. Sustained point of view, restraint, ironical wit, poetic images and cadences, and Poe's virtue of totality—these are some of the characteristic qualities of Crane which make "The Open Boat one of the short masterpieces of modern American prose

None of them knew the colour of the sky Their eyes glanced level, and were fastened upon the waves that swept toward them These waves were of the hue of slate, save for the tops, which were of foaming white and all of the men knew the colours of the sea. The horizon narrowed and widened, and dipped and rose, and at all times its edge was jagged with waves that seemed thrust up in points like rocks.

Many a man ought to have a bath-tub larger than the boat which here rode upon the sea. These waves were most wrongfully and barbarously abrupt and tall, and each froth-top was a problem in small boat navigation.

The cook squatted in the bottom and looked with both eves at the six inches of gunwale which separated him from the ocean. His sleeves were rolled over his fat torearms, and the two flaps of his unbuttoned vest dangled as he bent to bail out the boat. Often he said Gawd! That was a narrow clip' As he remarked it he invariably gazed eastward over the broken sea.

The oiler, steering with one of the two oars in the boat, sometimes raised himself suddenly to keep clear of water that swirled in over the stern. It was a thin little oar and it seemed often ready to snap.

The correspondent, pulling at the other oar, watched the waves and wondered why he was there.

The injured captain, lying in the bow, was at this time buried in that profound dejection and indifference which comes, temporarily at least, to even the bravest and most enduring when, willy nilly, the firm fails, the army loses, the ship goes down. The mind of the master of a vessel is rooted deep in the timbers of her, though he command for a day or a decade, and this captain had on him the stern impression of a scene in the greys of dawn of a seven turned faces, and later a stump of a top-mast with a white ball on it that slashed to and fro at the waves, went low and lower, and down Thereafter there was something strange in his voice Although steady, it was deep with mourning, and of a quality beyond oration or tears

'Keep 'er a little more south, Billie,' said he.

'A little more south, sir,' said the oiler in the stern

A seat in this boat was not unlike a seat upon a bucking broncho, and, by the same roken, a broncho is not much smaller. The craft pranced and reared, and plunged like an animal. As each wave came, and she rose for it, she seemed like a horse making at a fence outrageously high. The manner of her scramble over these walls of water is a mystic thing, and, moreover, at the top of them were ordinarily these problems in white water, the foam racing down from the summit of each wave, requiring a new leap, and a leap from the air. Then, after scornfully bumping a crest, she would slide, and race, and splash down a long incline, and arrive bobbing and nodding in front of the next menace.

A singular disadvantage of the sea lies in the fact that after successfully surmounting one wave you discover that there is another behind it just as important and just as nervously anxious to do something effective in the way of swamping boats. In a ten-foot dingey one can get an idea of the resources of the sea in the line of waves that is not probable to the average experience which is never at sea in a dingey. As each slaty wall of water approached, it shut all else from the view of the men in the boat, and it was not difficult to imagine that this particular wave was the final outburst of the ocean, the last effort of the grim water. There was a terrible grace in the move of the waves, and they came in silence, save for the snarling of the crests.

In the wan light, the faces of the men must have been grey. Their eyes must have glinted in strange ways as they gazed steadily astern. Viewed from a balcony, the whole thing would doubtless have been weirdly picturesque. But the men in the boat had no time to see it, and if they had had leisure there were other things to 20 occupy their minds. The sun swung steadily up the sky, and they knew it was broad day because the colour of the sea changed from slate to emerald-green, streaked with amber lights, and the foam was like tumbling snow. The process of the breaking day was unknown to them. They were aware only of this effect upon the colour of the waves that rolled toward them.

In disjointed sentences the cook and the correspondent argued as to the difference between a life-saving station and a house of refuge. The cook had said. "There's a 80 house of refuge just north of the Mosquito Inlet Light, and as soon as they see us, they'll come off in their boat and pick us up."

'As soon as who see us?' said the correspondent.

'The crew,' said the cook

'Houses of refuge don't have crews,' said the correspondent 'As I understand them, they are only places where clothes and grub are stored for the bencht of shipwrecked people. They don't carry crews'

'Oh, yes, they do,' said the cook

the second second second second second

'No, they don't,' said the correspondent

Well, we're not there yet, anyhow,' said the oiler, in the stern.

'Well,' said the cook, 'perhaps it's not a house of refuge that I'm thinking of as being near Mosquito Inlet Light. Perhaps it's a life-saving station.'

'We're not there yet,' said the oiler, in the stern.

As the boat bounced from the top of each wave, the wind tore through the hair of the hatless men, and as the craft plopped her stern down again the spray slashed past them. The crest of each of these waves was a hill, from the top of which the men surveyed, for a moment, a broad tumultuous expanse, shining and wind-riven. It was probably splendid. It was probably glorious, this play of the free sea, wild with lights of emerald and white and amber.

Bully good thing it's an on-shore wind,' said the cook. If not, where would we be? Wouldn't have a show.'

'That's right,' said the correspondent.

The busy oiler nodded his assent

Then the captain, in the bow, chuckled in a way that expressed humour, contempt, tragedy, all in one 'Do you think we've got much of a show now, boys' said he.

Whereupon the three were silent, save for a trifle of hemming and hawing. To express any particular optimism at this time they felt to be childish and stupid, but they all doubtless possessed this sense of the situation in their mind. A young man thinks doggedly at such times. On the other hand, the ethics of their condition was decidedly against any open suggestion of so hopelessness. So they were silent.

'Oh, well,' said the captain, soothing his children, 'we'll get ashore all right'

But there was that in his tone which made them think, so the oiler quoth 'Yes! If this wind holds!'

The cook was bailing 'Yes! If we don't catch hell in the surf'

Canton flannel gulls flew near and far Sometimes they sat down on the sea, near patches of brown seaweed that rolled over the waves with a movement like carpets on a 40 line in a gale. The birds sat comfortably in groups, and they were envied by some in the dingey, for the wrath of the sea was no more to them than it was to a covey of prairie chickens a thousand miles inland. Often they came very close and stared at the men with black bead-like eves At these times they were uncanny and sinister in their unblinking scrutiny, and the men hooted angrily at them, telling them to be gone. One came, and evidently decided to alight on the top of the captain's head The bird flew parallel to the boat and did not circle, but made short sidelong jumps in the air in chicken-fashion Eis black eyes were wistfully fixed upon the captain's head 'Ugly brute,' said the oiler to the bird 'You look as if you were made with a jack-knife. The cook and the correspondent swore darkly at the creature The captain naturally wished to knock it away with the end of the heavy painter, but he did not dare do it, because anything resembling an emphatic gesture would have capsized this freighted boat, and so with his open hand, the caproin gently and carefully waved the gull away. After it had been discouraged from the pursuit the captain breathed. easier on account of his hair, and others breathed easier because the bird struck their minds at this time as being somehow gruesome and ominous

In the meantime the oiler and the correspondent rowed. And also they rowed

They sat together in the same seat, and each rowed an oar Then the oiler took both oars, then the correspondent took both oars, then the oiler, then the correspondent They rowed and they rowed The very ticklish part of the business was when the time come for the reclining one in the stern to take his turn at the oars. By the very last star of truth, it is easier to steal eggs from under a hen than it was to change seats in the dingey. First the man in the stein slid his hand along the thwart and moved with care, as if he were of Sèvres. Then the man in the rowing seat slid his hand along the other thwart. It was all done with the most extraordinary care. As the two sidled past each other, the whole party kept watchful eyes on the coming wave, and the captain cried. 'Look out now' Steady there!'

The brown mats of seaweed that appeared from time to time were like islands, bits of earth. They were travelling, apparently, neither one way nor the other. They were, to all intents, stationary. They informed the men in the boat that it was making progress slowly toward the land.

The captain, rearing cautiously in the bow, after the

dingey soared on a great swell, said that he had seen the lighthouse at Mosquito Inlet. Presently the cook remarked that he had seen it. The correspondent was at the oars then, and for some reason he too wished to look at the lighthouse, but his back was toward the far shore and the waves were important, and for some time he could not seize an opportunity to turn his head. But at lost there came a wave more gentle than the others, and when at the crest of it he swiftly scoured the western horizon.

See it?' said the captain

'No,' said the correspondent slowly, 'I didn't see anything'

Look again,' said the captain. He pointed 'It's exactly in that direction'

At the top of another wave, the correspondent did as he was bid, and this time his eyes chanced on a small still thing on the edge of the swaying horizon. It was precisely like the point of a pin. It took an anxious eye to find a lighthouse so tiny.

'Think we'll make it, captain?'

'If this wind holds and the boat don't swamp, we can't do much else,' said the captain

The little boat, lifted by each towering sea, and splashed viciously by the crests, made progress that in the absence of seaweed was not apparent to those in her she seemed just a wee thing wallowing, miraculously top up at the mercy of five oceans. Occasionally, a great spread of water, like white flames, swarmed into her.

Bail her, cook' said the captain serenely 'Ali right, captain,' said the cheerful cook

It would be difficult to describe the subtle brotherhood of men that was here established on the scas. No one said that it was so. No one mentioned it. But it dwelt in the boat, and each man felt it warm him. They were a coptain, an oiler, a cook, and a correspondent, and they were friends, friends in a more curiously iron-bound degree than may be common. The hurt captain, lying against the water-jar in the bow, spoke always in a low voice and calmly, but he could never command a more ready and swiftly obedient crew than the motley three of the dingey. It was more than a mere recognition of what was best for the common safety. There was surely in it a quality that was personal and heartfelt. And after this devotion to the commander of the boat there was this comradeship that the correspondent, for instance, who had been taught to be cynical of men, knew even at the time was the best experience of his life. But no one said that it was so. No one mentioned it

I wish we had a sail, remarked the captain. 'We might so try my overcoat on the end of an oar and give you two boys a chance to rest.' So the cook and the correspondent held the mast and spread wide the overcoat. The oiler steered, and the little boat made good way with her new rig. Sometimes the oiler had to scull sharply to keep a sea from breaking into the boat, but otherwise sailing was a success.

Meanwhile the lighthouse had been growing slowly larger. It had now almost assumed colour, and appeared like a little grey shadow on the sky. The man 60 at the oars could not be prevented from turning his head rather often to try for a glimpse of this little grey shadow.

At last, from the top of each wave the men in the tossing boat could see land. Even as the lighthouse was an upright shadow on the sky, this land seemed but a long black shadow on the sea. It certainly was thinner than paper. "We must be about opposite New Smyrna,' said the cook, who had coasted this shore often in schooners. 'Captain, by the way, I believe they abandoned that life-saving station there about a year ago.'

'Did they?' said the captain

The wind slowly died away. The cook and the correspondent were not now obliged to slave in order to hold high the oar. But the waves continued their old impetuous swooping at the dingcy, and the little craft, no longer under way, struggled woundily over them. The oiler or the correspondent took the oars again.

Shipwrecks are apropos of nothing. If men could only train for them and have them occur when the men had reached pink condition, there would be less drowning at 80 sea. Of the four in the dingey none had slept any time worth mentioning for two days and two nights previous to embarking in the dingey, and in the excitement of clambering about the deck of a foundering ship they had also forgotten to cat heartily.

For these reasons, and for others, net her the oiler nor the correspondent was fond of rowing at this time. The correspondent wondered ingenuously how in the name of all that was sane could there be people who thought 70

it amusing to row a boat. It was not an amusement, it was a diabolical punishment, and even a genius of mental aberrations could never conclude that it was anything but a horror to the muscles and a crime against the back. He mentioned to the boat in general how the amusement of rowing struck him, and the weary-faced oiler smiled in full sympathy. Previously to the foundering, by the way, the oiler had worked double-watch in the engine-room of the ship.

Take her easy, now, boys, said the captain 'Don't spend yourselves. If we have to run a surf you'll need all your strength, because we'll sure have to swim for it Take your time'

Slowly the land arose from the sea. From a black line it became a line of black and a line of white, trees and sand. Finally, the captain said that he could make out a house on the shore. "That's the house of refuge, sure,' said the cook. "They'll see us before long, and come out after us."

The distant-lighthouse reared high. The keeper ought to be able to make us out now, if he's looking through a glass, said the captain. He'll notify the life-saving people.

'None of those other boats could have got ashore to give word of the wreck,' said the oiler, in a low voice 'Else the lifeboat would be out hunting us'

Slowly and beautifully the land loomed out of the sea. The wind came again. It had veered from the north-east to the south-east. Finally, a new sound struck so the cars of the men in the boat. It was the low thunder of the surf on the shore. 'We'll never be able to make the lighthouse now,' said the captain. 'Swing her head a little more north, Billie'.

'A little more north, sir,' said the oiler

Whereupon the little boat turned her nose once more down the wind, and all but the oarsmen watched the shore grow. Under the influence of this expansion doubt and direful apprehension was leaving the minds of the men. The management of the boat was still most absorbing, but it could not prevent a quiet cheerfulness. In an hour, perhaps, they would be ashore.

Their backbones had become thoroughly used to balancing in the boat, and they now rode this wild colt of a dingey like circus men. The correspondent thought that he had been dienched to the skin, but happening to feel in the top pocket of his coat, he found therein eight cigars. Four of them were soaked with sea-water; four were perfectly scatheless. After a search, somebody produced three dry matches, and thereupon the four waifs rode impudently in their little boat, and with an sassurance of an impending rescue shining in their eyes, puffed at the big cigars and judged well and ill of all men. Everybody took a drink of water.

IV

'Cook,' remarked the captain, 'there don't seem to be any signs of life about your house of refuge'

'No,' replied the cook 'Funny they don't see us'

A broad stretch of lowly coast lay before the eyes of the men. It was of low dunes topped with dark vege tation. The roar of the surf was plain, and sometimes they could see the white lip of a wave as it spun up the beach. A tiny house was blocked out black upon the sky. Southward, the slim lighthouse lifted its little grey length.

Tide, wind, and waves were swinging the dingey northward. 'Funny they don't see us,' said the men

The surf's roar was here dulled, but its tone was, nevertheless, thunderous and mighty. As the boat swam over the great rollers, the men sat listening to this roar 'We'll swamp sure,' said everybody

It is fair to say here that there was not a life-saving station within twenty miles in either direction, but the men it did not know this fact, and in consequence they made dark and opprobrious remarks concerning the eyesight of the nation's life-savers. Four scowling men sat in the dingey and surpassed records in the invention of epithets. 'Funny they don't see us.'

The light-heartedness of a former time had completely faded. To their sharpened minds it was easy to conjuic pictures of all kinds of incompetency and blindness and indeed, cowardice. There was the shore of the populous land, and it was bitter and bitter to them that from it is came no sign.

'Well,' said the captain, ultimately, 'I suppose we'll have to make a try for ourselves. If we stay out here too long, we'll none of us have strength left to swim after the boat swamps'

And so the oiler, who was at the oars, turned the boat straight for the shore. There was a sudden tightening of muscles. There was some thinking

'If we don't all get ashore—' said the captain. 'If we don't all get ashore, I suppose you fellows know where to send news of my finish?'

They then briefly exchanged some addresses and admonitions. As for the reflections of the men, there was a great deal of rage in them. Perchance they might be formulated thus. If I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, which in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees? Was I brought here merely to have my nose dragged away as I was about to nibble the sacred cheese of lite? It is preposterous. If this old ninny-woman, Fite, cannot do better than this, she should be deprived of the management of men's fortunes. She is an old hen who knows not her intention. If she has decided to drown me, why did she not do it in the beginning and save me all this trouble? The whole affair is absurd

But no, she cannot mean to drown me She dare not drown me. She cannot drown me Not after all this work. Afterward the man might have had an impulse to shake his fist at the clouds. Just you drown me, now, and then hear what I call you!

The billows that came at this time were more formidable. They seemed always just about to break and roll over the little boat in a turmoil of foam. There was a preparatory and long growl in the speech of them. No mind unused to the sea would have concluded that the dingey could ascend these sheer heights in time. The shore was still afar. The oiler was a wily surfman Boys,' he said swiftly, 'she won't live three minutes more, and we're too far out to swim. Shall I take her to sea again, captain?'

'Yes! Go ahead!' said the captain

This oiler, by a series of quick miracles, and fast and steady oarsmanship, turned the boat in the middle of the surf and took her safely to sea again

There was a considerable silence as the boat bumped over the furrowed sea to deeper water. Then somebody in gloom spoke Well, anyhow, they must have seen us from the shore by now.'

The gulls went in slanting flight up the wind toward the grey desolate east A squall, marked by dingy clouds, and clouds brick-red, like smoke from a burning building, appeared from the south-east.

'What do you think of those life-saving people? Ain't they peaches?'

Funny they haven't seen us.'

Maybe they think we're out here for sport! Maybe they think we're fishin'. Maybe they think we're damned fools.'

It was a long afternoon. A changed tide tried to force them southward, but wind and wave said northward. Far ahead, where coastline, sea, and sky formed their so mighty angle, there were little dots which seemed to indicate a city on the shore

'St Augustine?'

The captain shook his head 'Too near Mosquito Inlet.'
And the oiler rowed, and then the correspondent rowed. Then the oiler rowed. It was a weary business. The human back can become the seat of more aches and pains than are registered in books for the composite anatomy of a regiment. It is a limited area, but it can become the theatre of innumerable muscular conflicts, so tangles wrenches, knots, and other comforts.

'Did you ever like to row, Billie?' asked the correspondent

'No,' said the oiler 'Hang it'

When one exchanged the rowing-seat for a place in the bottom of the boat, he suffered a bodily depression that caused him to be careless of everything save an obligation to wiggle one finger. There was cold sea-water swashing to and fro in the boat, and he lay in it. His head, pillowed on a thwart, was within an inch of the 70 swirl of a wave crest, and sometimes a particularly obstreperous sea came in-board and drenched him once more. But these matters did not annoy him. It is almost certain that if the boat had capsized he would have tumbled comfortably out upon the ocean as if he felt sure that it was a great soft mattress.

'Look! There's a man on the shore!'

'Where'

'There' See 'im' See 'im'

'Yes, sure' He's walking along'

'Now he's stopped Look! He's facing us!'

'He's waving at us!'

'So he is! By thunder!'

'Ah, now we're all right! Now we're all right! There'll be a boat out here for us in half an hour'

'He's going on. He's running He's going up to that house there'

The remote beach seemed lower th. 1 the sea, and it required a searching glance to discern the little black figure. The captain saw a floating stick and they rowed to it. A bath-towel was by some weird chance in the boat, and, tying this on the stick, the captain waved it. The oarsman did not dare turn his head, so he was obliged to ask questions.

'What's he doing now?'

'He's standing still again He's looking, I think....
There he goes again Toward the house.... Now he stopped again'

'Is he waving at us?'

'No, not now! he was, though."

'Look! There comes another man!'

'He's running'

'Look at him go, would you'

10 Why, he's on a bicycle Now he's met the other man.

They're both waving at us Look!

There comes something up the beach.'

'What the devil is that thing?'

'Why, it looks like a boat'

'Why, certainly it's a boat.'

'No, it's on wheels'

'Yes, so it is W'cll, that must be the life-boat. They drag them along shore on a wagon.'

'That's the life-boat, sure'

20 'No, by—, it's—it's an omnibus.'

I tell you it's a life-bout

'It is not! It's an omnibus I can see it plain See? One of these big hotel omnibuses

'By thunder, you re right—It's an omnibus, sure as fare What do you suppose they are doing with an omnibus? Maybe they are going around collecting the life-crew, her?'

That's it, likely Took! There's a fellow waving a little black flag. He's standing on the steps of the omni-30 bus. There come those other two fellows. Now they re all talking together. Took at the fellow with the flag. Maybe he ain't waving it.

That ain't a flag, is it? That's his coat. Why certainly, that's his coat.

'So it is It's his coat. He's taken it off and is waving it around his head. But would you look at him swing it.'

Oh, say, there isn't any life-saying station there. That's just a winter resort hotel omnibus that has brought over some of the boarders to see us drown.

What's that idiot with the coat mean? What's he signaling, anyhow?

It looks as if he were trying to tell us to go north. There must be a life-saving station up there

'No! He thinks we're fishing. Just giving us a merry hand. See? Ah, there, Willie'

'Well, I wish I could make something out of those signals. What do you suppose he means?'

'He don't mean anything He's just playing.'

"Well, if he'd just signal us to try the surf again, or to go to sea and wait, or go north, or go south, or go to hell—there would be some reason in it. But look at him He just stands there and keeps his coat revolving like a wheel The ass!"

'There come more people'

'Now there's quite a mob Look! Isn't that a boat?' Where? Oh, I see where you mean No, that's no boat

'That fellow is still waving his coat'

'He must think we like to see him do that. Why don't he quit it? It don't mean anything'

I don't know I think he is trying to make us go north. It must be that there's a life-saving station there somewhere

'Say, he ain't tired yet. Look at 'im wave.'

'Wonder how long he can keep that up He's been revolving his coat ever since he caught sight of us He's an idiot. Why aren't they getting men to bring a boat out? A fishing boat—one of those big yawls—could come out here all right. Why don't he do something?

Oh, it's all right, now'

They'll have a boat out here for us in less than no time, now that they we seen us

A faint yellow tone came into the sky over the low land. The shadows on the sea slowly deepened. The wind bore coldness with it, and the men began to shiver

Holy smoke!' said one, allowing his voice to express his impious mood, 'if we keep on monkeying out here! If we've got to flounder out here all night!'

Oh, we'll never have to stay here all night! Don't you worry. They we seen us now, and it won't be long before they ll come chasing out after us."

The shore grew dusky The man waving a coat blended gradually into this gloom, and it swallowed in the same manner the omnibus and the group of people. The sprawhen it dashed uproariously over the side, made the vovagers shrink and swear like men who were being branded

'I'd like to catch the chump who waved that coat. I feel like soaking him one, just for luck'

'Why' What did he do'.

Oh, nothing, but then he seemed so damned cheerful In the meantime the oiler rowed, and then the correspondent rowed, and then the oiler rowed Grey-faced and bowed forward, they mechanically, turn by turn, plied the leaden oars. The form of the lighthouse had vanished from the southern horizon, but finally a pale star appeared, just lifting from the sea. The streaked saftron in the west passed before the all-merging darkness, and the sea to the east was black. The land had vanished, and was expressed only by the low and drear thunder of the surf.

It I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I altowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees? Was I brought here merely to have my nose dragged away as I was about to nibble the sacred cheese of life?

The patient captain, drooped over the water-jar, was sometimes obliged to speak to the oarsman

Keep her head up! Keep her head up!

Keep her head up," sir' The voices were weary and low

This was surely a quiet evening. All save the oarsman lay heavily and listlessly in the boat's bottom. As for him his eyes were just capable of noting the tall black waves that swept forward in a most sinister silence, save for an occasional subdued growl of a crest

The cook's head was on a thwart, and he looked without interest at the water under his nose. He was deep in other scenes. Finally he spoke 'Billie,' he murmured, dreamfully, 'what kind of pie do you like best?'

Pie,' said the oiler and the correspondent, agitatedly Don't talk about those things, blast you!'

Well, said the cook, 'I was just thinking about ham saidwiches, and—'

A night on the sea in an open boat is a long night As darkness settled finally, the shine of the light, lifting from the sea in the south, changed to full gold. On the northern horizon a new light appeared, a small bluish gleam on the edge of the waters. These two lights were the furniture of the world. Otherwise there was nothing but waves.

Two men huddled in the stern, and distances were so magnificent in the dingey that the rower was enabled to keep his feet partly warmed by thrusting them under his companions. Their legs indeed extended far under the rowing-seat until they touched the feet of the captain forward. Sometimes, despite the efforts of the tired oursman, a wave came piling into the boat, an icy wave of the night, and the chilling water soaked them anew. They would twist their bodies for a moment and groan, and sleep the dead sleep once more, while the water in the boat gurgled about them as the craft rocked.

The plan of the oiler and the correspondent was for one to row until he lost the ability, and then arouse the other from his sea-water couch in the bottom of the boat 50

The oiler plied the oars until his head drooped forward, and the overpowering sleep blinded him. And he rowed yet afterward. Then he touched a man in the bottom of the boat, and called his name. 'Will you spell me for a little while?' he said, meekly

'Sure, Billic,' said the correspondent, awakening and dragging himself to a sitting position. They exchanged places carefully, and the oiler, cuddling down in the seawater at the cook's side, seemed to go to sleep instantly.

The particular violence of the sea had ceased. The 60 waves came without snarling. The obligation of the man at the oars was to keep the boat headed so that the tilt of the rollers would not capsize her, and to preserve her from filling when the crests rushed past. The black waves were silent and hard to be seen in the darkness. Often one was almost upon the boat before the oarsman was aware.

In a low voice the correspondent addressed the captain. He was not sure that the captain was awake, although this iron man seemed to be always awake 70 'Captain, shall I keep her making for that light north, sir'

The same steady voice answered him 'Yes Keep it about two points off the port bow'

The cook had tied a life-belt around himself in order to get even the warmth which this clumsy cork contrivance could donate, and he seemed almost stove-like when a rower, whose teeth invariably chattered wildly as soon as he ceased his labour, dropped down to sleep

The correspondent, as he rowed, looked down at the 80 two men sleeping underfoot. The cook's arm was around the oiler's shoulders, and, with their fragmentary clothing and haggard faces, they were the babes of the sea, a grotesque rendering of the old babes in the wood.

Later he must have grown stupid at his work, for suddenly there was a growling of water and a crest came with a roar and a swash into the boat, and it was a wonder that it did not set the cook affoat in his lifebelt. The cook continued to sleep, but the oiler sat up, blinking his eyes and shaking with the new cold.

'Oh, I'm awful sorry, Billie,' said the correspondent, contritely

'That's all right, old boy,' said the oiler, and lay down again and was asleep.

Presently it seemed that even the captain dozed, and the correspondent thought that he was the one man afloat on all the oceans. The wind had a voice as it came over the waves, and it was sadder than the end

There was a long, loud swishing astern of the boat, and a gleaming trail of phosphorescence, like blue flame, was furrowed on the black waters. It might have been in made by a monstrous knife.

Then there came a stillness, while the correspondent breathed with the open mouth and looked at the sea

Suddenly there was another swish and another long flash of bluish light, and this time it was alongside the boat, and might almost have been reached with an oar. The correspondent saw an enormous fin speed like a shadow through the water, hurling the crystalline spray and leaving the long glowing trail

The correspondent looked over his shoulder at the captain. His face was hidden, and he seemed to be asleep. He looked at the babes of the sea. They certainly were asleep. So, being bereft of sympathy, he leaned a little way to one side and swore softly into the sea.

But the thing did not then leave the vicinity of the boat. Ahead or astern, on one side of the other, at intervals long or short, fled the long sparkling streak, and there was to be heard the whitoo of the dark fin. The speed and power of the thing was greatly to be admired It cut the water like a gigantic and keen projectile.

The presence of this biding thing did not affect the man with the same horior that it would if he had been a picnicker. He simply looked at the sea dully and swore in an undertone.

Nevertheless, it is true that he did not wish to be alone with the thing. He wished one of his companions to awaken by chance and keep him company with it. But the captain hung motionless over the water-jar, and the oiler and the cook in the bottom of the boat were plunged in slumber.

40 'If I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees?' During this dismal night, it may be remarked that a man would conclude that it was really the intention of the seven mad gods to drown him, despite the abominable injustice of it. For it was certainly an abominable injustice to drown a man who had worked so hard, so hard. The man felt it would be a crime most unnatural gother people had drowned at sea since galleys swarmed with painted sails but still—

When it occurs to a man that nature does not regard him as important, and that she feels she would not main the universe by disposing of him, he at first wishes to throw bricks at the temple, and he hates deeply the fact that there are no bricks and no temples. Any visible expression of nature would surely be pelleted with his jeers.

Then, if there be no tangible thing to hoot he feels a perhaps the desire to confront a personification and in dulge in pleas, bowed to one knee, and with hands supplicant saying 'Yes, but I love myself'

A high cold star on a winter's night is the word he feels that she says to him. Thereafter he knows the pathos of his situation

The men in the dingey had not discussed these matters but each had no doubt, reflected upon them in silence and according to his mind. There was seldom any expression upon their faces save the general one of complete weariness. Speech was devoted to the business of the boat.

To chime the notes of his emotion, a verse mysterious ly entered the correspondent's head. He had even forgotten that he had forgotten this verse, but it suddenly was in his mind.

'A soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers. There was lack of woman's nursing there was dearth of woman's tears.

But a comrade stood beside him and he took that comrade's hand,

And he said 'I shall never see my own, my native land'''

ď,

In his childhood, the correspondent had been made acquainted with the fact that a soldier of the Legion In dying in Algiers, but he had never regarded the fact 48

⁷⁷ A soldier land, from "Bingen on the Rhine," by Caroline E S Norton (1808-1877)

important Myriads of his school-fellows had informed him of the soldier's plight, but the dinning had naturally ended by making him perfectly indifferent. He had never considered it his affair that a soldier of the Legion law dying in Algiers, nor had it appeared to him as a matter for sorrow. It was less to him than the breaking of a pencil's point

Now, however, it quaintly came to him as a human, irong thing. It was no longer merely a picture of a few thices in the breast of a poet, meanwhile drinking tea and warming his feet at the grate, it was an actuality—stern, mournful, and fine

The correspondent plainly saw the soldier He lay on the sand with his feet out straight and still. While his pale left hand was upon his chest in an attempt to thwart the going of his life, the blood came between his fingers. In the far Algerian distance, a city of low square forms was set against a sky that was faint with the last sunset hues. The correspondent, plying the oars and dreaming of the slow and slower movements of the lips of the soldier, was moved by a protound and perfectly impersonal comprehension. He was sorry for the soldier of the Legion who lay dying in Algiers.

The thing which had followed the boat and waited had evidently grown bored at the delay. There was no longer to be heard the slash of the cut-water, and there was no longer the flame of the long trail. The light in the north still glimmered, but it was apparently no acarer to the boat. Sometimes the boom of the surfrang in the correspondent's ears, and he turned the craft seaward then and rowed harder. Southward, someone had evidently built a watch-fire on the beach. It was too low and too far to be seen, but it made a shimmering, toseate reflection upon the bluff back of it, and this could be discerned from the boat. The wind came stronger, and sometimes a wave suddenly raged out like a mountain-cat, and there was to be seen the sheen and spatkle of a broken crest.

The captain, in the bow, moved on his water-jar and sat erect 'Pretty long night,' he observed to the correspondent. He looked at the shore 'Those life-saving people take their time'

Did you see that shark playing around?'
'Yes, I saw him He was a big tellow, all right
Wish I had known you were awake'

Later the correspondent spoke into the bottom of the boat,

'Billie!' There was a slow and gradual disentanglement 'Billie, will you spell me?'

'Sure,' said the oiler

As soon as the correspondent rouched the cold comfortable sea-water in the bottom of the boat, and had huddled close to the cook's life-belt he was deep in sleep, despite the fact that his teeth played all the popular airs. This sleep was so good to him that it was but a moment before he heard a voice call his name in a tone that demonstrated the last stages of exhaustion 'Will you spell me'.'

Sure, Billie

The light in the north had mysteriously vanished, but 60 the correspondent took his course from the wide-awake captain

Later in the night they took the boat farther out to sea, and the captain directed the cook to take one oar at the stern and keep the boat facing the seas. He was to call out if he should hear the thunder of the surf. This plan enabled the oiler and the correspondent to get respite together. We'll give those boys a chance to get into shape again, said the captain. They curled down and, after a few preliminary chatterings and trembles, 70 slept once more the dead sleep. Neither knew they had bequeathed to the cook the company of another shark, or perhaps the same shark.

As the boat caroused on the waves, spray occasionally bumped over the side and gave them a fresh soaking, but this had no power to break their repose. The ominous slash of the wind and the water affected them as it would have affected mummies Boys, said the cook, with the notes of every reluctance in his voice, she's drifted in pretty close. I guess one of 80 you had better take her to sea again. The correspondent, aroused, heard the crash of the toppled crests.

As he was rowing, the captain gave him some whiskyand-water, and this steadied the chills out of him 'If I ever get ashore and anybody shows me even a photograph of an oar—'

At last there was a short conversation 'Billie Billie, will you spell me'.'

'Sure,' said the oiler.

When the correspondent again opened his eyes, the 90 sea and the sky were each of the grey hue of the dawning Later, carmine and gold was painted upon the waters. The morning appeared finally, in its splendour, with a sky of pure blue, and the sunlight flamed on the tips of the waves.

On the distant dunes were set many little black cottages, and a tall white windmill reared above them No man, nor dog, nor bicycle appeared on the beach. The cottages might have formed a deserted village

The voyagers scanned the shore A conference was 10 held in the boat 'Well,' said the captain, 'if no help is coming, we might better try a run through the surf right away. If we stay out here much longer we will be too weak to do anything for ourselves at all.' The others silently acquiesced in this reasoning. The boat was headed for the beach. The correspondent wondered if none ever ascended the tall wind-tower, and if then they never looked seaward. This tower was a giant, standing with its back to the plight of the ants. It represented in a degree, to the correspondent, the serenity of 20 nature amid the struggles of the individual-nature in the wind, and nature in the vision of men. She did not seem crucl to him then, nor beneficent, nor treacherous, nor wise. But she was indifferent, flatly indifferent It is, perhaps, plausible that a man in this situation, impressed with the unconcern of the universe, should see the innumerable flaws of his life, and have them taste wickedly in his mind and wish for another chance. A distinction between right and wrong seems absurdly clear to him, then, in this new ignorance of the grave-30 edge, and he understands that if he were given another opportunity he would mend his conduct and his words, and be better and brig'tter during an introduction or

'Now, boys,' said the captain, 'she is going to swamp sure. All we can do is to work her in as far as possible, and then when she swamps, pile out and scramble for the beach. Keep cool now, and don't jump until she swamps sure.'

The other took the oars. Over his shoulders he scanned the surf 'Captain, he said, 'I think I'd better bring her about, and keep her head-on to the seas and back her in'

'All right, Billie,' said the captain 'Back her in' The oiler swing the boat then and, scated in the stern the cook and the correspondent were obliged to look over their shoulders to contemplate the lonely and indifferent shore

The monstrous m-shore rollers heaved the boat high until the men were again enabled to see the white sheets of water scudding up the slanted beach. 'We won't get in very close,' said the captain Each time a man could wrest his attention from the rollers, he turned his glance toward the shore, and in the expression of the eyes during this contemplation there was a singular quality. The correspondent, observing the others, knew that they were not afraid, but the full meaning of their glances was shrouded.

As for himself, he was too tired to grapple fundamentally with the fact. He tried to coerce his mind into thinking of it, but the mind was dominated at this time by the muscles, and the muscles said they did not care. It merely occurred to him that if he should drown it would be a shame

There were no hurried words, no pallor, no plain agitation. The men simply looked at the shore. Now remember to get well clear of the boat when you jump said the captain.

Seaward the crest of a roller suddenly fell with a thunderous crash, and the long white comber came roaring down upon the boat

'Steady now,' said the captain. The men were silent They turned their eyes from the shore to the combinand waited. The boat slid up the incline, leaped at the furious top, bounced over it, and swung down the long back of the waves. Some water had been shipped and the cook bailed it out.

But the next crest crashed also. The tumbling boiling flood of white water caught the boat and whirled it almost perpendicular. Water swarmed in from all sides. The correspondent had his hands on the gunwale at this time, and when the water entered at that place he swiftly withdrew his fingers, as if he objected to wetting them

The little boat, drunken with this weight of water, reeled and snuggled deeper into the sea

'Bail her out, cook' Bail her out,' said the captain.
'All right, captain,' said the cook

'Now, boys, the next one will do for us, sure,' said the oiler 'Mind to jump clear of the boat'

The third wave moved forward, huge, furious, implacable. It fairly swallowed the dingey, and almost simultaneously the men tumbled into the sea. A piece of life-belt had lain in the bottom of the boat, and as the correspondent went overboard he held this to his chest with his left hand.

The January water was icy, and he reflected immediately that it was colder than he had expected to find it off the coast of Florida. This appeared to his dazed mind as a fact important enough to be noted at the time. The coldness of the water was sad, it was tragic. This fact was somehow so mixed and confused with his opinion of his own situation that it seemed almost a proper reason for teats. The water was cold.

When he came to the surface he was conscious of little but the noisy water. Afterward he saw his companions in the sea. The oiler was ahead in the race. He was swimming strongly and rapidly. Off to the correspondent's left, the cook's great white and corked back balged out of the water, and in the rear the captain was host of with his one good hand to the keel of the overal med dinger.

There is a certain immovable quality to a shore, and the correspondent wondered at it amid the confusion of the sea

It seemed also very attractive, but the correspondent knew that it was a long journey, and he paddled leisurely. The piece of life-pieserver lay under him and sometimes he whirled down the incline of a wave as if he were on a hand-sled

But finally he arrived at a place in the sea where trivel was beset with difficulty. He did not pause swimming to inquire what manner of current had caught him, but there his progress ceased. The shore was set before him like a bit of scenery on a stage, and he looked at it and understood with his eyes each detail of it.

As the cook passed, much farther to the left, the coptain was calling to him, 'Turn over on your back, cook! Turn over on your back and use the oar.'

All right, sir' The cook turned on his back, and, Paddling with an oar, went ahead as if he were a canoe

Presently the boat also passed to the left of the correspondent with the captain clinging with one hand to the keel. He would have appeared like a man raising homself to look over a board fence, if it were not for the extraordinary gymnastics of the boat. The correspondent marvelled that the captain could still hold to it.

They passed on, nearer to shore—the oiler, the cook, '1. captain—and following them went the water-jar, bouncing gaily over the seas

The correspondent remained in the grip of this strange new enemy—a current. The shore, with its white slope of sand and its green bluff, topped with little silent cottages, was spread like a picture before him. It was very near to him then, but he was impressed as one who so in a gallery looks at a scene from Brittany or Algiers

He thought 'Lam going to drown' Can it be possible? Can it be possible? Can it be possible? Perhaps an individual must consider his own death to be the final phenomenon of nature

But later a wave perhaps whiled him out of this small deadly current, for he found suddenly that he could again make progress toward the shore. Later still, he was aware that the captain, clinging with one hand to the keel of the dingey, had his face turned away from 60 the shore and toward him, and was calling his name. 'Come to the boat'.

In his structile to reach the captain and the boat, he reflected that where one gets properly wearied, drowning muse really be a comfortable arrangement, a cessation of hostilities accompanied by a large degree of relief, and he was glad of it, for the main thing in his mind for some moments had been horror of the temporary agony. He did not wish to be huit.

Presently he saw a man running along the shore. He 70 was undressing with most remarkable speed. Coat, trousers, shirt, ever, thing flew magically off him.

'Come to the boat,' called the captain

All right, captum' As the correspondent paddled, he saw the captain let himself down to bottom and leave the boat. Then the correspondent performed his one little marvel of the voyage. A large wave caught him and fluing him with east and supreme speed completely over the Loat and fur beyond it. It struck him even then as an event in g mnastics, and a true miracle of the sea. An 80 overtuined boat in the surf is not a plaything to a swimming man.

The correspondent arrived in water that reached only to his waist but his condition did not enable him to stand for more than a moment. Each wave knocked him into a heap, and the under-tow pulled at him.

Then he saw the man who had been running and undressing, and undressing and running come bounding into the water. He dragged ashore the cook, and then waded toward the captain, but the captain waved him so away, and sent him to the correspondent. He was naked, naked as a tree in winter but a halo was about his head, and he shone like a saint. He gave a strong pull, and a long drag, and a bully heave at the correspondent's hand

The correspondent, schooled in the minor formulæ, said: 'Thanks, old man' But suddenly the man cried 'What's that?' He pointed a swift finger The correspondent said. 'Go.'

In the shallows, face downward, lay the oiler His forehead touched sand that was periodically, between each wave, clear of the sea

The correspondent did not know all that transpired afterward. When he achieved safe ground he fell, striking the sand with each particular part of his body. It was as if he had dropped from a roof, but the thud was grateful to him.

It seems that instantly the beach was populated with men with blankets, clothes, and flasks, and women with coffee-pots and all the remedies sacred to their minds. The welcome of the land to the men from the sea was warm and generous, but a still and dripping shape was carried slowly up the beach, and the land's welcome for it could only be the different and sinister hospitality of the grave

When it came night, the white waves paced to and fro in the moonlight, and the wind brought the sound of the great sea's voice to the men on shore, and they felt that they could then be interpreters

1870 · 1902

"Give us stories now," was Norris' plea, "give us men, strong, brutal men, with red-hot blood in 'em, blood and bones and viscera in 'em, and women, too, that move and have their being." As well as any utterance of Norris this entreaty shows his alliance not with reticent realism of the sort Howells wrote but with the naturalistic school which flourished in France in the later years of the nineteenth century.

Frank Norris adopted this creed after he had experimented with other methods of artistic expression. Born in Chicago to well-to-do parents in 1870, he moved with his family to San Francisco in 1884. Somehow, at the age of seventeen, he persuaded his family to allow him to study art in Paris. During his stay abroad, however, he changed his allegiance from the Atelier Julien to literature—literature, furthermore, of a romantic sort influenced by the French romantic writer

Froissart and the English romantic writer Stevenson Some of Norris' earlier writings were clearly of the cloak-and-dagger school

Back in California as a student at the University of California (1890-1894), he discovered the appeal of the French naturalistic school led by Zola, and of Rudvard Kipling. As a student at Harvard (1894-1895), he wrote two novels showing this newer influence. Vandot of unitable Brute, not published until 1914, and McTeage Coublished in 1899. Later, he wrote the two novels for which he is best remembered, The Octopus (1901) and The Put (1903).

In part, Norris' enthusiasm for "living" characters derived from his feeling that life was superior to art "Of all the difficult things," he said, "that enter into the learning of a difficult profession, the most difficult of all for the intended novelist . . . is that life is better thin literature. The amateur will say this with conviction, will preach it in public and practise the exact reverse in private. But it still remains true that all the temperament, all the sensitiveness to impressions, all the education in the world will not help one little, little bit in the writing of the novel if life itself, the crude, the vulgar, if you will, is not studied. An hour's experience is worth ten years of study."

Handsome, distinguished in appearance, gifted with a sense of fun, Norris had a talent for friendship. He took great delight in becoming one of the Bohemian group in Paris and equal delight in becoming a friend of athletes, men-about-the-campus, and scholars in his college fraternity. After college, a visit to the Big Dipper Mine in the Sierras or a trip to Tampa as a war correspondent was for him an adventure in new acquaintanceships.

Yet Norris was very much of a conscious artist, and his critical writings attest that he had thoroughly developed theories about technique. He had ideas about the handling of scene and plot, and he was a champion of naturalism. The sheer art of the storyteller attracted him. Each chapter of a novel, he felt, should be "distinct, separate, having a definite beginning, rise, height and end, the action continuous, containing no break in time, the locality unchanged throughout...."

Norris liked to think of himself as a naturalist, and $h\epsilon$ believed a naturalist to be an author who attended to elemental forces in such a way as to give his narratives the sweep of epics. In The Octopus Norris pictured a poet eager to do what he approved—to strive, as he put it, "for the diapason, the great song which should embrace in itself a whole epoch, a complete era, the voice of the entire people." The scientific doctrine of the survival of the fittest and the sociological doctrine of economic determinism, also championed by naturalists, found expression in his books. The Octopus and The Prt were parts of a projected trilogy which was to show in epic terms the importance of wheat to all men's lives.

The career which came to an untimely end when Norris died in 1902 had, indeed, been a promising one. Norris' novels, it is true, for all his concern with the art of storytelling, were rather chaotic, but it seems very likely that, in time, he might have learned more about giving them unity. He is to be credited with introducing naturalism and what it stood for to a country in which naturalism was to be increasingly important. He foreshadows some of the aspects of the writings of notable modern authors—the unflinching depiction of sordid detail of Faulkner, the brutality of Hemingway, the poetic fervor of Wolfe.

The Octopus

Norris was employed for several years by McClure's Magazine as a reader and author. The association was important, since he worked at an office with such socially conscious authors as Ray Stannard Baker, Ida Tarbell, and Lincoln Steffens. All these authors helped drive home a lesson that he felt he had learned from the great Zola—that the best novel was "the novel of purpose". He planned The Octopus as such a work

"I am leaving for California Monday next," wrote Norris to a friend, April 5, 1899, "to be gone, very likely, until is the result of a talk I had with the firm here fall It They believe with me that the big American novel is going to come out of the West-California . I've got an idea that is as big as all outdoors and McClure is going to back me up while I put it through It involves a very long, a very serious, and perhaps a very terrible novel It will be about the San Joaquin wheat raisers and the Southern Pacific, and I guess we'll call it The Octopus-There's the chance for the big, epic, dramatic thing in this, and I mean to do it thoroughly-get at it from every point of view, the social, agricultural, and political

Norris spent four months in California, collecting materials. Then he returned to New York and started work on the book. Says his biographer, Franklin Walker. "He wrote plot summaries, he wrote out an 'index sheet for each character, he tabulated and arranged his notes, he made a map of the country where his action was to take place." In a sense he considered himself a research worker, unfolding a more or less objective "case study" which would reveal sociological truths. Such a study, inevitably, in his opinion, would be admirable as art. The writing itself, after the preliminaries had been completed, took a full year, and the novel was published in the spring of 1901.

Norris announced that this work was the first of "A Trilogy of the Epic of the Wheat —three novels which were to tell, respectively, of "1) the production, 2) the distribution, 3) the consumption of American wheat." The first dealt, as he said, with "the war between the wheat grower and the Railroad Trust" Follower of Zola that he was, Norris naturally saw these two as particular symbols of more universal elements. For him, the wheat was a primitive force, nourished by the earth and a perenrial, irresistible nourisher of life. The Trust—the Octobus -was the artificial exploiter and enemy of this life force To develop his thesis, Norris told his story very largely as it was seen by Presley, a poet who had a great longing to write an epic of the West in stirring hexameters Presley was admirable for the author's purposes because of his ability to see with a poet's eye the life of south-central California and the symbolism of various events and happenings Portions of the novel tell of mystic and romantic adventures of the characters which are related poetically to the main theme. The excerpts presented hereafter, however, tell only of the central conflict—that between the ranchers and the Railroad

The time at the start is late September, with the harvest in the San Joaquin Valley just completed. Presley, who lives with the Derrick family at Los Muertos Rancho, pays a visit to some of the neighbors. Returning from a visit to Vanamee, a sheepherder and range rider, he is hortified by a scene which foreshadows the course of the narrative.

from Book I, Chapter I

THE SLAUGHTER OF THE SHEEP

Presley had climbed the fence at the limit of the Quien Sabe ranch. Beyond was Los Muertos, but between the two ran the railroad. He had only time to jump back upon the embankment when, with a quivering of the earth, a locomotive, single, unattached, shoot by him with a roar, filling the air with the reek of hot oil vomitting smoke and sparks, its enormous eye, cyclopean red throwing a glare far in advance, shooting by in a sudd-n crash of confused thunder, filling the night with the terrific clamor of its iron hoofs.

Abruptly Presley remembered This must be the crack passenger engine of which Dyke had told him the one delayed by the accident on the Bakersfield division and for whose passage the track had been opened all that way to Fresno.

Before Presley could recover the shock of the irruption, while the earth was still vibrating, the rails still humming, the engine was far away, flinging the echo of its frantic gallop over all the valley. For a brief instant it reared with a hollow diapason on the Long Trestle over Broderson Creek, then plunged into a cutting further on, the quivering glare of its fires losing itself in the night, its thunder abruptly diminishing to a subdued and distant humming. All at once this ceased the engine was gone

But the moment the noise of the engine lapsed, Presley - about to start forward again—was conscious of a confesion of lamentable sounds that rose into the night frem out the engine's wake Prolonged cries of agony, sobbing wails of infinite pain, heartrending, pitiful

The noises came from a little distance. He ran down the track, crossing the culvert, over the irrigating ditch, and at the head of the long reach of track—between the culveit and the Long Trestle—paused abruptly, held immovable at the sight of the ground and rails all about him.

In some way, the herd of sheep—Vanamee's herd—had found a breach in the wire fence by the right of way and had wandered out upon the tracks. A band had been crossing just at the moment of the engine's passage. The pathos of it was beyond expression. It was a shughter a massacre of innocents. The iron monster had charged fuil into the midst, merciless, inexorable. To the right and left, all the width of the right of way, the little bodies had been flung, backs were snapped against the fence posts, brains knocked out. Caught in the birbs of the wire, wedged in, the bodies hung suspended. Under foot it was terrible. The black blood, winking in the starlight, seeped down into the clinkers between the tres with a prolonged sucking murmur.

Presley turned away, horror-struck, sick at heart, overwhelmed with a quick burst of irresistible compassion for this brute agony he could not relieve. The sweetness was gone from the evening, the sense of peace, of security and placid contentment was stricken from the landscape. The hideous ruin in the engine's path drove all thought of his poem from his mind. The inspiration vanished like a mist. The de Profundis had ceased to ring

He hurried on across the Los Muertos ranch, almost running, even putting his hands over his ears till he was out of hearing distance of that all but human distress. Not until he was beyond earshot did he pause, looking back, listening The night had shut down again. For a moment the silence was profound, unbroken.

Then, faint and prolonged, across the levels of the so ranch, he heard the engine whistling for Bonneville. Again and again, at rapid intervals in its flying course, it whistled for road crossings, for sharp curves, for trestles, ominous notes, hoarse, bellowing, ringing with the accents of menace and defiance, and abruptly Presley saw again, in his imagination, the galloping monster, the terror of steel and steam, with its single eye cyclopean, red, shooting from horizon to horizon, but saw it now as the symbol of a vast power, huge, terrible, flinging the echo of its thunder over all the so reaches of the valley, leaving blood and destruction in its path, the leviathan, with tentacles of steel clutching into the soil, the soulless Force, the non-hearted Power, the monster, the Colossus, the Octopus

[The book moves on to represent the growers of wheat who are the intended victims of the Octopus The following chapter describes the plowing at the Quien Sabe Rancho, the proprietor of which is Annixter, a leading character in the book.]

THE PLOWING

The day was fine. Since the first rain of the season there had been no other. Now the sky was without a cloud, pale blue, delicate, luminous, scintillating with morning. The great brown earth turned a huge flank to it, exhaling the moisture of the early dew. The atmosphere, washed clean of dust and mist, was translucent as crystal. Far off to the east, the hills on the other side of Broderson Creek stood out against the pallid saffron of the horizon as flat and as sharply outlined as if pasted on the sky. The campanile of the ancient Mission of San Juan seemed as fine as frost work. All about between the horizons, the carpet of the land unrolled itself to infinity. But now it was no longer parched with heat, cracked and warped by a merciless sun, powdered with dust. The rain had done its work, not a clod that was not swollen with fertility, not a fissure that did not exhale the sense of fecundity. One could not take a dozen steps upon the ranches without the brusque sensation that underfoot the land was alive, roused at last from its sleep, palpitating with the desire of reproduction. Deep down there in the recesses of the soil, the great heart throbbed once more, thrilling with passion, vibrating with desire, offering itself to the caress of the plow, insistent, eager, imperious. Dimly one felt the deep-seated trouble of the earth, the uneasy agitation of its members, the hidden tumult of its womb, demanding to be made fruitful, to reproduce, to disengage the eternal renascent germ of Life that stirred and struggled in its loins.

The plows, thirty-five in number, each drawn by its team of ten, stretched in an interminable line, nearly a quarter of a mile in length, behind and ahead of Vanamee They were arranged, as it were en echelon, not in file-nor one directly behind the other, but each 21 succeeding plow its own width further in the field than the one in front of it. Each of these plows held five shears, so that when the entire company was in motion, one hundred and seventy-five furrows were made at the same instant. At a distance, the plows resembled a great column of field artillery Each driver was in his place, his glance alternating between his horses and the foreman nearest at hand. Other foremen, in their buggies or buckboards, were at intervals along the line, like battery lieutenants Annixter himself, on horseback, 30 in boots and campaign hat, a cigar in his teeth, overlooked the scene.

The division superintendent, on the opposite side of the line, galloped past to a position at the head. For a long moment there was a silence. A sense of preparedness ran from end to end of the column. All things were ready, each man in his place. The day's work was about to begin.

the creak of straining leather, the subdued clash of machinery, the cracking of whips, the deep breathing of nearly four hundred horses, the abrupt commands and scries of the drivers, and, last of all, the prolonged, soothing murmur of the thick brown earth turning steadily from the multitude of advancing shears

The plowing, thus commenced, continued The sun rose higher Steadily, the hundred iron hands kneaded and furrowed and stroked the brown, humid earth, the hundred iron teeth bit deep into the Titan's flesh Perched on his seat, the moist, living reins slipping and tugging in his hands, Vanamee, in the midst of this steady confusion of constantly varying sensation, sight interrupted by sound, sound mingling with sight, on this swaying, vibrating seat, quivering with the prolonged thrill of the earth, lapsed to a sort of pleasing numbness, in a sense, hypnotized by the weaving maze of things in which he found himself involved. To keep his team at an even, regular gait, maintaining the precise interval to run his furrows as closely as possible to those already made by the plow in front-this for the moment was the entire sum of his duties. But while one part of his brain, alert and watchful, took cognizance of these matters, all the greater part was lulled and stupefied with the long monotony of the affair

The plowing, now in full swing, enveloped him in a vague, slow-moving whirl of things. Underneath him was the jarring, jolting, trembling machine, not a clod was turned, not an obstacle encountered, that he did not receive the swift impression of it through all his body the very friction of the damp soil, sliding incessantly from the shiny surface of the shears, seemed to reproduce itself in his finger tips and along the back of his $\bar{\epsilon}$ head He heard the horse-hoofs by the myriads crushing down easily, deeply, into the loam, the prolonged clinking of trace-chains, the working of the smooth, brown flanks in the harness, the clatter of wooden hames the champing of bits, the click of iron shoes against pebbles the brittle stubble of the surface ground crackling and snapping as the furrows turned, the sonorous, steads breaths wrenched from the deep, laboring chests, strapbound, shining with sweat, and all along the line the voices of the men talking to the horses. Everywhere there 90 were visions of glossy brown backs, straining, heaving. swollen with muscle, harness streaked with specks of froth, broad, cup-shaped hoofs, heavy with brown loam men's faces red with tan, blue overalls spotted with tale-grease, muscled hands, the knuckles whitened in their grip on the reins, and through it all the ammoniacal smeil of the horses, the bitter reek of perspiration of beasts and men, the aroma of warm leather, the scent of dead stubble—and stronger and more penetrating than everything else, the heavy, enervating odor of the upturned, living earth.

At intervals, from the top of one of the rare, low swells of the land, Vanamee overlooked a wider horizon On the other divisions of Quien Sabe the same work was in progress Occasionally he could see another column of plows in the adjoining division—sometimes so close at hand that the subdued murmur of its movements reached his ear, sometimes so distant that it resolved itself into a long, brown streak upon the gray of the ground Jurther off to the west on the Osterman ranch other columns came and went, and, once, from the crest of the highest swell on his division, Vanamee caught a distant glimpse of the Broderson ranch. There, too, moving specks indicated that the plowing was under way. And turther away still, far off there beyond the fine line of the horizons, over the curve of the globe, the shoulder of the earth, he knew were other ranches, and beyond these others, and beyond these still others, the immensiucs multiplying to infinity

Everywhere throughout the great San Joaquin, unseen and unheard, a thousand plows up-stirred the land, tens of thousands of shares clutched deep into the warm, moist soil

It was the long stroking caress, vigorous, male, powerful, for which the Earth seemed panting. The heroic embrace of a multitude of iron hands, gripping deep into the brown, warm flesh of the land that quivered responsive and passionate under this rude advance, so robust as to be almost an assault, so violent as to be veritably brutal. There, under the sun and under the speckless sheen of the sky, the wooing of the Titan began, the vast primal passion, the two world-forces, the elemental Male and Female locked in a colossal embrace ar grapples in the throes of an infinite desire, at once terrible and divine, knowing no law, untamed, savage, natural, sublime

From time to time the gang in which Vanamee worked halted on the signal from foreman or overseer. The horses came to a standstill, the vague clamor of the work lapsed away. Then the minutes passed. The whole work hung suspended. All up and down the line one demanded.

what had happened The division superintendent galloped past, perplexed and anxious For the moment, one of the plows was out of order, a bolt had slipped, a lever so refused to work, or a machine had become immobilized in heavy ground, or a horse had lamed himself Once, even, toward noon, an entire plow was taken out of the line, so out of gear that a messenger had to be sent to the division forge to summon the machinist

Annixter had disappeared. He had ridden further on to the other divisions of his ranch, to watch the work in progress there. At twelve o clock, according to his orders all the division superintendents put themselves in communication with him by means of the telephone of wires that connected each of the division houses, reporting the condition of the work, the number of acres covered, the prospects of each plow traversing its daily average of twenty miles.

At half-past twelve, Vanamee and the rest of the drivers are their lunch in the field, the tin buckets having been distributed to them that morning after breakfast. But in the evening, the routine of the previous day was repeated, and Vanamee unharnessing his team, riding one horse and leading the others, returned to the division 70 barns and bunk-house.

It was between six and seven o'clock. The half hundred men of the gang threw themselves upon the supper the Chinese cooks had set out in the shed of the eating-house, long as a bowling alley, unpainted, crude, the seats benches, the table covered with oilcloth. Overhead a half-dozen kerosene lamps flared and smoked

The table was taken as if by assault, the clatter of iron knives upon the tin plates was as the reverberation of hail upon a metal roof. The plowmen rinsed their throats so with great draughts of wine, and, their clbows wide, their foreheads flushed, resumed the attack upon the beef and bread, eating as though they would never have enough. All up and down the long table, where the kerosene lamps reflected themselves deep in the oilcloth cover, one heard the incessant sounds of mastication, and saw the uninterrupted movement of great jaws. At every moment one or another of the men demanded a fresh portion of beef, another pint of wine, another half-loaf of bread. For upward of an hour the gang ate. It was so no longer a supper. It was a veritable barbecue, a crude and primitive feasting, barbaric, homeric

But in all this scene Vanamee saw nothing repulsive Presley would have abhorred it—this feeding of the People, this gorging of the human animal, eager for its meat. Vanamee, simple, uncomplicated, living so close to nature and the rudimentary life, understood its significance. He knew very well that within a short half-hour after this meal the men would throw themselves down in their bunks to sleep without moving, inert and stupefied with fatigue, till the morning. Work, food, and sleep, all life reduced to its bare essentials, uncomplex, honest, healthy. They were strong, these men, with the ostrength of the soil they worked, in touch with the essential things, back again to the starting point of civilization, coarse, vital, real, and sane.

His peremptory handling of freight rates riles the farmers, and they are further distressed by rumors that the railroad may shortly revalue the land which they have been leasing. At the celebration of the completion of a big barn on Annixter's ranch, their fears are confirmed and they take action.]

from Book I, Chapter VI

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE LEAGUE

It was almost midnight. The dance drew toward its close in a storm of jubilation. The perspiring musicians toiled like galley slaves, the guests singing as they danced

The group of men reassembled in the harness room Even Magnus Derrick condescended to enter and drink a toast. Presley and Vanamee, still holding themselves aloof, looked on, Vanamee more and more disgusted 20 Dabney, standing to one side, overlooked and forgotten, continued to sip steedily at his glass, solumn, reserved Garnett of the Ruby rancho, Keast from the ranch of the same name, Gethings of the San Pablo and Chattern of the Bonania, leaned back in their chairs, their waistcoats unbuttoned, their legs spread wide, laughingthey could not tell why Other ranchers, men whom Annixter had never seen, appeared in the room, wheat growers from places as far distant as Goshen and Pixley, young men and old, proprietors of veritable principali-30 ties, hundreds of thousands of acres of wheat lands, a dozen of them, a score of them, men who were strangers to each other, but who made it a point to shake hands with Magnus Derrick, the "prominent man" of the vailest Old Broderson, whom every one had believed had gone home, returned, though much sobered, and took his place, refusing, however, to drink another spoonful

Soon the entire number of Annixter's guests found themselves in two companies, the dancers on the floor of the barn, frolicking through the last figures of the Virginia reel, and the boisterous gathering of men in the harness room, downing the last quarts of fertilizer Both assemblies had been increased. Even the older people had joined in the dance, while nearly every one of the men who did not dance had found his way into the harness room. The two groups rivaled each other in their noise Out on the floor of the barn was a very whirlwind of gayety, a tempest of laughter, hand-clapping and cries of amusement. In the harness room the confused shouting and singing, the stamping of heavy feet set a quivering reverberation in the oil of the kerosene lamps, the flame of the candles in the Japanese lanterns flaring and swaying in the gusts of hilarity. At intervals, between the two one heard the music, the wailing of the violins, the vigorous snarling of the cornet, and the harsh incessant rasping of the snare drum

And at times all these various sounds mingled in a single vague note, huge, clamorous that rose up into the night from the colossal, reverberating compass of the barn and sent its echoes far off across the unbroken levels of the surrounding ranches, stretching out to infinity under the clouded sky, calm, mysterious, still

Annixter, the punch bowl clasped in his arms, was pouring out the last spoonful of liquor into Carahers glass when he was aware that some one was pulling at the sleeve of his coat. He set down the punch bowl

"Well, where did you come from?" he demanded

It was a messenger from Bonneville, the uniformed boy that the telephone company employed to carry messages. He had just arrived from town on his bicycle, out of breath and panting

"Message for you, sir Will you sign?"

He held the book to Annixter, who signed the receipt wondering

The boy departed, leaving a thick envelope of yellow paper in Annixter's hands, the address typewritten, the word "Urgent" written in blue pencil in one corner

Annixter tore it open. The envelope contained other sealed envelopes, some eight or ten of them, addressed to Magnus Derrick, Osterman, Broderson, Garnett, Keas

Gethings, Chattern, Dabney, and to Annixter himself viill puzzled, Annixter distributed the envelopes, mutrering to himself

What's up now?"

The incident had attracted attention. A comparative $c_{\rm CET}$ followed, the guests following the letters with their cress as they were passed around the table. They functed that Annixter had arranged a surprise

Magnus Derrick, who sat next to Annixter, was the $\tau_{\rm IS}$ to receive his letter. With a word of excuse he opened it

Read it, read it, Governor," shouted a half-dozen voices "No secrets, you know Everything above-board here to-night."

Magnus cast a glance at the contents of the letter, then rose to his feet and read

Magnus Derrick,

Bonneville, Tulare Co., Cal

Dear Sir

By regrade of October 1st, the value of the Railroad land you occupy, included in your ranch of Los Muertos, has been fixed at $27.00 per acre. The land is now for sale at that price to any one.

Yours, etc.,

CYRUS BLAKELEE RUGGLES, Land Agent P and S W R R S BEHRMAN, Loxal Agent, P and S W R R

In the midst of the profound silence that followed, Osterman was heard to exclaim grimly

That's a pretty good one. Tell us another."

But for a long moment this was the only remark

The silence widened, broken only by the sound of torn paper as Annixter, Osterman, old Broderson, Garnett, Keast Gethings, Chattern, and Dabney opened and read their letters. They were all to the same effect, almost word for word like the Governor's Only the figures and the proper names varied. In some cases the price per acre was twenty-two dollars. In Annixter's case to was thirty.

And—and the Company promised to sell to me, to—to all of us," gasped old Broderson, "at two dollars and a / "/t an acre"

It was not alone the ranchers immediately around Bonneville who would be plundered by this move on the part of the Railroad The "alternate section' system applied throughout all the San Joaquin By striking at the Bonneville ranchers a terrible precedent was established. Of the crowd of guests in the harness room alone, nearly every man was affected, every man menaced with 50 ruin. All of a million acres was suddenly involved.

Then suddenly the tempest burst. A dozen men were on their feet in an instant, their teeth set, their fists clinched, their faces purple with rige. Oaths, curses, maledictions exploded I ke the fitting of successive mines Voices quivered with wrath hands flung upward, the fingers hooked, prehensile, trembled with anger. The sense of wrongs, the injustices, the oppression, extortion, and pillage of twenty years suddenly culminated and found voice in a rancous howl of execration. For a sec- 60 ond there was nothing orticulate in that cry of savage exasperation, nothing even intelligent. It was the human animal hounded to its corner, exploited, harried to its last stand, at biv, ferocious, terrible turning at last with bared teeth and upraised cliws to meet the death grapple. It was the hideous squeiling of the tormented brute, its back to the wall, detending its lair, its mate and its whelps, ready to bite, to rend, to trample to batter out the life of The Enemy in a principal, bestial welter of blood and fury

The roar subsided to intermittent clamor, in the pauses of which the sounds of music and dancing made themselves audible once more

S Behrman again, 'vociferated Harran Derrick

Chose his moment well printered America. "Hits his bardest when were all rounded up hiving a good time."

Gendemen, this is ruin'

What's to be done now?"

Tight' My God! do you think we are going to stand 80 this? Do you think we can?

The uproar swelled again. The clearer the assembly of ranchers understood the significance of this move on the part of the Railroad, the more terrible it appeared, the more flagrant, the more intolerable. Was it possible, was it within the bounds of imagination, that this tyranny should be contemplated? But they I new—past years had driven home the lesson—the implacable, iron monster with whom they had to deal, and again and again the sense of outrage and oppression lashed them to their 100 feet, their mouths wide with curses, their fists clinched tight, their throats hoarse with shouting Fight! How fight? What are you going to do?"

'If there's a law in this land-"

"If there is, it is in Shelgrim's pocket Who owns the courts in California? Ain't it Shelgrim?"

"God damn him."

"Well, how long are you going to stand it? How long before you'll settle up accounts with six inches of plugged gas-pipe?"

"And our contracts, the solemn pledges of the corporation to sell to us first of all—"

"And now the land is for sale to anybody"

"Why, it is a question of my home Am I to be turned out? Why, I have put eight thousand dollars into improving this land."

"And I six thousand, and now that I have, the Railroad grabs it"

"And the system of irrigating ditches that Derrick and I have been laying out There's thousands of dollars in that!"

"I'll fight this out till I've spent every cent of my 25 money"

"Where? In the courts that the Company owns?"

"Think I am going to give in to this? Think I am to get off my land? By God, gentlemen, law or no law, railroad or no railroad. I—will—not."

"Nor I."

"Nor I"

"Nor I"

"This is the last Legal means first, if those fail—the shotgun

"They can kill me They can shoot me down, but I'll die—die fighting for my home—before I'll give in to this."

At length Annixter made himself heard

"All out of the room but the ranch owners," he shouted "Hooven, Caraher, Dyke, you'll have to clear out. This is a family affair. Presley, you and your friend can remain."

Reluctantly the others filed through the door There remained in the harness room—besides Vanamee and 40 Presley—Magnus Derrick, Annixter, old Broderson, Harran, Garnett from the Ruby rancho, Keast from the ranch of the same name, Gethings of the San Pablo, Chattern of the Bonanza, about a score of others, ranchers from various parts of the county, and, last of all, Dabney, ignored, silent, to whom nobody spoke and who, as yet, had not uttered a word.

But the men who had been asked to leave the harness room spread the news throughout the barn. It was repeated from lip to lip. One by one the guests dropped out of the dance. Groups were formed By swift degrees the gavety lapsed away. The Virginia reel broke up The musicians ceased playing, and in the place of the noisy effervescent revelry of the previous half hour, a subdued murmur filled all the barn, a mingling of whispers lowered voices, the coming and going of light footsteps the uneasy shifting of positions, while from behind the closed doors of the harness room came a prolonged sullen hum of anger and strenuous debate. The dance came to an abrupt end. The guests, unwilling to go as vet, stunned, distressed, stood clumsily about, their eves vague, their hands swinging at their sides, looking stupidly into each other's faces. A sense of impending calamity, oppressive, foreboding, gloomy, passed through the air overhead in the night, a long shiver of anguish and of terror, mysterious, despairing

In the harness room, however, the excitement continued unchecked. One rancher after another delivered himself of a torrent of furious words. There was no order, merely the frenzied outcry of blind fury. One spirit alone was common to all—resistance at whatever cost and to whatever lengths.

Suddenly Osterman leaped to his feet, his bald head gleaming in the lamp-light, his red ears distended a flood of words filling his great, horizontal slit of a mouth his comic actor's face flaming. Like the hero of a melodrama, he took the stage with a great sweeping gesture.

"Organization," he shouted, "that must be our watchword. The curse of the ranchers is that they fritter away their strength. Now, we must stand together, now, now. Here's the crisis, here's the moment. Shall we meet it? I call for the League. Not next week, not to-morrow not in the morning, but now, now, now, this very moment, before we go out of that door. Every one of ushere to join it, to form the beginnings of a vast organization, banded together to death, if needs be, for the protection of our rights and homes. Are you ready? Is it now or never? I call for the League."

Instantly there was a shout With an actor's instinct Osterman had spoken at the precise psychological moment. He carried the others off their feet, glib, dexterous voluble. Just what was meant by the League the other did not know, but it was something, a vague engine.

machine with which to fight. Osterman had not done speaking before the room rang with outcries, the crowd of men shouting, for what they did not know

The League! The League!"

Now to-night, this moment; sign our names before we leave

"He's right Organization! The League!"

We have a committee at work already," Osterman voliferated "I am a member, and also Mr Broderson, Mr Annixter, and Mr Harran Derrick What our aims are we will explain to you later. Let this committee be the nucleus of the League—temporarily, at least. Trust us. We are working for you and with you. Let this committee be merged into the larger committee of the League, and for President of the League"—he paused the truction of a second—"for President there can be but one name mentioned, one man to whom we all must look as leader—Magnus. Derrick."

The Governor's name was received with a storm of theers. The harness room re-echoed with the shouts of

'Derrick! Derrick!"

'Magnus for President'"

"Derrick, our natural leader"

Derrick, Derrick, Derrick for President"

Magnus 10se to his feet He made no gesture Erect as a cavalry officer, tall, thin, commanding, he dominated the crowd in an instant There was a moment's hush

"Gentlemen,' he said, "if organization is a good word, moderation is a better one. The matter is too grave for haste. I would suggest that we each and severally return to our respective homes for the night, sleep over what has happened, and convene again to-morrow, when we tre calmer and can approach this affair in a more judicious mood. As for the honor with which you would inform me, I must affirm that that, too, is a matter for grave deliberation. This League is but a name as yet. To accept control of an organization whose principles are not yet fixed is a heavy responsibility. I shrink from it—"

But he was allowed to proceed no turther A storm of protest developed. There were shouts of

No, no The League to-night and Derrick for President."

We have been moderate too long"

The League first, principles afterward"

We can't wait," declared Osterman "Many of us can not attend a meeting to-morrow Our business affairs would prevent it. Now we are all together. I propose a temporary chairman and secretary be named and a ballot be taken. But first the League. Let us draw up a set of resolutions to stand together, for the 50 defence of our homes, to death, if needs be, and each man present affix his signature thereto."

He subsided amid vigorous applause. The next quarter of an hour was a vague confusion, every one talking at once, conversations going on in low tones in various corners of the room. Ink, pens, and a sheaf of foolscap were brought from the ranch house. A set of resolutions was drafted, having the force of a pledge, organizing the League of Defence. Annixter was the first to sign. Others followed, only a few holding back, refusing to join till they had shought the matter over. The roll grew, the paper circulated about the table, each signature was welcomed by a salvo of cheers. At length, it reached Harran Derrick, who signed amid tremendous uproar. He released the pen only to shake a score of hands.

"Now, Magnus Derrick"

"Gentlemen," began the Covernor, once more rising, 'I beg of you to allow me further consideration Gentlemen—"

He was interrupted by renewed shouting
"No, no, now or never—Sign, join the League"
"Don't leave us—We look to you to help

But presently the excited throng that turned their faces toward the Governor were aware of a new face at his elbow. The door of the harness room had been left unbolted and Mrs Derrick, unable to endure the heartbreaking suspense of waiting outside, had guhered up all her courage and had come into the room. Trembling, she clung to Magnus's arm, her pretty light-brown 80 hair in disarray, her large young girl's eyes wide with terror and distrust. What was about to happen she did not understand, but these men were clamoring for Magnus to pledge himself to something, to some terrible course of action, some ruthless, unscrupulous battle to the death with the iron-hearted monster of steel and steam Nerved with a coward's intrep dity, she, who so easily obliterated herself, had found her way into the midst of this frantic crowd, into this hot, close room, reeking of alcohol and tobacco smoke, into this atmos- 90 phere surcharged with hatred and curses She seized her husband's arm imploring, distraught with terror

"No, no," she murmured, "no, don't sign"

She was the feather caught in the whirlwind. En masse, the crowd surged toward the erect figure of the Governor, the pen in one hand, his wife's fingers in the other, the roll of signatures before him. The clamor was deafening, the excitement culminated brusquely Half a hundred hands stretched toward him, thirty voices, at top pitch, implored, expostulated, urged, almost commanded. The reverberation of the shouting was as the plunge of a cataract.

It was the uprising of The People, the thunder of the outbreak of revolt, the mob demanding to be led, aroused at last, imperious, resistless, overwhelming. It was the blind fury of insurrection, the brute, many-tongued, redeyed, bellowing for guidance, baring its teeth, unsheathing its claws, imposing its will with the abrupt, resistless pressure of the relaxed piston, inexorable, knowing no pity

"No, no," implored Annie Derrick "No, Magnus, 20 don't sign"

"He must," declared Harran, shouting in her ear to make himself heard—he must—Don't you understand?"

Again the crowd surged forward, roaring Mrs Derrick was swept back, pushed to one side. Her husband no longer belonged to her. She paid the penalty for being the wife of a great man. The world, like a colossal iron wedge, crushed itself between. She was thrust to the wall. The throng of men, stamping, surrounded Magnus, she could no longer see him, but, terror-struck, so she listened. There was a moment's lull, then a vast thunder of savage jubilation. Magnus had signed.

Harran found his mother leaning against the wall, her hands shut over her ears, her eyes, dilated with fear, brimming with tears. He led her from the harness room to the outer room, where Mrs. Tree and Hilma took charge of her, and then, impatient, refusing to answer the hundreds of anxious questions that assailed him, hurried back to the harness room.

Already the balloting was in progress, Osterman act-40 ing as temporary chairman. On the very first ballot he was made secretary of the League pro tem, and Magnus unanimously chosen for its President. An executive committee was formed, which was to meet the next day at the Los Muertos ranch house.

It was half-past one o'clock. In the barn outside the greater number of the guests had departed. Long since the musicians had disappeared. There only remained the families of the ranch owners involved in the meeting in the harness room. These huddled in isolated groups in corners of the garish, echoing barn, the women in their wraps, the young men with their coat collars turned up against the draughts that once more made themselves felt.

For a long half hour the loud hum of eager conversation continued to issue from behind the door of the harness room. Then, at length, there was a prolonged scraping of chairs. The session was over. The men came out in groups, searching for their families.

At once the homeward movement began Every one was worn out Some of the ranchers' daughters had gone ; to sleep against their mothers' shoulders

Billy, the stableman, and his assistant were awakened and the teams were hitched up. The stable yard was full of a maze of swinging lanterns and buggy lamps. The horses fretted, champing the bits, the carry-aliscreaked with the straining of leather and springs as they received their loads. At every instant one heard the rattle of wheels, as vehicle after vehicle disappeared in the night. A fine drizzling rain was falling, and the lamps began to show dim in a vague haze of orange light.

Magnus Derrick was the last to go. At the doorway of the barn he found Annixter, the roll of names—which it had been decided he was to keep in his safe for the moment—under his arm. Silently the two shook hands. Magnus departed. The grind of the wheels of his carry-all grated sharply on the gravel of the driveway in front of the ranch house, then, with a hollow roll across a little plank bridge, gained the roadway. For a moment the beat of the horses hoofs made itself heard on the roadway. It ceased. Suddenly there was a great silence.

Annixter, in the doorway of the great barn, stood looking about him for a moment, alone, thoughtful. The barn was empty. That astonishing evening had come to an end. The whirl of things and people, the crowd of dancers, Delaney, the gun fight, Hilma Tree, her ever fixed on him in mute confession, the rabble in the harness room, the news of the regrade, the fierce outburst of wrath, the hasty organizing of the League, all went spinning confusedly through his recollection. But he was exhausted. Time enough in the morning to think it all over. By now it was raining sharply. He put the roll.

of names into his inside pocket, threw a sack over his

But in the harness room, lighted by the glittering lanterns and flaring lamps, in the midst of overturned chairs, spilled liquor, cigar stumps, and broken glasses, Vanamee and Presley still remained talking, talking. At length, they rose, and came out upon the floor of the barn and stood for a moment looking about them

Billy, the stableman, was going the rounds of the walls, putting out light after light. By degrees, the vast interior was growing dim. Upon the roof overhead the rain diummed incessantly, the eaves dripping. The floor was littered with pine needles, bits of orange peel, ends and fragments of torn organdies and muslins and bits of tissue paper from the "Phrygian Bonnets" and "Liberty Caps. The buckskin mare in the stall, dozing on three legs changed position with a long sigh. The sweat stifetang the hair upon her back and loins, as it dried, gave off a penetrating, ammoniacal odor that mingled with the stale perfume of sachet and wilted flowers.

Presley and Vanamee stood looking at the deserted barn. There was a long silence. Then Presley said

Well what do you think of it all?"

I think," answered Vanamee slowly, "I think that there was a dance in Brussels the night before Waterloo"

Despite the opposition of Magnus, the League decides to use money to bring about the election of two of the three members of the State Railway Commission, which is to fix the valuation of their property and the rates for the transportation of their wheat. One of the members backed by the League is Lyman Derrick, the "Governor's" eldest son, a corporation lawyer. At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the League which is held at the Los Muertos ranch, Lyman appears to tell about the new rates which the commissioners have fixed.

from Book II, Chapter IV

LYMAN'S REPORT TO THE COMMITTEE

At the time appointed, the men composing the Committee gathered about the table in the dining-room of the Los Muertos ranch house—It was almost a reproduction of the scene of the famous evening when Osterman had proposed the plan of the Ranchers' Railroad Commis- 30 sion. Magnus Derrick sat at the head of the table, in his buttoned frock coat. Whiskey bottles and siphons of soda-water were within easy reach. Presley, who by now was considered the confidential friend of every member of the Committee, lounged as before on the sofa, smoking cigarettes, the cat Nathalic on his knee. Besides Magnus and Annixter, Osterman was present, and old Broderson and Harran, Garnett from the Ruby Rancho and Gethings of the San Pablo, who were also members of the Executive Committee, were on hand, preoccupied, 40 bearded men, smoking black cigars, and, last of all, Dabney, the silent old man, of whom little was known but his name, and who had been made a member of the Committee, nobody could tell why

"My son Lyman should be here, gentlemen, within at least ten minutes. I have sent my team to meet him at Bonneville," explained Magnus, as he called the meeting to order. "The secretary will call the roll."

Osterman called the roll, and, to fill in the time, read over the minutes of the previous meeting. The treasurer 50 was making his report as to the funds at the disposal of the League when Lyman arrived.

Magnus and Harran went forward to meet him, and the Committee rather awkwardly rose and remained standing while the three exchanged greetings, the members, some of whom had never seen their commissioner, eying him out of the corners of their eyes

Lyman was dressed with his usual correctness. His cravat was of the latest fashion, his clothes of careful design and unimpeachable fit. His shoes, of patent 60 leather, reflected the lamplight, and he carried a drab overcoat over his arm. Before being introduced to the Committee, he excused himself a moment and ran to see his mother, who waited for him in the adjoining sitting-room. But in a few moments he returned, asking pardon for the delay

He was all affability, his protruding eyes, that gave such an unusual, foreign appearance to his very dark face, radiated geniality. He was evidently anxious to please, to produce a good impression upon the grave, 70 clumsy farmers before whom he stood. But at the same time, Presley, watching him from his place on the sofa, could imagine that he was rather nervous. He was too nimble in his cordiality, and the little gestures he made in bringing his cuffs into view and in touching the ends of his tight, black mustache with the ball of his thumb were repeated with unnecessary frequency

"Mr Broderson, my son, Lyman, my eldest son. Mr. Annixter, my son, Lyman"

The Governor introduced him to the ranchers, proud of Lyman's good looks, his correct dress, his ease of manner Lyman shook hands all around, keeping up a flow of small talk, finding a new phrase for each member, complimenting Osterman, whom he already knew, upon his talent for organization, recalling a mutual acquaintance to the mind of old Broderson. At length, however, he sat down at the end of the table, opposite his brother There was a silence.

Magnus rose to recapitulate the reasons for the extra session of the Committee, stating again that the Board of Railway Commissioners which they—the ranchers—had succeeded in seating had at length issued the new schedule of reduced rates, and that Mr Derrick had been obliging enough to offer to come down to Los Muertos in person to acquaint the wheat-growers of the San Joaquin with the new rates for the carriage of their grain

But Lyman very politely protested, addressing his father punctiliously as "Mr Chairman," and the other ranchers as "Gentlemen of the Executive Committee of the League." He had no wish, he said, to disarrange the regular proceedings of the Committee. Would it not be preferable to defer the reading of his report till "new business, was called for? In the meanwhile, let the Committee proceed with its usual work. He understood the necessarily delicate nature of this work, and would be pleased to withdraw till the proper time arrived for him to speak.

"Good deal of bucking and filling about the reading of a column of figures," muttered Annixter to the man at his elbow

Lyman awaited the Committee's decision. He sat down, touching the ends of his mustache

"Oh, play ball," growled Annixtei

Gethings rose to say that as the meeting had been to called solely for the purpose of hearing and considering the new grain tariff he was of the opinion that routine business could be dispensed with and the schedule read at once. It was so ordered

Lyman rose and made a long speech Voluble as Osterman himself, he, nevertheless, had at his command a vast number of readymade phrases, the staples of a political speaker, the stock in trade of the commercial lawyer, which rolled off his tongue with the most persuasive fluency. By degrees, in the course of his speech, he began to insinuate the idea that the wheat-growers had never expected to settle their difficulties with the Railroad by the work of a single commission that they had counted upon a long, continued campaign of many years, railway commission succeeding railway commission, before the desired low rates should be secured, that the present Board of Commissioners was only the beginning and that too great results were not expected from them. All this he contrived to mention casually, in the talk, as if it were a foregone conclusion a matter understood by all

As the speech continued, the eyes of the ranchers around the table were fixed with growing attention upon this well-dressed, city-bred young man, who spoke so fluently and who told them of their own intentions A feeling of perplexity began to spread, and the first taint of distrust invaded their minds

"But the good work has been most auspiciously inaugurated," continued Lyman "Reforms so sweeping as the one contemplated can not be accomplished in a single night. Great things grow slowly, benefits to be permanent must accrue gradually Yet, in spite of all this, your commissioners have done much Already the phalanx of the enemy is pierced, already his armor is dinted Pledged as were your commissioners to an average ten per cent reduction in rates for the carriage of grain by the Pacific and Southwestern Railroad, we have rigidly adhered to the demands of our constituency we have obeyed the People. The main problem has not yet been completely solved, that is for later, when we shall have gathered sufficient strength to attack the enemy in his very stronghold, but an average ten po cent cut has been made all over the State. We have made a great advance, have taken a great step forward and if the work is carried ahead, upon the lines laid down by the present commissioners and their constituents, there is every reason to believe that within a very few years equitable and stable rates for the shipment of grain from the San Joaquin Valley to Stockton, Port Costa, and tidewater will be permanently imposed"

"Well, hold on," exclaimed Annixter, out of order stand ignoring the Governor's reproof, "hasn't your commission reduced grain rates in the San Joaquin?"

We have reduced grain rates by ten per cent all over the State," rejoined Lyman "Here are copies of the new schedule"

He drew them from his value and passed them around the table

You see," he observed, "the rate between Mayfield and Oakland, for instance, has been reduced by twenty-me cents a ton."

Yes—but—but—" said old Broderson, "it is rather unusual, isn't it, for wheat in that district to be sent to Oakland?"

'Why, look here," exclaimed Annixter, looking up from the schedule, "where is there any reduction in lates in the San Joaquin—from Bonneville and Guadalajara, for instance? I don't see as you've made any reduction at all. Is this right? Did you give me the right schedule?"

"Of course, all the points in the State could not be covered at once," returned Lyman "We never expected, you know, that we could cut rates in the San Joaquin the very first move, that is for later. But you will see we made very material reductions on shipments from the upper Sacramento Valley, also the rate from lone to Marysville has been reduced eighty cents a ton."

Why, rot, cried Annixter, 'no one ever ships wheat that way "

The Salinas rate,' continued Lyman, "has been lowered seventy-five cents, the St Helena rate fifty cents, and please notice the very drastic cut from Red Bluff, north along the Oregon route, to the Oregon State Line"

Where not a carload of wheat is shipped in a year," commented Gethings of the San Pablo.

Oh, you will find yourself mistaken there, Mr. Gethings," returned Lyman courteously "And for the matter of that, a low rate would stimulate wheat-production in that district."

The order of the meeting was broken up, neglected; Magnus did not even pretend to preside. In the growing excitement over the inexplicable schedule, routine was not thought of. Every one spoke at will.

Why, Lyman," demanded Magnus, looking across the table to his son, "is this schedule correct? You have not cut rates in the San Joaquin at all We—these gentlemen here and myself—we are no better off than we were before we secured your election as commissioner."

"We were pledged to make an average ten per cent cut, sir—'

"It is an average ten per cent cut," cried Osterman "Oh, yes, that's plain. It's an average ten per cent cut so all right, but you've made it by cutting grain rates between points where practically no grain is shipped. We, the wheat-growers in the San Joaquin, where all the wheat is grown, are right where we were before. The Railroad won't lose a nickel. By Jingo, boys, he glanced around the table, "I'd like to know what this means."

"The Railroad, if you come to that," returned Lyman, "has already lodged a protest against the new rate."

Annixter uttered a derisive shout

"A protest! That's good, that is When the P. and S. W objects to rates it don't 'protest,' m' son. The first you hear from Mr. Shelgrim is an injunction from the courts preventing the order for new rates from taking effect. By the Lord," he cried angrily, leaping to his feet, "I would like to know what all this means, too. Why didn't you reduce our grain rates? What did we elect you for?"

"Yes, what did we elect you for?" demanded Osterman and Gethings, also getting to their feet Order, order, gentlemen," cried Magnus, remembering the duties of his office and rapping his knuckles on the table. "This meeting has been allowed to degenerate too far already."

"You elected us, 'declared Lyman doggedly, "to make an average ten per cent cut on grain rates. We have done it. Only because you don't benefit at once, you object. It makes a difference whose ox is gored, it seems." "Lyman!"

It was Magnus who spoke He had drawn himself to 80 his full six feet. His eyes were flashing direct into his son's. His voice rang with severity

"Lyman, what does this mean?"

The other spread out his hands

"As you see, sir. We have done our best. I warned you not to expect too much. I told you that this question of transportation was difficult. You would not wish to put rates so low that the action would amount to confiscation of property."

"Why did you not lower rates in the valley of the 90 San Joaquin?"

"That was not a prominent issue in the affair," responded Lyman, carefully emphasizing his words "I understand, of course, it was to be approached in time. The main point was an average ten per cent reduction. Rates will be lowered in the San Joaquin. The ranchers around Bonneville will be able to ship to Port Costa at equitable rates, but so radical a measure as that can not be put through in a turn of the hand. We must study—"

"You knew the San Joaquin rate war an issue," shouted Annixter, shaking his finger across the table to "What do we men who backed you care about rates up in Del Norte and Siskiyou Counties." Not a whoop in hell. It was the San Joaquin rate we were fighting for, and we elected you to reduce that. You didn't do it and you don't intend to, and, by the Lord Harry, I want to know why."

'You'll know, sii--- ' began Lyman

"Well, I'll tell you why, vocificated Osterman "Till tell you why It's because we have been sold out. It's because the P and S W have had their spoon in this boiling. It's because our commissioners have betrayed us. It's because we're a set of damn fool farmers and have been cinched again."

Lyman paled under his dark skin at the direct attack. He evidently had not expected this so soon. For the fraction of one instant he lost his poise. He strove to speak, but caught his breath, stammering

What have you to say, then?' cried Harran, who, until now, had not spoken

"I have this to say," answered Lyman, making head as best he might, that this is no proper spirit in which to discuss business. The Commission has fulfilled its obligations It has adjusted rites to the best of its ability. We have been it work for two months on the preparation of this schedule—"

That's a lie, shouted Annixter, his face scarler—that's a lie. That schedule was drawn in the offices of the Pacific and Southwestern and you know it. It's a scheme of rates made for the Railroad and by the Railroad and you were bought over to put your name to it.

There was a concerted outburst at the words. All the men in the room were on their feet, gesticulating and vociferating.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen, cried Magnus, "are we schoolboys, are we ruftians of the street?"

"We're a set of fool farmers and we've been betrayed," cried Osterman

'Well, what have you to say? What have you to say? persisted Harran, leaning across the table toward his brother "For God's sake, Lyman, you've got some explanation"

"You've misunderstood," protested Lyman, white and trembling 'You've misunderstood You've expected too much Next year—next year—soon now, the Commission will take up the—the Commission will consider the San Joaquin rate We've done our best, that is all "

"Have you, sir?" dcmanded Magnus

The Governor's head was in a whirl, a sensation all most of faintness, had seized upon him. Was it possible?

Have you done your best?' For a second he compelled Lyman's eye. The glances of father and son met and, in spite of his best efforts, Lyman's eyes wavered He began to protest once more, explaining the matter over again from the beginning. But Magnus did not listen. In that brief lapse of time he was convinced that the terrible thing had happened, that the unbelievable had come to pass. It was in the air Between father and son, in some subtle fashion, the truth that was a lie stood suddenly revealed. But even then Magnus would not receive it Lyman do this! His son, his eldest son, descend to this! Once more and for the last time he turned to him and in his voice there was that ring that compelled silence.

Tyman, he said I adjure you—I—I demind of you as you are my son and an honorable man, explain yourself. What is there behind all this? It is no longer as Chairman of the Committee I speak to you, you a member of the Railroad Commission. It is your father who speaks, and I address you as my son. Do you un derstand the gravity of this crisis, do you realize the responsibility of your position, do you not see the importance of this moment? Explain yourself.

"There is nothing to explain

You have not reduced rates in the San Joaquin You have not reduced rates between Bonneville and tidewater/

I repeat, sir, what I said before. An average ten per cent cut—

"Lyman, answer me, yes or no Have you reduced the Bonneville rate?

"It could not be done so soon Give us time We-Yes or no! By God, sir, do you dare equivocate with me. Yes or no, have you reduced the Bonneville rate?"

And answer me," shouted Harran, leaning far across the table, "answer me. Were you paid by the Railroad to leave the San Joaquin rate untouched?"

Lyman, whiter than ever, turned furiously upon his brother

Don't you dare put that question to me again '

No I wont," cried Harran, "because Ill tell you to cont villain's face that you uere paid to do it."

On the instant the clamor burst forth afresh Still on their feet, the ranchers had, little by little, worked round the table, Magnus alone keeping his place. The others were in a group before Lyman, crowding him, is it were, to the wall, shouting into his face with menicing gestures. The truth that was a lie, the certainty of trust betrayed, a pledge ruthlessly broken, was plain to every one of them.

By the Lord¹ men have been shot for less than this," cried Osterman. "You've sold us out, you, and if you ever bring that dago face of yours on a level with mine again, I'll slap it."

Keep your hands off," exclaimed Lyman quickly, the augressiveness of the cornered rat flaming up within him. No violence. Don't you go too far."

How much were you paid? How much were you

Yes, yes what was your price?" cried the others. They were beside themselves with anger, their words come harsh from between their set teeth, their gestures were made with their fists clinided.

You know the Commission acted in good faith," retorted Lyman "You know that all was fair and above-board.

Tur," shouted Annixter, 'Itar, bribe-cater. You were bought and paid for and with the words his arm seemed dmost of itself to leap out from his shoulder. It man received the blow squarely in the face and the force of it sent him staggering backward toward the will. He tripped over his value and fell half-way, his back supported against the closed door of the room Mignus sprang forward. His son had been struck, and the instincts of a father rose up in instant protest, rose for a moment, then forever died away in his heart. He checked the words that flashed to his mind. He lowered his upraised arm. No, he had but one son. The poor, staggering creature with the fine clothes, white face, and blood-streaked lips was no longer his. A blow could not dishonor him more than he had dishonored himself. 50

But Gethings, the older man, intervened, pulling Annixter back, crying

"Stop, this won't do Not before his father"

"I am no father to this man, gentlemen," exclaimed Magnus "From now on I have but one son You, sir," he turned to Lyman, 'you, sir, leave my house

Lyman, his handkerchief to his lips, his smart cravat in disarray, caught up his hat and coat. He was shaking with fury, his protruding eyes were bloodshot. He swung open the door

"Ruffians," he shouted from the threshold, "ruffians, bullies. Do your own dirty business yourselves after this. I'm done with you. How is it, all of a sudden, you talk about honor? How is it that all at once you're so clean and straight? You weren't so particular at Sacramento just before the nominations. How was the Board elected? I'm a bribe-eater, am 1' Is it any worse than gitting a bribe? Ask Magnus Derrick what he thinks about that. Ask him how much he paid the Democratic bosses at Sacramento to swing the convention."

He went out, slamming the door

Preslev followed. The whole affair made him sick at heart filled him with infinite disgust, infinite weariness. He wished to get away from it all. He left the diningroom and the exerted, clamoring men behind him and stepped out on the porch of the ranch house, closing the door behind him. Lyman was nowhere in sight Presley was alone. It was late, and after the lamp-heated air of the dining-room the coolness of the night was delicious, and its vast silence, after the noise and fury of the committee meeting, descended from the stars like a benediction. Presley stepped to the edge of the porch, looking off to southward.

And there before him, mile after mile, illimitable, covering the earth from horizon to horizon, lay the Wheat The growth, now many days old, was already high from the ground. There it lay, a vast, silent ocean, shimmering a pallid green under the moon and under the stars; a mighty force, the strength of nations, the life of the world. There in the night, under the dome of the sky, 90 it was growing steadily. To Presley's mind, the scene in the room he had just left dwindled to paltry insignificance before this sight. Ah, yes, the Wheat—it was over this that the Railroad, the ranchers, the traitor false to his trust, all the members of an obscure conspiracy, were wrangling. As if human agency could affect this colossal power! What were these heated, tiny squabbles, this feverish, small bustle of mankind, this minute swarming of the human insect, to the great, majestic, silent ocean of the Wheat itself! Indifferent, gigantic, resistless, it moved in its appointed grooves. Men, Liliputians, gnats in the sunshine, buzzed impudently in their tiny battles, were born, lived through their little day, died, and were forgotten, while the Wheat, wrapped in Nirvanic calm, grew steadily under the night, alone with the stars and with God.

[Thus betrayed by the agent whom they had expected to protect them, baffled in every other attempt they make to battle the forces against them, the ranchers are desperate When, at a barbecue, some of the ranchers receive word that they have been dispossessed, open warfare ensues?

from Book II, Chapter VI

OPEN WARFARE

Annixter, Harran, and Presley climbed to the level plateau where the games were to be held, to lay out the courses, and mark the distances. It was the very place where once Presley had loved to lounge entire afternoons, reading his books of poems, smoking and dozing. From this high point one dominated the entire valley to the south and west. The view was superb. The three men paused for a moment on the crest of the hill to consider it.

Young Vacca came running and panting up the hill after them, calling for Annixter

"Well, well, what is it?

"Mr Osterman's looking for you, sir, you and Mr Harran Vanamee, that cowboy over at Derrick's, has just come from the Governor with a message 1 guess it's important"

"Hello, what's up now?" muttered Annixter, as they turned back.

They found Osterman saddling his horse in furious haste. Near by him was Vanamee holding by the bridle an animal that was one lather of sweat. A few of the picnickers were turning their heads curiously in that direction. Evidently something of moment was in the wind.

'What's all up?'' demanded Annixter, as he and Harran, followed by Presley, drew near

"There's hell to pay," exclaimed Osterman under $h_{\rm IS}$ breath "Read that. Vanamee just brought it"

He handed Annixter a sheet of note paper, and turned again to the cinching of his saddle

'We've got to be quick," he cried "They've stolen amarch on us"

Annixter read the note, Harran and Presley looking over his shoulder

'Ah, it's them, is it'" exclaimed Annixter

Harran set his teeth 'Now for it,' he exclaimed

"They've been to your place already, Mr Annixter,' said Vanamee "I passed by it on my way up They have put Delaney in possession, and have set all your furniture out in the road

Annixter turned about, his lips white Already Preslet and Harran had run to their horses

'Vacca," cried Annixter, "where's Vacca? Put the sad dle on the buckskin, quick Osterman, get as many of the League as are here together at *thi*1 spot, understand I'll be back in a minute. I must tell Hilma this."

Hooven ran up as Annixter disappeared His little eyes were blazing he was dragging his horse with him

"Say, dose fellers come, hey? Me I'm alretty, see I hev der guhn"

"They've jumped the ranch, little girl," said Annixer putting one arm around Hilma "They're in our house now I'm off. Go to Derrick's and wait for me there

She put her arms around his neck

"You're going?' she demanded

"I must "Don't be frightened It will be all right to Derrick's and—good-by

She said never a word. She looked once long into his eyes, then kissed him on the mouth

Meanwhile, the news had spread. The multitude rost to its feet. Women and men, with pale faces looked it each other speechless, or broke forth into inarticulitie exclamations. A strange, unfamiliar murmur took the place of the tumultuous gayety of the previous moments. A sense of dread, of confusion, of impending terror weighed heavily in the air. What was now to happen?

When Annixter got back to Osterman, he found a 8 number of the Leaguers already assembled. They were all mounted Hooven was there and Harran, and besides these Garnett of the Ruby rancho and Gethings of the San Pablo, Phelps, the foreman of Los Muertos, and, last of all Dabney, silent as ever, speaking to no one Presley came riding up

Best keep out of this, Pres," cried Annixter. Are we ready?" exclaimed Gethings

Ready, ready, we're all here '

.4// Is this all of us? cried Annixter. "Where are the six hundred men who were going to rise when this happened?"

They had wavered, these other Leaguers. Now, when the actual crisis impended, they were smitten with confusion. Ah, no, they were not going to stand up and be shot at just to save Derrick's land. They were not armed. What did Annixter and Osterman take them for? No, sir the Railroad had stolen a march on them. After all his big talk Derrick had allowed them to be taken by surprise. The only thing to do was to call a meeting of the Executive Committee. That was the only thing. As for going down there with no weapons in their hands, are sir. That was asking a little too much.

Come on, then, boys," shouted Osterman, turning his back on the others. "The Governor says to meet him at Hooven's. We'll make for the Long Trestle and strike the trail to Hooven's there."

They set off It was a terrible ride Twice during the scrambling descent from the hills, Presley's pony fell beneath him Annixter, on his buckskin, and Osterman, on his thoroughbred, good horsemen both, led the others, setting a terrific pace. The hills were left behind. Broderson Creek was crossed and on the levels of Quien Sabe, straight through the standing wheat, the nine horses, pogged and spurred, stretched out to their utmost. Their passage through the wheat sounded like the rip and tear of a gigantic web of cloth. The landscape on either hand resolved itself into a long blur. Tears came to the eyes, flying pebbles, clods of earth, grains of wheat flung up in the flight, stung the face like shot. Osterman's thor-- ouglibred took the second crossing of Broderson Creek in a single leap. Down under the Long Trestle tore the cavalcade in a shower of mud and gravel, up again on the further bank, the horses blowing like steam engines, on into the trail to Hooven's, single file now. Presley's Pony lagging, Hooven's horse bleeding at the eyes, the buckskin, game as a fighting cock, catching her second wind, far in the lead now, distancing even the English thoroughbred that Osterman rode

At last Hooven's unpainted house, beneath the enormous live-oak tree, came in sight Across the Lower so Road, breaking through fences and into the yard around the house, thundered the Leaguers Magnus was waiting for them

The riders dismounted, hardly less exhausted than their horses

"Why, where's all the men?" Annixter demanded of Magnus

"Broderson is here and Cutter," replied the Governor, "no one else I thought you would bring more men with you"

"There are only nine of us"

"And the six hundred Leaguers who were going to rise when this happened!" exclaimed Garnett, bitterly

"Rot the League," cried Annixter "It's gone to pot—went to pieces at the first touch"

"We have been taken by surprise, gentlemen, after all," said Magnus "Totally off our guard. But there are eleven of us. It is enough."

"Well, what's the game, Has the marshal come, How many men are with him?"

"The United States marshal from San Francisco," explained Magnus, "came down early this morning and stopped at Guadalajara. We learned it all through our friends in Bonneville about an hour ago. They telephoned me and Mr Broderson. S. Behrman met him and provided about a dozen deputies. Delancy, Ruggles, and Christian joined them at Guadalajara. They left Guadalajara, going toward. Mr Annixter's ranch house on Quien Sabe. They are serving the writs in ejectment and putting the dummy buyers in possession. They are so armed. S. Behrman is with them."

"Where are they now?"

"Cutter is watching them from the Long Trestle They returned to Guadalajara They are there now."

"Well," observed Gethings, "from Guadalajara they can only go to two places. Either they will take the Upper Road and go on to Osterman's pext, or they will take the Lower Road to Mr. Derrick's."

'That is as I supposed," said Magnus "That is why I wanted you to come here From Hooven's here, we can 90 watch both roads simultaneously"

'Is anybody on the lookout on the Upper Road?"

'Cutter. He is on the Long Trestle."

"Say," observed Hooven, the instincts of the oldtime soldier stirring him, "say, dose feller pretty demn schmart, I tink. We got to put some picket way oudt bei der Lower Roadt alzoh, und he tek dose glassus Mist'r Ennixt'r got bei um. Say, look at dose irregation ditsch. Dot ditsch he run righd across both dose road, hey? Dat's some fine entrenchment, you bedt. We fighd um from dose ditsch."

o In fact, the dry irrigating ditch was a natural trench, admirably suited to the purpose, crossing both roads as Hooven pointed out and barring approach from Guadalajara to all the ranches save Annixter's—which had already been seized

Gethings departed to join Cutter on the Long Trestle, while Phelps and Harran, taking Annixter's field glasses with them, and mounting their horses, went out toward Guadalajara on the Lower Road to watch for the marshal's approach from that direction

After the outposts had left them, the party in Hooven's cottage looked to their weapons. Long since, every member of the League had been in the habit of carrying his revolver with him. They were all armed and, in addition, Hooven had his rifle. Presley alone carried no weapon.

The main room of Hooven's house, in which the Leaguers were now assembled, was barien, poverty-stricken, but tolerably clean. An old clock ticked vociferously on a shelf. In one corner was a bed, with a patched, faded quilt. In the centre of the room, strad-30 dling over the bare floor, stood a pine table. Around this the men gathered two or three occupying chairs. Annixter sitting sidewise on the table, the rest standing

"I believe, gentlemen, said Magnus, "that we can go through this day without bloodshed. I believe not one shot need be fired. The Railroad will not force the issue, will not bring about actual fighting. When the marshal realizes that we are thoroughly in earnest, thoroughly determined, I am convinced that he will withdraw."

There were murmurs of assent

"Look here, said Annixter, it this thing can by any means be settled peaceably. I say let's do it, so long as we don't give in"

The others stared Was this Annixter who spoke the Hotspur of the League, the quarrelsome, irascible fellow who loved and sought a quarrel? Was it Annixter, who now had been the first and only one of them all to suffer, whose ranch had been seized, whose house hold possessions had been flung out into the road?

"When you come right down to it," he continued, "killing a man, no matter what he's done to you, is a serious business. I propose we make one more attempt to stave this thing off. Let's see if we can't get to talk with the marshal himself, at any rate, warn him of the danger of going any further. Boys, let's not fire the first shot. What do you say?"

The others agreed unanimously and promptly, and old Broderson, tugging uneasily at his long beard, added

"No—no—no violence, no unnecessary violence, that is I should hate to have innocent blood on my hands—that is, if it is innocent. I don't know, that S. Behrman e—ah, he is a—a—surely he had innocent blood on hi head. That Dyke affair, terrible, terrible, but then Dyke was in the wrong—driven to it, though, the Railroad did drive him to it. I want to be fair and just to everybody—"

"There's a team coming up the road from Los Muertos," announced Presley from the door

"Fan and just to everybody," murmured old Broderson wagging his head, frowning perplexedly "I don't want to—to—to harin anybody unless they harm me"

"Is the team going toward Guadalajara" inquired Garnett, getting up and coming to the door

"Yes, it's a Portuguese, one of the garden truck men"
"We must turn him back," declared Osterman. He can't go through here. We don't want him to take one news on to the marshal and S. Behrman."

"I'll turn him back, said Presley

He rode out toward the market cart, and the others watching from the road in front of Hoovens, saw him halt it. An excited interview followed. They could be if the Portuguese expostulating volubly but in the end is turned back.

"Martial law on Los Muertos, isn't it?" observed Osterman "Steady all, he exclaimed as he turned about "here comes Harran"

Harran rode up at a gallop The others surrounded him "I saw them, he cried "They are coming this was S Behrman and Ruggles are in a two-horse buggy. All the others are on horseback. There are eleven of them

Christian and Delaney are with them Those two have rifles I left Hooven watching them" Better call in Gethings and Cutter right away," said Annaxter "We'll need all our men"

I'll call them in," Presley volunteered at once "Can I have the buckskin? My pony is about done up"

He departed at a brisk gallop, but on the way met Gethings and Cutter returning They, too, from their elevated position, had observed the marshal's party leaving Guadalajara by the Lower Road Presley told them of the decision of the Leaguers not to fire until fired upon

'All right," said Gethings "But if it comes to a gun-fight, that means it's all up with at least one of us Delaney never misses his man"

When they reached Hooven's again, they found that the Leaguers had already taken their position in the ditch The plank bridge across it had been torn up Magnus, two long revolvers lying on the embankment in front of him, was in the middle, Harran at his side. On either side, some five feet intervening between each man, stood the other Leaguers, their revolvers ready. Dabney, the silent old man, had taken off his coat

"Take your places between Mr Osterman and Mr Broderson," said Magnus, as the three men rode up "Presley," he added, "I forbid you to take any part in this affair"

"Yes, keep him out of it," cried Annixter from his position at the extreme end of the line "Go back to Hooven's house, Pres, and look after the horses," he added "This is no business of yours And keep the road behind us clear Don't let any one come near, not any one, understand?"

Presley withdrew, leading the buckskin and the horses that Gethings and Cutter had ridden. He fastened them under the great live-oak and then came out and stood in the road in front of the house to watch what was going on

In the ditch, shoulder deep, the Leaguers, ready, watchful, waited in silence, their eyes fixed on the white shimmer of the road leading to Guadalajara

Where's Hooven?" inquired Cutter

I don't know," Osterman replied "He was out watching the Lower Road with Harran Derrick Oh, Harran," he called, "isn't Hooven coming in?"

"I don't know what he is waiting for," answered Harran "He was to have come in just after me. He thought maybe the marshal's party might make a feint in this direction, then go around by the Upper Road, after all. He wanted to watch them a little longer. But he ought to be here now

"Think he'll take a shot at them on his own account?" "Oh, no, he wouldn't do that"

"Maybe they took him prisoner"

"Well, that's to be thought of, too"

Suddenly there was a cry Around the bend of the road in front of them came a cloud of dust. From it emerged a horse's head

"Hello, hello, there's something "

"Remember, we are not to fire first'

"Perhaps that's Hooven, I can't see Is it? There only seems to be one horse"

"Too much dust for one horse"

Annixter, who had taken his field glasses from Harran, adjusted them to his eyes

"That's not them," he announced presently, "nor Hooven either That's a cart" Then, after another moment, he added, "The butcher's cart from Guadalajara"

The tension was relaxed The men drew long breaths, settling back in their places

"Do we let him go on, Governor?"

"The bridge is down He can't go by and we must not let him go back We shall have to detain him and gues- 70 tion him I wonder the marshal let him pass"

The cart approached at a lively trot

"Anybody else in that cart, Mr Annixter?" asked Magnus "Look carefully It may be a ruse. It is strange the marshal should have let him pass"

The Leaguers roused themselves again Osterman laid his hand on his revolver

"No," called Annixter, in another instant, "no, there's only one man in it"

The cart came up, and Cutter and Phelps, clambering 80 from the ditch, stopped it as it arrived in front of the party

"Hey-what-what" exclaimed the young butcher. pulling up "Is that bridge broke?"

But at the idea of being held, the boy protested at top voice, badly frightened, bewildered, not knowing what was to happen

"No, no, I got my meat to deliver Say, you let me go Say, I ain't got nothing to do with you"

He tugged at the reins, trying to turn the cart about. 90 Cutter, with his jack-knife, parted the reins just back of the bit

"You'll stay where you are, m' son, for a while We're not going to hurt you But you are not going back to town till we say so. Did you pass anybody on the road out of town?"

In reply to the Leaguers' questions, the young butcher at last told them he had passed a two-horse buggy and a lot of men on horseback just beyond the railroad tracks. They were headed for Los Muertos.

"That's them, all right," muttered Annixter. "They're to coming by this road, sure."

The butcher's horse and cart were led to one side of the road, and the horse tied to the fence with one of the severed lines The butcher himself was passed over to Presley, who locked him in Hooven's barn

"Well, what the devil," demanded Osterman, "has become of Bismarck?"

In fact, the butcher had seen nothing of Hooven. The minutes were passing, and still he failed to appear.

"What's he up to, anyways?"

"Bet you what you like, they caught him. Just like that crazy Dutchman to get excited and go too near You can always depend on Hooven to lose his head"

Five minutes passed, then ten The road toward Guadalajara lay empty, baking and white under the sun "Well, the marshal and S Behrman don't seem to be in any hurry, either"

"Shall I go forward and reconnoure, Governor?" asked Harran

But Dabney, who stood next to Annixter, touched him 30 on the shoulder and, without speaking, pointed down the road Annixter looked, then suddenly cried out

"Here comes Hooven"

The German galloped into sight, around the turn of the road, his rifle laid across his saddle. He came on rapidly, pulled up, and dismounted at the dirch

"Dey're commen," he cried, trembling with excitement "I watch um long dime bei der side oaf der roadt in der busches. Dey shrop bei der gate oder side der relroadt trecks and talk long dime mit one n'udder. Den dey gome on. Dey're gowun sure do zum monkeydoodle pizeness. Me, I see Gritschum put der kertridges in his guhn. I tink they gowun to gome my place first. Dey gowun to try to put me off, tek my home, bei Gott."

"All right, get down in here and keep quiet, Hooven Don't fire unless---"

"Here they are."

A half-dozen voices uttered the cry at once.

There could be no mistake this time A buggy, drawn by two horses, came into view around the curve of the road. Three riders accompanied it, and behind these, seen at intervals in a cloud of dust, were two—three—five—six others.

This, then, was S. Behrman with the United States marshal and his posse. The event that had been so long in preparation, the event which it had been said would never come to pass, the last trial of strength, the last fight between the Trust and the People, the direct, brutal grapple of armed men, the law defied, the Government ignored, behold, here it was close at hand.

Osterman cocked his revolver, and in the profound silence that had fallen upon the scene, the click was plainly audible from end to end of the line.

"Remember our agreement, gentlemen," cried Magnus, in a warning voice "Mr Osterman, I must ask you to ler down the hammer of your weapon"

No one answered In absolute quiet, standing motionless in their places, the Leaguers watched the approach of the marshal

They drew nearer The grind of the buggy wheels in the grit and dust of the road, and the prolonged clatter of the horses' feet began to make itself heard. The Leaguers could distinguish the faces of their enemies.

In the buggy were S Behrman and Cyrus Ruggles, the latter driving A tall man in a frock coat and slouched hat—the marshal, beyond question—rode at the left of the buggy, Delaney, carrying a Winchester, at the right Christian, the real estate broker, S. Behrman's cousin, also with a rifle, could be made out just behind the marshal Back of these, riding well up, was a group of horsemen, indistinguishable in the dust raised by the buggy's wheels

Steadily the distance between the Leaguers and the posse diminished

"Don't let them get too close, Governor," whispered

When S. Behrman's buggy was about one hundred yards distant from the irrigating ditch, Magnus sprang out upon the road, leaving his revolvers behind him. He beckoned Garnett and Gethings to follow, and the three ranchers, who, with the exception of Broderson.

were the oldest men present, advanced, without arms, to meet the marshal.

Magnus cried aloud

"Halt where you are."

From their places in the ditch, Annixter, Osterman, Dabney, Harran, Hooven, Broderson, Cutter, and Phelps, their hands laid upon their revolvers, watched silently, alert, keen, ready for anything

At the Governor's words, they saw Ruggles pull sharply on the reins. The buggy came to a standstill. the riders doing likewise. Magnus approached the marshal, still followed by Garnett and Gethings, and began to speak. His voice was audible to the men in the ditch, but his words could not be made out. They heard the marshal reply quietly enough and the two shook hands Delaney came around from the side of the buggy, his horse standing before the team across the road. He leaned from the saddle, listening to what was being said. but made no remark From time to time. S Behrman and Ruggles, from their seats in the buggy, interposed a sentence or two into the conversation, but at first, so far as the Leaguers could discern, neither Magnus nor the marshal paid them any attention. They saw, however, that the latter repeatedly shook his head and once they heard him exclaim in a loud voice

I only know my duty, Mr Derrick"

Then Gethings turned about, and seeing Delaney close at hand, addressed an unheard remark to him. The cowpuncher replied curtly and the words seemed to anger 3. Gethings. He made a gesture, pointing back to the ditch, showing the intrenched Leaguers to the posse. Delaney appeared to communicate the news that the Leaguers were on hand and prepared to resist, to the other members of the party. They all looked toward the ditch and plainly saw the ranchers there, standing to their arms.

But meanwhile Ruggles had addressed himself more directly to Magnus, and between the two an angry discussion was going forward. Once even Harran heard his father exclaim

"The statement is a lie and no one knows it better than yourself."

"Here," growled Annixter to Dabney, who stood next him in the ditch, "those fellows are getting too close Look at them edging up Don't Magnus see that?"

The other members of the marshal's force had come forward from their places behind the buggy and were spread out across the road Some of them were gathered about Magnus. Garnett, and Gethings; and some were talking together, looking and pointing toward the ditch. Whether acting upon signal or not, the Leaguers in the 50 ditch could not tell, but it was certain that one or two of the posse had moved considerably forward. Besides this, Delaney had now placed his horse between Magnus and the ditch, and two others riding up from the rear had followed his example. The posse surrounded the three ranchers, and by now everybody was talking at once.

"Look here," Harran called to Annixter, "this won't do I don't like the looks of this thing. They all seem to be edging up, and before we know it they may take the 60 Governor and the other men prisoners."

They ought to come back," declared Annixter

"Somebody ought to tell them that those fellows are creeping up

By now the angry argument between the Governor and Ruggles had become more heated than ever Their voices were raised, now and then they made furious gestures

"They ought to come back," cried Osterman "We couldn't shoot now if anything should happen, for fear 70 of hitting them"

"Well, it sounds as though something were going to happen pretty soon"

They could hear Gethings and Delaney wrangling furiously, another deputy joined in Im going to call the Governor back," exclaimed Annixter, suddenly clambering out of the ditch

'No, no," cried Osterman, "keep in the ditch They can't drive us out if we keep here"

Hooven and Harran, who had instinctively followed so Annixter, hesitated at Osterman's words and the three halted irresolutely on the road before the ditch, their weapons in their hands

Governor," shouted Harran, "come on back. You can't do anything "

Still the wrangle continued, and one of the deputies, advancing a little from out the group cried out

'Keep back there' Keep back there, you'"

'Go to hell, will you?' shouted Harran on the instant. "You're on my land"

"Oh, come back here, Harran," called Osterman. "That ain't going to do any good."

"There—listen," suddenly exclaimed Harran "The Governor is calling us Come on, I'm going"

Osterman got out of the ditch and came forward, catching Harran by the arm and pulling him back

"He didn't call Don't get excited You'll ruin everything Get back into the ditch again."

But Cutter, Phelps, and the old man Dabney, misunderstanding what was happening, and seeing Osterman leave the ditch, had followed his example. All the Leaguers were now out of the ditch, and a little way down the road, Hooven, Osterman, Annixter, and Harran in front, Dabney, Phelps, and Cutter coming up from behind.

"Keep back, you," cried the deputy again.

In the group around S Behrman's buggy, Gethings and Delaney were yet quarreling, and the angry debate between Magnus, Garnett, and the marshal still continued

Till this moment, the real estate broker, Christian, had 20 taken no part in the argument, but had kept himself in the rear of the buggy. Now, however, he pushed forward. There was but little room for him to pass, and, as he rode by the buggy, his horse scraped his flank against the hub of the wheel. The animal recoiled sharply, and, striking against Garnett, threw him to the ground. Delancy's horse stood between the buggy and the Leaguers gathered on the road in front of the ditch, the incident, indistinctly seen by them, was misinterpreted.

so Garnett had not yet risen when Hooven raised a great shout

"Hoch, der Kasser! Hoch, der Vaterland!"

With the words he dropped to one knee, and, sighting his rifle carefully, fired into the group of men around the buggy

Instantly the revolvers and rifles seemed to go off of themselves Both sides, deputies and Leaguers, opened fire simultaneously. At first, it was nothing but a confused roar of explosions, then the roar lapsed to an irregular, quick succession of reports, shot leaping after shot; then a moment's silence, and, last of all, regular as clock-ticks, three shots at exact intervals. Then stillness.

Delaney, shot through the stomach, slid down from his horse, and, on his hands and knees, crawled from the road into the standing wheat Christian fell backward from the saddle toward the buggy, and hung suspended in that position, his head and shoulders on the wheel one stiff leg still across his saddle. Hooven, in attemptine to rise from his kneeling position, received a rifle ball squarely in the throat, and rolled forward upon his face Old Broderson crying out, "Oh, they've shot me boys," staggered sideways, his head bent, his hands rigid at his sides, and fell into the ditch. Osterman, blood running from his mouth and nose, turned about and walked back. Presley helped him across the irrigating ditch and Osterman laid himself down, his head on his folded arms Harran Derrick dropped where he stood turning over on his face, and lay motionless, groaning terribly, a pool of blood forming under his stomach a The old man Dabney, silent as ever, received his death speechless He fell to his knees, got up again, fell once more, and died without a word Annixter, instantly killed, fell his length to the ground, and lay without movement, just as he had fallen, one arm across his face

[This bloody conflict marks the end of the struggle of the ranchers The Railroad has been victorious—has rapa crously taken from the tillers of the soil their land. Presley writes in his journal his impressions of the unequal contest and its conclusion.]

from Book II, Chapter VII

PRESLEY'S JOURNAL

Presley did not close his eyes once during the night he did not even remove his clothes. Long after the doctor had departed and that house of tragedy had quieted down, he still remained in his place by the open window of his little room, looking off across the leagues of growing wheat, watching the slow kindling of the dawn Horror weighed intolerably upon him. Monstrous things, huge, terrible, whose names he knew only too well whirled at a gallop through his imagination, or rose spectral and grisly before the eyes of his mind. Harran dead, Annixter dead, Broderson dead, Osterman, perhaps even at that moment dying. Why, these men had made up his world. Annixter had been his best friend, Harran, his almost daily companion, Broderson and Osterman were familiar to him as brothers. They were all his associates, his good friends, the group was his environment, belonging to his daily life. And he, standing there in the dust of the road by the irrigating ditch, had seen them shot. He found himself suddenly at his table, the candle burning at his elbow, his journal before him, writing swiftly, the desire for expression, the craving for ourlet to the thoughts that clamored tumultuous at his brain, never more insistent, more imperious. Thus he wrote

Dabney dead, Hooven dead, Harran dead, Annixter Leid, Broderson dead, Osterman dying, S. Behrman alive, accessful, the Railroad in possession of Quien Sabe I them shot. Not twelve hours since I stood there at the irrigating ditch. Ah, that terrible moment of horror and confusion1 powder smoke—flashing pistol barrels blood stains-rearing horses-men staggering to their death-Christian in a horrible posture, one rigid leg high in the air across his saddle-Broderson falling sidewise into the ditch—Osterman laying himself down, his head on his arms, as if tired, tired out. These things, I have seen them. The picture of this day's work is from henceforth part of my mind, part of me They have done it, S Behrman and the owners of the railroad have done it, while all the world looked on, while the people of these United States looked on Oh, come now and try your theories upon us, us of the ranchos, us, who have suffered, us, who know Oh, talk to us now of the 'rights of Capital,' talk to us of the Trust, talk to us of the equilibrium between the classes Try your ingenious dras upon us We know. I can not tell whether or not your theories are excellent. I do not know if your ideas re plausible. I do not know how practical is your scheme of society. I do not know if the Railroad has a right to our lands, but I do know that Harran is dead, that Annixter is dead, that Broderson is dead, that Hooven is dead, that Osterman is dying and that S. Behrman is alive, successful, triumphant, that he has ridden into possession of a principality over the dead bodies of five men shot down by his hired associates

I can see the outcome The Railroad will prevail. The Trust will overpower us Here in this corner of a great nation, here, on the edge of the continent, here, in his valley of the West, far from the great centres, isoluted, remote, lost, the great iron hand crushes life from us crushes liberty and the pursuit of happiness from us and our little struggles our moment's convulsion of death agony causes not one jar in the vast, clashing machinery of the nation's life, a fleck of grit in the wheels, perhaps, a grain of sand in the cogs—the momentary creak of the axle is the mother's wail of bereavement, so the wifes cry of anguish—and the great wheel turns, spinning smooth again, even again, and the tiny impediment of a second, scarce noticed, is forgotten. Make the people believe that the faint tremor in their great engine is a menace to its function? What a folly to think of it. Tell them of the danger and they will laugh at you. Tell them, five years from now, the story of the fight between the League of the San Joaquin and the Railroad and it will not be believed. What' a pitched battle between Farmer and Railroad, a battle that cost the lives of seven so men? Impossible, it could not have happened. Your story is fiction—is exaggerated.

"Yet it is Lexington-God help us, God enlighten us, God rouse us from our lethargy-it is Lexington, farmers with guns in their hands fighting for Liberty Is our State of California the only one that has its ancient and hereditary foe? Are there no other Trusts between the oceans than this of the Pacific and Southwestern Railroad? Ask yourselves, you of the Middle West, ask yourselves, you of the North, ask yourselves, you of the 70 East, ask yourselves, you of the South-ask yourselves, every citizen of every State from Maine to Mexico, from the Dakotas to the Carolinas, have you not the monster in your boundaries? If it is not a Trust of transportation, it is only another head of the same Hydra. Is not our death struggle typical? Is it not one of many, is it not symbolical of the great and terrible conflict that is going on everywhere in these United States? Ah, you people, blind, bound, tricked, betrayed, can you not see it? Can you not see how the monsters have plundered your treas- 80 ures and holding them in the grip of their iron claws, dole them out to you only at the price of your blood, at the price of the lives of your wives and your little children? You give your babies to Moloch for the loaf of bread you have kneaded yourselves. You offer your starved wives to Juggernaut for the iron nail you have vourselves compounded."

A Neglected Epic

In this plea for a proper literary treatment of an American subject, Norris indicates some of the ideas which impelled him to attempt his epic trilogy, of which The Octopus was a part. The essay was first published in World's Work, December 1902.

Suddenly we have found that there is no longer any Frontier. The westward-moving course of empire has at last crossed the Pacific Ocean Civilization has circled the globe and has come back to its starting point, the vague and mysterious East.

The thing has not been accomplished peacefully From the very first it has been an affair of wars—of invasions Invasions of the East by the West, and of raids North and South—raids accomplished by flying columns that dashed out from both sides of the main army Sometimes even the invaders have fought among themselves, as, for instance, the Trojan War, or the civil wars of Italy, England, and America, sometimes they have turned back on their tracks and, upon one pretext or another, reconquered the races behind them, as for instance Alexander's wars to the eastward, the Crusades, and Napoleon's Egyptian campaigns

Retarded by all these obstacles, the march has been painfully slow. To move from Egypt to Greece took centuries of time. More centuries were consumed in the campaign that brought empire from Greece to Rome, and still more centuries passed before it crossed the Alps and invaded northern and western Europe.

But observe Once across the Mississippi, the West—our Far West—was conquered in about forty years In all the vast campaign from east to west here is the most signal victory, the swiftest, the completest, the most brilliant achievement—the wilderness subdued at a single stroke

Now all these various fightings to the westward, these mysterious race-movements, migrations, wars and wanderings have produced their literature, distinctive, peculiar, excellent. And this literature we call epic. The Trojan War gave us the "Iliad," the "Odyssey," and the "Aeneid," the campaign of the Greeks in Asia Minor produced the "Anabasis," a whole cycle of literature grew from the conquest of Europe after the fall of Rome—"The Song of Roland," "The Nibelungenlied," "The Romance of the Rose," "Beowulf," "Magnusson," "The Scotch Border Ballads," "The Poem of the Cid," "The 4 Hemskringla," "Orlando Furioso," "Jerusalem Delivered," and the like

On this side of the Atlantic, in his clumsy, artificial way, but yet recognized as a producer of literature, Cooper has tried to chronicle the conquest of the eastern part of our country. Absurd he may be in his ideas of life and character, the art in him veneered over with charlatanism, yet the man was solemn enough and took his work seriously, and his work is literature.

Also a cycle of romance has grown up around the s Civil War The theme has had its poets to whom the public have been glad to listen. The subject is vast noble, is, in a word, epic, just as the Trojan War and the Retreat of the Ten Thousand were epic.

But when at last one comes to look for the literature that sprang from and has grown up about the last great epic event in the history of civilization, the event which in spite of stupendous difficulties was consummated more swiftly, more completely, more satisfactorily than any like event since the westward migration began— I mean the conquering of the West, the subduing of the wilderness beyond the Mississippi—what has this produced in the way of literature? The dime novel and nothing else—The dime novel and nothing better

The Trojan War left to posterity the character of Hector, the wars with the Saracens gave us Roland, the folklore of Iceland produced Grettir, the Scotch

I no . . Fronter The disappearance of the frontier was announced by the federal government in 1890, and in 1893 Frederick Jackson Turner published the first significant study of the frontier in our history • 34 Iliad . Odyssey . . Aeneid. These, like others listed, were, as Norris says, epic works—with one exception there was no Magnusson epic Probably Norris' error arose from the fact that Eirikk Magnusson aided William Norris in translating some sagas into English • 54 Retreat Thousand, the defeat of the army of Cyrus at Cunaxa (401 8 C.), reported by Xenophon in his Anabasis • 63 dime novel, a type of cheap thriller written and sold in this country between 1860 and obout 1895 border poetry brought forth Douglas; the Spanish epic the Cid But the American epic, just as heroic, just as elemental, just as important and as picturesque, will fade into history, leaving behind no finer type, no nobler hero than Buffalo Bill.

The young Greeks sat on marble terraces overlooking the Aegean Sea and listened to the thunderous roll of Homer's hexameter. In the feudal castles the ministrel sang to the young boys, of Roland. The farm folk of keland to this very day treasure up and read to their little ones hand-written copies of the Greela Saga chronicling the deeds and death of Grettir the Strong But the youth of the United States learn of their epic by paying a dollar to see the "Wild West Show"

The plain truth of the matter is that we have neglected our epic—the black shame of it be on us—and no contemporaneous poet or chronicler thought it worth his while to sing the song or tell the tale of the West because literature in the day when the West was being won was a cuit indulged in by certain well-bred gentlemen in New England who looked eastward to the Old World, to the legends of England and Norway and Germany and Italy for their inspiration, and left the great, strong, honest, fearless, resolute deeds of their own countrymen to be defamed and defaced by the nameless hacks of the "yellow back" libraries.

One man—who wrote "How Santa Claus Came to Simpson's Bar"—one poet, one chronicler did, in fact, arise for the moment, who understood that wild, brave to life and who for a time gave promise of bearing record of things seen.

One of the requirements of an epic—a true epic—is that its action must devolve upon some great national event. There was no lack of such in those fierce years after '49. Just that long and terrible journey from the Mississippi to the ocean is an epic in itself. Yet no serious attempt has ever been made by an American author to render into prose or verse this event in our history as "national" in scope, in origin and in results as the Revolution itself. The prairie schooner is as large a figure in the legends as the black ship that bore Ulysses homeward from Troy. The sea meant as much to the Argonauts of the fifties as it did to the ten thousand.

And the Alamo! There is a trumpet-call in the word; and only the look of it on the printed page is a flash of fire. But the very histories slight the deed, and to many an American, born under the same flag that the Mexican rifles shot to ribbons on that splendid day, the word is meaningless Yet Thermopylae was less glorious, and in comparison with that siege the investment of Troy was 50 mere wanton riot. At the very least the Texans in that battered adobe church fought for the honour of their flag and the greater glory of their country, not for loot or the possession of the person of an adultress. Young men are taught to consider the "Iliad," with its butcheries, its glorification of inordinate selfishness and vanity, as a classic Achilles, murderer, egotist, ruffian, and liar, is a hero But the name of Bowie, the name of the man who gave his life to his flag at the Alamo, is perpetuated only in the designation of a knife Crockett is the hero of a 60 "funny story" about a sagacious 'coon, while Travis the boy commander who did what Gordon with an empire back of him failed to do, is quietly and definitely agnored

Because we have done nothing to get at the truth about the West, because our best writers have turned to the old-country folklore and legends for their inspiration, because "melancholy harlequins" strut in fringed leggings upon the street-corners, one hand held out for pennies, we have come to believe that our West, our epic, was an affair of Indians, road-ag-nts, and 10 desperadoes, and have taken no account of the brave men who stood for law and justice and liberty, and for those great ideas died by the hundreds, unknown and unsung—died that the West might be subdued, that the last stage of the march should be accomplished, that the Anglo-Saxon should fulfil his destiny and complete the cycle of the world

The great figure of our neglected epic, the Hector of our ignoble Iliad, is not, as the dime novels would have us believe, a lawbreaker, but a lawmaker, a fighter, 80 it is true, as is always the case with epic figures, but a fighter for peace, a calm, grave, strong man who hated the lawbreaker as the hound hates the wolf

He did not lounge in barrooms, he did not cheat at cards, he did not drink himself to maudlin fury, he did not "shoot at the drop of the hat" But he loved his horse, he loved his friend, he was kind to little children, he was always ready to side with the weak against the strong, with the poor against the rich. For hypocrisy, and pretense, for shams and subterfuges, he had no mercy, no tolerance. He was too brave to lie and too strong to steal. The odds in that lawless day were ever against him, his enemies were many and his friends were few, but his face was always set bravely against evil, and fear was not in him even at the end. For such a man as this could die no quiet death in a land where law went no further than the statute books and life lay in the crook of his neighbour's forefinger.

He died in defense of an ideal, an epic hero, a legendary figure, formidable, sad. He died facing down injustice, dishonesty, and crime, died "in his boots, and the same world which has glorified Achilles and forgotten Travis finds none too poor to do him reverence. No literature has sprung up around him—this great character native to America. He is of all the world-types the one distinctive to us—peculiar, particular and unique. He is dead and even his work is misinterpreted ind misunderstood. His very memory will soon be gone, and the American epic, which, on the shelves of posterity, should have stood shoulder to shoulder with the "Hemskringla" and the "Tales of the Nibelungen and the "Song of Roland," will never be written

A Plea for Romantic Fiction

Readers who believe that such terms as "realism" and "romanticism" have had unchanging definitions throughout their history will be puzzled by this plea. The fact of the matter, of course, is that both terms have been used by critics and authors with a variety of denotations. Here, as Norris urges "romantic" writing, defining the term in his own individual way, he offers insight not only into the nature of critical controversies of the day but also into his own objectives and methods as an author

Let us at the start make a distinction. Observe that one speaks of romanticism and not of sentimentalism. One claims that the latter is as distinct from the former as is that other form of art which is called Realism. Romance has been often put upon and overburdened by being forced to bear the onus of abuse that by right should fall to sentiment, but the two should be kept very distinct, for a very high and illustrious place will be claimed for romance, while sentiment will be handed to down the scullery stairs.

Many people to-day are composing mere sentimentalism, and calling it and causing it to be called romance. so with those who are too busy to think much upon these subjects, but who none the less love honest literature, Romance, too, has fallen into disrepute. Consider now the cut-and-thrust stories. They are all labeled Romances, and it is very easy to get the impression that Romance must be an affair of cloaks and daggers, or moonlight and golden hair But this is not so at all The true Romance is a more serious business than this a It is not merely a conjurer's trick-box full of flimsy quackeries, tinsel and claptraps, meant only to amuse and relying upon deception to do even that Is it not something better than this? Can we not see in it an instrument, keen, finely tempered, flawless-an instrument with which we may go straight through the clothes and tissues and wrappings of flesh down deep into the red, living heart of things?

Is all this too subtle, too merely speculative and intrinsic, too preciouse and nice and "literary"? Devoutly one hopes the contrary So much is made of so-called Romanticism in present-day fiction that the subject seems worthy of discussion, and a protest against the misuse of a really noble and honest formula of literature appears to be timely—misuse, that is, in the sense of a limited use. Let us suppose for the moment that a romance can be made out of a cut-and-thrust business.

Heavens, are there no other things that are romantic, even in this—falsely, falsely called—humdrum world of today? Why should it be that so soon as the novelist addresses himself—seriously—to the consideration of contemporary life he must abandon Romance and take up the harsh, loveless, colourless, blunt tool called Realism?

Now, let us understand at once what is meant by Romance and what by Realism Romance, I take it, is the kind of fiction that takes cognizance of variations from the type of normal life Realism is the kind of fiction that confines itself to the type of normal life According to this definition, then, Romance may even treat of the sordid, the unlovely—as for instance, the novels of M Zola (Zola has been dubbed a Realist, but he is, on the contrary, the very head of the Romanticists) Also, Realism, used as it sometimes is as a term of reproach, need not be in the remotest sense or degree offensive, but on the other hand respectable as a church and proper as a deacon—as, for instance, the novels of Mr. Howells

The reason why one claims so much for Romance. and quarrels so pointedly with Realism, is that Realism stultifies itself. It notes only the surface of things. For it Beauty is not even skin deep, but only a geometrical pline, without dimensions and depth, a mere outside. Realism is very excellent so far as it goes, but it goes no turther than the Realist himself can actually see, or actually hear Realism is minute, it is the drama of a broken teacup, the tragedy of a walk down the block, so the excitement of an afternoon call, the adventure of an invitation to dinner It is the visit to my neighbour's house, a formal visit, from which I may draw no conclusions I see my neighbour and his friends-very, oh, such very! probable people-and that is all. Realism bows upon the doormat and goes away and says to me, as we link arms on the sidewalk "That is life" And I say it is not. It is not, as you would very well see if you took Romance with you to call upon your neighbour.

Lately you have been taking Romance a weary journey across the water—ages and the flood of years—and haling her into the fuzzy, musty, worm-eaten, moth-riddled, rust-corroded "Grandes Salles" of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, and she has found the drama of a bygone age for you there. But would you take her across the street to your neighbour's front parlour (with the bisque fisher-boy on the mantel and the photograph of Niagara Falls on glass hanging in the front window); would you introduce her there? Not you. Would you take a walk with her on Fifth Avenue, or Beacon Street, or Michigan Avenue? No, indeed Would you choose so her for a companion of a morning spent in Wall Street, or an afternoon in the Waldorf-Astoria? You just guess you would not

She would be out of place, you say—inappropriate She might be awkward in my neighbour's front parlour, and knock over the little bisque fisher-boy. Well, she might If she did, you might find underneath the base of the statuette, hidden away, tucked away—what? God knows. But something that would be a complete revelation of my neighbour's secretest life.

So you think Romance would stop in the front parlour and discuss medicated flannels and mineral waters with the ladies? Not for more than five minutes. She would be off upstairs with you, prying, peeping, peering into the closets of the bedroom, into the nursery, into the sitting-room, yes, and into that little iron box screwed to the lower shelf of the closet in the library, and into those compartments and pigeon-holes of the secretaire in the study She would find a heartache (maybe) between the pillows of the mistress's bed, and a memory carefully 70 secreted in the master's deed-box. She would come upon a great hope amid the books and papers of the study-table of the young man's room, and-perhapswho knows-an affair, or, great Heavens, an intrigue, in the scented ribbons and gloves and hairpins of the young lady's bureau And she would pick here a little and there a little, making up a bag of hopes and fears and a package of joys and sorrows-great ones, mind you-and then come down to the front door, and, stepping out into the street, hand you the bags and 80 package and say to you-"That is Life!"

Romance does very well in the castles of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance chateaux, and she has the entree there and is very well received. That is all well and good. But let us protest against limiting her to such places and such times. You will find her, I grant you, in the chatelaine's chamber and the dungeon of the man-at-arms, but, if you choose to 'ook for her, you will find her equally at home in the brownstone house on the corner and in the office-building downtown. And we

this very day, in this very hour, she is sitting among the rags and wretchedness, the dirt and despair of the tenements of the East Side of New York

"What?" I hear you say, "look for Romance-the lady of the silken robes and golden crown, our beautiful, chaste maiden of soft voice and gentle eyes-look for her among the vicious ruffians, male and female, of Allen Street and Mulberry Bend," I tell you she is there, and to your shame be it said you will not know her in those 10 surroundings. You, the aristocrats, who demand the fine linen and the purple in your fiction, you, the sensitive, the delicate, who will associate with your Romance only so long as she wears a silken gown. You will not follow her to the slums, for you believe that Romince should only amuse and entertain you, singing you sweet songs and touching the harp of silver strings with rosy-tipped fingers If haply she should call to you from the squalour of a dive, or the awful degradation of a disorderly house, crying "Look! listen! This, too, is life. These, too, are 20 my children! Look at them, know them and, knowing, help!" Should she call thus you would stop your ears, you would avert your eyes and you would answer, "Come from there, Romance Your place is not there!" And you would make of her a harleguin, a tumbler, a sword-dancer, when, as a matter of fact, she should be by right divine a teacher sent from God

She will not often wear the robe of silk, the gold crown, the jeweled shoon, will not always sweep the silver harp. An iron note is hers if so she choose, and coarse garments, and stained hands, and, meeting her thus, it is for you to know her as she passes—know her for the same young queen of the blue mantle and lilies. She can teach you if you will be humble to learn—teach you by showing. God help you if at last you take from Romance her mission of teaching, if you do not believe that she has a purpose—a nobler purpose and a mightier than mere amusement, mere entertainment. Let Realism do the entertaining with its meticulous presentation of teacups, rag carpets, wall-paper and haircloth sofas stopping with these, going no deeper than it sees, choosing the ordinary, the untroubled, the commonplace

But to Romance belongs the wide world for range, and the unplumbed depths of the human heart, and the mystery of sex, and the problems of life, and the black, unsearched penetralia of the soul of man. You, the indolent, must not always be amused. What matter the silken clothes, what matter the prince's houses? Romance, too, is a teacher, and if—throwing aside the purple—she wears the camel's-hair and feeds upon the locusts it is to cry aloud unto the people, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight his path."

Theodore Dreiser

1871 · 1945

Theodore Dreiser was our first full-fledged naturalist in fiction Although Frederic, Crane, and Norris had pioneered in the naturalistic direction, a fully developed naturalism did not appear in the American novel until Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie: for the first time in American fiction, the actions of the characters were determined entirely by "natural" causes

The twelfth in a family of thirteen children, Dreiser was born in 1871, in Terre Haute, Indiana, where his father, a German emigrant, was proprietor of a woolen mill The burning of the mill, which was not insured, left the family in extreme poverty. Dreiser's formal schooling was received in an Indiana high school and at Indiana University, where he stayed only one year because he felt that the curriculum "did not concern ordinary life at all " More useful than college to Dreiser were various odd jobs in Chicago-washing dishes in a restaurant, shoveling coal in a railroad yard, working in a hardware factory, collecting bills for a furniture store. Valuable also to the future novelist were his experiences as a reporter on the Chicago Globe and on other newspapers in St Louis, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and New York His newspaper career extended until about 1905 For a while he was connected with certain "pulp' magazines, and from 1907 to 1910 he was editor of The Delineator. But jobs like these were necessary to pay expenses, his novels brought him little money for many vears. In the meantime, he had married but did not find marriage to his liking "It was a binding state," he said, "and I was not to be bound. I begged her to set me free, and she did" Perhaps he depicts in the story 'Free" the tragedy which he felt he had escaped

For more than twenty years, Dreiser was the center of a great controversy. His books were condemned as immoral" Sister Carrie, though printed in 1900, was not released for sale in America until 1906. His second novel, Jennie Gerhardt (1911), like Sister Carrie, was objected to because it told a story of unconventional sex relationships. Dreiser did not hold up Carrie or Jennie as examples for other girls to follow, nor did he treat sex salaciously, but conventional moralists found objectionable his sympathetic attitude toward his characters and his failure to mete out the usual rewards and punishments The Financies (1912) and The Titan (1914), which describe the unscrupulous career of Frank Cowperwood, were attacked with especial violence by Stuart P Sherman ("The Barbaric Naturalism of Theodore Dreiser, On Contemporary Literature, 1918) who declared, 'Dreiser has just two things to tell us about Cowperwood that he has a rapacious appetite for money, and that he has a rapacious appetite for women' The Gentus" (1915), an inferior and innocuous work, was suppressed for eight years. Dreiser's champions, chief among whom was H L Mencken, editor of The Smart Set, defended him ably, but the attack continued until 1925 the year of The American Tragedy Although The American Tragedy was not radically different from its predecessors, it was an instantaneous success. No more striking evidence can be cited of the change in the intellectual and moral atmosphere of postwar America Mencken could put up his bright sword

It is easy to point out weaknesses in Dreiser's novels he lacks a sense of humor, his prose is pedestrian, the piling up of detail often makes for dull reading But his work is important, both historically and intrinsically.

No other American novelist has documented his stories quite so carefully or has written a social record of American life so convincingly authentic. No other American novelist has treated his subjects so sympathetically. Human actions, to Dreiser, are largely the result of social forces from without, and of chemical forces from within. Men and women, therefore, are not too much to blame for what they are and do. There is no satire or cynicism or smartness in Dreiser, no prurient exploitation of sex, no manipulation of plot or trick of style He recorded life as he saw it—with naturalness candor, and compassion. Sherwood Anderson wrote in 1921 "Theodore Dreiser is a man who, with the passage of time, is bound to loom larger and larger in the awakening aesthetic consciousness of America" The prophecy is already fulfilled

The Second Choice

Although Dreiser can be best appreciated in the mass, a short story like "The Second Choice" illustrates well enough the essential characteristics of his work prosaic, commonplace detail, a plodding style, a compassion which may easily be mistaken for sentimentality but which at its best has a genuine poignance, a natural narrative method free from trick or artifice. The last named characteristic is of special importance, for it marks Dreiser's break with the traditional short story in America. The traditional short story, as written by Poe, Bret Harte, and O. Herry, seemed meretricious to Dreiser and his followers because it sacrificed realism to artifice of plot and the surprise ending "The Second Choice" does not properly end at all. Shirley simply "proceeded to set the table."

"The Second Choice" is taken from Free and Other Stories, published in 1918, but it is similar to the work which, before 1914, made Dreiser an important force in American fiction.

Shirley Dear

You don't want the letters There are only six of them, anyhow, and think, they're all I have of you to cheer me on my travels What good would they be to you—

little bits of notes telling me you're sure to meet me but me—think of me¹ If I send them to you, you'll tear them up, whereas if you leave them with me I can dab them with musk and ambergris and keep them in a little silver box, always beside me

Ah, Shirley dear, you really don't know how sweet I think you are, how dear! There isn't a thing we have ever done together that isn't as clear in my mind as this great big skyscraper over the way here in Pittsburgh and far more pleasing. In fact, my thoughts of you are the most precious and delicious things I have, Shirley

But I'm too young to marry now. You know that Shirley, don't you? I haven't placed myself in any way yet, and I'm so restless that I don't know whether I ever will, really. Only yesterday, old Roxbaum—that's minew employer here—came to me and wanted to know if I would like an assistant overseership on one of his coffee plantations in Java, said there would not be much money in if for a year or two, a bare living, but later there would be more—and I jumped at it. Just the thought of Java and going there did that, although I knew I could make more staying right here. Can't you see how it is with me Shirl? I'm too restless and too young. I couldn't take care of you right, and you wouldn't like me after a while if I didn't.

But ah, Shirley sweet, I thinl, the dearest things of you' There isn't an hour, it seems, but some little bit of you comes back—a dear, sweet bit—the night we sat on the grass in Tregore Park and counted the stars through the trees, that first evening at Sparrows Point when we missed the last train and had to walk to Langley Remember the tree-toads, Shirl? And then that warm April Sunday in Atholby woods! Ah, Shirl, you don't want the six notes! Let me keep them But think of me, will you, sweet, wherever you go and whatever you do? I'll always think of you, and wish that you had met a better, saner man than me, and that I really could have married you and been all you wanted me to be. By-by, sweet I may start for Java within the month If so and you would want them, I'll send you some cards from there—if they have any

Your worthless

ARTHUR.

She sat and turned the letter in her hand, dumb with despair. It was the very last letter she would ever get from him. Of that she was certain. He was gone now, once and for all. She had written him only once, not miking an open plea but asking him to return her letters, and then there had come this tender but evasive teply saying nothing of a possible return but desiring to keep her letters for old times' sake—the happy hours they had spent together.

The happy hours! Oh, yes, yes, yes—the happy hours! In her memory now, as she sat here in her home after the day's work, meditating on all that had been in the few short months since he had come and gone, was a world of color and light—a color and light so transfiguring as to seem celestial, but now, alas, wholly dissipated It had contained so much of all she had desired—love. romance, amusement, laughter He had been so gay and thoughtless, or headstrong, so youthfully romantic, and with such a love of play and change and to be saving and doing anything and everything. Arthur could dance in a gay way, whistle, sing after a fashion, play He could play cards and do tricks, and he had such a superior air, so genial and brisk, with a kind of innate courtesy in it and yet an intolerance for slowness and stedginess or anything dull or dingy, such as characterized-But here her thoughts fled from him She refused to think of any one but Arthur

Sitting in her little bedroom now, off the parlor on the ground floor in her home in Bethune Street, and sheing out over the Kessels' yard, and beyond that—there being no fences in Bethune Street—over the sards' or lawns of the Pollards, Bakers, Cryders, and others, she thought of how dull it must all have seemed to him, with his fine imaginative mind and experiences, his love of change and gaiety, his atmosphere of something better than she had ever known. How little she had been fitted, perhaps, by beauty or temperament to overcome this—the something—dullness in her work or her home, which possibly had driven him away. For, although many had admired her to date, and she was 50 young and pretty in her simple way and constantly receiving suggestions that her beauty was disturbing to some, still, he had not cared for her—he had gone

And now, as she meditated, it seemed that this scene. and all that it stood for-her parents, her work, her daily shuttling to and fro between the drug company for which she worked and this street and house-was typical of her life and what she was destined to endure always Some girls were so much more fortunate. They had fine clothes, fine homes, a world of pleasure and op- 60 portunity in which to move They did not have to scrimp and save and work to pay their own way. And yet she had always been compelled to do it, but had never complained until now-or until he came, and after Bethune Street, with its commonplace front yards and houses nearly all alike, and this house, so like the others, room for room and porch for porch, and her parents, too, really like all the others, had seemed good enough, quite satisfactory, indeed, until then But now,

Here, in their kitchen, was her mother, a thin, pale, but kindly woman, peeling potatoes and washing lettuce, and putting a bit of steak or a chop or a piece of liver in a frying pan day after day, morning and evening, month after month, year after year. And next door was Mrs Kessel doing the same thing And next door Mrs Cryder And next door Mrs Pollard But, until now, she had not thought it so bad But now-now-oh! And on all the porches or lawns all along this street were the husbands and fathers, mostly middle-aged or 80 old men like her father, reading their papers or cutting the grass before dinner, or smoking and meditating afterward Her father was out in front now, a stooped, forbearing, meditative soul, who had rarely anything to say-leaving it all to his wife, her mother, but who was fond of her in his dull, quiet way He was a patternmaker by trade, and had come into possession of this small, ordinary home via years of toil and saving, her mother helping him. They had no particular religion, as he often said thinking reasonably human conduct a 90 sufficient passport to heaven, but they had gone occasionally to the Methodist Church over in Nicholas Street, and she had once joined it. But of late she had not gone, weaned away by the other commonplace pleasures of her world.

And then in the midst of it, the dull drift of things, as she now saw them to be, he had come—Arthur Bristow—young, energetic, good-looking, ambitious, dreamful, and instanter, and with her never knowing quite how, the whole thing had been changed. He had 10 appeared so swiftly—out of nothing, as it were

Previous to him had been Barton Williams, stout, phlegmatic, good-natured, well-meaning, who was, or had been before Arthur came, asking her to marry him, and whom she allowed to half assume that she would She had liked him in a feeble, albeit, as she thought, tender way, thinking him the kind, according to the logic of her neighborhood, who would make her a good husband, and, until Arthur appeared on the scene, had really intended to marry him. It was not really a love-20 match, as she saw now, but she thought it was, which was much the same thing, perhaps. But, as she now recalled, when Arthur came, how the scales fell from her eyes! In a trice, as it were, nearly, there was a new heaven and a new earth. Arthur had arrived, and with him a sense of something different.

Mabel Gove had asked her to come over to her house in Westleigh, the adjoining suburb, for Thanksgiving eve and day, and without a thought of anything, and because Barton was busy handling a part of the work 30 in the despatcher's office of the Great Eastern and could not see her, she had gone And then, to her surprise and strange, almost meffable delight, the moment she had seen him, he was there-Arthur, with his slim, straight figure and dark hair and eyes and clean-cut features, as clean and attractive as those of a coin. And as he had looked at her and smiled and narrated humorous bits of things that had happened to him, something had come over her-a spell-and after dinner they had all gone round to Edith Barringer's to dance, and there as she 40 had danced with him, somehow, without any seeming boldness on his part, he had taken possession of her, as it were, drawn her close, and told her she had beautiful eyes and hair and such a delicately rounded chin, and that he thought she danced gracefully and was sweet She had nearly fainted with delight

"Do you like me?" he had asked in one place in the dance, and, in spite of herself, she had looked up into his eyes, and from that moment she was almost mad over him, could think of nothing else but his hair and eyes and his smile and his graceful figure

Mabel Gove had seen it all, in spite of her determination that no one should, and on their going to bed later, back at Mabel's home, she had whispered

"Ah, Shirley, I saw You like Arthur, don't you?"

'I think he's very nice," Shirley recalled replying, for Mabel knew of her affair with Barton and liked him 'but I'm not crazy over him." And for this bit of treason she had sighed in her dreams nearly all night

And the next day, true to a request and a promise made by him, Arthur had called again at Mabel's to take her and Mabel to a "movie" which was not so far away, and from there they had gone to an ice-cream parlor, and during it all, when Mabel was not looking, he had squeezed her arm and hand and kissed her neck, and she had held her breath, and her heart had seemed to stop

"And now you're going to let me come out to your place to see you, aren't you?" he had whispered

And she had replied, "Wednesday evening," and then written the address on a little piece of paper and given it to him

But now it was all gone, gone!

This house, which now looked so dreary-how romantic it had seemed that first night be called-the front room with its commonplace furniture, and later in the spring, the veranda, with its vines just sprouting, and the moon in May Oh, the moon in May, and June and July, when he was here! How she had lied to Barton to make evenings for Arthur, and occasionally to Arthur to keep him from contact with Barton. She had not even mentioned Barton to Arthur because-becausewell, because Arthur was so much better, and somehow (she admitted it to herself now) she had not been sure that Arthur would care for her long, if at all, and then -well, and then, to be quite frank, Barton might be good enough. She did not exactly hate him because she had found Arthur-not at all She still liked him in a way-he was so kind and faithful, so very dull and straightforward and thoughtful of her, which Arthur was certainly not Before Arthur had appeared, as she well remembered, Barton had seemed to be plenty good > enough—in fact, all that she desired in a pleasant, companionable way, calling for her, taking her places, bringing her flowers and candy, which Arthur rarely did, and for that, if nothing more, she could not help continuing to like him and to feel sorry for him, and, besides, as she had admitted to herself before, if Arthur left her—Weren't his parents better off than hers—and hadn't he a good position for such a man as he—one hundred and fifty dollars a month and the certainty of more later on? A little while before meeting Arthur, she had thought this very good, enough for two to live on at least, and she had thought some of trying it at some time or other—but now—now—

And that first night he had called-how well she remembered it-how it had transfigured the parlor next this in which she was now, filling it with something it had never had before, and the porch outside, too, for that matter, with its gaunt, leafless vine, and this street, too, even-dull, commonplace Bethune Street There had been a flurry of snow during the afternoon while she was working at the store, and the ground was white with it. All the neighboring homes seemed to look sweeter and happier and more inviting than ever they had as she came past them, with their lights peeping from under curtains and drawn shades. She had hurried into hers and lighted the big red-shaded parlor lamp, her one artistic treasure, as she thought, and put it near the piano, between it and the window, and arranged the chairs, and then bustled to the task of making herself as pleasing as she might. For him she had gotten out her one best filmy house dress and done up her hair in the fashion she thought most becoming-and that he had not seen before-and powdered her cheeks and nose and darkened her evelashes, as some of the girls at the store did, and put on her new gray satin slippers. and then, being so arrayed, waited nervously, unable to eat anything or to think of anything but him

And at last, just when she had begun to think he might not be coming, he had appeared with that arch smile and a "Hello' It's here you live, is it? I was wondering. George, but you're twice as sweet as I thought you were, aren't you?" And then, in the little entryway, behind the closed door, he had held her and kissed her on the mouth a dozen times while she pretended to push against his coat and struggle and say that her parents might hear

made handsomer thereby, as she thought! He had made her sit near him and had held her hands and told her about his work and his dreams—all that he expected to do in the future—and then she had found herself wishing intensely to share just such a life—his life—anything that he might wish to do, only, she kept wondering, with a slight pain, whether he would want her to—he was so young, dreamful, ambitious, much younger and more dreamful than herself, although, in reality, he was several years older

And then followed that glorious period from December to this late September, in which everything which was worth happening in love had happened. Oh, those wondrous days the following spring, when, with the 60 first burst of buds and leaves, he had taken her one Sunday to Atholby, where all the great woods were, and they had hunted spring beauties in the grass, and sat on a slope and looked at the river below and watched some boys fixing up a sailboat and setting forth in it quite as she wished she and Arthur might be doinggoing somewhere together-far, far away from all commonplace things and life! And then he had slipped his arm about her and kissed her cheek and neck, and tweaked her ear and smoothed her hair—and oh, there 70 on the grass, with the spring flowers about her and a canopy of small green leaves above, the perfection of love had come-love so wonderful that the mere thought of it made her eyes brim now! And then had been days, Saturday afternoons and Sundays, at Atholby and Sparrows Point, where the great beach was, and in lovely Tregore Park, a mile or two from her home, where they could go of an evening and sit in or near the pavilion and have ice-cream and dance or watch the dancers. Oh. the stars, the winds, the summer breath of those days! 80 Ah, me! Ah, me!

Naturally, her parents had wondered from the first about her and Arthur, and her and Barton, since Barton had already assumed a proprietary interest in her and she had seemed to like him. But then she was an only child and a pet, and used to presuming on that, and they could not think of saying anything o her. After all, she was young and pretty and was entitled to change her mind, only, only—she had had to indulge in a career of lying and subterfuge in connection with Barton, since Arthur was headstrong and wanted every evening that he chose—to call for her at the store and keep her downtown to dinner and a show

Arthur had never been like Barton, shy, phlegmatic, obedient, waiting long and patiently for each little favor. but, instead, masterful and eager, rifling her of kisses and caresses and every delight of love, and teasing and 10 playing with her as a cat would a mouse. She could never resist him. He demanded of her her time and her affection without let or hindrance. He was not exactly selfish or cruel, as some might have been, but gay and unthinking at times, unconsciously so, and yet loving and tender at others-nearly always so But always he would talk of things in the future as if they really did not include her-and this troubled her greatly-of places he might go, things he might do, which, somehow, he seemed to think or assume that she could not or would not do with 20 him He was always going to Australia sometime, he thought, in a business way, or to South Africa, or possibly to India He never seemed to have any fixed clear future for himself in mind

A dreadful sense of helplessness and of impending disaster came over her at these times, of being involved in some predicament over which she had no control, and which would lead her on to some sad end Arthur, although plainly in love, as she thought, and apparently delighted with her, might not always love her. She 30 began, timidly at first (and always, for that matter), to ask him pretty, seeking questions about himself and her, whether their future was certain to be together, whether he really wanted her-loved her-whether he might not want to marry some one else or just her, and whether she wouldn't look nice in a pearl satin weddingdress with a long creamy veil and satin slippers and a bouquet of bridalwreath. She had been so slowly but surely saving to that end, even before he came, in connection with Barton, only, after he came, all thought 40 of the import of it had been transferred to him. But now, also, she was beginning to ask herself sadly, "Would it ever be?" He was so airy, so inconsequential, so ready to say "Yes, yes," and "Sure, sure' That's right' Yes, indeedy, you bet' Say, kiddie, but you'll look sweet!" but, somehow, it had always seemed as if this whole thing were a glorious interlude and that it could not last Arthur was too gay and ethereal and too little settled in his own mind. His ideas of travel and living in different cities, finally winding up in New York of San Francisco, but never with her exactly until she asked him, were too ominous, although he always reassured her gaily "Of course! Of course!" But somehow she could never believe it really, and it made her intensely sad at times, horribly gloomy. So often she wanted to cry, and she could scarcely tell why

And then, because of her affection for him, she had finally quarreled with Barton, or nearly that, if one could say that one ever really quarreled with him It had been because of a certain Thursday evening a few weeks before about which she had disappointed him. In . a fit of generosity, knowing that Arthur was coming Wednesday, and because Barton had stopped in at the store to see her, she had told him that he might come having regretted it afterward, so enamored was she of Arthur And then when Wednesday came, Arthur had changed his mind, telling her he would come Friday instead, but on Thuisday evening he had stopped in at the store and asked her to go to Sparrows Point, with the result that she had no time to notify Barton. He had gone to the house and sat with her parents until tenthirty, and then, a few days later, although she had written him offering an excuse, had called at the store to complain slightly

"Do you think you did just right Shirley? You might have sent word, mightn't you? Who was it—the new fellow you won't tell me about?"

Shirley flared on the instant

"Supposing it was? What's it to you? I don't belong to you yet, do I? I told you there wasn't any one, and I wish you'd let me alone about that I couldn't help it: last Thursday—that's all—and I don't want you to be fussing with me—that's all If you don't want to, you needn't come any more, anyhow."

"Don't say that. Shirley," pleaded Barton "You don't mean that I won't bother you, though, if you don't want me any more"

And because Shirley sulked, not knowing what else to do, he had gone and she had not seen him since

And then sometime later when she had thus broken with Barton, avoiding the railway station where he worked, Arthur had failed to come at his appointed time, sending no word until the next day, when a note came to the store saying that he had been out of town for his firm over Sunday and had not been able to notify her but that he would call Tuesday. It was an awful blow At the time, Shirley had a vision of what was to follow. It seemed for the moment as if the whole world had suddenly been reduced to ashes, that there was nothing but black charred cinders anywhere—she felt that about all life. Yet it all came to her clearly then that this was but the beginning of just such days and just such excuses, and that soon, soon, he would come no more He was beginning to be tired of her and soon he would not even make excuses. She felt it, and it froze and terrified her.

And then, soon after, the indifference which she feared did follow-almost created by her own thoughts, as it were First, it was a meeting he had to attend somewhere one Wednesday night when he was to have come for her. Then he was going out of town again, over Sunday. Then he was going away for a whole week -it was absolutely unavoidable, he said, his commercial duties were increasing-and once he had casually remarked that nothing could stand in the way where she was concerned-never! She did not think of reproaching him with this, she was too proud. If he was going, he must go She would not be willing to say to herself that she had ever attempted to hold any man. But, just the same, she was agonized by the thought. When he was with her, he seemed tender enough, only, at times, his eyes wandered and he seemed slightly bored. Other o girls, particularly pretty ones, seemed to interest him as much as she did

And the agony of the long days when he did not come any more for a week or two at a time! The waiting, the brooding, the wondering, at the store and here in her home—in the former place making mistakes at times because she could not get her mind off him and being reminded of them, and here at her own home at nights, being so absent-minded that her parents remarked on it. She felt sure that her parents must be noticing that of Arthur was not coming any more, or as much as he had—for she pretended to be going out with him, going to Mabel Gove's instead—and that Barton had deserted her too, he having been driven off by her indifference, never to come any more, perhaps, unless she sought him out.

And then it was that the thought of saving her own face by taking up with Barton once more occurred to her, of using him and his affections and faithfulness and dullness, if you will, to cover up her own dilemma. Only, this ruse was not to be tried until she had written so Arthur this one letter—a pretext merely to see if there was a single ray of hope, a letter to be written in a gentle-enough way and asking for the return of the few notes she had written him. She had not seen him now in nearly a month, and the last time she had, he had said he might soon be compelled to leave her awhile—to go to Pittsburgh to work. And it was his reply to this that she now held in her hand—from Pittsburgh! It was frightful! The future without him!

But Barton would never know really what had 60 transpired, if she went back to him. In spite of all her delicious hours with Arthur, she could call him back, she felt sure. She had never really entirely dropped him, and he knew it. He had bored her dreadfully on occasion, arriving on off days when Arthur was not about, with flowers or candy, or both, and sitting on the porch steps and talking of the railroad business and of the whereabouts and doings of some of their old friends. It was shameful, she had thought at times, to see a man so patient, so hopeful, so good-natured as Barton, deceived in this way, and by her, who was so miserable over another. Her parents must see and know, she had thought at these times, but still, what else was she to do?

"I'm a bad girl," she kept telling herself "I'm all wrong What right have I to offer Barton what is left?" But still, somehow, she realized that Barton, if she chose to favor him, would only be too grateful for even the leavings of others where she was concerned, and that even yet, if she but deigned to crook a finger, she could have him. He was so simple, so good-natured, so stolid and matter of fact, so different to Arthur whom (she could not help smiling at the thought of it) she was loving now about as Barton loved her—slavishly, hopelessly

And then, as the days passed and Arthur did not write any more—just this one brie! note—she at first grieved horribly, and then in a fit of numb despair attempted, bravely enough from one point of view, to adjust herself to the new situation. Why should she of despair? Why die of agony where there were plenty who would still sigh for her—Barton among others? She was young, pretty, very—many told her so. She could, if she chose, achieve a vivacity which she did not feel. Why should she brook this unkindness without a thought of retaliation? Why shouldn't she enter upon a gay and heartless career, indulging in a dozen flirtations at once—dancing and killing all thoughts of Arthur in a round of frivolities? There were many who beckoned to her. She stood at her counter in the drug store on many a day and brooded over this, but at the thought of which one to begin with, she faltered. After her late love, all were so tame, for the present anyhow.

And then—and then—always there was Barton, the humble or faithful, to whom she had been so unkind and whom she had used and whom she still really liked. So often self-reproaching thoughts in connection with him crept over her. He must have known, must have seen how badly she was using him all this while, and yet he had not failed to come and come, until she had actually quarreled with him, and any one would have seen that it was literally hopeless. She could not help remembering, especially now in her pain, that he adored her. He was not calling on her now at all—by her indifference she had finally driven him away—but a word, a word—she waited for days, weeks, hoping against hope, and then—

The office of Barton's superior in the Great Eastern terminal had always made him an easy object for her blandishments, coming and going, as she frequently did, via this very station. He was in the office of the as-30 sistant train-despatcher on the ground floor, where passing to and from the local, which, at times, was quicker than a street-car, she could easily see him by peering in, only, she had carefully avoided him for nearly a year If she chose now, and would call for a message blank at the adjacent telegraph-window which was a part of his room, and raised her voice as she often had in the past, he could scarcely fail to hear, if he did not see her And if he did, he would rise and come over-of that she was sure, for he never could resist her It had been a wile 10 of hers in the old days to do this or to make her presence felt by idling outside. After a month of brooding, she felt that she must act—her position as a deseited girl was too much. She could not stand it any longer really-the eyes of her mother, for one

It was six-fifteen one evening when, coming out of the store in which she worked, she turned her sten disconsolately homeward. Her heart was heavy, her face rather pale and drawn. She had stopped in the store's retiring-room before coming out to add to her charms as much as possible by a little powder and rouge and s to smooth her hair It would not take much to reallure her former sweetheart, she felt sure-and yet it might not be so easy after all Suppose he had found another But she could not believe that. It had scarcely been long enough since he had last attempted to see her, and he was really so very, very fond of her and so faithful He was too slow and certain in his choosing-he had been so with her Still, who knows? With this thought, she went forward in the evening, feeling for the first time the shame and pain that comes of deception, the agony of of having to relinquish an ideal and the feeling of despair that comes to those who find themselves in the position of suppliants, stooping to something which in better days and better fortune they would not know. Arthur was the cause of this

When she reached the station, the crowd that usually filled it at this hour was swarming. There were so many pairs like Arthur and herself laughing and hurrying away or so she felt. First glancing in the small mirror of a weighing scale to see if she were still of her former of a weighing scale to see if she were still of her former of the stand which stood outside, and for a few pennies purchased a tiny bunch of violets. She then went inside and stood near the window, peering first furtively to see if he were present. He was Bent over his work, a green shade over his eyes, she could see his solid genial figure at a table. Stepping back a moment to ponder, she finally went forward and, in a clear voice asked,

"May I have a blank, please?"

The infatuation of the discarded Barton was such that 8. It brought him instantly to his feet. In his stodgy, stocky way he rose, his eyes glowing with a friendly hope, his mouth wreathed in smiles, and came over. At the sight of her, pale, but pretty—paler and prettier, really, than he had ever seen her—he thrilled dumbly.

"How are you, Shirley?" he asked sweetly, as he drew near, his eyes searching her face hopefully. He had not seen her for so long that he was intensely hungry, and her paler beauty appealed to him more than ever. Why wouldn't she have him? he was asking himself. Why wouldn't his persistent love yet win her? Perhaps it might "I haven't seen you in a month of Sundays, it seems How are the folks?"

"They're all right, Bart," she smiled archly, "and so am I How have you been? It has been a long time since the seen you I've been wondering how you were Have you been all right? I was just going to send a message."

As he had approached, Shirley had pretended at first not to see him, a moment later to affect surprise, although she was really suppressing a heavy sigh. The sight of him, after Arthur, was not reassuring Could the really interest herself in him any more? Could she? Sure, sure," he replied genially, "I'm always all right

You couldn't kill me, you know Not going away, are you, Shirl'" he queried interestedly

No, I m just telegraphing to Mabel She promised to meet me to-morrow, and I want to be sure she will."

"You don't come past here as often as you did Shirley," he complained tenderly "At least, I don't seem to see you so often, he added with a smile 'It isn't anything I have done, is it?" he queried, and then, when she protested quickly, added 'What's the trouble, Shirl? Haven't been sick have you?

She affected all her old gaiety and ease, feeling as though she would like to cry

Oh, no, she returned, "Tve been all right I've been going through the other door, I suppose, or coming in and going out on the Langdon Avenue car" (This was true because she had been wanting to avoid him). I've been in such a hurry, most nights, that I haven't a had time to stop, Bart. You know how late the store keeps us at times.

He remembered, too, that in the old days she had made time to stop or meet him occasionally

Yes, I know," he said tactfully "But you haven't been to any of our old card-parties either of late, have you? At least, I haven't seen you I've gone to two or three, thinking you might be there"

That was another thing Arthur had done—broken up her interest in these old store and neighborhood parties and a banjo-and-mandolin club to which she had once belonged. They had all seemed so pleasing and amusing in the old days—but now. In those days Bart had been her usual companion when his work permitted.

"No," she replied evasively, but with a forced air of pleasant remembrance, 'I have often thought of how much fun we had at those, though It was a shame to drop them You haven't seen Harry Stull or Trina Trask recently, have you'" she inquired, more to be saying something than for any interest she felt

He shook his head negatively, then added

"Yes, I did, too, here in the waiting-room a few nights ago They were coming down-town to a theater, I suppose"

His face fell slightly as he recalled how it had been their custom to do this, and what their one quarrel had been about. Shirley noticed it. She felt the least bit sorry for him, but much more for herself, coming back so disconsolately to all this.

"Well, you're looking as pretty as ever, Shirley," he so continued, noting that she had not written the telegram and that there was something wistful in her glance "Prettier, I think," and she smiled sadly. Every word that she tolerated from him was as so much gold to him, so much of dead ashes to her. "You wouldn't like to come down some excaining this week and see. The Mouse-Trap, would you? We haven to been to a theater together in I don't know when. His eyes sought hers in a hopeful doglake way.

So—she could have him again—that was the pity of 70 it! To have what she really did not want, did not care for! At the least nod now he would come, and this very devotion made it all but worthless, and so sad. She ought to marry him now for certain, if she began in this way, and could in a month's time if she chose, but oh, oh—could she? For the moment she decided that she could not, would not. If he had only repulsed her—told her to go—ignored her—but no, it was her fate to be loved by him in this moving, pleading way, and hers not to love him as she wished to love—to be loved. Plainly, 80 he needed some one like her, whereas she, she—She turned a little sick, a sense of the sacrilege of gaiety at this time creeping into her voice, and exclaimed.

"No, no!" Then seeing his face change, a heavy sadness come over it, 'Not this week, anyhow, I mean' ("Not so soon," she had almost said) "I have several engagements this week and I'm not fee'ing well But"—seeing his face change, and the thought of her own state returning—"you might come out to the house some evening instead, and then we can go some other time" so

His face brightened intensely. It was wonderful how he longed to be with her, how the least favor from her comforted and lifted him up. She could see also now, however, how little it meant to her, how little it could ever mean, even if to him it was heaven. The old relationship would have to be resumed in toto, once and for all, but did she want it that way now that she was feeling so miserable about this other affair? As she meditated, these various moods racing to and fro in her mind, Barton seemed to notice, and now it occurred to him that perhaps he had not pursued her enough—was too easily put off. She probably did like him yet. This evening, her present visit, seemed to prove it.

"Sure, sure!" he agreed "I'd like that I'll come out Sunday, if you say We can go any time to the play I'm sorry, Shirley, if you're not feeling well. I've thought of you a lot these days. I'll come out Wednesday, if you don't mind."

She smiled a wan smile It was all so much easier than she had expected—her triumph—and so ashenlike in consequence, a flavor of dead-sea fruit and defeat about 20 it all, that it was pathetic How could she, after Arthur? How could he, really?

"Make it Sunday," she pleaded, naming the farthest day off, and then hurried out

Her faithful lover gazed after her, while she suffered an intense nausea To think—to think—it should all be coming to this! She had not used her telegraph-blank, and now had forgotten all about it. It was not the simple trickery that discouraged her, but her own future which could find no better outlet than this, could not 30 rise above it apparently, or that she had no heart to make it rise above it. Why couldn't she interest herself in some one different to Barton? Why did she have to return to him? Why not wait and meet some otherignore him as before? But no, no, nothing mattered now -no one-it might as well be Barton as any one, and she would at least make him happy and at the same time solve her own problem She went out into the train-shed and climbed into her train. Slowly, after the usual pushing and jostling of a crowd, it drew out toward Latonia, 40 that suburban region in which her home lay. As she rode, she thought

"What have I just done? What am I doing?" she kept asking herself as the clacking wheels on the rails fell into a rhythmic dance and the houses of the brown, dry, endless city fled past in a maze "Severing myself decisively from the past—the happy past—for supposing, once I am married, Arthur should return and want me again—suppose! Suppose!"

Below at one place, under a shed, were some marker. gardeners disposing of the last remnants of their days wares—a sickly, dull life, she thought Here was Rutgers Avenue, with its line of red street-cars, many wagons and tracks and counter-streams of automobiles—how often had she passed it morning and evening in a shuttle-like way, and how often would, unless she got married! And here, now, was the river flowing smoothly be tween its banks lined with coal-pockets and wharvesaway, away to the huge deep sea which she and Arthur had enjoyed so much Oh, to be in a small boat and drift out, out into the endless, restless, pathless deep' Somehow the sight of this water, to-night and every night, brought back those evenings in the open with Arthur at Sparrows Point, the long line of dancers in Eckert's Pavilion, the woods at Atholby, the park, with the dancers in the pavilion—she choked back a sob. Once Arthur had come this way with her on just such an eve ning as this, pressing her hand and saying how wonderful she was Oh, Arthur! Arthur! And now Barton was to take his old place again—forever, no doubt. She could not trifle with her life longer in this foolish way, or his What was the use? But think of it!

Yes, it must be—forever now, she told herself She must marry Time would be slipping by and she would become too old It was her only future—marriage It was the only future she had ever contemplated really. A home, children, the love of some man whom she could love as she loved Arthur Ah, what a happy home that would have been for her! But now, now—

But there must be no turning back now, either There was no other way. If Arthur ever came back—but tear not, he wouldn't! She had risked so much and lost—lost him. Her little venture into true love had been such a failure. Before Arthur had come all had been well enough. Barton, stout and simple and frank and direct, had in some way—how, she could scarcely realize now—offered sufficient of a future. But now, now! He had enough money, she knew, to build a cottage for the two of them. He had told her so. He would do his best always to make her happy, she was sure of that. They could live in about the state her parents were living in—or a little better, not much—and would never want. No doubt there would be children, because he craved them _several of them—and that would take up her time, long years of it—the sad, gray years! But then Arthur, whose children she would have thrilled to bear, would be no more, a mere memory—think of that!—and Barton the dull, the commonplace, would have achieved his finest dream—and why?

Decause love was a failure for her-that was whyand in her life there could be no more true love. She would never love any one again as she had Arthur It could not be, she was sure of it. He was too fascinating. 1000 wonderful Always, always, wherever she might be. whoever she might marry, he would be coming back. intruding between her and any possible love, receiving any possible kiss. It would be Arthur she would be loving or kissing. She dabbed at her eyes with a tiny handkerchief, turned her face close to the window and stared out, and then as the environs of Latonia came into view. wondered (so deep is romance) What if Arthur should come back at some time-or now! Supposing he should be here at the station now, accidentally or on purpose, to welcome her, to soothe her weary heart. He had met her here before How she would fly to him, lay her head on his shoulder, forget forever that Barton ever was, that they had ever separated for an hour Oh, Arthur! Arthur!

But no, no, here was Latonia-here the viaduct over her train, the long business street and the cars marked Center" and "Langdon Avenue" running back into the great city. A few blocks away in tree-shaded Bethune Street, duller and plainer than ever, was her parents' cottage and the routine of that old life which was now, she telt, more fully fastened upon her than ever before-the liwn-mowers, the lawns, the front porches all alike Now would come the going to and fro of Barton to business is her father and she now went to business, her keeping house, cooking, washing, ironing, sewing for Barton as her mother now did these things for her father and herself. And she would not be in love really, as she wanted to be Oh, dreadful! She could never escape it really. now that she could endure it less, scarcely for another hour And yet she must, must, for the sake of-for the sake of-she closed her eyes and dreamed.

She walked up the street under the trees, past the houses and lawns all alike to her own, and found her fither on their veranda reading the evening paper. She sighed at the sight

Back, daughter?" he called pleasantly.

"Yes."

"Your mother is wondering if you would like steak or liver for dinner Better tell her"

"Oh, it doesn't matter"

She hurried into her bedroom, threw down her hat and gloves, and herself on the bed to rest silently, and groaned in her soul. To think that it had all come to this!—Never to see him any more!—To see only Barton, and marry him and live in such a street, have four or five children, forget all her youthful companionships—and all to save her face before her parents, and her future. Why must it be? Should it be, really? She choked and stifled. After a little time her mother, hearing her come in, came to the door—thin, practical, affectionate, conven-60 toonal.

"What's wrong, honcy? Aren't you feeling well tonight? Have you a headache? Let me feel."

Her thin cool fingers crept over her temples and hair She suggested something to eat of a headache powder right away

"I'm all right, mother—I'm just not feeling well now Don't bother—I'll get up soon—Please don't."

"Would you rather have liver or steak to-night, dear?"
"Oh, anything—nothing—please don't bother—steak 70 will do—anything"—if only she could get 11d of her and be at rest

Her mother looked at her and shook her head sympathetically, then retreated quietly, saying no more Lying so, she thought and thought-grinding, destroying thoughts about the beauty of the past, the darkness of the future-until able to endure them no longer she got up and, looking distractedly out of the window into the yard and the house next door, stared at her future fixedly What should she do, What should she really do, There 80 was Mrs Kessel in her kitchen getting her dinner as usual, just as her own mother was now, and Mr Kessel out on the front porch in his shirt-sleeves reading the evening paper Beyond was Mr Pollard in his yard, cutting the grass All along Bethune Street were such houses and such people—simple, commonplace souls all clerks, managers, fairly successful chaftsmen, like her father and Barton, excellent in their way but not like Arthur the beloved, the lost-and here was she, perforce. or by decision of necessity, soon to be one of them, in 90 some such street as this no doubt, forever and- For the moment it choked and stifled her.

She decided that she would not. No, no, no! There must be some other way—many ways She did not have to do this unless she really wished to—would not—only— Then going to the mirror she looked at her face and smoothed her hair

"But what's the use?" she asked of herself wearily and resignedly after a time. 'Why should I cry? Why shouldn't I marry Barton? I don't amount to anything, anyhow. Arthur wouldn't have me. I wanted him, and to I am compelled to take some one else—or no one—what difference does it really make who? My dreams are too high, that's all I wanted Arthur, and he wouldn't have me I don't want Barton, and he crawls at my feet. I'm a failure, that's what's the matter with me."

And then, turning up her sleeves and removing a fichu which stood out too prominently from her breast she went into the kitchen and, looking about for an apron, observed

"Can't I help? Where's the tablecloth?" and finding it among napkins and silverware in a drawer in the adjoining room, proceeded to set the table

The father of Langdon Elwyn Mitchell was Silas Weir Mitchell (1829-1914), a Philadelphia physician who, upon turning author, wrote a number of historical romances which now make rather heavy plodding, and two or three very readable novels in the form of conversations. Of the latter group of novels, his biographer, Anna Robeson Burr, says, "The author put into them his wide reading, his medical experience, his relish of the human adventure, the pleasant discursiveness of many dinners." Works of this stamp suggest that the elder Mitchell, who constantly moved in sophisticated circles of friends, could transfer to paper sparkling talk like that destined to brighten a play by his son—The New York Idea, an outstanding achievement in American theatrical history.

Langdon Mitchell attended St Paul's school in Concord, New Hampshire, went abroad for three years, and then went to Harvard and Columbia to study law During his boyhood in school and during his young manhood, he exchanged literary manuscripts and criticisms with his father, who, established author though he was, thought very highly of his son's talents and insights When, in 1897, S Weir Mitchell's novel, $Hngh\ Wynne$, was winning universal acclaim, and the son mentioned some very bad flaws in it, the father wrote "Only Langdon has any real criticism to offer He says it is all most a perfectly real book, but has no great scenes nor reaches the higher levels of characterization . . . I hope he will write a novel!"

Already, however, the son had embarked upon a literary career in other fields. In 1883, three years before being admitted to the New York bar, he had published the first of several poetic and dramatic works. It was not until 1899, though, that he was really successful as a playwright. In that year, his dramatization of Thackeray s famous novel, Vanity Fair, produced under the title Becky Shaip, began a two-year run in New York which was followed by well-attended presentations in other cities. This play has been twice revived. In 1900 he adapted and staged one of his father's novels, The Adventure of François.

likes, first produced in the Lyric Theater in New York in 1906 and destined not only to have a long run but also to 'represent," in the words of A H Quinn, noted scholar of our theater, "American social comedy at its best. Like the author's earlier success, this drama has been twice revived. Furthermore, it has been translated into German, Danish, Swedish, and Hungarian, and has been well received when acted abroad. Nothing else which Mitchell wrote during the rest of his long life (he died in 1935) compared with this achievement of his forty-fourth year.

The major theme of The New York Idea is divorce and its distressing effects upon some of the fashionable folk of New York The title is explained in the line. "Marry for whim and leave the rest to the divorce court -that's the New York idea of marriage" In 1906 and later, divorce was far too serious a matter to be regarded casually by even the most sophisticated people, and it was rather daring of the playwright to allow sympathetic characters to talk humorously about the subject. Brought into contact with these witty characters, a group of inordinately stuffy people who thoughtlessly champion a whole series of conventional attitudes provide contrasts and make possible the satire typical of high comedy. It is sature not only upon divorce but also upon several American attitudes "When I was writing the play," the author says, "I had really no idea of satirizing divorce or law or anything specially temperamental or local What I wanted to satirize was a certain extreme frivolity in the American spirit and in our American life-frivolity in the deep sense-not just a girl's frivolity, but that profound, sterile, amazing frivolity which one observes and meets in our churches, in our political life, in literature, in music. Our frivolity is, I feel, on the edge of the tragic. Indeed, I think it is entirely tragic, and there are lines, comedy lines, in The New York Idea that indicate this aspect of the thing." A certain seriousness, therefore, underlies the apparently aloof fun of the play, giving the substantial basis social comedy must have if it is not to be ephemeral.

The plot is adequate, but not so urgent or so complicated as to interfere with the progress of many conversations of the characters, and that is as it should be in high comedy. The dialogue, inevitably, is the most important single ingredient of dramas of this type. And the talk is excellent-in character and varied in several ways, but, in addition, consistently interesting and diverting. It abounds in witty phrases and in epigrams "The modern American marriage is like a wire tence. The woman's the wire-the posts are the husbands" "I don't take sugar. Yes, gout. It gives me a twinge even to sit in the shadow of a sugar maple." Never was a friend to a woman-thank God, in all my life well talk about being a friend to a whiskey and soda" "If we can't be moral, at least we can avoid being vulgar" Four decades after its initial publication, The New York Idea continues to make telling points and to amuse those who read it.

SCENE Living-room in the house of Philip Phillimore. Five PM of an afternoon of May The general air and appearance of the room is that of an old-fashioned, decorous, comfortable interior. There are no electric lights and no electric bells. Two bell ropes as in old-fashioned houses. The room is in dark tones inclining to sombre and of old-fashioned elegance.

Seated in the room are Miss Heneage, Mrs. Phillimore and Thomas. Miss Heneage is a solidly built, narrow-minded woman in her sixties. She makes no effort to look younger than she is, and is expensively but quietly dressed, with heavy elegance. She commands her household and her family connection, and on the strength of a large and steady income feels that her opinion has its value. Mrs. Phillimore is a semi-professional invalid, refined and unintelligent. Her movements are weak and fatigued. Her voice is habitually plaintive and she is entirely a lady without a trace of being a woman of fashion. Thomas is an easy-mannered, but respectful family servant, un-English both in style and appearance. He has no deportment worthy of being so called, and takes an evident interest in the affairs of the family he serves.

Miss Heneage is seated at the tea-table, facing the footlights. Mrs Phillimore is seated at the table on the right. Thomas stands near by Tea things on table. Decanter of sherry in coaster. Bread and butter on plate. Vase with flowers. Silver match-box. Large old-fashioned tea urn. Guard for flame. "The Evening Post" on tea-table. Miss Heneage and Mrs. Phillimore both have cups of tea. Miss Heneage sits up very straight, and pours tea for Grace, who enters from door. She is a pretty and fashionably dressed girl of twenty. She speaks supercitiously, coolly, and not too fast. She sits on the sofa gracefully and without lounging. She wears a gown suitable for spring visiting, hat, parasol, and gloves.

GRACE. [As she moves to the sofa] I never in my life walked so far and found so few people at home [Pauses. Takes off gloves. Somewhat querulously.] The fact is the nineteenth of May is ridiculously late to be in town

MISS HENEAGE Thomas, Mr Phillimore's sherry? THOMAS [Industring the particular table] The sherry, ma'am

MISS HENEAGE. Mr. Phillimore's Post?

THOMAS. [Pointing to "The Evening Post" on the tea kable] The Post, ma'am.

MISS HENEAGE. [Indicating cup] Miss Phillimore [THOMAS takes cup of tea to GRACE. Silence. They all sup tea. THOMAS goes back, fills sherry glass, remaining round and about the tea-table. They all drink tea during their entire conversation]

GRACE The Dudleys were at home. They wished to know when my brother Philip was to be married, and where and how?

MISS HENEAGE If the Dudleys were persons of breeding, they'd not intrude their curiosity upon you

GRACE I like Lena Dudley

MRS. PHILLIMORE [Speaking slowly and gently.] D_0 I know Miss Dudley?

GRACE She knows Philip She expects an announcement of the wedding

MRS. PHILLIMORE I trust you told her that my son, my sister and myself are all of the opinion that those who have been divorced should remairy with modesty and without parade

GRACE I told the Dudleys Philip's wedding was here, tomorrow

MISS HENEAGE [To MRS PHILLIMORE, picking up a sheet of paper from the table.] I have spent the after-3 noon, Mary, in arranging and listing the wedding gifts and in writing out the announcements of the wedding I think I have attained a proper form of announcement [Taking the sheet of note-paper and giving it to THOMAS] Of course the announcement Philip himself made was quite out of the question [GRACE smilec] However, there is mine [She points to the paper THOMAS gives the list to MRS PHILLIMORE and motor away]

GRACE I hope you'll send an announcement to the Dudleys

MRS. PHILLIMORE. [Prepared to make the best of things, plaintitely reads] "Mr Philip Phillimore and Mrs Cynthia Dean Karslake announce their marriage May twentieth at three o'clock, Nineteen A. Washington Square, New York" [Replacing the paper on THOMAS's salver] It sounds very nice

[THOMAS returns the paper to MISS HENEAGE]

MISS HENEAGE In my opinion it barely escapes sounding nasty However, it is correct. The only remaining question is—to whom the announcement should not be sent [THOMAS goes out.] I consider an announcement of the wedding of two divorced persons to be in the nature of an intimate communication. It not only announces the wedding—it also announces the divorce [Returning to her teacup.] The person I shall ask counsel of is cousin William Sudley He promised to drop in this afternoon

GRACE Oh! We shall hear all about Cairo
MRS PHILLIMORE. William is judicious [THOMAS

MISS HENEAGE. [With finality] Cousin William will disapprove of the match unless a winter in Cairo has altered his moral tone.

THOMAS. [Announcing.] Mr Sudley [He ushers in WILLIAM SUDLEY, a little oldsish gentleman. He is and appears thoroughly insignificant. But his opinion of the place he occupies in the world is enormous. His manners, voice, presence, are all those of a man of breeding and self-importance.]

MRS PHILLIMORE and MISS HENEAGE [Rising and greeting SUDLEY; a little tremulously.] My dear William! [THOMAS withdraws.]

SUDLEY [Shakes hands with MRS PHILLIMORE, wherly glad to see them] How d'ye do, Mary? [Greeting MISS HENEAGE.] A very warm May you're having, Sarah GRACE [Coming forward to welcome htm.] Dear Cousin William!

MISS HENEAGE Wasn't it warm in Cairo when you teleft? [She will have the strict truth, or nothing: still, on account of SUDLEY's impeccable respectability, she treats in with more than usual leniency.]

SUDLEY [Sitting down] We left Cairo six weeks ago, Grace, so I've had no news since you wrote in February that Philip was engaged [After a pause.] I need not to say I consider Philip's engagement excessively regretable. He is a judge upon the Supreme Court bench with a divorced wife—and such a divorced wife!

GRACE Oh, but Philip has succeeded in keeping everything as quiet as possible

SUDLEY. [Acidly] No, my dear! He has not succeeded in keeping his former wife as quiet as possible. We had not been in Cairo a week when who should turn up but Vida Phillimore. She went everywhere and did everything no woman should!

GRACE. [With unfergued interest.] Oh, what did she SUDLEY. She "did" Cleopatra at the tableaux at Lord Errington's! She "did" Cleopatra, and she did it robed only in some diaphanous material of a nature so transparent that—in fact she appeared to be draped in moonshine [MISS HFNEAGE indicates the presence of GRACE and rises.] That was only the beginning. As soon as she heard of Philip's engagement, she gave a dinner in honour of it! Only divorcées were asked! And she had a dummy—yet, my dear, a dummy!—at the head of the table. He stood for Philip—that is he sat for Philip! [Rising and moving to the table.]

MISS HENEAGE. [Irritated and disgusted] Ah!

MRS PHILLIMORE. [With dismay and pain] Dear me! 60

MISS HENEAGE. [Confident of the value of her opin100] I disapprove of Mrs Phillimore

SUDLEY. [Taking a cigarette] Of course you do, but has Philip taken to Egyptian cigarettes in order to celebrate my winter in Cairo?

GRACE. Those are Cynthia's

SUDLEY. [Thinking that no one is worth knowing whom he does not know.] Who is "Cynthia"?

GRACE Mrs Karslake—She's staying here, Cousin William She'll be down in a minute

SUDLEY. [Shocked.] You don't mean to tell me—>—' MISS HENEAGE Yes, William, Cynthia is Mrs Karslake—Mrs Karslake has no New York house I disliked the publicity of a hotel in the circumstances, and, accordingly, when she became engaged to Philip, I invited her here

SUDLEY. [Suspectous and distrustful.] And may I ask who Mrs Karslake is?

MISS HENEAGE. [With confidence] She was a Deane SUDLEY [Walking about the room, sorry to be obliged 80 to concede good birth to any but his own blood.] Oh, oh—well, the Deanes are extremely nice people [Approaching the table] Was her father J William Deane? MISS HENEAGE. [Nodding, still more secure.] Yes SUDLEY. [Giving in with difficulty] The family is an old one J William Deane's daughter? Surely he left a very considerable—

MISS HENEAGE. Oh, fifteen or twenty millions.

SUDLEY. [Determined not to be dazzled.] If I remember rightly she was brought up abroad

MISS HENEAGE. In France and England—and I fancy brought up with a very gay set in very gay places. In fact she is what is called a "sporty" woman

SUDLEY. [Always ready to think the worst.] We might put up with that But you don't mean to tell me Philip has the—the—assurance to marry a woman who has been divorced by—

MISS HENEAGE. Not at all Cynthia Karslake divorced her husband

SUDLEY [Gloomsly, since he has less fault to find than to he expected] She divorced him! Ah! [He seeks the consolation of his tea.]

MISS HENEAGE The suit went by default And, my dear William, there are many palliating circumstances. Cynthia was married to Karslake only seven months There are no—[Glancing at GRACE] no hostages to Fortune! Ahem!

SUDLEY [Still unwilling to be pleased] Ah! What sort of a young woman is she?

GRACF [With the superiority of one who is not too 20 popular.] Men admire her

MISS HENEAGE She's not conventional

MRS PHILLIMORE [Showing a faint sense of justice] I am bound to say she has behaved discreetly ever since she arrived in this house

MISS HENEAGE Yes, Mary—but I sometimes suspect that she exercises a degree of self-control—

SUDLEY. [Glad to have something against someone]

She claps on the lid, eh? And you think that perhaps some day she'll boil over? Well, of course fifteen or twenty millions—but who's Karslake?

GRACE [Very inperculsonaly] He owns Cynthia K She's the famous mare

MISS HENEAGE He's Henry Karslake's son

SUDLEY [Beginning to make the best of fifteen millions-in-latt.] Oh!—Henry!—Very respectable family Although I temember his father served a term in the Senate And so the wedding is to be to-morrow?

MRS. PHILLIMORF [Assenting] To-morrow

SUDLEY [Riving, his respectability to the front when to he thinks of the ceremony GRACE rives.] To-morrow. Well, my dear Sarah, a respectable family with some means. We must accept her. But on the whole, I think it will be best for me not to see the young woman. My disapprobation would make itself apparent.

GRACE. [Whispering to SUDLEY] Cynthia's coming [He doesn't bear CYNTHIA comes in, absorbed in reading a newspaper. She is a young creature in her twenties, small and high-bred, full of the love of excitement and sport. Her manner is wide-awake and keen, and she is evidently in no fear of the opinion of others. Her dress is exceedingly elegant, but with the elegance of a woman whose chief interests lie in life out of doors. There is nothing hard or masculine in her style, and her expression is youthful and ingenuous.]

SUDLEY. [Sententious and determinately epigram matic] The uncouth modern young woman, eight feet high, with a skin like a rhinoceros and manners like a cave-dweller—an habitué of the race-track and the divorce court—

GRACE. [Aside to SUDLEY] Cousin William! SUDLEY. Eh, oh!

CYNTHIA. [Reading her newspaper, advances into the room, immersed, excited, trembling. She lowers paper to catch the light.] "Belmont favourite—six to one—Rockaway—Rosebud, and Flying Cloud Slow track—raw wind—h'm, h'm, h'm—At the half, Rockaway forged ahead, when Rosebud under the lash made a bold bid for victory—neck by neck—for a quarter—when Flying Cloud slipped by the pair and won on the post by a nose in one forty nine!" [Speaking with the enthusiasm of a sport] Oh, I wish I'd seen the dear thing do it Oh, it's Mr Sudley! You must think me very rude How do you do, Mr Sudley? [Going over to SUDLEY]

SUDLEY [Bowing without cordiality.] Mrs Karslake [CYNTHIA pauses, feeling he should say something At he says nothing, she speaks again.]

CYNTHIA. I hope Cairo was delightful? Did you have a smooth voyage?

SUDLEY. [Pompously] You must permit me, Mrs Karslake—

CYNTHIA [With good temper, somewhat embarrased, and talking herself into ease] Oh, please don't welcome me to the family All that formal part is over, if you don't mind I'm one of the tribe now! You're coming to our wedding tomorrow?

SUDLEY. My dear Mrs Karslake, I think it might be wiser—

CYNTHIA. [Still with cordial good temper] Oh, but you must come! I mean to be a perfect wife to Philip and all his relations! That sounds rather miscellaneous. but you know what I mean

SUDLEY. [Very sententious.] I am afraid-

CYNTHIA. [Gay and still covering her embarrassment.]

If you don't come, it'll look as if you were not standing by Philip when he's in trouble! You'll come, won't you—

Sait of course you will.

St DLEY [After a self-important pause.] I will come, Mrs Karslake [Pausing] Good afternoon. [In a tone of orion and light compassion.] Good-bye, Mary Good-iternoon, Sarah [Sighing.] Grace, dear [To Miss] HENEAGE] At what hour did you say the alimony commences?

MISS HENEAGE [Quickly and commandingly to cover is slip] The ceremony is at three P.M, William. [SUDLEY walks toward the door.]

MRS PHILLIMORE. [With fatigued voice and manner as the rises] I am going to my room to rest awhile. [She trails slowly from the room.]

MISS HENEAGE. [To SUDLEY.] Oh, William, one moment—I entirely forgot! I've a most important social question to ask you! [She accompanies him slowly to the door] In regard to the announcements of the medding—who they shall be sent to and who not For instance—the Dudleys—[Deep in their talk, SUDLEY and MISS HENEAGE pass out together.]

CINTHIA. [From the sofa] So that's Cousin William? GRACE [From the tea-table.] Don't you like him? CYNTHIA [Calmly sarcastic] Like him? I love him Hc s so generous He couldn't have received me with more warmth if I d been a mulatto.

[THOMAS comes in, preceded by PHILLIMORE. PHILLIP PHILLIMORE is a self-centered, short-tempered, imperious member of the respectable fashionables of New York. He is well and solidly dressed, and in manner and speech stidently a man of family. He is accustomed to being listened to in his home circle and from the bench, and it fractically impossible for him to believe that he can make a mistake.]

GRACE. [Outraged] Really, you know—[CYNTHIA  moves to the table.] Philip!

[PHILIP nods to GRACE absent-mindedly. He is in his working suit and looks tired. He walks into the room intently; goes over to the tea-table, bends over and kisses CYNTHIA on the forehead. Goes to his chair, which THOMAS has moved to suit him. He sits, and sighs with satisfaction.]

PHILIP. [As if exhausted by brain work.] Ah. Grace!

[GRACE immediately sails out of the room.] Well, my dear, I thought I should never extricate myself from the court-room. You look very debonnair!

CYNTHIA. The tea's making You'll have your glass of sherry?

PHILIP. [The strain of the day evidently having been severe.] Thanks! [Taking it from THOMAS and sighing.] Ah!

CYNTHIA. I can see at's been a tiring day with you 40 PHILIP. [His great tustle with the world leaving him unworsted but utterly spent] H'm! [He gratefully sips his tea.]

CYNTHIA. Were the lawyers very long-winded?

PHILIP. [Almost too tried for speech] Prolix to the point of somnolence. It might be affirmed without inexactitude that the prolixity of counsel is the somnolence of the judiciary. I am fatigued, ah! [A little suddenly, awakening to the fact that his orders have not been carried out to the letter.] Thomas! My Post is not in its 50 usual place!

CYNTHIA. It's here, Philip [THOMAS gets it.]

PHILIP. Thanks, my dear [Opening "The Post."] Ah! This hour with you—is—is really the—the—[Absently.] the one vivid moment of the day [Reading] H'm—shocking attack by the President on vested interests H'm—too bad—but it's to be expected. The people insisted on electing a desperado to the presidential office—they must take the hold-up that follows [After a pause, he reads.] H'm! His English is lacking 60 in idiom his spelling in conservatism, his mind in balance, and his character in repose.

CYNTHIA [Amuable but not very sympathetic] You seem more fatigued than usual Another glass of sherry, Philip?

PHILIP Oh, I ought not to-

CYNTHIA. I think you seem a little more tired than usual.

PHILIP. Perhaps I am [She pours out sherry PHILIP takes glass but does not sip] Ah, this hour is truly a 70 grateful form of restful excitement [After an inspired interval.] You, too, find it—eh? [He looks at CYNTHIA.]

CYNTHIA [With veiled sarcasm] Decidedly

PHILIP Decidedly what, my dear?

CYNTHIA. [Her sarcasm still veiled] Restful

PHILIP. H'm! Perhaps I need the calm more than you do Over the case today I actually—eh—[Sipping his tea.] slumbered. I heard myself do it That's how I know. A dressmaker sued on seven counts [Reading bis newspaper] Really, the insanity of the United States Senate—you seem restless, my dear Ah—um—have you seen the evening paper? I see there has been a lightning change in the style or size of hats which ladies—

[Sweeping a descriptive motion with his hand, he gives the paper to CYNTHIA, then moves his glass, reads, and sips.]

CYNTHIA. The lamp, Thomas

[THOMAS blows out the alcohol lamp on the tea-table with difficulty. Blows twice Movement of PHILIP each time. Blows again.]

PHILIP [Irritably] Confound it, Thomas! What are you puffing and blowing at—?

THOMAS It s out, ma'am-yes, sir

PHILIP. You're excessively noisy, Thomas!

THOMAS [In a fluster.] Yes, sir-I am

CYNTHIA. [Soothing THOMAS'S wounded feelings] We don't need you, Thomas.

THOMAS Yes, ma'am

PHILIP Puffing and blowing and shaking and quaking 20 like an automobile in an ecstasy! [THOMAS meekly withdraws]

CYNTHIA [Not unsympathetically] Too bad, Philip! I hope my presence isn't too agitating?

PHILIP Ah—it's just because I value this hour with you, Cynthia—this hour of tea and toast and tranquillity It's quite as if we were married—happily married—already

CYNTHIA [Admitting that married life is a blank, begins to look through paper] Yes, I feel as if we were married already

PHILIP. [Not recognizing her tone.] Ah! It's the calm, you see

CYNTHIA [Without warmth.] The calm? Yes—yes, it s—it's the calm

PHILIP. [Sight] Yes, the calm—the Halcyon calm of —of second choice H'm! [He reads and turns of er the leaves of the paper CYNTHIA reads. There is a stlence]

After all, my dear—the feeling which I have for you—is—is—eh—the market is in a shocking condition of plethora! H'm—h'm—and what are you reading?

CYNTHIA. [Embarrassed] Oh, eh—well—I—eh—I'm just running over the sporting news.

PHILIP Oh! [He looks thoughtful.]

CYNTHIA. [Beginning to forget PHILIP and to remember more interesting matters.] I fancied Hermes would come in an easy winner. He came in nowhere Nonpareil was ridden by Henslow—he's a rotten bad rider. He gets nervous

PHILIP. [Still interested in his newspaper.] Does her H'm! I suppose you do retain an interest in horses and races H'm—I trust some day the—ah—law will at tract—Oh [Turning a page.] Here's the report of m opinion in that dressmaker's case— Haggerty vs. Phillimore

CYNTHIA. [Puzzled.] Was the case brought agains you?

PHILIP Oh—no The suit was brought by Haggert Miss Haggerty, a dressmaker, against the—in fact, modear, against the former Mrs Phillimore [After a pause he returns to his reading]

CYNTHIA. [Curious about the matter.] How did you decide it?

PHILIP. I was obliged to decide in Mrs Phillimores favour Haggerty's plea was preposterous

CYNTHIA Did you—did you meet the—the—for mer—

PHILIP No

CYNTHIA I often see her at afternoon teas

PHILIP How did you recognize-

CYNTHIA Why—[Opening the paper] because Mrs Vida Phillimore's picture appears in every other issue of most of the evening papers. And I must confess I was curious. But, I'm sure you find it very painful to meet her again.

PHILIP [Slowly, considering] No,—would you find it so impossible to meet Mr—CYNTHIA. [Much excited and croused] Philip! Don't speak of him. He's nothing. He's a thing of the past I never think of him. I forget him!

PHILIP [Somewhat sarcastic] That's extraordinards original of you to forget him

CYNTHIA [Gently, and wishing to drop the subject] We each of us have something to forget, Philip—and John Karslake is to me—Well, he's dead!

PHILIP As a matter of fact, my dear, he is dead. or the next thing to it—for he's bankrupt

CYNTHIA. [After a pause.] Bankrupt? [Excited and moved.] Let's not speak of him. I mean never to see him or think about him or even hear of him!

[He assents. She reads her paper. He sips his tea and reads his paper. She turns a page, starts and cries out.]

PHILIP. God bless me!

(ANTHIA It's a picture of-of-

PHILIP. John Karslake?

CINTHIA. Picture of him, and one of me, and in the middle between us "Cynthia K!"

PHILIP "Cynthia K!"

(NNTHIA. [Excited.] My pet riding mare! The best morse he has! She's an angel even in a photograph! Oh! 'Reading.] "John Karslake drops a fortune at Saratoga." Rises and walks up and down excitedly. PHILIP takes the paper and reads.]

FHILIP [Unconcerned, as the matter hardly touches ham] Hem—ah—Advertises country place for sale—stibles, famous mare "Cynthia K"—favourite riding-mare of former Mrs Karslake, who is once again to enter the irena of matrimony with the well-known and highly tespected judge of—(INTHIA [Sensitive and much disturbed.] Don't!

Don't, Philip, please don't!

t PHILIP. My dear Cynthia—take another paper—here's my Post' You'll find nothing disagreeable in The Post. [Cinthia takes paper.]

CANTHIA. [After reading, near the table.] It's much worse in The Post. "John Karslake sells the former Mrs. Karslake's jewels—the famous necklace now at Tiffany's, and the sporty ex-husband sells his wife's portrait by Sargent!" Philip, I can't stand this.

[Pair paper on the table]

PHILLP. Really, my dear, Mr Karslake is bound to ppear occasionally in print—or even you may have to meet him

[THOMAS comes in.]

(YNTHIA [Determined and distressed] I won't meet him! I won't meet him. Every time I hear his name or (ynthia K's" I'm so depressed.

THOMAS. [Announcing with something like reluctance] Sir, Mr Fiddler. Mr Karslake's trainer

[HDDLER walks in. He is an English horse trainer, a ride-awake, stocky, well-groomed little cockney. He knows his own mind and sees life altogether through a stable door. Well-dressed for his station, and not too young.]

(YNTHIA. [Excited and disturbed.] Fiddler? Tim Fiddler? His coming is outrageous!

FIDDLER. A note for you, sir.

CYNTHIA. [Impulsively.] Oh, Fiddler—is that you? 40 FIDDLER. Yes'm!

CYNTHIA. [In a half whisper, still speaking on impulse.] How is she? Cynthia K? How's Planet II and the colt and Golden Rod? How's the whole stable? Are they well?

FIDDLER. No'm—we're all on the bum. [Aside.] Ever since you kicked us over!

CYNTHIA. [Reproving bim, though pleased.] Fiddler! FIDDLER. The horses is just simply gone to Egypt since you left, and so's the guv'nor

CYNTHIA. [Putting an end to Fiddler.] That will do, Fiddler.

FIDDLER. I'm waiting for an answer, sir.

CYNTHIA. What is it, Philip?

PHILIP. [Uncomfortable] A mere matter of business [Assde to FIDDLER] The answer is, Mr Karslake can come The—the coast will be clear.

[FIDDLER goes out]

CYNTHIA. [Amuzed; rising.] You're not going to see him?

PHILIP. But Karslake, my dear, is an old acquaintance 60 of mine He argues cases before me I will see that you do not have to meet him

[CYNTHIA walks the length of the room in excited dejection. MATTHEW comes in He is a High-Church clergyman to a highly fashionable congregation His success is parily due to his social position and parily to his elegance of speech, but chiefly to his inherent amiability, which leaves the sinner in happy peace and smiles on the just and unjust alike.]

MATTHEW. [Most amsably.] Ah. my dear brother! PHILIP. [Greeting him] Matthew

MATTHEW. [Nodding to PHILIP] Good afternoon, my dear Cynthia How charming you look! [CYNTHIA sits down at the tea-table. To CYNTHIA.] Ah, why weren't you in your pew yesterday? I preached a most original sermon [He lays bis hat and cane on the divan.]

THOMAS. [Assde to PHILIP.] Sir, Mrs Vida Phil. 70 limore's maid called you up on the telephone, and you're to expect Mrs Phillimore on a matter of business

PHILIP. [Astonished and disgusted.] Here, impossible! [To CYNTHIA] Excuse me, my dear! [PHILIP, much embarrassed, goes out, followed by THOMAS.]

MATTHEW. [Approaching CYNTHIA'S chair, happily and pleasantly self-important.] No, really, it was a wonderful sermon, my dear My text was from Paul—

'It is better to marry than to burn" It was a strictly logical sermon. I argued—that, as the grass withereth, and the flower fadeth,—there is nothing final in Nature, not even Death! And, as there is nothing final in Nature, not even Death,—so then if Death is not final—why should marriage be final? [Gently.] And so the necessity of—eh—divorce! You see? It was an exquisite sermon! All New York was there! And all New York went away happy! Even the sinners—if there were any! I don't often meet sinners—do you?

CYNTHIA [Indulgently, in spite of his folly, because he is kind] You're such a dear, delightful Pagan! Here's your tea!

MATTHEW [Taking the tea.] Why, my dear—you have a very sad expression!

CYNTHIA [A little bitterly] Why not?

MATTHEW [With sentimental sweetness.] I feel as 20 if I were of no use in the world when I see sadness on a young face Only sinners should feel sad You have committed no sin!

CYNTHIA [Impulsively] Yes, I have! MATTHEW Eh?

CYNTHIA I committed the unpardonable sin—whe—when I married for love!

MATTHEW One must not marry for anything else, my dear'

CYNTHIA Why am I marrying your brother?

MATTHEW 1 often wonder why? I wonder why you didn't choose to remain a free woman

CYNTHIA [Going over the ground she has often argued with herself] I meant to, but a divorcee has no place in society. I felt horribly lonely! I wanted a friend. Philip was ideal as a friend—for months. Isn't it nice to bind a friend to you?

MATTHEW. [Setting down his teachp] Yes—yes!

CYNTHIA. [Growing more and more excited and moved as she speaks] To marry a friend—to marry on prudent, sensible grounds—a man—like Philip? That's what I should have done first, instead of rushing into marriage—because I had a wild, mad, sensitive, sympathetic—passion and pain and fury—of, I don't know what—that almost strangled me with happiness!

MATTHEW. [Amiable and reminiscent] Ah—ah—in my youth—I,—too!

CYNTHIA. [Coming back to her manner of every day]
And besides—the day Philip asked me I was in the dumps! And now—how about marrying only for love.

[PHILIP comes back.]

MATTHEW Ah, my dear, love is not the only thing in the world!

PHILIP. [Half aside.] I got there too late, she'd hung up

CYNTHIA. Who, Philip?

PHILIP. Eh—a lady—eh—

[THOMAS, flurried, comes in with a card on a salver]
THOMAS A card for you, sir Ahem—ahem—Mrs
Phillimore—that was, sir.

PHILIP. Eh?

THOMAS She's on the stairs, sir. [He nods backuards, only to find VIDA at his side. He announces her as he ing the best way of meeting the difficulty.] Mrs Vida Phillimore!

[VIDA comes in slowly, with the air of a spoiled beauty, She stops just inside the door and speaks in a very causal manner. Her voice is languorous and caressing. She is dressed in the excess of the French fashion and carries a daring parasol. She smiles and comes in, undulating to the middle of the room. Tableau. THOMAS with draws.]

VIDA How do you do, Philip [After a pause.] Don't tell me I'm a surprise! I had you called up on the 'phone and I sent up my card—and, besides, Philip dear, when you have the—the—habit of the house, as unfortunitely I have, you can't treat yourself like a stranger in a strange land. At least, I can't—so here I am. My reason for coming was to ask you about that B & O stock we hold in common [To MATTHEW, condessendingly, the clergy being a class of infortunates debarred by profession from the pleasures of the world.] How do you do? [Pause She then goes to the real reason of his wist]. Do be polite and present me to your wife-to-be PHILIP [Awkuardly] Cynthia—

CYNTHIA [Cheerfully, with dash, putting the tible between VIDA and herself] We're delighted to see vou. Mrs Phillimore I needn't ask you to make yourself at home, but will you have a cup of tea?

[MATTHEW sits near the little table.]

what I expected I heard she was a dove She's a very dashing kind of a dove! [To CYNTHIA, who more to the tea-table.] My dear, I'm paying you compliments. Five lumps and quantities of cream. I find single life very thinning [To PHILIP, calm and ready to be agreeable to any man.] And how well you're looking! It must be the absence of matrimonial cares—or is it a new angel in the house?

CYNTHIA. [Outraged at VIDA's intrusion, but polities though delicately sarcastic.] It's most amusing to sit in your place. And how at home you must feel here in this house where you have made so much trouble—I mean tea. [Rises.] Do you know it would be in much better taste if you would take the place you're accustomed to?

VIDA. [As calm as before.] My dear, I'm an intruder only for a moment; I shan't give you a chance to score off me again! But I must thank you, dear Philip, for rendering that decision in my favour—

PHILIP. I assure you-

VIDA. [Unable to resist a thrust.] Of course, you would like to have rendered it against me It was your wonderful sense of justice, and that's why I'm so grateful—if not to you, to your Maker!

PHILIP [Feels that this. 15 no place for his future urle Rises quickly. To CYNTHIA.] Cynthia, I would prefer that you left us

[MATTHEW moves to the sofa and sits down]

CYNTHIA. [Determined not to leave the field first, remains seated] Certainly, Philip!

PHILIP. I expect another visitor who-

VIDA [With flattering insistence, to CYNTHIA] Oh, my dear—don't go! The truth is—I came to see you! I feel most cordially towards you—and really, you know, people in our position should meet on cordial terms

CYNTHIA. [Taking it with apparent calm, but pointing her remarks.] Naturally, if people in our position couldn't meet, New York society would soon come to an end

[THOMAS comes in.]

VIDA. [Calm, but getting her knife in too] Precisely Society's no bigger than a band-box. Why, it's only a moment ago I saw Mr Karslake walking—

CYNTHIA Ah!

THOMAS. [Announcing clearly. Everyone changes place, in consternation, amusement or surprise. CYNTHIA moves to leave the room, but stops for fear of attracting KARSLAKE'S attenuon.] Mr. John Karslake!

[Enter KARSLAKE. He is a powerful, generous personality, a man of affairs, breezy, gay and careless. He gives the impression of being game for any fate in store for bim. His clothes indicate sporting propensities and his taste in waistcoats and ties is brilliant. KARSLAKE sees first PHILIP and then MATTHEW. THOMAS goes out.]

PHILIP. How do you do?

JOHN. [Very gay and no respecter of persons] Goodafternoon, Mr Phillimore Hello—here's the church! [Crossing to MATTHEW and shaking hands He slaps him on the back] I hadn't the least idea—how are you' By George, your reverence, that was a racy sermon of so yours on Divorce! What was your text? [Sees VIDA and bows, very politely] Galatians 4.2, "The more the merrier," or "Who next?" [Smiles] As the whale said after Jonah! [CYNTHIA makes a sudden movement, upsetting her teacup. JOHN faces about quickly and they face each other. JOHN gives a frank start. A pluse holds them]

JOHN. [Astounded, in a low voice.] Mrs Karslake—[Bowing.] I was not aware of the pleasure in store for me. I understood you were in the country. [Recovering 60 and moving to her chan.] Perhaps you'll be good enough to make me a cup of tea?—that is if the teapot wasn't lost in the scrimmage. [There is another pause. CYN-THIA, determined to equal him in coolness, returns to the tea-tray.] Mr. Phillimore, I came to get your signature in that matter of Cox vs. Keely.

PHILIP. I shall be at your service, but pray be seated [He indicates a chair by the tea-table]

JOHN [Suting beyond but not far from the tea-table]

And I also understood you to say you wanted a saddle- 70 horse

PHILIP. You have a mare called—eh—"Cynthia K?"

JOHN. [Promptly.] Yes—she's not for sale

PHILIP. Oh, but she's just the mare I had set my mind on

JOHN. [With a touch of humour] You want her for yourself?

PHILIP. [A little flustered.] I—ch—I sometimes ride JOHN. [Now sure of himself] she's rather lively for you, Judge Mrs Karslake used to ride her.
PHILIP. You don't care to sell her to me?

JOHN She's a dangerous mare, Judge, and she's as delicate and changeable as a girl I'd hate to leave her in your charge!

CYNTHIA. [Eagerly but in a low voice.] Leave her in mine, Mr Karslake!

JOHN. [After a slight pause.] Mrs Karslake knows all about a horse, but—[Turning to CYNTHIA.] Cynthia K's got rather tricky of late CYNTHIA [Haughtily.] You mean to say you think she'd chuck me?

JOHN. [With polite solicitude and still humourous. To PHILIP.] I'd hate to have a mare of mine deprive 10 you of a wife, Judge [Rises CYNTHIA thows anger.] She goes to Saratoga next week, CW.

VIDA. [Who has been sitting and talking to MATTHEW for lack of a better man, comes to talk to KARSLAKE.] CW?

JOHN. [Rising as she rises] Creditors willing VIDA. [Changing her seat for one near the tea-table.]

I'm sure your creditors are willing

JOHN Oh, they're a breezy lot, my creditors They're giving me a dinner this evening

20 VIDA. [More than usually anxious to please] I regret I'm not a breezy creditor, but I do think you owe it to me to let me see your Cynthia K! Can't you lead her around to my house?

JOHN. At what hour, Mrs Phillimore?

VIDA. Say eleven? And you, too, might have a leading in my direction—771 Fifth Avenue

[JOHN bows. CYNTHIA hears and notes this.]

CYNTHIA. Your cup of tea, Mr Karslake

JOHN Thanks [Taking his tea and sipping it.] I beg your pardon—you have forgotten, Mrs Karslake—30 very naturally, it has slipped your memory, but I don't take sugar [CYNTHIA, furious with him and herself. He hands the cup back. She makes a second cup.]

CYNTHIA. [Cheerfully; in a rage.] Sorry!

JOHN. [Also apparently cheerful] Yes, gout. It gives me a twinge even to sit in the shadow of a sugarmaple First you riot, and then you diet!

VIDA. [Calm and amused, aside to MATTHEW.] My dear Matthew, he's a darling! But I feel as if we were all taking tea on the slope of a volcano!

[MATTHEW sits down]

40 PHILIP. It occurred to me, Mr Karslake, you might be glad to find a purchaser for your portrait by Sargent?

JOHN. It's not my portrait It's a portrait of Mrs Karslake, and to tell you the truth—Sargent's a good fellow—I've made up my mind to keep it—to remember the artist by.

[CYNTHIA is wounded by this.]

PHILIP. H'm!

[CYNTHIA hands a second cup to JOHN.]

CYNTHIA. [With careful politeness] Your cup of tea, Mr Karslake.

JOHN. [Rising and taking the tea with courteous m difference.] Thanks—sorry to trouble you. [He drinks the cup of tea standing by the tea-table.]

PHILIP. [To make conversation] You're selling your country place?

JOHN. If I was long of hair—I'd sell that.

CYNTHIA. [Excited. Taken out of herself by the news.] You're not really selling your stable?

JOHN. [Finishes his tea, places the empty cup on the tea-table, and reseats himself.] Every gelding I've got—seven foals and a donkey! I don't mean the owner

CYNTHIA. [Still interested and forgetting the discomfort of the situation.] How did you ever manage to come such a cropper?

JOHN. Streak of blue luck!

CYNTHIA. [Quickly.] I don't see how it's possible— JOHN. You would if you'd been there. You remember the head man? [Sitting down.] Bloke?

CYNTHIA. Of course!

JOHN Well, his wife divorced him for beating her over the head with a bottle of Fowler's Solution, and it seemed to prey on his mind. He sold me—

CYNTHIA. [Horrified.] Sold a race?

JOHN. About ten races, I guess

CYNTHIA. [Incredulous.] Just because he'd beaten his wife?

JOHN. No. Because she'd divorced him

CYNTHIA. Well, I can't see why that should prey on his mind! [Suddenly remembers]

JOHN. Well, I have known men that it stroked the wrong way But he cost me eighty thousand And then Urbanity ran third in the thousand-dollar stakes for two-year-olds at Belmont.

CYNTHIA. [Throws this remark in.] I never had faith in that horse

JOHN. And, of course, it never rains monkeys but it pours gorillas! So when I was down at St Louis on the fifth, I laid seven to three on Fraternity—

CYNTHIA. Crazy! Crazy!

JOHN. [Ready to take the opposite view.] I don't see it. With her record she ought to have romped it an easy winner.

CINTHIA. [Her sporting instinct asserting itself.] She hasn't the stamina! Look at her barrel!

JOHN Well, anyhow, Geranium finished me'
ONTHIA You didn't lay odds on Geranium!
JOHN. Why not? She's my own mare—ONTHIA. Oh!

JOHN Streak o' bad luck-

CYNTHIA. [Plainly anxious to say "I told you so"] Streak of poor judgment! Do you remember the day you rode Billy at a six-foot stone wall, and he stopped and you didn't, and there was a horner's nest [MATTHEW tites] on the other side, and I remember you were hot just because I said you showed poor judgment? [She laughs at the memory. A general movement of disapproval She remembers the situation] I beg your pardon

MATTHEW [Rises to meet VIDA. Hastily] It seems to me that horses are like the fourth gospel. Any conversation about them becomes animated almost beyond the limits of the urbane!

[VIDA, disgusted by such planness of speech, rises ai..! goes to PHILIP who waves her to a chair.]

PHILIP. [Formally] I regret that you have endured such reverses, Mr Karslake.

[JOHN quietly bows.]

CYNTHIA [Concealing her interest and speaking casually] You haven't mentioned your new English horse—Pantomime What did he do at St Louis?

JOHN. [Sitting down] Fell away and ran fifth CYNTHIA. Toobad Washe fully acclimated? Ah, well—

JOHN. We always differed—you remember—on the time needed—

MATTHEW. [Coming over to CYNTHIA, and speaking to carry off the situation as well as to get a tip.] Isn't there a—eh—a race tomorrow at Belmont Park?

JOHN. Yes, I'm going down in my auto

CYNTHIA. [Evidently wishing she might be going too.] Oh!

MATTHEW. And what animal shall you prefer?
[Covering his personal interest with amsable altruism.]
JOHN. I'm backing Carmencita

CYNTHIA. [With a gesture of despair] Carmencita!

[MATTHEW returns to VIDA'S side.]

JOHN You may remember we always differed on Carmencita.

CYNTHIA. [Disgusted at John's dunderheadedness.] But there is no room for difference. She's a wild, head-strong, dissatisfied, foolish little filly. The deuce couldn't ride her—she'd shy at her own shadow—"Carmencita." Oh, very well then. I'll wager you—and I'll give you odds too—"Decorum" will come in first, and I'll lay so three to one he'll beat Carmencita by five lengths! How's that for face.

JOHN. [Never forgetting the vituation] Sorry I'm not flush enough to take you

CYNTHIA [Impetuonaly] Philip, dear, you lend John enough for the wager

MATTHEW. [As nearly horrified as so soft a soul can be] Ahem! Really—

JOHN It's a sporty idea, Mrs. Karslake, but perhaps in the circumstances—

CYNTHIA. [Her mind on her wager] In what circumstances?

PHILIP [With a nervous laugh] It does seem to me there is a certain impropriety—

CYNTHIA. [Remembering the conventions, which, for a moment, had actually escaped her] Oh, I forgot When horses are in the air—

MATTHEW. [Pouring oil on troubled waters. Moving, he speaks to VIDA from the back of her armchair] It's the fourth gospel, you see

[THOMAS comes in with a letter on a salver, which he hands to PHILIP.]

CYNTHIA. [Meckly] You are quite right, Philip [PHILIP gets up] The fact is, seeing Mr Karslake again [Laying on her indifference with a trowel.] he seems to me as much a stranger as if I were meeting him for the first time

MATTHEW [Ande to VIDA.] We are indeed taking tea on the slope of a volcano

VIDA. [About to go, but thinking she will have a last word with JOHN] I'm sorry your fortunes are so depressed, Mr. Karslake.

PHILIP. [Looking at the card that THOMAS has just brought in.] Who in the world is Sir Wilfrid Cates-Darby' [There is a general stir]

JOHN. Oh—ch—Cares-Darby' [PHILIP opens the letter which THOMAS has brought with the card.] That's the English chap I bought Pantomime of.

PHILIP. [To THOMAS.] Show Sir Wilfrid Cates-Darby in. [THOMAS goes out. The prospect of an Englishman with a handle to his name changes VIDA'S plans and, instead of leaving the house, she goes to sofa, and poses there.]

JOHN. He's a good fellow, Judge Place near Epsom.

Breeder Over here to take a shy at our races.

THOMAS. [Opening the door and announcing.] Sir Wilfrid Cates-Darby.

[Enter SIR WILLFRID CATES-DARBY. He is a high-bred, sporting Englishman. His manner, his dress and his diction are the perfection of English elegance. His movements are quick and graceful. He talks lightly and with ease. He is full of life and unsmiling good temper.]

PHILIP. [To SIR WILLTRID and referring to the letter of introduction in his hand.] I am Mr Phillimore I am grateful to Stanhope for giving me the opportunity of knowing you, Sir Wilfrid I fear you find it warm?

SIR WILFRID. [Delicately mopping his forehead] Ah, well—ah—warm, no—hot, yes! Deuced extraordinary climate yours, you know, Mr Phillimore

PHILIP. [Conventionally] Permit me to present you to—[The unconventional situation pulls him up short It takes him a moment to decide how to meet it. He makes up his mind to pretend that everything is as usual, and 20 presents CYNTHIA first.] Mrs Karslake

[SIR WILFRID bows, surprised and doubtful.]
CYNTHIA How do you do?

PHILIP. And to Mrs Phillimore [VIDA bows non-chalantly, but with a view to catching SIR WILFRID'S attention. SIR WILFRID bows, and looks from her to PHILIP.] My brother—and Mr Karslake you know.

SIR WILFRID. How do, my boy [Half aside, to JOHN] No idea you had such a charming little wife— What?— Eh?— [KARSLAKE moves to speak to MATTHEW and PHILLP in the further room.]

CYNTHIA. You'll have a cup of tea, Sir Wilfrid?

SIR WILFRID. [At the table.] Thanks, awfully [Very cheerfully.] I'd no idea old John had a wife! The rascal never told me!

CYNTHIA. [Pouring tea and facing the facts.] I'm not Mr Karslake's wife!

SIR WILFRID. Oh!—Eh?—I see— [He is evidently trying to think this out.]

VIDA. [Who has been ready for some time to speak to him.] Sir Wilfrid, I'm sure no one has asked you how 40 you like our country?

sir Wilfrid. [Gong to VIDA and standing by bernather sofa.] Oh, well, as to climate and horses, I sat nothing But I like your American humour. I'm acquiring it for home purposes VIDA. [Getting down to love as the basis of contersation.] Aren't you going to acquire an American girl for home purposes?

SIR WILFRID. The more narrowly I look the agreeable project in the face, the more I like it Oughtn't to say that in the presence of your husband [He casts a look at PHILIP, who has gone into the next room.]

VIDA. [Cheerful and unconstrained.] He's not my husband!

sir Wilfrid. [Completely confused.] Oh—eh?— my brain must be boiled You are—Mrs—eh—ah—of course, now I see! I got the wrong names! I thought you were Mrs Phillimore. [Sitting down by her.] And that nice girl, Mrs Karslake! You're deucedly lucky to be Mrs Karslake John's a prime sort. I say, have you and he got any kids? How many?

VIDA. [Horrified at being suspected of maternity, but speaking very sweetly] He's not my husband

SIR WILFRID. [Hss good spirits all gone, but determined to clear things up.] Phew! Awfully hot in here! Who the deuce is John's wife?

VIDA. He hasn't any

SIR WILFRID Who's Phillimore's wife?

VIDA He hasn't any

SIR WILFRID. Thanks, fearfully! [To MATTHEW, whom he approaches: suspecting himself of having lost his wits.] Would you excuse me, my dear and Reverend Sir—you're a churchman and all that—would you mind straightening me out?

MATTHEW. [Most graciously] Certainly, Sir Wilfrid Is it a matter of doctrine?

SIR WILFRID. Oh, damme—beg your pardon,—no, it's not words, it's women

MATTHEW. [Ready to be outraged.] Women' SIR WILFRID It's divorce Now, the lady on the sofa—

MATTHEW. Was my brother's wife, he divorced herincompatibility—Rhode Island The lady at the tea-table was Mr Karslake's wife, she divorced him—desertion— Sioux Falls One moment—she is about to marry my brother.

SIR WILFRID. [Cheerful again] I'm out! Thought! never would be! Thanks! [VIDA laughs.]

VIDA. [Not a whit discountenanced and ready to Nease] Have you got me straightened out yet?

SIR WILFRID. Straight as a die! I say, you had lots of tun, didn't you? [Returning to his position by the sofa.]
And so she's Mrs John Karslake?

VIDA. [Calm, but secretly disappointed.] Do you like her'

SIR WILFRID. My word!

VIDA [Fully expecting personal flattery.] Eh?

4 SIR WILFRID. She's a box o' ginger!

VIDA. You haven't seen many American women! SIR WILFRID Oh, haven't I?

VIDA If you'll pay me a visit tomorrow—at twelve, you shall meet a most charming young woman, who has seen you once, and who admires you—ah!

SIR WILFRID. I'm there-what!

VIDA Seven hundred and seventy-one Fifth Avenue SIR WILFRID. Seven seventy-one Fifth Avenue—at twelve

VIDA At twelve

SIR WILERID Thanks! [Indicating CYNTHIA] She's a thoroughbred—you can see that with one eye shut Iwelve [Shaking hands.] Awfully good of you to ask me [He joins JOHN] I say, my boy, your former's an absolute certainty [To CYNTHIA] I hear you're about to marry Mi Phillimore, Mrs Karslake?

[KARSLAKE crosses to VIDA and together they move to the sofa and set down.]

(YNTHIA. To-morrow, 3 PM, Sir Wilfrid

SIR WILFRID. [Much taken with CYNTHIA.] Afraid I ve run into a sort of family party, eh? [Indicating VIDA] The Past and the Future—awfully chic way you Americans have of asking your divorced husbands and wives to drop in, you know—celebrate a christenin', or the new bride, or—(YNTHIA. Do you like your tea strong?

SIR WILFRID Middlin'

CYNTHIA Sugar?

SIR WILFRID. One!

(YNTHIA. Lemon?

SIR WILFRID. Just torture a lemon over it [He makes 4. d eesture as of twisting a lemon peel She hands him his 164] Thanks' So you do it to-morrow at three?

CYNTHIA. At three, Sir Wilfrid.

SIR WILFRID. Sorry!

(YNTHIA. Why are you sorry?

SIR WILFRID. Hate to see a pretty woman married Might marry her myself

CYNTHIA. Oh, but I'm sure you don't admire American women.

sir wilfrid Admire you, Mrs Karslake-

CYNTHIA Not enough to marry me, I hope.

SIR WILFRID. Marry you in a minute¹ Say the word Marry you now—here

CYNTHIA. You don't think you ought to know me a little before—

SIR WILFRID Know you? Do know you

CYNTHIA [Covering her han with her handkerchief.] What colour is my hair?

SIR WILFRID. Pshaw'

CYNTHIA You see! You don't know whether I'm a chestnut or a strawberry roan! In the States we think a 60 few months of friendship is quite necessary

SIR WILFRID Few months of moonshine! Never was a friend to a woman—thank God, in all my life

CYNTHIA Oh-oh oh!

SIR WILFRID Might as well talk about being a friend to a whiskey-and-soda

CYNTHIA. A woman has a soul Sir Wilfrid

SIR WILFRID Well, good whiskey is spirits—dozens o' souls!

CYNTHIA. You are so gross!

SIR WILFRID. [Changing his teat for one at the teatable] Gross? Not a bit! Friendship between the sexes is all fudge! I'm no friend to a rose in my garden I don't call it friendship—eh—eh—a warm, starry night, moonbeams and ilex trees, "and a spirit who knows how" and all that—eh—[Getting closer to her.] You make me feel awfully poetical, you know—[PHILIP comes toward them, glances nervously at CYNTHIA and SIR WILFRID and walks away again] What's the matter? But I say—poetry aside—do you, eh—[Looking around to place & PHILIP.] Does he—y'know—is he—does he go to the head?

CYNTHIA. Sir Wilfrid, Mr Phillimore is my sober second choice

SIR WILFRID Did you ever kiss him? I'll bet he fined you for contempt of court Look here, Mrs Karslake, if you're marryin' a man you don't care about—

CYNTHIA. [Amused and excusing his audacity as a foreigner's eccentricity.] Really!

sir wilfrid. Well, I don't offer myself-

CYNTHIA Ob!

SIR WILLFRID Not this instant-

CYNTHIA Ah!

SIR WILFRID But let me drop in to-morrow at ten.

CYNTHIA What country and state of affairs do you think you have landed in?

SIR WILFRID New York, by Jove! Been to school, too.

New York is bounded on the North, South, East and West by the state of Divorce! Come, come, Mrs Kars lake, I like your country You've no fear and no respect —no can't and lots of can Here you all are, you see—your former husband, and your new husband's former wife—sounds like Ollendorff! Eh? So there you are, you see! But, Jokin' apart—why do you marry him? Oh, well, marry him if you must! You can run around the corner and get a divorce afterwards—

CYNTHIA I believe you think they throw one in with an ice cream soda!

sir Wilfrid [Riving] Damme, my dear lady, a mar20 riage in your country is no more than a—eh—eh—what do you call 'em.' A thank you ma'am. That's what an American marriage is—a thank you, ma'am. Bump—bump—you're over it and on to the next

CYNTHIA You're an odd fish! What! I believe I like you!

SIR WILFRID 'Course you do' You'll see me when I call tomorrow at ten? We'll run down to Belmont Park, eh?

CYNTHIA Don't be absurd!

VIDA. [Has finished ber talk with JOHN, and breaks in 30 on SIR WILFRID, who has hung about CYNTHIA too long to suit her] Tomotrow at twelve, Sir Wilfiid!

SIR WILFRID Twelve!

VIDA [Shaking hands with JOHN] Don't forget, Mr Karslake—eleven o'clock tomorrow

JOHN [Bowing assent] I won't'

VIDA [Coming over to CYNTHIA.] Oh, Mrs Karslake, I've ordered Tiffany to send you something It's a sugarbowl to sweeten the matrimonial lot! I suppose nothing would induce you to call?

Thanks, no—that is, is "Cynthia K' really to be there at eleven? I'd give a gold mine to see her again

VIDA Do come!

CYNTHIA If Mr Karslake will accommodate me by his absence

VIDA Dear Mr Karslake, you'll have to change your hour

JOHN. Sorry, I'm not able to.

CYNTHIA. I can't come later for I'm to be married

JOHN It's not as bad as that with me, but I'm to be sold up—Sheriff, you know. Can't come later than eleven.

VIDA. [To CYNTHIA.] Any hour but eleven, dear CYNTHIA. [Perfectly regardless of VIDA, and ready 11. vex JOHN 1f possible] Mrs Phillimore, I shall call on you at eleven—to see Cynthia K I thank you for the invitation Good afternoon

VIDA. [Aside to JOHN, crossing to speak quietly to him.] It's mere bravado, she won't come

JOHN. You don't know her

[There is a pause and general embarrassment SIR WIL FRID uses his eye-glass. JOHN angry CYNTHIA truma phant MATTHEW embarrassed. VIDA irritated. PHILIP puzzled. Everybody is at odds.]

SIR WILFRID [For the first time a witness to 1/s, pretty complications of divorce. To MATTHEW.] Do you have it as warm as this ordinarily?

MATTHEW [For whom these moments are more than usually painful, and urping his brow.] It's not so much the heat as the humidity

JOHN. [Looks at watch and, relieved, glad to be off] I shall be late for my creditors' dinner

SIR WILFRID. [Interested and walking toward JOHN] Creditors' dinner

JOHN [Reading the note] Fifteen of my sporting creditors have arranged to give me a blow-out at Sherry and I'm expected right away or sooner. And, by the way I was to bring my friends—if I had any. So now's the time to stand by me! Mrs. Phillimore?

VIDA. Of course!

JOHN. [Ready to embarrass CYNTHIA, if possible, and speaking as if he had quite forgotten then former relations] Mrs Karslake—I beg your pardon Judge [PHILIP declines] No? Sir Wilfrid?

SIR WILFRID I'm with you!

JOHN [To MATTHEW] Your Grace?

MATTHEW I regret-

SIR WILFRID Is it the custom for creditors-

¹³ Ollendorff Heinrich Gottfried Ollendorff (1803-1865) devised a new method fai learning to read, write, and speak foreign languages. Some of the exercises were richter like Sir Wilfrid's complicated sentence. * 21 thank you ma'am, a dip or hollow in a road, so called because a person crossing it would appear to bow unexpectedly.

JOHN. Come on, Sir Wilfrid! [THOMAS opens door.]

SIR WILFRID. Is it the custom-

JOHN Hang the custom! Come on—I'll show you a gang of creditors worth having!

[SIR WILFRID and JOHN go out, arm in aim, preceded by VIDA MATTHEW crosses the room, smiling, as if pleated, in a Christian way, with this display of generous garety. He stops short suddenly and looks at his watch.]

MATTHEW. Good gracious! I had no idea the hour was so late. I've been asked to a meeting with Maryland and lowa, to talk over the divorce situation. [He leaves the from quickly and his voice is heard in the hall.]

[CYNTHIA is evidently much excited. The outer door alims PHILIP comes down slowly CYNTHIA stands, here ever wide, her breathing visible, until PHILIP speaks then the seems suddenly to realize her position. There is a long pause.]

PHILIP [With a superior air] I have seldom witnessed a more amazing cataclysm of jocundity! Of course, my dear, this has all been most disagreeable for you.

CYNTHIA [Excitedly] Yes, yes, yes!

PHILIP I saw how much it shocked your delicacy.

CYNTHIA [Distressed and moved.] Outrageous.

[PHILIP sits down.]

PHILIP. Do be seated, Cynthia [Taking up the paper. Quelly] Very odd sort of an Englishman—that Cates-Darby!

(YNTHIA. Sir Wilfrid'-Oh, ves! [PHILIP lettles down to the paper. To herself] Outrageous! I've a great mind to go at eleven—just as I said I would!

PHILIP. Do sit down, Cynthia!

CYNTHIA. What? What?

PHILIP You make me so nervous-

CYNTHIA. Sorry—sorry [She sits down and, seeing the paper, takes it, looking at the picture of JOHN KARSLAKE]

PHILIP. [Sighing with content] Ah! Now that I see him. I don't wonder you couldn't stand him. There's a kind of—ah—spontaneous inebriety about him. He is incomprehensible! If I might with reverence crossquestion the Creator, I would say to him. "Sir, to what end or purpose did you create. Mr. John Karslake?" I believe I should obtain no adequate answer! However, [Sighs] at last we have peace—and The Post! [PHILIP, settling bimself, reads his paper; Canthia, glancing at her paper, occasionally looks across at PHILIP.] Forget the dust of the arena—the prolixity of counsel—the involuntary fatuity of things in general [After a pause, he 40 goes on with his reading.] Compose yourself!

[MISS HENEAGE, MRS. PHILLIMORE and GRACE come in CYNTHIA sighs without letting her sigh be heard. She tries to compose heiself. She glances at the paper and then, hearing MISS HENEAGE, starts dightly MISS HENEAGE and MRS. PHILLIMORE stop at the table.]

MISS HENLAGE [Carrying a sheet of paper] There, my dear Mary, is the announcement as I have now reworded it. I took William's suggestion. [MRS PHILLI-MORF takes and cosmally reads it.] I also put the case to him, and he was of the opinion that the announcement should be sent oily to those people who are really in society. [She sits near the table. (YNTHIA braces berself to bear the PHILLIMORE contensation.]

GRACE I wish you d make an exception of the Dudleys. 50 [CYNTHIA tries and moves to the chan by the table] MISS HENFAGE. And, of course, that excludes the Oppenheims—the Vance-Browns

MRS PHILLIMORE Its just as well to be exclusive. GRACE. I do wish you'd make an exception of Lena Dudley.

MISS HENEAGE. We might, of course, include those new Girardos, and possibly—possibly the Paddingtons GRACE I do wish you would take in Lena Dudley.

[They are now sitting]

MRS PHILLIMORE. The mother Dudley is as common as a charwoman, and not nearly as clean

PHILIP [Sighing, his own feelings, as usual, to the fore] Ah! I certainly am fatigued!

[CYNTHIA begins to slowly crush the newspaper she has been reading with both hands, as if the effort of self-repression were too much for her]

MISS HENEAGE [Making the best of a gloomy future.] We shall have to ask the Dudleys sooner or later to dine, Mary—because of the elder girl's marriage to that dissolute French Marquis

MRS. PHILLIMORE [Plannively] I don't like common people any more than I like common cats, and of course in my time—

MISS HENEAGE I think I shall include the Dudleys 70
MRS PHILLIMORE You think you'll include the Dudleys'

MISS HENEAGE Yes, I think I will include the Dudleys!

[Here CYNTHIA'S control breaks down. Driven desperately by their chatter, she has slowly rolled her newspaper into a hall, and at this point tosses it violently to the floor and bursts into hysterical laughter.]

MRS. PHILLIMORE. Why, my dear Cynthia—Compose yourself.

PHILIP. [Hastily] What is the matter, Cynthia? [They speak together.]

MISS HENEAGE. Why, Mrs Karslake, what is the matter?

GRACE [Coming quickly forward.] Mrs. Karslake! [Curtain]

ACT II

SCENE Mrs. Vida Phillimore's boudoir. The room is furnished to please an empty-headed, pleasure-loving and fashionable woman. The furniture, the ornaments, what pictures there are, all witness to taste up-to-date. Two French windows open on to a balcony, from which the trees of Central Park can be seen. There is a table between them, a mirror, a scent bottle, etc., upon it. On the right, up stage, is a door, on the right, down stage, another door. A lady's writing-table stands between the two, nearer centre of stage. There is another door up stage; below it, an open fireplace, filled with potted plants, andirons, etc., not in use. Over it is a tall mirror; on the mantel-piece are a French clock, candelabra, vases, etc. On a line with the fireplace is a lounge, gay with silk pillows A florist's box, large and long, filled with American Beauty roses, rests on a low table near the head of the lounge Small tables and light chairs where needed

Benson, alone in the room, is looking critically about her She is a neat and pretty little English lady's maid in black silk and a thin apron Still surveying the room, she moves here and there, and, her eyes lighting on the box of flowers, she goes to the door of Vida's room and speaks to her

BENSON. Yes, ma'am, the flowers have come. [She holds open the door through which VIDA, in a morning gown, comes in slowly. She is smoking a cigarette in 10 as aesthetic a manner as she can, and is evidently turned out in her best style for conquest.]

VIDA. [Faces the balcony as she speaks, and is, as always, even and civil, but a bit disdainful toward her servant.] Terribly garish light, Benson. Pull down the — [BENSON, obeying, partly pulls down the shade] Lower still—that will do. [As she speaks she goes about the room, giving the tables a push here and the chairs a ferk there, and generally arranging the vases and ona ments.] Men hate a clutter of chairs and tables [Stop ping and taking up a hand mirror from the table, she faces the windows.] I really think I'm too pale for this light.

BENSON. [Quickly, understanding what is implied] Yes, ma'am. [BENSON goes out for the rouge, and VIDA seats herself at the table. There is a knock at the door.] Come!

[BROOKS comes in.]

BROOKS. [An ultra-English footman, in plush and calves.] Any horders, m'lady?

VIDA. [Incapable of remembering the last man, or or considering the new one.] Oh,—of course! You're the new—

BROOKS. Footman, m'lady.

VIDA. [As a matter of form.] Your name?

BROOKS. Brooks, m'lady.

[BENSON returns with the rouge.]

VIDA. [Carefully giving instructions while she keeps her eyes on the glass and is rouged by BENSON] Brooks I am at home to Mr. Karslake at eleven, not to anyone else till twelve, when I expect Sir Wilfrid Cates-Darby [BROOKS, watching BENSON, is inattentive.] BROOKS. Yes, m'lady.

VIDA. [Calm, but wearied by the ignorance of the lower classes.] And I regret to inform you, Brooks, that in America there are no ladies, except salesladies!

BROOKS. [Without a trace of comprehension.] Yes, m'lady.

VIDA. I am at home to no one but the two names I have mentioned. [BROOKS bows and exits. She dabt on rouge while BENSON holds glass.] Is the men's clubroom in order?

BENSON. Perfectly, ma'am.

VIDA. Whiskey and soda?

BENSON. Yes, ma'am, and the ticker's been mended. The British sporting papers arrived this morning

VIDA. [Looking at her watch which lies on the drawing-table.] My watch has stopped.

BENSON. [Glancing at the French clock on the chininey-piece.] Five to eleven, ma am

VIDA. [Getting promptly to work.] H'm, h'm, I shall be caught. [Rising.] The box of roses, Benson! [BENSON brings the box of roses, uncovers the flowers and places them at VIDA'S side.] My gloves—the clippers, and the vase! [Each of these things BENSON places in turn within VIDA'S range where she sits on the sofa. She has the long box of roses at her side on a small table, a vase of u ater on the floor by her side. She cuts the stems and places the roses in the vase. When she feels that she has reached a picturesque position, in which any onlooker a would see in her a creature filled with the love of flowers and of her fellowman, she says:] There! [The door opens and BROOKS comes in, VIDA nods to BENSON.]

BROOKS. [Announcing stolidly] Sir John Karslake. [JOHN, dressed in very nobby riding togs, comes in guily and forcibly. BENSON withdraws as he enters, and is followed by BROOKS. VIDA from this moment on, is busied with her roses.]

VIDA. [Languorously, but with a faint suggestion of humour.] Is that really you, Sir John?

JOHN [Lively and far from being impressed by VIDA] I see now where we Americans are going to get our titles Good-morning' You look as fresh as paint [He lays his gloves and riding crop on the table, and takes a chair.]

VIDA. [Facing the insinuation with gentle pain.] I hope you don't mean that? I never flattered myself for a moment you'd come You're riding Cynthia K'

JOHN. Fiddler's going to lead her round here in ten

VIDA. Cigars and cigarettes? Scotch? [Indicating a small table]

JOHN. Scotch [Goes up quickly to table and helps | himself to Scotch and seltzer.]

VIDA. And now do tell me all about her! [Putting in her last roses, she keeps one rosebud in her hand, of suze suitable for a man's buttonhole]

JOHN. [As he drinks] Oh, she's an adorable creature—delicate, high-bred, sweet-tempered—

VIDA. [Showing her claws for a moment.] Sweet-tempered? Oh, you're describing the horse! By "her" I meant—

JOHN. [Irritated by the remembrance of his wife.]

Cinthia Karslake? I'd rather talk about the last Tornado

[He drops moodily into a chair.]

VIDA. [With artful soothing.] There is only one thing I want to talk about, and that is, you! Why were you unhappy?

JOHN. [Still cross.] Why does a dollar last such a short time?

VIDA. [Currous.] Why did you part?

JOHN. Did you ever see a schooner towed by a tug? Well, I parted from Cynthia for the same reason that the hawser parts from the tug—I couldn't stand the tug VIDA. [Sympathizing] Ah!

JOHN. [After a pause, and still cross.] Awful cheerful morning chat

VIDA [Excusing her curiosity and coming back to love as the only subject for verious conversation.] I must hear the story, for 1m anxious to know why I've taken such a fancy to you!

JOHN. [Very nonchalantly] Why do I like you?

VIDA. [Doing her best to chaim] I won't tell you—it would flatter you too much

JOHN. [Not a bit impressed by VIDA, but humanly ready to flut] Tell me'

VIDA. There's a rose for you [Giving him the one she has in her hand.]

JOHN. [Saying what is plainly expected of him] I want more than a rose—

VIDA. [Passing over this insinuation] You refuse to tell me-->

JOHN. [Once more reminded of CYNTHIA, speaks with sudden feeling.] There's nothing to tell. We met, 70 we loved, we married, we parted, or at least we wrangled and jangled. [Sighs.] Ha! Why weren't we happy? Don't ask me, why! It may have been partly my fault

VIDA [With tenderness] Never

JOHN. [His mind on CYNTHIA] But I believe it's all in the way a girl's brought up. Our girls are brought up to be ignorant of life—they're ignorant of life. Life is a joke, and marriage is a picnic, and a man is a shawl-strap—'Pon my soul, Cynthia Deane—no, I can't tell you! [In great irritation, he rises abruptly, and 80 strides up and down the room.]

VIDA. [Gently.] Please tell me'

JOHN. Well, she was an heiress, an American heiress—and she'd been taught to think mairiage meant burnt almonds and moonshine and a yacht and three automobiles, and she thought—I don't know what she thought, but I tell you, Mrs Phillimore, marriage is three parts

⁷⁷ shawl-strap, a device for carrying shawls and blankets love and seven parts forgiveness of sins [He continues restlessly to pace the floor as he speaks of Cynthia.]

VIDA. [Flattering him as a matter of second nature.]

She never loved von.

JOHN. [On whom she has made no impression at all.] Yes, she did For six or seven months there was not a shadow between us It was perfect, and then one day she went off like a pistol-shor! I had a piece of law work and couldn't take her to see Flashlight race the 10 Maryland mare The case meant a big fee, big Kudos, and in sails Cynthia, Flashlight-mad! And will I put on my hat and take her? No—and bang she goes off like a stick o' dynamite—what did I marry her for?—and words—pretty high words, until she got mad, when she threw over a chair, and said, oh, well,—marriage was a fullure, or it was with me, so I said she'd better try somebody else She said she would, and marched out of the room

VIDA [Gently sarcastic] But she came back!

JOHN. She came back, but not as you mean. She stood at the door and said, "Jack, I shall divorce you." Then she came over to my study-table, dropped her wedding ring on my law papers, and went out The door shut. I laughed, the front door slammed, I damned [After a silence, moving abrupily to the window.] She never came back [He turns away and then, recovering, moves toward VIDA, who catches his hands.]

VIDA. [Hoping for a contradiction.] She's broken your heart

JOHN [Taking a chair by the lounge.] Oh, no!

VIDA. [Encouraged, begins to play the game again.]

You'll never love again!

JOHN. [Speaking to ber from the foot of the sofa.]
Try me¹ Try me¹ Ah, no, Mrs Phillimore, I shall laugh, live, love and make money again¹ And let me tell you one thing—I'm going to rap her one over the knuckles. She had a stick of a Connecticut lawyer, and he—well, to cut a legal story short, since Mrs Karslake's been in Europe, I have been quietly testing the validity of the decree of divorce Perhaps you don't understand?

VIDA. [Displaying her innate shrewdness.] Oh, about a divorce, everything!

JOHN. I shall hear by this evening whether the divorce will stand or not VIDA. But it's today at three she marries—you won't let her commit bigamy?

JOHN. [Shaking his head.] I don't suppose I'd go as far as that. It may be the divorce will hold, but any. way I hope never to see her again. [He sits down beside her so that their faces are now directly opposite. Taking advantage of the close range, her eyes, without loss of time, open a direct fire.]

VIDA. Ah, my poor boy, she has broken your heart [Believing that this is her psychological moment. the lays her hand on his arm, but draws it back as soon at he attempts to take it] Now don't make love to me

JOHN. [Bold and amused, but never taken in.] Why not?

VIDA. [With immense gentleness.] Because I like you too much [More garly.] I might give in, and take a notion to like you still more!

JOHN. Please do!

vida. [With gush, and determined to be womanly at all hazards] Jack. I believe you'd be a lovely lover JOHN. [Immensely diverted.] Try me!

VIDA. [Not hoping much from his tone] You charming, tempting, delightful fellow, I could love you without the least effort in the world,—but, no!

JOHN. [Playing the game.] Ah, well, now seriously' Between two people who have suffered and made their own mistakes—

VIDA. [Playing the game too, but not playing it well] But you see, you don't really love me!

JOHN. [Still ready to say what is expected.] Cynthia—Vida, no man can sit beside you and look into your eyes without feeling—

VIDA. [Speaking the truth as she sees it, seeing that ber methods don't succeed] Oh! That's not love! That's simply—well, my dear Jack, it's beginning at the wrong end. And the truth is you hate Cynthia Karslake with such a whole-hearted hate, that you haven't a moment to think of any other woman

JOHN. [With sudden anger.] I hate her!

VIDA. [Very softly and most stweetly] Jack—Jack. I could be as foolish about you as—oh, as foolish as ant-thing, my dear! And perhaps some day—perhaps some day you'll come to me and say, Vida, I am totally indifferent to Cynthia—and then—

JOHN. And then?

VIDA. [The ideal woman in mind.] Then, perhaps, we you and I may join hands and stroll together into the Garden of Eden. It takes two to find the Garden of Eden, you know—and once we're on the inside, we'll look the gate.

JOHN. [Gaily, and seeing straight through her

VIDA [Agreeing very softly.] Under a rose-bush! [There is a very soft knock at which JOHN statis up [sickly.] Come! [BROOKS comes in, with BENSON state at his heels.]

BROOKS. [Stolid, announces.] My lady—Sir Wilf— [BENSON stops him with a sharp movement and turns toward VIDA.]

BENSON [With intention.] Your dressmaker, ma'am. [BENSON waves BROOKS to go and BROOKS very haughtity complies.]

VIDA. [Wonderingly] My dressmaker, Benson? [With quick intelligence] Oh, of course, show her up Mr Karslake, you won't mind for a few minutes using my men's club-room? Benson will show you! You'll find ugars and the ticker, sporting papers, whiskey; and, if you want anything special, just 'phone down to my 'chef' IOHN [Looking at his watch] How long?

2. VIDA [Very anxious to please] Half a cigar! Benson will call you

JOHN. [Practically-minded.] Don't make it too long You see, there's my sheriff's sale on at twelve, and those races this afternoon Fiddler will be here in ten minutes, remember! [The door opens.]

VIDA [To JOHN] Run along! [JOHN leaves and VIDA, instantly practical, makes a broad gesture to BENSON.] Everything just as it was, Benson! [BENSON whisks the roses out of the vase and replaces them in the box. She gives VIDA scissors and empty vases, and, when VIDA finds heiself in precisely the same position which preceded JOHN'S entrance, she says.] There!

[BROOKS comes in as VIDA takes a rose from backet.]
BROOKS. [With characteristic stolidness] Your ladyship's dressmaker! M'lady! [Enter SIR WILFRID in morning with, boutonnière, etc.]

VIDA [With tender surprise and busy with the roses.] Is that really you, Sir Wilfrid! I never flattered myself for an instant that you'd remember to come

SIR WILFRID. [Moving to the head of the sofa] Come?
Course I come! Keen to come see you By Jove, you know, you look as pink and white as a huntin mornin VIDA. [Ready to make any man as happy as possible.] You'll smoke?

sir wilferid. Thanks! [He watches her as she trims and arrange: the flowers.] Awfully long fingers you have! Wish I was a rose, or a ring, or a pair of shears! I say, d you ever notice what a devil of a fellow I am for originality, what? [Unlike JOHN, is evidently impressed by her.] You've got a delicate little den up here! Not so much low livin' and high thinkin', as low so lights and no thinkin' at all, I hope—eh'

[By this time VIDA has filled a case with roses and rises to sweep by him and, if possible, make another charming picture to his eyes

VIDA. [Gliding gracefnily past him.] You don't mind my moving about?

SIR WILERID [Impressed] Not if you don't mind my watchin'. [Sitting down on the rof.i.] And sayin' how well you do it

VIDA. Its most original of you to come here this morning. I don't quite see why you did. [She places the roses here and there, as if to see then effect, and leaves them on a small table near the door through which 60 her visitors entered.]

SIR WILFRID Admiration

VIDA. [Sauntering slowly toward the mirror as she speaks.] Oh, I saw that you admited her! And of course, she did say she was coming here at eleven! But that was only bravado! She won't come, and besides, I've given orders to admit no one!

SIR WILFRID [Attempting to dam the stream of ber talk which flows gently but vieadily on] May I ask you—

VIDA. And, indeed, if she came now, Mr. Karslake has 10 gone, and her sole object in coming was to make him uncomfortable. [She moves toward the table, stopping a half minute at the mistor to see that she looks as she wishes to look.] Very dangerous symptom, too, that passionate desire to make ones former husband unhappy! But, I can't believe that your admiration for Cynthia Karslake is so warm that it led you to pay me this visit a half hour too early in the hope of seeing—

SIR WILFRID. [Riving, most civil, but speaking his mind like a Briton] I say, would you mind stopping a so moment! [She imiles] I'm not an American, you know. I was brought up not to interrupt But you Americans, it's different with you! If somebody didn't interrupt you, you'd go on forever

VIDA [Passing him to tantalize] My point is that you come to see Cynthia—

SIR WILFRID. [Believing she means st.] I came hopin' to see—

VIDA. [Provokingly.] Cynthia!

SIR WILFRID. [Perfectly single-minded and entirely taken in] But I would have come even if I'd known—VIDA. [Evading him, while he follows.] I don't believe it!

SIR WILFRID. [Protesting whole-heartedly.] Give you my word I—

VIDA. [Leading bim on] You're here to see her! And of course—

SIR WILFRID [Determined to be heard because, after all, he's a man.] May I have the—eh—floor? [VIDA sits down in a chair.] I was jolly well bowled over with Mrs Karslake, I admit that, and I hoped to see her here, but—

VIDA [Talking nonsense and knowing it.] You had another object in coming. In fact, you came to see Cynthia, and you came to see me! What I really long to know is, why you wanted to see me! For, of course, Cynthia's to be married at three! And if she wasn't she wouldn't have you!

SIR WILFRID [Not intending to wound; merely speaking the flat truth.] Well, I mean to jolly well ask her. VIDA. [Indignant] To be your wife?

SIR WILFRID. Why not?

VIDA. [Still indignani] And you came here, to my house—in order to ask her—

SIR WILFRID. [Truthful even on a subtle point.] Oh, 30 but that's only my first reason for coming, you know

VIDA. [Concealing her hopes.] Well, now I am curious—what is the second?

SIR WILFRID. [Simply.] Are you feelin' pretty robust? VIDA. I don't know!

SIR WILFRID [Crosses to the buffet.] Will you have something, and then I'll tell you!

VIDA. [Gaily] Can't I support the news without—SIR WILFRID [Trying to explain his state of mind, a feat which he has never been able to accomplish.]
40 Mrs Phillimore, you see it's this way Whenever you're lucky, you're too lucky Now, Mrs Karslake is a nipper and no mistake, but as I told you, the very same evenin' and house where I saw her—[He attempts to take her band.]

VIDA. [Gently rising and affecting a tender surprise.] What!

SIR WILFRID. [Rising with her.] That's it!—You're over! [He suggests with his right hand the movement of a horse taking a hurdle.]

VIDA. [Very sweetly.] You don't really mean-

SIR WILI'RID. [Carried away for the moment $b_{1/40}$, much true womanliness.] I mean, I stayed awake for an hour last night, thinkin' about you

VIDA. [Speaking to be contradicted.] But, you've just told me—that Cynthia—

sir Wilfrid. [Admitting the fact.] Well she did—she did bowl my wicket, but so did you—

VIDA. [Taking him very gently to task] Don't you think there's a limit to—[She sits down.]

SIR WILFRID. [Roused by so much loveliness of soul] of Now, see here, Mrs Phillimore! You and I are not bottle babies, eh, are we? You've been married and—I—I've knocked about, and we both know there's a lot of stuff talked about—eh, eh, well, you know—the one and only—that a fellow can't be awfully well smashed by two at the same time, don't you know! All rubbish! You know it, and the proof of the puddin's in the eatin', I am!

VIDA. [With gentle reproach.] May I ask where I come in?

sir wilfrid. Well, now, Mrs Phillimore, I'll be frank with you, Cynthia's my favourite, but you're runnin' her a close second in the popular esteem!

VIDA. [Laughing, determined not to take offence] What a delightful, original, fantastic person you are

SIR WILFRID. [Frankly happy that be has explained everything so neatly] I knew you'd take it that way' VIDA. And what next, pray?

SIR WILFRID. Oh, Just the usual,—eh,—thing,—the—eh—the same old question, don't you know Will vou have me if she don't?

vida. [A shade piqued, but determined not to this showing it.] And you call that the same old usual question?

SIR WILFRID. Yes, I know, but—but will you? I sul in a week, we can take the same boat And—eh—eh—my dear Mrs—mayn't I say Vida, I'd like to see you at the head of my table

VIDA [With velvet irony.] With Cynthia at the foot?

SIR WILFRID [Practical, as before.] Never mind Mrs Karslake,—I admire her—she's—but you have your own points! And you're here, and so'm I!—damme I offer myself, and my affections, and I'm no icicle, my dear, tell you that for a fact, and,—and in fact what's your answer!—[VIDA sighs and shakes her head] Make it ves! I say, you know, my dear Vida—[He catches in hands.]

VIDA [Drawing them from bis.] Unhand me, dear villain! And sit further away from your second choice! What can I say? I'd rather have you for a lover than any min I know You must be a lovely lover!

SIR WILFRID I am! [He makes a second effort to auth her fingers.]

VIDA Will you kindly go further away and be good! SIR WILFRID. [Quite forgetting CYNTHIA.] Look here, if you say yes, we'll be married—

VIPA. In a month!

SIR WILFRID Oh, no-this evening!

NIDA [Incapable of leaving a situation unadorned.] This evening! And sail in the same boat with you! And shall we sail to the Garden of Eden and stroll into it and lock the gate on the inside and then lose the key—under a rose-bush?

SIR WILFRID. [After a pause and some consideration.] Its yes, I say—that's too clever for me! [He draws have to her to bring the understanding to a crisis.]

VIDA [Interrupted by a soft knock.] My maid—tome'

SIR WILFRID. [Swinging out of his chair and moving to the sofa.] Ehr

BENSON. [Coming in and approaching VIDA.] The new footman, ma'am—he's made a mistake. He's told the lidy you're at home VIDA. What lady?

BENSON Mrs Karslake, and she's on the stairs, ma am

VIDA Show her in

[SIR WILFRID has been turning over the roses. On hearing this, he faces about with a long stemmed one in his hand. He subsequently uses it to point his temaiks.]

SIR WILFRID. [To BENSON who stops.] One moment! [To VIDA.] I say, eh—I'd rather not see her!

VIDA. [Very innocently.] But you came here to see her.

SIR WILFRID. [A little flustered] I'd rather not Eh,—
I foncied I'd find you and her together—but her—[Coming a step nearer.] findin' me with you looks so dooced intimate,—no one else, d'ye see, I believe she'd—draw conclusions—

BENSON. Pardon me, ma'am—but I hear Brooks coming!

SIR WILFRID. [To BENSON.] Hold the door!

VIDA. So you don't want her to know?---

SIR WILFRID [To VIDA] Be a good girl now—run me off somewhere!

VIDA [To BENSON.] Show Sir Wilfrid the men's room

[BROOKS comes in.]

SIR WILFRID The men's room! Ah! Oh! Eh!

VIDA [Beckoning him to go at once] Sir Wil—[He besitates, then as BROOKS advances, he flings off with BENSON.]

BROOKS. Lady Karslake, milady!

VIDA. Anything more inopportune! I never dreamed she'd come—[CYNTHIA comes in veiled. As she walks quickly into the room, VIDA greets her languorously.] 60 My dear Cynthia, you don't mean to say—

CYNTHIA. [Rather short, and visibly agitated.] Yes, I've come.

VIDA. [Polite, but not urgent.] Do take off your veil.

CYNTHIA. [Complying] Is no one here? VIDA. [As before.] Won't you sit down?

CYNTHIA. [Agutated and suspicious] Thanks, no— That is, yes, thanks Yes! You haven't answered my question? [CYNTHIA waves her hand through the haze. glances suspiciously at the smoke, and looks about for the cigarette.]

VIDA [Playing innocence in the first degree.] My dear, what makes you imagine any one's here!

CYNTHIA. You've been smoking

VIDA Oh, puffing away! [CYNTHIA sees the glasses.] CYNTHIA. And drinking—a pair of drinks' [Her eyes lighting on JOHN'S gloves on the table at her elbow.] Do they fit you, dear? [VIDA smiles; CYNTHIA picks up the crop and looks at it and reads her own name.] "Jack, from Cynthia"

VIDA [Without taking the trouble to double for a mere woman] Yes, dear, it's Mr. Karslake's crop, but I'm happy to say he left me a few minutes ago.

CYNTHIA. He left the house? [VIDA smiles.] I wanted to see him.

VIDA. [With a shade of insolence.] To quarrel? CYNTHIA. [Frank and curt.] I wanted to see him.

VIDA. [Determined to put CYNTHIA in the wrong.] And I sent him away because I didn't want you to repeat the scene of last night in my house

CYNTHIA [Looks at crop and is silent] Well, I can't stay I'm to be married at three, and I had to $\Gamma!$ y truant to get here!

[BENSON comes in]

BENSON [To VIDA] There's a person, ma'am, on the sidewalk

VIDA. What person, Benson?

BENSON A person, ma'am, with a horse

CYNTHIA. [Happily agriated] It's Fiddler with Cynthia K! [She walks rapidly to the window and look out.]

VIDA [To BFNSON.] Tell the man I'll be down in five minutes.

CYNTHIA. [Looking down from the balcony with delight.] Oh, there she is!

VIDA. [Ande to BENSON.] Go to the club room, Benson, and say to the two gentlemen I can't see thera 20 at present—I'll send for them when—

BENSON. [Listening] I hear some one coming

VIDA. Quick! [BENSON leaves the door which opens and JOHN comes in slowly, carelessly VIDA whispers to BENSON]

BENSON. [Moving close to JOHN and whispering]
Beg par—

VIDA [Under her breath] Go back!

JOHN [Not understanding] Beg paidon?

VIDA. [Scarcely above a whisper] Go back!

JOHN [Denic] Can't! I ve a date! With the sheriff! VIDA [A little cross] Please use your eyes

JOHN [Langhing and flattering VIDA.] I am using my eyes

VIDA. [Fretted.] Don't you see there's a lovely creature in the room!

JOHN. [Not knowing what it is all about, but taking a wicked delight in seeing her customary calm suffled.]
Of course there is.

VIDA. Hush!

JOHN. [Teasingly.] But what I want to know is— VIDA, Hush!

JOHN. [Enjoying his fun.]—is when we're to stroll in the Garden of Eden—

VIDA. Hush!

JOHN -and lose the key [To put a stop to this, she lightly tosses her handkerchief into his face.] $B_{\rm l}$ George, talk about attar of roses!

CYNTHIA [At window, excited and moved at seems, bei male once more] Oh, she's a darling! [Turning] A perfect darling! [JOHN starts up; he sees CYNTHIA at the same instant that she sees him] Oh! I didate know you were here [After a pause, with "take-it-in leave it frankine's] I came to see yo! [JOHN loo's extremely dark and angry, VIDA itses]

VIDA [To CYNTHIA, most gently and seeing there nothing to be gained of JOHN] Oh, pray feel at home Cynthia, dear! [Stopping by the door to her bedroom to JOHN] When I ve a nice street frock on, I'll ask you to present me to Cynthia K [VIDA opens the door and goes out CYNTHIA and JOHN involuntarily exchange glances]

YNTHIA [Agitated and frank.] Of course, I told you vesterday I was coming here

JOHN [Irritated] And I was to deny myself the privilege of being here?

CYNTHIA [Curt and agitated] Yes

JOHN [Read] to fight.] And you guessed I would do that?

CYNTHIA No

JOHN What?

CYNTHIA [Speaks with agitation, frankness and good will] Jack—I mean, Mr Karslake,—no, I mean, Jack—I came because—well, you see, it's my wedding dav—and—ind—I—I—was rude to you last evening. Id like to apologize and make peace with you before I go—

JOHN. [Determined to be disagreeable] Before you go to your last, long home!

CYNTHIA. I came to apologize

JOHN But you'll remain to quarrel!

CYNTHIA. [Still frank and kind] I will not quarted No'—and I'm only here for a moment I'm to be mar ried at three, and just look at the clock! Besides, I told' Philip I was going to Louise's shop, and I did—on the way here; but, you see, if I stay too long he'll telephone Louise and find I'm not there, and he might guess I was here. So you see I'm risking a scandal. And now, Jack see here, I lay my hand on the table, I'm here on the square, and,—what I want to say is, why—Jack, even if we have made a mess of our married life, let's put by anger and pride. It's all over now and can't be help-d. So let's be human, let's be reasonable, and let's be kind.

to each other! Won't you give me your hand? [JOHN retuses.] I wish you every happiness!

JOHN. [Turning away, the past rankling.] I had a client once, a murderer, he told me he murdered the man, and he told me, too, that he never felt so kindly to ambody as he did to that man after he d killed him!

(YNTHIA. Jack!

¡OHN [Unforgiving.] You murdered my happiness' (YNTHIA. I won't recriminate!

JOHN And now I must put by anger and pride! I do! But not self-respect, not a just indignation—not the facts and my clear memory of them!

CENTHIA Jack!

JOHN. No!

CYNTHIA. [With growing emotion, and holding of the hard] I give you one more chance! Yes I'm determined to be generous. I forgive everything you ever did to me. I'm ready to be friends. I wish you every happiness and every—every—horse in the world! I can't do more than that! [She offers it again.] You refuse?

JOHN. [Moved but surly.] I like wildcats and I like Christians, but I don't like Christian wildcats! Now I'm close hauled, trot out your tornado! Let the Tiger loose! It's the tamer, the man in the cage that has to look lively and use the red hot crowbar! But, by Jove, I'm out of the cage! I'm a mere spectator of the married circus! [He puffs vigorously]

CYNTHIA. Be a game sport then! Our marriage was a wager, you wagered you could live with me. You lost, you paid with a divorce, and now is the time to show your sporting blood. Come on, shake hands and part friends.

JOHN. Not in this world' Friends with you, no' I have a proper pride. I don't propose to put my pride in my pocket.

CYNTHIA. [Jealous and plain spoken] Oh. I wouldn't ask you to put your pride in your pocket while Vida's handkerchief is there [JOHN looks angered] Pretty little bijou of a handkerchief [Pulling out the handkerchief.] And she is charming, and divorced, and reasonably well made up

JOHN Oh, well, Vida is a woman [Toying with the handkerchief] I'm a man, a handkerchief is a handkerchief, and, as some old Aristotle or other said, whatever concerns a woman, concerns me!

CYNTHIA. [Not oblivious of him, but in a low voice.] Insufferable! Well, yes. [She sits down. She is too much wounded to make any further appeal.] You're pertectly right. There's no possible harmony between so divorced people! I withdraw my hand and all good feeling. No wonder I couldn't stand you. Eh? However, that's pleasantly past! But at least, my dear Karslake, let us have some sort of beauty of behaviour! If we cannot be decent, let us endeavour to be graceful. If we can't be moral, at least we can avoid being vulgar.

JOHN. Well-

CYNTHIA. If there's to be no more marriage in the JOHN. [C1 meally] Oh, but that's not it, there's to 60 be more and more and more'

CYNTHIA [With a touch of bitterness.] Very well¹ I repeat then, if there's to be nothing but marriage and divorce, and remarriage and re-divorce, at least, at least, those who are divorced can avoid the vulgarity of meeting each other here, there, and everywhere!

JOHN. Oh, that's where you come out!

CYNTHIA I thought so yesterday, and to-day I know it It's an insufferable thing to a woman of any delicacy of feeling to find her husband—

IOHN. Ahem-former

CYNTHIA. Once a husband always-

JOHN. [In the same cynical tone] Oh, no! Oh, dear, (YNTHIA. To find her—to find the man she has once lived with—in the house of—making love to—to find you here! [JOHN (miles and river)] You smile,—but I say, it should be a social axiom, no woman should have to meet her former husband

JOHN [Cynical and cutting] Oh, I don't know, 80 after I ve served my term I don't mind meeting m (YNTHIA [A1 JOHN takes chen near ber.] It's in decent—at the norse-show, the opera, at races and balls, to meet the man who once—It's not civilized! It's fantastic! It's half baked! Oh, I never should have come here! [He sympathizes, and she gous rerational and furious] But it's entirely your fault!

IOHN. My fault?

CYNTHIA. [Working berself into a rege] Of course so Y'hat business have you to be about—to be at large. To be at all!

IOHN. Gosh!

CYNTHIA. [Her rage increasing.] To be where I am! Yes, it's just as horrible for you to turn up in my life as it would be for a dead person to insist on coming back to life and dinner and bridge!

JOHN. Horrid idea!

CYNTHIA. Yes, but it's you who behave just as if you were not dead, just as if I'd not spent a fortune on your funeral You do, you prepare to bob up at afternoon ic teas,—and dinners—and embarrass me to death with your extinct personality!

JOHN. Well, of course we were married, but it didn't quite kill me.

CYNTHIA. [Angry and plain spoken.] You killed yourself for me-I divorced you I buried you out of my life If any human soul was ever dead, you are! And there's nothing I so hate as a gibbering ghost.

JOHN Oh, I say!

CYNTHIA. [With hot anger.] Go gibber and squeak 20 where gibbering and squeaking are the fashion!

JOHN [Laughing and pretending to a coldness he does not feel.] And so, my dear child, I'm to abate myself as a nuisance! Well, as far as seeing you is concerned, for my part it's just like seeing a horse who's chucked you once The bruises are OK, and you see him with a sort of easy curiosity. Of course, you know, he'll jolly well chuck the next man!-Permit me! [JOHN picks up her gloves, handkerchief and parasol, and gives her these as she drops them one by one in her 30 agitation] There's pleasure in the thought.

CYNTHIA. Oh!

JOHN. And now, may I ask you a very simple question? Mere curiosity on my part, but, why did you come here this morning?

CYNTHIA I have already explained that to you. JOHN Not your real motive Permit me! CYNTHIA. Oh!

JOHN. But I believe I have guessed your realpermit me-your real motive

CYNTHIA. Oh!

JOHN. [With mock sympathy.] Cynthia, I am sorry for you

CYNTHIA H'm?

JOHN. Of course we had a pretty lively case of the fever-the mutual attraction fever, and we were married a very short time And I conclude that's what's the matter with you! You see, my dear, seven months of married life is too short a time to cure a bad case of the fancies.

CYNTHIA. [In angry surprise.] What?

IOHN. [Calm and triumphant.] That's my diagnosis CYNTHIA. [Slowly and gathering herself together] I don't think I understand

JOHN. Oh, yes, you do, yes, you do

CYNTHIA. [With blazing eyes.] What do you mean JOHN. Would you mind not breaking my crop' Thank you! I mean [With polite impertinence] that ours was a case of premature divorce, and, ahem, you re in love with me still [He pauses. CYNTHIA has one moment of fury, then she realizes at what a disadvantage this places her She makes an immense effort, recovered her calm, thinks hard for a moment more, and then, has suddenly an inspiration.]

CYNTHIA. Jack, some day you'll get the blind staggers from concert No, I'm not in love with you, Mr Karslake but I shouldn't be at all surprised if she were Shes just your sort, you know. She's a man-eating shark, and you'll be a toothsome mouthful Oh, come now, Jack what a silly you are! Oh, yes, you are, to get off a joke like that, me-in love with-[She looks at him]

JOHN. Why are you here? [She laughs and begins to play her game] Why are you here?

CYNTHIA. Guess! [She laughs.]

JOHN. Why are you-

CYNTHIA [Quickly.] Why am I here! I'll tell yo I'm going to be married I had a longing, an irresistible longing to see you make an ass of yourself just once more. It happened!

JOHN. [Uncertain and discomfited.] I know better! CYNTHIA. But I came for a serious purpose, too $\ensuremath{\mathsf{I}}\xspace \kappa$ came, my dear fellow, to make an experiment on myself I've been with you thirty minutes, and-[She sighs with content.] It's all right!

JOHN. What's all right?

CYNTHIA. [Calm and apparently at peace with the world.] I'm ımmune.

JOHN. Immune?

CYNTHIA. You're not catching any more! Yes, you see, I said to myself, if I fly into a temper-

JOHN. You did!

CYNTHIA If I fly into a temper when I see him. well, that shows Im not yet so entirely convalescent that I can afford to have Jack Karslake at my house. If I remain calm I shall ask him to dinner

JOHN [Routed.] Ask me if you dare! [He rises.]

CYNTHIA. [Getting the whip hand for good] Ask tou to dinner? Oh, my dear fellow. [JOHN rises.] I'm going to do much more than that [She rises.] We must be friends, old man! We must meet, we must meet often, we must show New York the way the thing should be done, and, to show you I mean it—I want tou to be my best man, and give me away when I'm married this afternoon.

john. [Incredulous and impatient.] You don't mean that! [He pushes back his chair.]

(YNTHIA. There you are! Always suspicious! JOHN. You don't mean that!

CYNTHIA [Hiding her emotion under a sportstoman's manner.] Don't I? I ask you, come! And come is you are! And I'll lay my wedding gown to Cynthia K that you won't be there! If you're there, you get the gown, and if you're not, I get Cynthia K!—

JOHN. [Determined not to be worsted.] I take it!

CYNTHIA. Done' Now, then, we'll see which of us two is the real sporting goods! Shake! [They shake hands on it.] Would you mind letting me have a plain soda! [JOHN goes to the table, and, as he is rattled and sloes not regard what he is about, he fills the glass three-tourths full of whiskey. He gives this to CYNTHIA who looks him in the eye with an air of triumph.] Thanks [Maliciously, as VIDA enters.] Your hand is a bit shaky think you need a little King William [JOHN shrugs his shoulders, and, as VIDA immediately speaks, CYNTHIA lefers drinking.]

VIDA. [10 CYNTHIA.] My dear, I'm sorry to tell you your husband,—I mean, my husband—I mean Philip—he's asking for you over the 'phone You must have said you were coming here. Of course, I told him you were not here, and hung up.

BENSON. [Entering hurriedly and at once moving to VIDA.] Ma'am, the new footman's been talking with Mr. Phillimore on the wire. [VIDA, gesture of regret.] He told Mr Phillimore that his lady was here, and, if I can believe my ears, ma'am, he's got Sir Wilfrid on the 'phone now!

SIR WILFRID. [Making his appearance, perplexed and annoyed.] I say, y'know—extraordinary country, that old chap. Phillimore, he's been damned impertment over the wire! Says I've run off with Mrs. Karslake—talks about "Louise!' Now who the dooce is Louise? He s comin' round here, too—I said Mrs. Karslake wasn there—[Seeing CYNTHIA.] He!lo! Good job! so What a liar I am!

BENSON [Coming to the door. To VIDA] Mr. Fiddler, ma am, says the mare is gettin' very restive. [JOHN bears this and moves at once. BENSON withdraws]

JOHN [To VIDA.] If that mare's restive, she'll break out in a rash.

VIDA [To JOHN] Will you take me?

JOHN. Of course [They go to the door.]

CYNTHIA. [To JOHN] Tata, old man' Meet you at the altar' If I don't, the mare's mine'

[SIR WILFRID looks at her amazed]

VIDA. [To CYN1HIA.] Do the honours, dear, in my absence!

JOHN. Come along, come along, never mind them! A horse is a horse! [JOHN and VIDA go out gaily and in baste. At the same moment CYNTHIA drinks what she supposes to be her glass of plain soda. As it is whiskey straight, she is seized with astonishment and a fit of coughing. SIR WILFRID relieves her of the glass.]

SIR WILFRID. [Indicating the contents of the glass] I say, do you ordinarily take it as high up—as seven 70 fingers and two thumbs

CYNTHIA. Jack poured it out Just shows how groggy he was! And now, Sir Wilfrid—[She gets her things to go.]

SIR WILFRID. Oh, you can't go!

[BROOKS appears at the door.]

CYNTHIA. I am to be married at three.

SIR WILFRID. Let him wait [Aside to BROOKS, whom he meets near the door.] If Mr. Phillimore comes, bring his card up

BROOKS. [Going.] Yes, Sir Wilfrid.

SIR WILFRID. To me! [Tipping him]

BROOKS. [Bowing.] To you, Sir Wilfrid [BROOKS goes.]

SIR WILFRID. [Returning to CYNTHIA.] I've got to have my innings, y'know! [Looking at her more closely.] I say, you've been crying!—

CYNTHIA. King William!

SIR WILFRID. You are crying! Poor little gal!

CYNTHIA. [Tears in her eyes.] I feel all shaken and cold [BROOKS returns with a card]

80

SIR WILFRID. [Astonished and sympathetic.] Poor little gal.

CYNTHIA [Her eyes wet.] I didn't sleep a wink last night [With disgust] Oh, what is the matter with me'

[BROOKS has carried in the card to SIR WILFRID, who picks it up and says aside, to BROOKS] Phillimore? [BROOKS assents. Aloud to CYNTHIA, calmly decentful.] Who's Waldorf Smith [CYNTHIA shakes her head. To BROOKS, returning card to salver] Tell the gentleman Mrs Karslake is not here! [BROOKS leaves the room.]

CYNTHIA. [Aware that she has no business where she n.] I thought it was Philip!

So did I! [With cheerful confidence.] And now, Mrs. Karslake, I'll tell you why you're cryin' [Sitting down heside her.] You're marryin' the wrong man! I'm sorry for you, but you're such a goose. Here you are, marryin' this legal luminary What for? You don't know! He don't know! But I do! You pretend you're marryin' him because it's the sensible thing, not a bit of it You're marryin' Mr Phillimore because of all the other men you ever saw he's the least like Jack Karslake

(YNTHIA. That's a very good reason

SIR WILLIRID. There's only one good reason for marryin and that's because you'll die if you don't!

(YNTHIA. Oh, I've tried that'

SIR WILFRID. The Scripture says "Try! Try! again!" tell you, there's nothing like a w'im!

CYNTHIA. What's that' W'im' Oh, you mean a wbim' Do please try and say Wbim'

SIR WILFRID [For the first time emphasizing his H in the word] Whim. You must have a wim—wim for the chappie you marry

CYNTHIA I had-for Jack.

sir will rid. Your wim wasn't winnny enough, my dear! If you'd had more of it, and tougher, it would ha' stood, y know! Now, I'm not proposin!

10 (YNTHIA [Diverted at last from her own distress.]
1 hope not!

SIR WILLFRID. Oh, I will later! It's not time yet! As I was saying—

CYNTHIA. And pray, Sir Wilfrid, when will it be time?

SIR WII FRID As soon as I see you have a w im for me!

[Rissing, looks at his watch.] And now, I'll tell you what we'll do! We've got just an hour to get there in, my motor's on the corner, and in fifty minutes we'll be at Belmont Park.

CYNTHIA. [Her sporting blood fired.] Belmont Park's SIR WILFRID. We'll do the races, and dine at Mattins—CYNTHIA [Tempted.] Oh, if I only could' I can't' I've got to be married. You're awfully nice; I've almost got a "w im" for you already.

SIR WILFRID. [Delighted.] There you are! I'll send a telegram! [She shakes her head. He sits and with the table.]

CYNTHIA No, no, no!

SIR WILFRID [Reading what he has written.] "Oil with Cates-Darby to Races Please postpone ceremon till seven-thirty"

CYNTHIA Oh, no, it's impossible!

SIR WILFRID. [Accustomed to have things go his wan] No more than breathin! You can't get a w'im for me, you know, unless we're together, so together we'll be' [JOHN KARSLAKE opens the door, and, unnoticed, walks into the room] And tomorrow you'll wake up with a jolly little w'im— [Reading] "Postpone ceremons till seven-thirty" There. [He puts on her cloak and turning, sees JOHN.] Hello!

JOHN. [Surly.] Hello! Sorry to disturb you.

[Gring him the telegraph form.] Just the man' and send it, my boy Thanks!

[JOHN reads it.]

CYNTHIA. No, no, I can't go!

SIR WILFRID. Cockety-coo-coo-can't. I say, you must' CYNTHIA. [Postively.] No.'

JOHN. [Astounded.] Do you mean you're going—sir wilfrid. [Very gay] Off to the races, my bo' JOHN [Angry and outraged.] Mrs Karslake can't go with you there!

[CYNTHIA starts: amazed at his assumption of marii authority, and delighted that she will have an opportunity of outraging his sensibilities.]

SIR WILFRID. Oho!

JOHN An hour before her wedding!

SIR WILFRID. [Gay and not angry] May I know if it's the custom—

JOHN [Jealous and disgusted.] It's worse than eloping—

SIR WILFRID. Custom, y'know, for the husband, that

JOHN. [Thoroughly vexed.] By George, there's a limit!

CYNTHIA What? What? What? [Gathering up her; mgs] What did I hear you say?

SIR WILFRID. Ah!

JOHN. [Angry.] I say there's a limit-(NNTHIA. [More and more determined to arouse and existe JOHN] Oh, there's a limit is there?

JOHN. There is! I bar the way! It means reputation—it means—

CYNTHIA. [Enjoying ber opportunity.] We shall see what it means!

SIR WILFRID. Aha!

JOHN. [To CYNTHIA] I'm here to protect your reputation—

SIR WILLERID [To CYNTHIA.] We're got to make haste, you know

CYNTHIA Now, I'm ready-

JOHN. [To CYNTHIA] Be sensible. You're breaking off the match—

(YNTHIA. [Excitedly.] What's that to you? SIR WILFRID. It's boots and saddles!

JOHN [Taking his stand between them and the door] No thoroughfare!

SIR WILFRID. Look here, my boy-!

CYNTHIA. [Catching at the opportunity of putting JOHN in an impossible position] Wait a moment, Sir Wilfrid! Give me the wire! [Facing him] Thanks! [Taking the telegraph form from him and tearing it up] There! Too rude to chuck him by wire! But you, Jack, you ve taken on yourself to look after my interests, so I'll just ask you, old man, to run down to the Supreme Court and tell Philip—nicely, you know—I'm off with Sir Wilfrid and where! Say I'll be back by seven if I'm not later! And make it clear, Jack, I'll marry him by eight-thirty or nine at the latest! And mind joure there dear! And now, Sir Wilfrid, we're off.

10HN. [Staggered and furious, giving way as they first bim] I'm not the man to—to carry—

CYNTHIA. [Quick and dashing] Oh, yes, you are JOHN—a message from you

CYNTHIA [Triumphant] Oh, yes, you are you're just exactly the man! [CYNTHIA and SIR WILFRED whirl out.] JOHN. Great muracles of Moses!

[Custain]

ACT III

SCENE The same as that of Act I, but the room has been cleared of superfluous furniture, and arranged for a wedding ceremony Mrs. Phillimore is reclining on the sofa at the right of the table. Miss Heneage at its left Sudley is seated at the right of the table. Grace is seated on the sofa There is a wedding-bell of roses, an arch of orange blossoms, and, girdled by a ribbon of white, an altar of calla lilies. There are cushions of flowers. alcoves of flowers, vases of flowers-in short, flowers everywhere and in profusion and variety. Before the altar are two cushions for the couple to kneel on and, on pedestals, at each side of the arch, are twin candelabra The hangings are pink and white The room, first of all, and its emblems, holds the undivided attention, then slowly engaging it, and in contrast to their gay surroundings, the occupants About each and every one of them, hangs a deadly atmosphere of suppressed irritation SUDLEY. [Impatiently] All very well my dear Sarah. But you see the hour. Twenty to ten! We have been here since half-past two.

MISS HENEAGE You had dinner?

SUDLEY I did not come here at two to have dinner at eight, and be kept waiting until ten! And, my dear Sarah, when I ask where the bride is—

MISS HENEAGE [With forced compound] I have told you all I know Mr Iohn Karslake came to the house at lunch time, spoke to Philip, and they left the house together

GRACE Where is Philip?

MRS PHILLIMORF [Feebly, reritated] I don't wish to be censorious or to express an actual opinion, but I must say it's a bold bride who keeps her future mother-in-law waiting for eight hours. However, I will not venture to—[MRS PHILLIMORE reclines again and Jades away into silence]

GRACE. [Sharply and decisively] I do! I'm sorry I went to the expense of a silver ice-pitcher

[MRS. PHILLIMORE sight. MISS HENEAGE keeps her temper unth an effort which is obvious. THOMAS opens the door]

SUDLEY [To MRS PHILLIMORE] For my part, I don't believe Mrs Karslake means to return here or to marry Philip at all! THOMAS. [Coming in and approaching MISS HENE-AGE] Two telegrams for you, ma'am! The choir boys have had their supper [A slight movement ripples the ominous calm of all. THOMAS steps back.]

SUDLEY. [Rising.] At last we shall know!

MISS HENEAGE. From the lady! Probably!

[MISS HENEAGE opens the first telegram and reads it at a glance, laying it on the salver again with a look at SUDLFY. THOMAS passes the salver to SUDLEY, who takes to the telegram.]

GRACE There's a toot now.

MRS. PHILLIMORE. [Feebly, confused.] I don't wish to intrude, but really I cannot imagine Philip marrying at midnight [As SUDLFY reads, MISS HENEAGE opens the second telegram, but does not read it.]

SUDLEY. [Reading] "Accident, auto struck"—something! "Gasoline"—did something—illegible, ah! [Reads.] 'Home by nine forty-five! Hold the church!"

[A general movement sets in.]

MISS HENEAGE. [Profoundly shocked.] "Hold the 20 church!" William, she still means to marry Philip! and to-night, too!

SUDLEY. It's from Belmont Park.

GRA(E. [Making a great discovery.] She went to the races!

MISS HENEAGE This is from Philip! [Reading the second telegram.] "I arrive at ten o'clock Have dinner ready" [MISS HENEAGE motions to THOMAS, who, obeying, retires. Looking at her watch] They are both due now [Movement] What's to be done? [She rises and subject to the shoulders.]

SUDLEY. [Rising] After a young woman has spent her wedding day at the races? Why, I consider that she has broken the engagement,—and when she comes, tell her so

MISS HENEAGE. I'll telephone Matthew. The choir boys can go home—her maid can pack her belongings—and when the lady arrives—

[Impudently, the very distant toot of an auto-horn breaks in upon her words, producing, in proportion to its growing nearness, an increasing pitch of excitement and indignation. GRACE flies to the door and looks out. MRS PHILLIMORE, helpless, does not know what to do or where to go or what to say. SUDLEY moves about excitedly MISS HENEAGE stands ready to make herself disagreeable.]

GRACF. [Speaking rapidly and with excitement] I hear a man's voice. Cates-Darby and brother Matthew [A lond and brazenly misstent toot outrages afresh.

Laughter and voices outside are heard family. GRACE looks out of the door, and, as quickly withdraws.]

MISS HENEAGE. Outrageous!

SUDLEY. Disgraceful!

MRS. PHILLIMORE. Shocking! [Partly rising as the voices and horn are heard.] I shall not take any part at all, in the—eh—[She fades away.]

MISS HENEAGE. [Interrupting her.] Don't trouble yourself.

[Through the growing noise of voices and laughte. CYNTHIA'S voice is heard. SIR WILFRID is seen in the outer hall. He is burdened with uraps, not to mention a newspaper and parasol, which in no wise check his flow of gay remarks to CYNTHIA, who is still outside CYNTHIA'S voice, and now MATTHEW'S, reach those in side, and, at last, both join SIR WILFRID, who has turned at the door to wait for them. As she reaches the door, CYNTHIA turns and speaks to MATTHEW, who immediately follows her She is in automobile attire, wearing goggles, a veil, and an exquisite duster of latest Paris style. They come in with a subdued bustle and noise As their eyes light on CYNTHIA, SUDLEY and MISS HLN EAGE exclaim, and there is a general movement.]

SUDLEY. 'Pon my word!

GRACE. Hah!

MISS HENEAGE. [Bristling up to her feet, her sense bilities outraged.] Shocking!

[GRACE remains standing above sofa. SUDLEY more toward her, MISS HENEAGE sitting down again. MRS PHILLIMORE reclines on sofa. CYNTHIA begins to specifies soon as she appears and speaks fluently to the end]

CYNTHIA. No! I never was so surprised in my life as when I strolled into the paddock and they gave me a rousing reception—old Jimmy Withers, Debt Gollup Jack Deal, Monty Spiffles, the Governor and Buckeve All of my old admirers! They simply fell on my neck and, dear Matthew, what do you think I did? I turned on the water main! [There are movements and murn in of disapprobation from the family. MATTHEW indicates a desire to go.] Oh, but you can't go!

MATTHEW. I'll return in no time!

CYNTHIA. I'm all ready to be married. Are they reads? [MATTHEW waves a pious, polite gesture of recognition to the family.] I beg everybody's pardon! [Taking of her wrap and putting it on the back of a chair.] M goggles are so dusty, I can't see who's who! [To SIR WIL-FRID.] Thanks! You have carried it well [She takes the natural from SIR WILFRID.]

SIR WILFRID. [Aside to CYNTHIA.] When may I—?

SIR WILFRID. [Imperturbably.] Oh, I'm coming back! CYNTHIA. [Advancing a bit toward the family.] Not a bit of use in coming back! I shall be married before tou get here! Ta! Ta! Goodwood!

SIR WILFRID. [Not in the least affected.] I'm coming back [He goes out quickly. There are more murmurs of disapprobation from the family. There is a slight paire.]

(YNTHIA. [Beginning to take off her goggles, and moving nearer "the family."] I do awfully apologize for being so late!

MISS HENEAGE. [Importantly.] Mrs Karslake—sudley. [Importantly] Ahem! [CYNTHIA lays down goggles and sees their severity.]

CYNTHIA. Dear me' [Surveying the flowers and for a moment speechless.] Oh, good heavens! Why, it looks like a smart funeral!

[MISS HENEAGE moves; then speaks in a perfectly ordinary natural tone, but her expression is severe. CINTHIA immediately realizes the state of affairs in its fullness.]

MISS HENEAGE. [To CYNTHIA.] After what has occurred, Mrs Karslake—

CYNTHIA. [Glances quietly toward the table, and then sits down at it, composed and good-tempered] I see you got my wire—so you know where I have been.

MISS HENEAGE. To the race-course!

SUDLEY. With a rowdy Englishman. [CYNTHIA so glances at SUDLEY, uncertain whether he means to be disagreeable, or whether he is only naturally so.]

MISS HENEAGE. We concluded you desired to break the engagement!

CYNTHIA. [Indifferently] No! No! Oh! No! MISS HENEAGE. Do you intend, despite of our opinion of you—

CYNTHIA. The only opinion that would have any weight with me would be Mrs Phillimore's.

[She turns expectantly to MRS PHILLIMORE]

⁶ MRS. PHILLIMORE. I am generally asleep at this hour, and, accordingly, I will not venture to express any eh—any—actual opinion. [She fades away. CYNTHIA miles.] MISS HENEAGE. [Coldly.] You smile. We simply inform you that as regards us, the alliance is not grateful.

CYNTHIA. [Affecting gaiety and unconcern.] And all this because the gasoline gave out

SUDLEY. My patience has given out!

GRACE. So has mine 1 m going [She makes good her word.]

SUDLEY [Vexed beyond civility. To CYNTHIA.] My dear young lady You come here, to this sacred—eh—eh—spot—altar!— [Gentine] odoriferous of the paddock!—speaking of Spiffles and Buckeye,—having practically eloped!—having created a scandal, and disgraced our family!

CYNTHIA. [Affecting surprise at this attitude.] How does it disgrace you? Because I like to see a high-bred, clean, nervy, sweet little four-legged gee play the antelope over a hurdle!

MISS HENEAGE Sister, it is high time that you—[She turns to CYNTHIA with a gesture.]

CYNTHIA. [With quiet irony.] Mrs Phillimore is generally asleep at this hour, and accordingly she will not venture to express—

SUDLEY. [Spluttering with irritation.] Enough, madam—I venture to—to—to—to say, you are leading a fast life

CYNTHIA. [With powerful intention.] Not in this house! For six heavy weeks have I been laid away in 10 the grave, and I've found it very slow indeed trying to keep pace with the dead!

SUDLEY. [Despairingly.] This comes of horses! CYNTHIA. [Indignant] Of what?

SUDLEY. C-c-caring for horses!

MISS HENEAGE. [With sublime morality.] What Mrs. Karslake cares for is—men

CYNTHIA. [Angry and gay.] What would you have me care for? The Ornithorhyncus Paradoxus? or Pithacanthropus Erectus? Oh, I refuse to take you seriously & [SUDLEY begins to prepare to leave, he buttons himself into respectability and his coat]

SUDLEY My dear madam, I take myself seriously—and madam, I—I retract what I have brought with me [Feeling in his waistcoat pocket] as a graceful gift,—an Egyptian scarab—a—a—sacred beetle, which once ornamented the person of a—eh—mummy

⁵ Goodwood, an annual English horse race

CYNTHIA. [Scoring in return.] It should never be absent from your pocket, Mr. Sudley!

[SUDLEY walks away in a rage.]

MISS HENEAGE. [Rising, to SUDLEY.] I've a vast mind to withdraw my—

[CYNTHIA moves.]

CYNTHIA. [Interrupts; maliciously.] Your wedding present.' The little bronze cat!

MISS HENEAGE. [Moves, angrely.] Oh! [Even MRS PHILLIMORE comes momentarily to life, and expresses silent indignation]

10 SUBLEY. [Loftrly.] Sarah, I'm going

[GRACE, who has met PHILIP, takes occasion to accompany him into the room. PHILIP looks dusty and grim. As they come in, GRACE speaks to him, and PHILIP shakes his bead. They pause near the door]

CYNTHIA. [Emotionally] I shall go to my room! However, all I ask is that you repeat to Philip—[A i she moves toward the door, she comes suddenly upon PHILIP, and speaks to him in a low voice.]

SUDLEY. [To MISS HENEAGE, determined to win] As I go out, I shall do myself the pleasure of calling a hansom for Mrs Karslake—

[PHILIP moves slightly from the door]

PHILIP As you go out, Sudley, have a hansom called, and when it comes, get into it.

o SUDLEY. [Furious] Eh,—eh,—my dear sir, I leave you to your fate [PHIIIP angestly points him the door and SUDLEY leaves in great haste]

MISS HENEAGE. [W nb weight.] Philip, you've not heard—

PHILLP. [Intersepting.] Everything—from Grace! My sister has repeated your words to me—and her own! I ve told her what I think of ber. [PHILLIP glances witheringly at GRACE]

GRACE. I shant wait to hear any more [She flounces so out of the room.]

PHILIP. Don't make it necessary for me to tell you what I think of you [PHILIP moves to the right, toward his mother, to whom be gives his arm. MISS HENEAGE immediately seeks the opposite side.] Mother, with your permission, I desire to be alone. I expect both you and Grace, Sarah, to be dressed and ready for the ceremony a half hour from now. [As PHILIP and MRS. PHILLIMORE are about to go out. MISS HENEAGE speaks.]

MISS HENEAGE I shall come or not as I see fit And let me add, my dear brother, that a fool at forty is a fool indeed [MISS HENEAGE, bigh and mighty, goes out much pleased with her quotation.]

MRS PHILLIMORE. [Stupid and weary as usual, perillip, as he leads her to the door.] My dear son—] won't venture to express—[CYNTHIA, in uritation, motor the table.]

PHILIP. [Soothing a silly mother.] No, mother, don't But I shall expect you, of course, at the ceremony [MRS PHILLIMORE languidly veines. PHILLIP strides to the centre of the voom, taking the tone, and assuming the attitude, of the injured husband.] It is proper for me to tell you that I followed you to Belmont I am aware—I know with whom—in fact, I know all! [He puncturates his words with pauses, and indicates the whole centrolly universe.] And now let me assure you—I am the last man in the world to be jilted on the very excof—ot—everything with you I won't be jilted [CIN THIA is silent] You understand? I propose to marry you I won't be made ridiculous

CYNTHIA [Glancing at PHILIP.] Philip, I didn't mean to make you—

PHILIP. Why, then, did you run off to Belmont Park with that fellow?

CYNTHIA. Philip, I-eh-

PHILIP. [Stiting down at the table] What motive' What reason? On our wedding day? Why did you do it' CYNTHIA I'll tell you the truth I was bored PHILIP. [Staggered] Bored? In my company?

CYNTHIA. I was bored, and then—and besides, Sir Wilfrid asked me to go

PHILIP. Exactly, and that was why you went Cynthia when you promised to marry me, you told me you had forever done with love. You agreed that marriage was the rational coming together of two people.

CYNTHIA. I know, I know!

PHILIP. Do you believe that now?

CYNTHIA I don't know what I believe My brain is in a whirl! But, Philip I am beginning to be—Im afraid—yes, I am afraid that one can't just select a great and good man [Indicating bim.] and say: I will be happy with him.

PHILIP [With complacent dignity.] I don't see why not You must assuredly do one or the other You must either let your heart choose or your head select

CYNTHIA. [Gravely.] No, there's a third scheme

Sir Wilfrid explained the theory to me A woman should marry whenever she has a whim for the man, and then leave the rest to the man Do you see?

PHILIP. [Furrous] Do I see? Have I ever seen anything else? Marry for whim! That's the New York idea of marriage

CYNTHIA. [Observing cymcally.] New York ought to know

PHILIP Marry for whim and leave the rest to the divorce court! Marry for whim and leave the rest to the man. That was the former Mrs. Phillimore's idea. Only she spelled "whim" differently, she omitted the "w.' [He rises in bis anger.] And now you—you take up with this preposterous—[CYNTHIA moves uneasily.] But, non-sense! It's impossible! A woman of your mental calibre.—No. Some obscure, primitive female feeling is at work corrupting your better judgment! What is it you feel?

(YNTHIA. Philip you never felt like a fool, did you?

CYNTHIA. [Politcly] I thought not

PHILIP No, but whatever your feelings, I conclude you are ready to marry me

CYNTHIA [Uneasy] Of course, I came back I am here, am I not?

PHILIP. You are ready to marry me?

CYNTHIA. [Twisting in the coils] But you haven't had your dinner

PHILIP Do I understand you refuse?

CYNTHIA. Couldn't we defer-

PHILIP You refuse'

(YNTHIA. [Desperately thinking of an escape from her promise, and finding none] No I said I'd marry you I'm a woman of my word. I will

PHILIP [Triumpbant] Ah! Very good, then Run to your room [CYNTHIA timns to PHILIP] Throw something over you In a half hour I'll expect you here! And Cynthia, my dear, remember! I cannot cuculate like a wood-pigeon, but—I esteem you!

CYNTHIA. [Hopelessly] I think I'll go, Philip PHILIP I may not be fitted to play the love-bird, but—CYNTHIA. [Spirilessly] I think I'll go, Philip
PHILIP I'll expect you,—in half an hour.

CYNTHIA. [With leaden despair] Yes

PHILIP And, Cynthia don't think any more about that fellow, Cates-Darby.

CYNTHIA. [Amazed and disgusted by his misapprebension] No

[As CYNTHIA leaves, THOMAS comes in from the opposite door.]

PHILIP. [Not seeing THOMAS, and clumsily defiant.]

And if I had that fellow, Cates-Darby, in the dock—' 50

THOMAS Sir Wilfrid Cates-Darby

PHILIP. Six what—what—wh-who? [SIR WILFRID enters in evening diess. PHILIP looks SIR WILFRID in the face and speaks to THOMAS] Tell Sir Wilfrid Cates-Darby I am not at home to him

[THOMAS is embarrassed.]

SIR WILFRID [Undarnted] My dear Lord Eldon—PHILIP [Again addressing THOMAS] Show the gentleman the door

[There is a paise. SIR WILLERID, with a significant gesture, glances in the door]

SIR WILFRID [Moving to the door, he examines it and return to PHILIP] Eh.—I admire the door, my 60 boy! Fine old carved mahogany panel, but don't ask me to leave by it, for Mrs Karslake made me promise I'd come, and that's why I'm here

[THOMAS does not want for further orders.]

PHILIP Sii, you are-impudent-1

SIR WILEFRID [Interrupting] Ah, you put it all in a nutshell, don't you?

PHILIP. To show your face here, after practically eloping with my wife!

SIR WILLERID. [Affecting ignorance] When were you married?

PHILIP We are as good as married

SIR WILFRID Oh, pooh, pooh! You can't tell me that grace before soup is as good as a dinner! [He takes out his cigar-case and, in the absence of a match, enjoys a smokeless smoke]

PHILIP. Sir-I-demand-

SIR WILFRID [Calmly carrying the vituation.] Mrs Karslake is not married That's why I'm here I am here for the same purpose you are, to ask Mrs Karslake to be my wife

PHILIP Are you in your senses?

SIR WILFRID. [Pricking his American countr's pet vanity] Come, come, Judge—you Americans have no sense of humour [Taking a small jewel-case from his pocket] There's my regards for the lady—and [Reaconably], if I must go, I will Of course, I would like to see her, but—if it isn't your American custom— THOMAS [Opens the door and announces.] Mr. Karslake

SIR WILFRID. Oh, well, I say; if he can come, I can! [JOHN KARSLAKE, in evening dress, comes in quickly, carrying a large and very smart bride's bouquet, which he hands to PHILIP, who stands transfixed. Because it never occurs to him to refuse it or chuck it away, PHILIP accepts the bouquet gingerly, but frees himself of it at the first available moment. JOHN walks to the centre of the room. Deep down he is feeling wounded and unhappy. But, as he knows his coming to the ceremony on whatever pretext is a social outrage, he carries it off by assuming an air of its being the most natural thing in the world. He controls the expression of his deeper emotion, but the pressure of this keeps his face grave, and he speaks with effort.]

JOHN My compliments to the bride, Judge.

PHILIP. [Angry] And you, too, have the effrontery SIR WILFRID There you are

JOHN. [Pretending ease] Oh, call it friendship— [THOMAS leaves.]

PHILIP [Puts bouquet on table. Ironically.] I sup-10 pose Mrs Karslake—

JOHN She wagered me I wouldn't give her away, and of course—[Throughout his stay JOHN hides the emotions he will not show behind a during irony Under its effects, PHILIP, on his right, walks about in a fury. SIR WILLIRID, sitting down on the edge of the table, is gay and undisturbed.]

PHILIP [Taking a step toward JOHN.] You will oblige me—both of you—by immediately leaving—

JOHN. [Sm:ling and going to PHILIP.] Oh, come, 20 come, Judge—suppose I am here? Who has a better right to attend his wife's obsequies! Certainly, I come as a mourner—for you!

SIR WILFRID. 1 say, is it the custom?

JOHN. No, no—of course it's not the custom, no. But we'll make it the custom. After all,—what's a divorced wife among friends?

PHILIP. Sir, your humour is strained!

JOHN. Humour,-Judge?

PHILIP. It is, sir, and I ll not be bantered! Your both 30 being here is—it is—gentlemen, there is a decorum which the stars in their courses do not violate do in their divorces! Get down to earth of the present day Rufus Choate and Daniel Webster are dead Y_{0u} must be modern. You must let peroration and poetry alone! Come along now. Why shouldn't I give the lady away?

JOHN Now, Judge, never you mind what the stars

SIR WILFRID. Hear! Hear! Oh, I beg your pardon' JOHN. And why shouldn't we both be here? American marriage is a new thing. We've got to strike the pace, and the only trouble is, Judge, that the judiciars have so messed the thing up that a man can't be sure he is married until he's divorced. It's a sort of marrygo-round, to be sure! But let it go at that! Here we all are, and we're ready to marry my wife to you, and start her on her way to him!

PHILIP. [Brought to a standstill.] Good Lord' Sir, you cannot trifle with monogamy'

JOHN. Now, now, Judge, monogamy is just as extinct as knee-breeches. The new woman has a new idea, and the new idea is—well, it's just the opposite of the old Mormon one. Their idea is one man, ten wives and a hundred children. Our idea is one woman, a hundred husbands and one child.

PHILIP. Sir, this is polyandry.

JOHN. Polyandry? A hundred to one it's polyandry, and that's it, Judge! Uncle Sam has established consecutive polyandry,—but there's got to be an interval between husbands! The fact is, Judge, the modern American marriage is like a wire fence. The woman's the wire—the posts are the husbands. [He indicates biniself, and then SIR WILFRID and PHILIP.] One—two—three! And if you cast your eye over the future you cast count them, post after post, up hill, down dale, all the way to Dakota!

PHILIP. All very amusing, sir, but the fact remains— JOHN. [Going to PHILIP who at once moves awai] Now, now, Judge, I like you But you're asleep, you're living in the dark ages You want to call up Central "Hello, Central! Give me the present time, 1900 New York!"

SIR WILFRID. Of course you do, and—there you are PHILIP. [Heavily.] There I am not, sir' And—[To JOHN.] as for Mr. Karslake's ill-timed jocosity,—sir, in the future—

SIR WILFRID. Oh, hang the future!

PHILIP I begin to hope, Sir Wilfrid, that in the future I shall have the pleasure of hanging you! [To JOHN.]

And as to you, sir, your insensate idea of giving away your own—your former—my—your—oh! Good Lord! This is a nightmare! [He turns to go in despair. MATTHEW, coming in, meets him, and stops him at the door.]

MATTHEW. [To PHILIP.] My dear brother, Aunt Sarah Heneage refuses to give Mrs Karslake away, unless you yourself.—eh—

PHILIP. [As he goes out.] No more! I'll attend to

[The CHOIR BOYS are heard practising in the next room]

MATTHEW. [Mopping his brow] How do you both do' My aunt has made me very warm [Ringing the hell] You hear our choir practising—sweet angel boys! Hm! H'm! Some of the family will not be present I am very fond of you, Mr Karslake, and I think it admirably Christian of you to have waived your—eh—your—eh—that is, now that I look at it more narrowly, let me say, that in the excitement of pleasurable anticipation, I forgot, Karslake, that your presence might occasion remark—[THOMAS responds to his ring] Thomas! I left, in the hall, a small hand-bag or satchel containing my surplice

THOMAS Yes, sir Ahem!

MATTHEW. You must really find the hand-bag at once

[THOMAS turns to go, when he stops startled]

THOMAS. Yes, sir [Announcing in consternation]
Mis Vida Phillimore [VIDA PHILLIMORE, in full evening dress, steps gently up to MATTHEW]

MATTHEW [Always pionsly serene] Ah, my dear child' Now this is just as it should be! That is, ch—[He walks to the centre of the room with her, VIDA, the while, pointedly disregarding SIR WILFRID] That is, when I come to think of it—your presence might be deemed inauspicious

VIDA But, my dear Matthew,—I had to come [Aside to him] I have a reason for being here

[THOMAS, who has left the room, again appears.]

MATTHEW. [With a helpless gesture.] But, my dear child-

THOMAS. [With sympathetic intention] Sir, Mr
Phillimore wishes to have your assistance, sir—with Miss Heneage immediately!

MATTHEW Ah! [To VIDA] One moment! I'll return [To THOMAS.] Have you found the bag with my surplice? [He goes out with THOMAS, speaking. SIR WILFRID moves at once to VIDA. JOHN, moving to a better position, watches the door.]

SIR WILFRID. [To VIDA.] You're just the person I most want to see!

VIDA. [With affected itimess.] Oh, no, Sir Wilfrid, Cynthia isn't here yet! [She moves to the table, and JOHN, his eyes on the door, coming toward her, she so speaks to him with obvious succeiness.] Jack, dear, I never was so ravished to see anyone

SIR WILFRID [Taken aback] By Jove'

VIDA. [Very sweet] I knew I should find you here!

JOHN [Annoyed but civil.] Now don't do that'

VIDA. [Sweeter than ever] Jack' [They sit down.]

JOHN [Civil but plain spoken.] Don't do it'

VIDA. [In a voice dripping with honey] Do what, ack'

JOHN Touch me with your voice! I have troubles 60 enough of my own [He sits not for from her; the table between them |

VIDA. And I know who your troubles are! Cynthia! [From this moment VIDA abandons JOHN as an object of the chase and works him into her other game]

JOHN I hate her I don't know why I came VIDA. You came, dear, because you couldn't stay away—you're in love with her

JOHN. All right, Vida, what I feel may be love but all I can say is, if I could get even with Cynthia 70 Kaislake—

VIDA You can, dear—it's as easy as powdering one's face, all you have to do is to be too nice to me'

JOHN [Looking at her inquiringly] Eh!

VIDA. Don't you realize she's jealous of you' Why did she come to my house this morning' She's jealous—and all you have to do—

JOHN If I can make her wince, I'll make love to you till the Heavenly cows come home!

VIDA. Well, you see, my dear, if you make love to 80 me it will [Delicately indicating SIR WILFRID] cut both ways at once!

JOHN Eh,—what! Not Cates-Dar'sy? [Starting] Is that Cynthia?

VIDA Now don't get rattled and forget to make love to me

JOHN I've got the jumps [Trying to follow her instruction] Vida, I adore you

VIDA. Oh you must be more convincing; that won't do at all

JOHN [Listening.] Is that she now?

[MATTHEW comes in and passes to the inner room.]

VIDA It's Matthew. And, Jack, dear, you'd best get the hang of it before Cynthia comes. You might tell me all about your divorce. That's a sympathetic subject.

Were you able to undermine it?

JOHN. No, I've got a wire from my lawyer this morning. The divorce holds. She's a free woman. She can marry whom she likes. [The organ is heard, very sofily played.] Is that Cynthia? [He rises quickly.]

VIDA. It's the organ!

JOHN. [Overwhelmingly excited] By George! I should never have come! I think I'll go. [He makes a movement toward the door.]

VIDA. [Rises and follows him remonstratingly.] When I need vou?

JOHN. I can't stand it.

VIDA. Oh, but, Jack-

20 JOHN Good-night!

VIDA. I teel quite ill [Seeing that she must play her last card to keep him, pretends to faintness; sways and falls into his arms.] Oh!

JOHN [In a rage, but beaten.] I believe you're putting up a fake.

[The organ swells as CYNTHIA enters sweepingly, dressed in full evening dress for the wedding ceremony. JOHN, not knowing what to do, keeps his arms about VIDA as a horrid necessity]

CYNTHIA [Speaking as the comes in, to MATTHEW.]

Here I am Ridiculous to make it a conventional thing, you know Come in on the swell of the music, and all that, just as if I'd never been married before Where's Philip? [She looks for PHILIP and sees JOHN with VIDA in his arms. She stops that]

JOHN [Uneasy and embarrassed.] A glass of water! I beg your pardon, Mrs Karslake—

[The organ plays on.]

CYNTHIA [Ironical and calm.] Vida!

JOHN. She has fainted.

CYNTHIA. [Cynically.] Fainted? [Without pausing.]
Dear, dear, dear, teirible! So she has [SIR WILFRID takes the flowers from a vase and prepares to sprinkle VIDA'S forchead with the water it contains.] No. no. 40 not her forchead, Sir Wilfrid, her frock! Sprinkle her best Paquin! If it's a real faint, she will $_{\mbox{\scriptsize nor}}$ come to!

VIDA. [Coming quickly to her senses as her Paris importation is about to suffer.] I almost fainted.

CYNTHIA. Almost!

VIDA. [Using the stock phrase as a matter of course, and reviving rapidly.] Where am I? [JOHN glamest at CYNTHIA sharply.] Oh, the bride! I beg everyone's pardon Cynthia, at a crisis like this, I simply couldn't stav away from Philip!

CYNTHIA. Stay away from Philip?

[JOHN and CYNTHIA exchange glances.]

VIDA. Your arm, Jack, and lead me where there is air [JOHN and VIDA go into the further room. The organ stops SIR WILFRID and CYNTHIA are practically alone in the room. JOHN and VIDA are barely within sight He is first seen to take her fan and give her air; then to pick up a book and read to her]

SIR WILFRID. I've come back.

CYNTHIA. [To SIR WILFRID.] Asks for air and goes to the greenhouse. [CYNTHIA crosses the room and SIR WILFRID offers her a seat.] I know why you are here It's that intoxicating little whim you suppose me to have for you My regrets! But the whim's gone flat. Yes yes, my gasoline days are over I'm going to be garaged for good However, I'm glad you're here, you take the edge off—

SIR WILFRID. Mr Phillimore?

CYNTHIA. [Sharply.] No, Karslake I'm just waiting to say the words [THOMAS comes in unnoticed.] "love honour and obey" to Phillimore—[Looking back] and at Karslake! [Seeing THOMAS.] What is it? Mr Phillimore?

THOMAS. Mr Phillimore will be down in a few minutes, ma'am. He's very sorry, ma'am. [Lowering his voice and coming nearer to CYNTHIA, mindful of the respect 3. abilities], but there's a button off his waistcoat.

CYNTHIA. [Rising. With irony.] Button off his waistcoat!

[THOMAS goes out.]

SIR WILFRID. [Delightedly] Ah! So much the better for me [CYNTHIA looks into the other room] Now then, never mind those two! [Cynthia moves resiless!)] Sit down.

CYNTHIA I can't

SIR WILFRID. You re as nervous as-

CYNTHIA. Nervous! Of course I'm nervous! So would tou be nervous if you'd had a runaway and smash up, and you were going to try it again. [She is unable to tie, her eyes from VIDA and JOHN, and SIR WILFRID, noting this, grows uneasy.] And if some one doesn't do way with those calla lilies—the odor makes me faint! SIR WILFRID moves.] No, it's not the lilies! It's the ounge blossoms!

SIR WILFRID. Orange blossoms?

CANTHIA. The flowers that grow on the tree that hangs over the abyss! [SIR WILFRID promptly confiscates to take of orange blossoms.] They smell of six o'clock in the evening. When Philip's fallen asleep, and little bots are crying the winners outside, and I'm crying inside, and dying inside and outside and everywhere.

SIR WILEFRID [Returning to her side.] Sorry to disppoint you They're artificial [CYNTHIA shrings her shoulders.] That's it' They're emblematic of artificial domesticity! And I'm here to help you balk it [He sits lown and CYNTHIA half rises and looks toward JOHN and VIDA] Keep still now, I've a lot to say to you stop looking—

CYNTHIA. Do you think I can listen to you make love to me when the man who—who—whom I most despise in all the world, is reading poetry to the woman who—who got me into the fix I'm in!

SIR WILERID. [Leaning over her chan.] What do you want to look at 'em for' [CYNTHIA moves] Let 'em be and listen to me! Sit down, for damme, I'm determined CYNTHIA [Now at the table and half to herself] won't look at them! I won't think of them Beasts! SIR WILERID interposes between her and her view of IOHN THOMAS opens the door and walks in.]

SIR WILFRID Now, then -[He sits down.]

(YNTHIA. Those two here' It's just as if Adam and Eve should invite the snake to their golden wedding [Seeing THOMAS] What is it, what's the matter'

THOMAS Mr Phillimore's excuses ma'am In a very short time— [THOMAS goes out]

SIR WILFRID. I'm on to you! You hoped for more buttons!

CYNTHIA. I'm dying of the heat, fan me [SIR WILFRID fans CYNTHIA.]

SIR WILFRID. Heat! No! You're dying because you're ignorin' nature. Certainly you are! You're marryin' Phillimore! [CYNTHIA appears faint.] Can't ignore nature,

Mrs. Karslake Yes, you are; you're forcin' your feelin's [CYNTHIA glances at bim.] And what you want to do is to let yourself go a bit—up anchor and sit tight! I'm no seaman, but that's the idea! [CYNTHIA moves and shakes ber bead.] So just throw the reins on nature's 50 neck, jump this fellow Phillimore and marry me! [He leans toward CYNTHIA.]

CYNTHIA. [Naturally, but with irritation.] You propose to me here, at a moment like this? When I'm on the last lap—just in sight of the goal—the gallows—the halter—the altar, I don't know what its name is! No, I won't have you! [Looking toward KARSLAKI and VIDA.] And I won't have you stand near me! I won't have you talking to me in a low tone! [Her eyes glied on JOHN and VIDA.] Stand over there—stand where so you are.

SIR WILFRID. 1 say-

CYNTHIA. I can hear you-I'm listening!

SIR WILFRID Well, don't look so hurried and worried You've got buttons and buttons of time. And now my offer You haven't yet said you would—

CYNTHIA. Marry you? I don't even know you!

sir wilfrid. Many your Tudnit etch know your sir wilfrid. [Feeling sure of being accepted] Oh,—tell you all about myself I'm no duke in a pickle o' debts, d'ye see? I can marry where I like Some o my no countrymen are rotters, ye know. They'd marry a monkey, if poppa-up-the-tree had a corner in cocoanuis! And they do marry some queer ones, ye know. [CYN-THIA looks beyond him, exclaims and tinne. SIR WII-FRID turns.]

CYNTHIA. Do they?

SIR WILFRID Oh, rather That's what's giving your heiresses such a bad name lately. If a fellah's in debt he can't pick and choose, and then he swears that American gals are awfully fine lookers, but they're no good when but comes to continuin' the race! Fair dolls in the drawin'room, but no good in the nursery.

CYNTHIA [Thinking of JOHN and VIDA and nothing clse.] I can see Vida in the nursery

SIR WILFRID You understand when you want a brood mare, you don't choose a Kentucky mule

CYNTHIA. I think I see one

SIR WILFRID. Well, that's what they're saying over there They say you gals run to talk [He plainly remembers VIDA'S tolubility] and I have seen gals here that would chat life into a wooden Indian! That's what you Americans call being clever.—All brains and no stuffin'! In fact, some of your American gals are the nicest boys I've ever met

CYNTHIA So that's what you think?

SIR WILFRID. Not a bit what I think—what my countrymen think!

CYNTHIA Why are you telling me?

SIR WILLIRID. Oh, just explaining my character. I'm the sort that can pick and choose—and what I want is to beart.

CYNTHIA. [VIDA and JOHN ever in mind.] No more heart than a dragon-fly!

[The organ begins to play softly.]

SIR WILFRID. That's it, dragon-fly. Cold as stone and never stops buzzing about showin' off her colours It's that American dragon-fly girl that I'm afraid of, because, d'ye see, I don't know what an American expects when he marries, yes, but you're not listening!

CYNTHIA. I am listening I am!

SIR WILLFRID. [Speaking directly to her.] An English-20 man, ye see, when he marries expects three things love, obedience, and five children

CYNTHIA. Three things! I make it seven!

SIR WILLIRID Yes, my dear, but the point is, will you be mistress of Traynham?

CYNTHIA. [Who has only half listened to him] No, Sir Wilfrid, thank you, I won't [She turns to see JOHN walk across the drawing-room with VIDA, and apparently absorbed in what she is saying] Its outrageous!

SIR WILFRID. Eh? Why are you crying?

(YNTHIA. [Almost sobbing] I am not!

SIR WILFRID You're not crying because you're in love with me?

CYNTHIA I'm not crying—or if I am, I'm crying because I love my country Its a disgrace to America—cast-off husbands and wives getting together in a parlour and playing tag under a palm-tree [JOHN. with intention and determined to stab CYNTHIA, kisses VIDA'S band]

SIR WILFRID. Eh! Oh! I'm damned! [To CYNTHIA.] 40 What do you think that means?

CYNTHIA. I don't doubt it means a wedding here, at once—after mine! [VIDA and JOHN leave the drawing-room and walk slowly toward them.]

VIDA. [Affecting an impossible intimacy to wound CYNTHIA and tantalize SIR WILFRID.] Hush, Jack—I'd much rather no one should know anything about $_{\rm i}$ until it's all over!

CYNTHIA. [Starting and looking at SIR WILFRID.]
What did I tell you?

VIDA. [To CYNTHIA.] Oh, my dear, he's asked me to champagne and lobster at your house—his house! Matthew is coming! [CYNTHIA starts, but controls ber self.] And you're to come, Sir Wilfrid. [Intending to convey the idea of a sudden marriage ceremony.] Of course, my dear, I would like to wait for your wedding but something rather—rather important to me is to take place, and I know you'll excuse me.

[The organ stops.]

SIR WILFRID. [Piqued at being forgotten.] All ven neat, but you haven't given me a chance, even.

VIDA. Chance? You're not serious?

SIR WILFRID. I am!

VIDA. [Striking while the iron is hot.] I'll give you a minute to offer yourself

SIR WILFRID. Eh?

VIDA. Sixty seconds from now

SIR WILFRID. [Uncertain] There's such a thing as bein' silly.

VIDA. [Calm and determined.] Fifty seconds left

SIR WILFRID. I take you—count fair [He hands her bis watch and goes to where CYNTHIA stands] I sat Mrs. Karslake—

CYNTHIA. [Overwhelmed with giref and emotion They're engaged, they're going to be married tonight over champagne and lobster at my house!

SIR WILFRID. Will you consider your-

CYNTHIA [Hastily, to get rid of him] No, no, no, no. Thank you, Sir Wilfrid, I will not

SIR WILFRID. [Calm, and not to be laid low.] Thinks awfully. [CYNTHIA walks away. Returning to VIDA.] Mrs Phillimore—

VIDA. [Returning his watch.] Too late! [To KARN LAKE.] Jack, dear, we must be off

sir Wilfrid. [Standing and making a general appear for information.] I say, is it the custom for American girls—that sixty seconds or too late? Look here! Not a bit too late. I'll take you around to Jack Karslake's, and I'm going to ask you the same old question again, you know [To vida] By jove, you know in your country it's the pace that kills. [Sir Wilfrid follows vida out the door.]

JOHN. [Gravely to CYNTHIA, who has walked away.]
Good-night, Mrs. Karslake, I'm going, I'm sorry I came.
CYNTHIA. Sorry? Why are you sorry? [JOHN looks at her: she winces a little.] You've got what you wanted.
[After a pause.] I wouldn't mind your marrying Vida—
10HN. [Gravely.] Oh, wouldn't you?

CYNTHIA. But I don't think you showed good taste in engaging yourselves here.

JOHN. Of course, I should have preferred a garden of roses and plenty of twilight (YNTHIA. [Rushing into speech.] I'll tell you what you have done—you've thrown yourself away! A woman like that! No head, no heart! All languor and loose—loose frocks—she's the typical worst thing America can do! She's the regular American marriage worm!

JOHN. I have known others-

CYNTHIA. [Quickly.] Not me I'm not a patch on that woman. Do you know anything about her life? Do you know the things she did to Philip? Kept him up every night of his life—forty days out of every thirty—and then, without his knowing it, put brandy in his coffee to make him lively at breakfast

JOHN. [Banteringly.] I begin to think she is just the woman—

CYNTHIA. [Unable to quiet her jealousy.] She is not the woman for you! A man with your bad temper—your airs of authority—your assumption of—of—everything What you need is a good, old-fashioned, bread-poultice woman! [CYNTHIA comes to a full stop and faces him.] JOHN. [Sharply.] Can't say I've had any experience of the good old-fashioned bread-poultice

CYNTHIA. I don't care what you say! If you marry Vida Phillimore—you sha'n't do it [Tears of rage choking her.] No, I liked your father and, for his sake, I'll see that his son doesn't make a donkey of himself a second time

JOHN. [Too angry to be amused.] Oh, I thought I was divorced. I begin to feel as if I had you on my hands still CYNTHIA. You have! You shall have! If you attempt to marry her, I'll follow you—and I'll find her—I'll tell Vida—[He turns to her.] I will. I'll tell Vida just what sort of a dance you led me.

JOHN. [Quickly on her last word but speaking graveh] Indeed! Will you? And why do you care what happens to me? CYNTHIA. [Startled by his tone.] I—I—ah—
JOHN. [Insistently and with a faint hope.] Why do you care?

CYNTHIA. I don't Not in your sense— JOHN How dare you then pretend— CYNTHIA. I don't pretend

JOHN. [Interrupting her; proud, serious and strong.] How dare you look me in the face with the eyes that I once kissed, and pretend the least regard for me? [CYNTHIA recoils and looks away Her own feelings are revealed to her clearly for the first time.] I begin to understand our American women now Fire-files—and the fire they gleam with is so cold that a midge couldn't warm his heart at it, let alone a man. You're not 60 of the same race as a man! You married me for nothing, divorced me for nothing, because you are nothing!

CYNTHIA. [Wounded to the heart.] Jack! What are you saying?

JOHN. [With unrestrained emotion] What,—you feigning an interest in me, feigning a lie—and in five minutes—[With a gesture, indicating the aliar] Oh, you've taught me the trick of your sex—you're the woman who's not a woman!

CYNTHIA. [Weakly] You're saying terrible things to me.

JOHN. [Low and with intensity] You haven't been divorced from me long enough to forget—what you should be ashamed to remember

CYNTHIA [Unable to face him and pretending not to understand him] I don't know what you mean?

JOHN. [More forcibly and with manly emotion.] You're not able to forget me! You know you're not able to forget me, ask yourself if you are able to forget me, and when your heart, such as it is, answers "no," then—[The organ is plainly heard] Well, then, prance gaily up to the altar and marry that, if you can! [He abruptly quits the room and CYNTHIA, moving to an armchair, sinks into it trembling. MATTHEW comes in and is joined by MISS HENEAGE and PHILIP. They do not see CYNTHIA buried deeply in her chair. Accordingly, MISS HENEAGE moves over to the sofa and waits They are all dressed for an evening reception and PHILIP is in the traditional bridegroom's rig.]

MATTHEW [As he enters] I am sure you will do your part, Sarah—in a spirit of Christian decorum [To PHILIP.] It was impossible to find my surplice, Philip, but the more informal the better.

PHILIP. [With pompous responsibility.] Where's Cvnthia?

[MATTHEW gives a glance around the room]

MATTHEW. Ah, here's the choir! [He moves forward to meet it CHOIR BOYS come in very orderly, divide and take their places, an even number on each side of the altar of flowers. MATTHEW vaguely superintends PHILIP gets in the way of the bell and moves out of the way in Thomas, I directed you— One moment, if you please [He indicates the tables and chairs which THOMAS hastens to push against the wall.]

PHILIP. [Walking forward and looking around him.]

PHILIP. [Walking forward and looking around him.] Where's Cynthia? [CYNTHIA rises, and, at the movement, PHILIP sees her and moves toward her. The organ grows suddenly silent]

(YNTHIA. [Faintly] Here I am

[MATTHEW comes down; organ plays softly]

MAITHFW. [To CYNTHIA] Ah, my very dear Cynthia, I knew there was something. Let me tell you the words of the hymn I have chosen

"Enduring love, sweet end of strife!

Oh, bless this happy man and wife!"
I'm afraid you feel—eh!

CYNTHIA. [Desperately calm] I feel awfully queer—I think I need a scotch [Organ stops. PHILIP remains uneasily at a little distance. MRS. PHILLIMORE and GRACE enter back slowly, as cheerfully as if they were going to hear the funeral service read. They remain near the doorway]

MATTHEW. Really, my dear, in the pomp and vanity—I mean—ceremony of this—this unique occasion, there should be sufficient exhilaration

CYNTHIA [With extraordinary control.] But there 30 isn't! [Feeling weak, she sits down.]

MATTHEW. I don't think my Bishop would approve of—eh—anything before!

(YNTHIA. [Too aguated to know how much she is moved.] I feel very queer.

MATTHEW. [Prously sure that everything is for the best] My dear child-

CYNTHIA. However, I suppose there's nothing for it—now—but—to—to—

MATTHEW. Courage!

40 CYNTHIA [Desperate and with a sudden explosion.]

Oh, don't speak to me. I feel as if I'd been eating gun powder, and the very first word of the wedding $serv_{ik}e$ would set it off!

MATTHEW. My dear, your indisposition is the voice of nature [CYNTHIA speaks more rapidly and with growing excitement. MATTHEW makes a movement toward the CHOIR BOYS.]

CYNTHIA. Ah,—that's it—nature! [MATTHEW shakei his head.] I've a great mind to throw the reins on na ture's neck

PHILIP. Matthew! [He moves to take his stand for the ceremony.]

MATTHEW. [Looks at PHILIP. To CYNTHIA] Philip is ready [PHILIP comes forward and the organ plays the wedding march.]

CYNTHIA [To herself as if at bay] Ready? Ready?

MATTHEW Cynthia, you will take Miss Heneage's arm [MISS HENEAGE moves stiffly nearer to the table] Sarah' [He waves MISS HENEAGE m the direction of CYNTHIA at which she advances a joyless step or two MATTHEW goes over to give the choir a low direction.] Now please don't forget, my boys When I raise my hands so, you begin, "Enduring love, sweet end of strife," etc. [CYNTHIA has risen. On the table by which she stands is her long lace cloak MATTHEW assumes sacerdotal importance and takes his position inside the altar of flowers.] Ahem! Philip! [He signs to Philip to take his position] Sarah! [CYNTHIA breathes fast, and supports hereelf against the table MISS HENEAGE, with the silent air of similarly, goes toward her and stands for a moment looking at her.] The ceremony will now begin

[The organ plays Mendelssohn's wedding march CN THIA turns and faces MISS HENEAGE. MISS HENEAGF slowly reaches CYNTHIA and extends her hand in his readiness to lead the bride to the altar]

MISS HENEAGE Mrs Karslake!

PHILIP Ahem' [MATTHEW ualks forward two or three steps CYNTHIA stands as if turned to stone.]

MATTHEW My dear Cynthia I request you—to take your place [CYNTHIA moves one or two steps as if to go up to the altar She takes MISS HENEAGE'S hand and slowly they walk toward MATTHEW] Your husband to be—is ready, the ring is in my pocket I have only to ask you the—eh—necessary questions,—and—eh—all will be blissfully over in a moment [The organ grows louder]

CANTHIA. [At this moment, just as she reaches PHILIP, stops, faces round, looks him, MATTHEW, and the rest in the face, and cries out in despan.] Thomas! Call a handom! [THOMAS goes out, leaving the door open. MISS HENEAGE crosses the room quickly: MRS. PHILLIMORE, bucked into action, rises. CYNTHIA catches up her cloak from the table. PHILIP turns and CYNTHIA comes forward and stops.] I can't, Philip—I can't [Whistle of hansom is heard off, the organ stops.] It is simply a case of throwing the reins on nature's neck—up anchor—and sit tight' [MATTHEW moves to CYNTHIA] Matthew, don't come near me! Yes, yes, I distrust you It's your business, and tou'd marry me if you could

PHILIP. [Watching her in dismay as she throws on bei cloak.] Where are you going?

CYNTHIA I'm going to Jack

PHILIP. What for?

CYNTHIA. To stop his mairying Vida I'm blowing a hurricane inside, a horrible, happy hurricane! I know myself—I know what's the matter with me If I married you and Miss Heneage—what's the use of talking about it—he mustn't marry that woman He sha'n't [CYNTHIA has now all her wraps on and walks toward the door rapidly. To PHILIP] Sorry' So long! Good-night and see you later [Reaching the door, she goes out in blind haste and without further ceremony. MATTHEW, in absolute amazement, throws up his arms PHILIP is rigid MIS PHILLIMORE sinks into a chair MISS HENEAGE stands supercilious and unmoved. GRACE, the same. The choir, at MATTHEW's gesture, mistakes it for the concerted signal, and binists lustily into the Epithalamis:

Enduring love—sweet end of strife!

Oh, bless this happy man and wife!"

[Gustain]

ACT IV

SCENE The scene is laid in John Karslake's study and smoking-room. There is a bay window on the left. A door on the left leads to stairs and the front of the house, while a door at the back leads to the dining-room. A fireplace and a mantel are on the right. A bookcase contains law and sporting books. On the wall is a full-length portrait of Cynthia. Nothing of this portrait is seen by audience except the gilt frame and a space of canvas. A large table with writing materials is littered over with law books, sporting books, papers, pipes, crops, a pair of spurs, etc. A wedding ring lies on it. There are three very low easy-chairs. The general appearance of the room is extremely gay and garish in colour. It has the easy confusion of a man's room. There is a small table on which, lying open, is a woman's sewing-basket, and, beside it, a piece of rich fancy-work, as if a lady had just risen from sewing. Laid on the further end of it are a lady's gloves. On a chair-back is a lady's hat. It is a half hour later than the close of Act III. Curtains are drawn over the window. A lamp on the table is lighted, as are, too, the various electric lights. One chair is conspicuously standing on its head.

Nogam is busy at the larger table. The door into the dining-room is half open

SIR WILERID. [Coming in from the draing room] Eh—what did you say your name was?

NOGAM. Nogam, sir

SIR WILFRID. Nogam? I've been here thirty minutes Where are the cigars? [NOGAM motions to a small table new the entrance Joor] Thank you Nogam, Mr Karslake was to have followed us here, immediately [He 40 lights a cigar]

NOGAM Mr Karslake just now 'phoned from his club [SIR WILFRID walk: toward the front of the room] and he's on his way home, sir

SIR WILFRID Nogam, why is that chair upside down? NOGAM. Our orders, sir

VIDA. [Speaking as she comes in] Oh, Wilfrid! [SIR WILFRID turns VIDA coming slowly toward him] I can't be left longer alone with the lobster! He reminds me too much of Phillimore!

SIR WILFRID Karslake's coming he stopped at his club on the way! [To NOGAM] You haven't heard anything of Mrs Karslake—/

NOGAM. [Surprised] No. sir'

SIR WILERID [In an aside to VIDA, as they move right to appear to be out of NOGAM'S bearing.] Deucedly odd, ye know—for the Reverend Matthew declared she left Phillimore's house before he did—and she told them she was coming here!

[NOGAM evidently takes this in]

VIDA Oh, she'll tuin up

SIR WILFRID. Yes, but I don't see how the Reverend

Phillimore had the time to get here and make us man and wife, don't y' know-

VIDA. Oh, Matthew had a fast horse and Cynthia a slow one-or she's a woman and changed her mind! Perhaps she's gone back and married Phillimore. And besides, dear, Matthew wasn't in the house four minutes and a half, only just long enough to hoop the hoop, [She twirls her new wedding ring gently about her finger] Wasn't it lucky he had a ring in his pocket

SIR WILFRID. Rather

VIDA. And are you aware, dear, that Phillimore bought and intended it for Cynthia? Do come [Going toward the door through which she has just entered], I'm desperately hungry! Whenever I'm married that's the effect it has! [VIDA goes out and SIR WILFRID, following, stops to talk to NOGAM.]

SIR WILLIRID. We'll give Mr Karslake ten minutes, Nogam If he does not come then, you might serve supper. [He 101ns VIDA.]

20 NOGAM [To SIR WILFRID.] Yes, sir. [The outside door opens and FIDDLER walks in.]

FIDDLER. [Easy and business-like] Hello, Nogam, where's the guv'nor? That mare's off her oats, and I've got to see him

NOGAM. He'll soon be here.

FIDDLER. Who was the parson I met leaving the house?

NOGAM. [Whispering] Sir Wilfrid and Mrs Phillimore have a date with the guv'nor in the dining-room, 30 and the reverend gentleman-[He makes a gesture as of giving an ecclesiastical blessing.]

FIDDLER. [Amuzed] He hasn't spliced them? [NOGAM assents] He has? They're married? Never saw a parson could resist it!

NOGAM Yes, but I've got another piece of news for you Who do you think the Rev. Phillimore expected to find here?

FIDDLER. [Proud of having the knowledge.] Mrs. Karslake? I saw her headed this way in a hansom with 40 a balky horse only a minute ago. If she hoped to be in at the finish-[FIDDLER is about to set the chair on its legs.]

NOGAM. [Quickly.] Mr. Fiddler, sir, please to let it alone.

FIDDLER. [Putting the chair down in surprise.] Does it live on its blooming head?

720 Mitchell

NOGAM. Don't you remember? She threw it on its head when she left here, and he won't have it up Ah that's 1t-hat, sewing-basket and all,-the whole rig is to remain as it was when she handed him his knock-our

[A bell rings outside.]

FIDDLER. There's the guv'nor-I hear him!

NOGAM. I'll serve the supper. [Taking a letter from his pocket and putting it on the mantel] Mr Fiddler would you mind giving this to the guv'nor? It's from his lawyer—his lawyer couldn't find him and left it with me He said it was very important [The bell rings again. Speaking from the door to SIR WILFRID | I'm coming, sir' [NOGAM goes out, shutting the door. JOHN KARS LAKE comes in. His hat is pushed over his eyes; his hande are buried in his pockets, and his appearance generally it: one of weariness and utter discouragement. He walks into the room slowly and heavily. He sees FIDDLER, who salutes, forgetting the letter. JOHN slowly sinks into the arm-chair near his study table.]

JOHN. [As he walks to his chair.] Hello, Fiddler! [After a pause, JOHN throws himself into a chan, keeping his hat on. He throws down his gloves, sighing.]

FIDDLER. Came in to see you, sir about Cynthia K

JOHN. [Drearily] Damn Cynthia K!

FIDDLER. Couldn't have a word with you?

JOHN. [Grumpy] No! FIDDLER. Yes, sir.

JOHN. Fiddler

FIDDLER. Yes, sir.

JOHN. Mrs Karslake- [FIDDLER nods] You used to say she was our mascot?

FIDDLER. Yes, sir

JOHN. Well, she's just married herself to a-a sort of a man-

FIDDLER. Sorry to hear it, sir

JOHN. Well, Fiddler, between you and me, we're pair of idiots

FIDDLER. Yes, sir!

JOHN. And now it's too late!

FIDDLER. Yes, sir-oh, beg your pardon, sir-your lawyer left a letter [JOHN takes the letter; opens and reads it, indifferently at first.]

JOHN. [As he opens the letter.] What's he got to say, more than what his wire said?—Eh—[Dumbfounded as he reads.] what?— Will explain—Error in wording of * telegram.—Call me up.— [Turning quickly to the telephone] The man can't mean that she's still— Hello! Hello! [JOHN listens.]

FIDDLER. Would like to have a word with you, sir—IOHN. Hello, Central!

FIDDLER. That mare-

OHN. [Consulting the letter, and speaking into the phone.] 33246a 38! Did you get it?

FIDDLER. That mare, sir, she's got a touch of malaria— 10HN. [At the 'phone.] Hello, Central—33246a-38!

--Clayton Osgood—yes, yes, and say, Central—get a move on you!

FIDDLER. If you think well of it, sir, I'll give her a tonic—

JOHN. [Still at the 'phone.] Hello! Yes—yes—Jack Karslake Is that you, Clayton? Yes—yes—well—
FIDDLER. Or if you like, Sir, I'll give her—

IOHN. [Turning on FIDDLER] Shut up! [To 'phone.] What was that? Not you—not you—a technical error? You mean to say that Mrs Karslake is still—my—Hold the wire, Central—get off the wire! Get off the wire' Is that you, Clayton? Yes, yes—she and I are still—I got it' Good-bye' [He hangs up the receiver, falls hak into a chair. For a moment he is overcome He lakes up telephone book.]

FIDDLER All very well, Mr Karslake, but I must know if I'm to give her—

JOHN. [Turning over the leaves of the telephone book in hot baste.] What's Phillimore's number?

FIDDLER. If you've no objections, I think I'll give her

JOHN. L-M-N-O-P—It's too late! She's married by this! Married!—and—my God—I—I am the cause. Phillimore—

HDDLER. I'll give her-

JOHN. Give her wheatina!—give her grape-nuts—give her away! [FIDDLER, biding his time, walks toward the window.] Only be quiet! Phillimore!

[SIR WILFRID comes in.]

SIR WILFRID. Hello! We'd almost given you up!

JOHN. [In bis agitation unable to find PHILLIMORE'S "umber.] Just a moment I'm trying to get Phillimore on the 'phone to—to tell Mrs Karslake—

SIR WILFRID. No good, my boy—she's on her way here! [JOHN drops the book and looks up dumb-founded] The Reverend Matthew was here, y'see—and he said—

JOHN. [Rising, turns.] Mrs Karslake is coming here? [SIR WILFRID nods.] To this house? Here?

SIR WILFRID. That's right.

JOHN. Coming here? You're sure? [SIR WILFRID nods assent.] Fiddler, I want you to stay here, and if Mrs 50 Karslake comes, don't fail to let me know! Now then, for heaven's sake, what did Matthew say to you?

SIR WILFRID. Come along in and I'll tell you

JOHN On your life now, Fiddler, don't fail to let me—

[SIR WILFRID carries JOHN off with him.]

VIDA. [From the dining-room.] Ah, here you are! FIDDLER. Phew!

[A moment's pause, and CYNTHIA opens the front door, and comes in very quietly, almost shyly, as if she were uncertain of her welcome]

CYNTHIA. Fiddler! Where is he? Has he come? Is he here? Has he gone?

FIDDLER. [Rattled.] Nobody's gone, ma'am, except the Reverend Matthew Phillimore

CYNTHIA. Matthew? He's been here and gone? [FID-DLER nods assent] You don't mean I'm too late? He's married them already?

FIDDLER Nogam says he married them!

CYNTHIA. He's married them! Married! Married before I could get here! [Sinking into an armchair.] Married in less time than it takes to pray for rain! Oh, well, the church—the church is a regular quick marriage counter [VIDA and JOHN are heard in light-hearted laughter.] Oh!

FIDDLER. I'll tell Mr Karslake-

CYNTHIA. [Rising and going to the dining-room door, turns the key in the lock and takes it out] No—I wouldn't see him for the world' [Moving to the work-table with the key] If I'm too late, I'm too late! and that's the end of it! [Laying the key on the table, she remains standing near it] I've come, and now I'll go! [There is a long pause during which CYNTHIA looks slowly about the room, then sighs and changes her tone] Well, Fiddler, it's all a good deal as it used to be in 80 my day.

FIDDLER. No, ma'am—everything changed, even the horses

CYNTHIA [Absent-mindedly.] Horses—how are the horses? [Throughout her talk with FIDDLER she gives the idea that she is saying good-bye to her life with JOHN.] FIDDLER. Ah, when husband and wife splits, ma'am, it's the horses that suffer Oh, yes, ma'am, we're all changed since you give us the go-by,—even the guv'nor.

CYNTHIA. How's he changed?

FIDDLER. Lost his sharp for horses, and ladies, ma'am—gives 'em both the boiled eye.

CYNTHIA I can't say I see any change; there's my portrait—I suppose he sits and pulls faces at me.

FIDDLER. Yes, ma'am, I think I'd better tell him of your bein' here.

O (YNTHIA. [Genily but decidedly.] No, Fiddler, no! [Again looking about her.] The room's in a terrible state of disorder However, your new mistress will attend to that [Pause.] Why, that's not her hat!

FIDDLER. Yours, ma'am.

CYNTHIA. Mine? [Walking to the table to look at it.] Is that my work-basket? [After a pause] My gloves? [FIDDLER assents] And I suppose—[Hurriedly going to the writing-table.] My—yes, there it is my wedding ring!—just where I dropped it! Oh, oh, oh, he keeps it 20 like this—hat, gloves, basket and ring, everything just as it was that crazy, mad day when I—[She glances at FIDDLER and breaks off] But for heaven's sake, Fiddler, set that chair on its feet!

FIDDLI-R. Against orders, ma'am.

CYNTHIA Against orders?

FIDDLER You kicked it over, ma'am, the day you left us.

CYNTHIA. No wonder he hates me with the chair in that state! He nurses his wrath to keep it warm. So, after all, Fiddler, everything is changed, and that chair is the proof of it I suppose Cynthia K is the only thing in the world that cares a whinney whether I m alive or dead. [She breaks down and sobi] How is she, Fiddler?

FIDDLIR Off her oats, ma am this evening.

CYNTHIA Oit her oats! Well, she loves me, so I suppose she will die, or change, or—or something Oh, she ll die, there's no doubt about that—she'll die [FIDD-LER, who has been watching his chance, takes the key off the table while she is solbing, tiptoes up stage, un-toky the door and goes out After he has done so, CYNTHIA rises and dries her eyes [There—I'm a tool—I must go—before—before—he—[As she speaks her last word, JOHN comes in weiftly]

JOHN Mrs Karslake!

CYNTHIA. [Contineed.] I—I—I just heard Cynthia K was ill—[JOHN assents. CYNTHIA tries to put on a cheerful and indifferent manner.] I—I ran around—1 and—and—[Pausing, she turns and takes a few stepi.] Well, I understand it's all over.

5

JOHN. [Cheerful.] Yes, it's all over.

CYNTHIA. How is the bride? JOHN. Oh, she's a wonder

CYNTHIA. Indeed¹ Did she paw the ground like the war-horse in the Bible² I'm sure when Vida sees a wedding ring she smells the battle afar off As for you my dear Karslake, I should have thought once bitten twice shy! But, you know best [VIDA, unable to keep her finger long out of a pressunters in.]

VIDA. Oh, Cynthia, I've just been through it again, and I feel as if I were eighteen. There's no use talking about it, my dear, with a woman it's never the second time's And how nice you were, Jack,—he never even laughed at us! [SIR WILFRID follows her with hat and cane VIDA kisses JOHN] That's the wages of virtue!

SIR WILFRID. [In time to see her kiss JOHN.] I say, is the custom? Every time she does that, my boy, you owe me a thousand pounds [Seeing CYNTHIA, who ap proaches them, he looks at her and JOHN in tun | Mrs Karslake [To JOHN] And then you say it's not an extraordinary country!

[CYNTHIA is more and more puzzled.]

VIDA. [To JOHN] See you next Derby, Jack! [Walk-11] to the door To SIR WILFRID] Come along, Wilfrid. We really ought to be going [To CYNTHIA] I hope dear, you haven't married him! Phillimore's a tomb! Good-bye, Cynthia—I m so happy! [As the goes] Just think of the silly people, dear, that only have this sensition once in a lifetime!

[JOHN follows VIDA out the door.]

SIR WILFRID [To CYNTHIA] Good-bye Mrs Kars-lake And I say, ye know, if you have married that dull old Phillimore fellah, why, when you ve divoiced him come over and stay at Traynham! I mean, of course, se know, bring your new husband. There'll be lots o horses to show you, and a whole covey of jolly little Cates-Darbvs Mind you come! [With real delicacy of feeling and forgetting his wife.] Never liked a woman as much in my life as I did you!

VIDA [Outvide, calling him] Wilfrid, dear!

SIR WILLIRID [Loyal to the unman who has caug'! him.]—except the one that's calling me!

[JOHN seturns, and SIR WILFRID, nodding to him, goes out JOHN shuts the door and crosses the room. There is a pause.]

(YNTHIA. So you're not married?

JOHN. No. But I know that you imagined I was CYNTHIA. [After a pause.] I suppose you think a woman has no right to divorce a man—and still continue to feel a keen interest in his affairs?

JOHN. Well, I'm not so sure about that, but I don't

CYNTHIA. A woman can be divorced—and still— [JOHN assents; she hides her embarrassment] Well, my c dear Karslake, you've a long life before you, in which to learn how such a state of mind is possible! So I won't stop to explain. Will you be kind enough to get me 1 cab? [She moves to the door.]

JOHN. Certainly I was going to say I am not surprised it your feeling an interest in me I'm only astonished that, having actually married Phillimore, you come here—CYNTHIA. [Indignantly.] I'm not married to him!

JOHN. [Silent for a moment] I left you on the brink—made me feel a little uncertain.

(YNTHIA. [In a matter of course tone.] I changed my mind—that's all

JOHN. [Taking his tone from her.] Of course [After an interval.] Are you going to marry him?

CYNTHIA. I don't know.

JOHN. Does he know you-

CYNTHIA. I told him I was coming here

JOHN. Oh! He'll turn up here, then-eh? [CYNTHIA

Is silent.] And you'll go back with him, I suppose?

CYNTHIA. [Talking at random] Oh—yes—I suppose 50 I—I haven't thought much about it

JOHN. [Changing his tone.] Well, sit down, do Till ne comes—talk it over [He places the armchair more comfortably for her] This is a more comfortable chair!

CYNTHIA. [Shamefacedly] You never liked me to sit in that one!

JOHN. Oh, well—it's different now [CYNTHIA moves and sits down, near the upset chair. There is a long pouse, during which JOHN thoughtfully paces the room.]
You don't mind if I smoke?

CYNTHIA. [Shaking her head.] No

JOHN. [Lighting his pipe and sitting down on the arm of a chair.] Of course, if you find my presence painful, I'll—skiddoo [He indicates the door, CYNTHIA shakes her head JOHN smokes his pipe and remains vented.]

CYNTHIA. [Suddenly and quickly] It's just simply a fact, Karslake, and that s all there is to it—if a woman has once been marr ed—that is, the first man she marries—then—she may quarrel, she may hate him—she may despise him—but she'll always be jealous of him so with other women Always! [JOHN takes this as if he were simply glad to have the information]

JOHN. Oh-H m! .th-yes-yes

CYNTHIA [After a pauce] You probably felt jealous of Phillimore

JOHN [Reasonably, sweetly, and in doubt] N-o! [Apologetically] I felt simply Let him take his medicine. CYNTHIA Oh!

JOHN. I beg your pardon—I meant—

CYNTHIA You meant what you said!

JOHN [Moving a step toward her] Mrs Karslake, I apologize—I won't do it again. But it's too late for you to be out alone—Philip will be here in a moment—and of course, then—

CYNTHIA It isn't what you ray—it's—it's—it's everything. It's the entire situation Suppose by any chance I don't marry Phillimore! And suppose I were seen at two or three in the morning leaving my former husband's house It's all wrong I have no business to be here! I'm going! You're perfectly horrid to me, you roknow—and—the whole place—it's so familiar, and so—so associated with—with—

IOHN, Discord and misery-I know-

CYNTHIA. Not at all with discord and misery! With harmony and happiness—with—with first love, and infinite hope—and—and—Jack Karslake,—if you don't set that chair on its legs, I think I'll explode [JOHN crosses the room rapidly, and sets the chair on its legs His tone changes.]

JOHN. [While setting chair on its legs.] There' I beg. 80 your pardon

CYNTHIA [Nervously.] I believe I hear Philip [She rises]

JOHN. [Going up to the windo. :] N-o! That's the policeman trying the front door! And now, see here, Mrs Karslake,—you're only here for a short minute, because you can't help yourself, but I want you to understand that I'm not trying to be disagreeable—I don't want to revive all the old unhappy—

CYNTHIA. Very well, if you don't—give me my hat [JOHN does so.] And my sewing! And my gloves, please! [She indicates the several articles which lie on the small table.] Thanks! [CYNTHIA throws the lot into the fire-place, and returns to the place she has left near table.] There! I feel better! And now—all I ask is—

JOHN. [Laughing.] My stars, what a pleasure it is CYNTHIA. What is?

JOHN Seeing you in a whirlwind!

10 CYNTHIA [Wounded by his seeming indifference.]
Oh!

JOHN No, but I mean, a real pleasure! Why not? Time's passed since you and I were together—and—eh—(YNTHIA And you've forgotten what a vile temper I had!

JOHN. [Reflectively.] Well, you did kick the stuffing out of the matrimonial buggy—

CYNTHIA [Pointedly but with good temper] It wasn't a buggy, it was a break cart—[She stands back 20 of the arm-chan] It's all very well to blame me! But when you married me, I'd never had a bit in my mouth!

JOHN Well, I guess I had a pretty hard hand Do you remember the time you threw both your slippers out of the window!

CYNTHIA Yes, and do you remember the time you took my fan from me by force?

JOHN After you slapped my face with it!

CYNTHIA Oh, Oh' I hardly touched your face! And do you remember the day you held my wrists?

30 JOHN You were going to bite me!

CYNTHIA Jack' I never! I showed my teeth at you! And I said I would bite you!

JOHN Cynthia, I never knew you to break your word! [He langh Casualli] And anyhow—they were awfully pictly teeth! [CYNTHIA, though bolt upright, has ceased to seem pained] And I say—do you remember, Cyn—[He leans over her armehan to talk] (YNTHIA [After a pause] You oughtn't to call me "Cyn'—it's not nice of you It's sort of cruel I'm not—

46 Cyn to you now

JOHN Awfully sorry, didn't mean to be beastly, Cyn [CYNTHIA turns quickly JOHN stamps his foot] Cynthia! Sorry I'll make it a commandment thou shalt not Cyn! [CYNTHIA langhs and urpes her eyes.]

CYNTHIA. How can you, Jack? How can you?

JOHN Well, hang it, my dear child, I—I'm sorry, but you know I always got foolish with you Your laugh d make a horse laugh Why, don't you remember that morning in the park before breakfast—when you laughed so hard your horse ran away with you'

CYNTHIA. I do, I do! [Both laugh. The door opens and NOGAM comes in, unnoticed by either.] But what was it started me laughing? [Laughing, she sits down and laughs again.] That morning Wasn't it somebody we met? [Laughing afresh.] Wasn't it a man on a horse! [As her memory pieces the picture, she again goes of into laughter.]

JOHN [Laughing too.] Of course! You didn't know him in those days! But I did! And he looked a sight in the saddle!

[NOGAM, trying to catch their attention, moves to ward the table.]

CYNTHIA Who was it?

JOHN Phillimore!

CYNTHIA. He's no laughing matter now [Seeing NOGAM] Jack, he's here!

JOHN Eh? Oh, Nogam?

NOGAM Mr Phillimore sir-

JOHN In the house?

NOGAM On the street in a hansom, sir—and he requests Mrs Karslake—

JOHN That'll do, Nogam [NOGAM goes ont and there is a pause JOHN, on his way to the window, looks at CYNTHIA, who has slowly risen and turned bey back to him] Well, Cynthia? [He speaks almost gravely and with finality.]

CYNTHIA [Trembling] Well?

JOHN It's the hour of decision, are you going to marry him? [Pause] Speak up!

CYNTHIA Jack,—I—I—

JOHN There he is—you can join him [He points to the street.]

CYNTHIA. Join Phillimore—and go home—with him —to his house, and Miss Heneage and—

JOHN The door's open [He points to the door]

CYNTHIA No, no! It's mean of you to suggest it!

JOHN You won't marry-

CYNTHIA Phillimore—no, never [Running to the window] No, never, never, Jack

JOHN [Opening the window and calling out] Its all right, Judge You needn't wait [There is a paint JOHN leaves the window and bursts into laughter Hemotes toward the door and closes it. CYNTHIA looks

CANTHIA. Jack! [JOHN laughs.] Yes, but I'm here, lack IOHN. Why not?

CYNTHIA. You'll have to take me around to the Holland House!

JOHN. Of course, I will' But, I say, Cynthia, there's (YNTHIA Why, I-I-can't stay here

JOHN No, of course you can't stay here But you can have a bite, though [CYNTHIA shakes her head. JOHN places the small chair, which was upset, next to the table, and the armchair close by.] Oh, I insist Just look at yourself—you're as pale as a sheet and—here, here Sit right down I insist! By George, you must do it! [CYNTHIA moves to the chair drawn up to the table, and sits down.]

(YNTHIA [Faintly] I am hungry

JOHN Just wait a moment [JOHN rushes out, leaving the door open.]

CYNTHIA I don't want more than a nibble [After a panse.] I am sorry to give you so much trouble

JOHN No trouble at all [From the dining-room comes the cheerful noise of glasses and silver] A hansom, of course, to take you around to your hotel? [Speaking as he returns with a tray.]

CYNTHIA. [To berself] I wonder how I ever dreamed I could marry that man

²² JOHN [Now by the table] Can't imagine! There!
CYNTHIA I am hungry Don't forget the hansom
[She eats, he wasts on her, setting this and that before her]

JOHN [Goes to the door, opens it and calls] Nogam, a hansom at once

NOGAM. [From without.] Yes, sir

JOHN. [Again at the table, shows, and from now on continues to show, his true feelings for her] How does it go?

CYNTHIA. [Faintly] It goes all right Thanks! [Hardly eating at all.]

JOHN You always used to like anchovy [CYNTHIA nods and eats.] Claret? [CYNTHIA shakes her head.] Oh, but you must!

CYNTHIA [Tremulously.] Ever so little [He fills her glass and then his.] Thanks!

JOHN Here's to old times! [Rusing his glass.]

CYNTHIA. [Very tremulous] Please not!

JOHN. Well, here's to your next husband.

CYNTHIA. [Very tenderly] Don't!

JOHN. Oh, well, then, what shall the toast be?

CYNTHIA I'll tell you— [After a pause.] You can drink to the relation I am to you

JOHN [Laughing] Well—what relation are you?

CYNTHIA I'm your first wife once removed!

JOHN [Laughing, drinks] I say, you're feeling better CYNTHIA Lots

JOHN [Renunssent] It's a good deal like those mornings after the races—isn't it?

CYNTHIA [Nods] Yes [Half-riving] Is that the 60 hansom?

JOHN [Going up to the window] No

CYNTHIA [Sitting down again] What is that sound?

IOHN Don't you remember?

CYNTHIA. No

JOHN That's the rumbling of the early milk wagons CYNTHIA Oh, Jack

JOHN. Do you recognize it now?

CYNTHIA Do I' We used to hear that—just at the hour, didn't we—when we came back from awfully 70 jolly late suppers and things!

JOHN. H'm!

CYNTHIA It must be fearfully late. I must go [She rises and moves to the chair where the has left her cloak She sees that JOHN will not help her and puts it on herself.]

JOHN Oh, don't go-why go'

CYNTHIA. [Embarrassed and agriated] All good things come to an end, you know

JOHN. They don't need to CYNTHIA. Oh, you don't mean that! And, you know, Jack, if I were caught—seen at this hour, leaving this house, you know—it's the most scandalous thing any one ever did, my being here at all Good-bye, Jack! [After a pause and almost in tears] I'd like to say, I—I—I—well, I sha'n't be bitter about you hereafter, and— [Halting.] Thank you awfully, old man, for the fodder and all that!

[She turns to go out.]

JOHN. Mrs Karslake-wait-

CYNTHIA. [Stopping to hear] Well?

JOHN [Serious.] I've rather an ugly bit of news for 90 you

CYNTHIA. Yes?

JOHN. I don't believe you know that I have been testing the validity of the decree of divorce which you procured

CYNTHIA. Oh, have you?

JOHN Yes, you know I felt pretty warmly about it (YNTHIA. Well)

JOHN. Well, I ve been successful [After a pause] The decree's been declared invalid Understand

10 CYNTHIA [Looking at him for a moment; then speakmg.] Not—precisely

JOHN [After a moment s silence] I m awfully sorry—I'm awfully sorry, Cynthia, but you're my wife still [There is a pause.]

CYNTHIA. $[With \ tapture]$ Honour bright? $[She \ tinks \ into \ the \ armchair.]$

JOHN. [Nods Half laughingly] Crazy country, isn't it?

CYNTHIA [Nods After an interval] Well Jack—what's to be done?

JOHN [Gently] Whatever you say [He moves a few steps toward her]

NOGAM. [Quietly coming in.] Hansom, sir. [He goes out and CYNTHIA rises.]

JOHN. Why don't you finish your supper? [CYNTHIA hestates.]

CYNTHIA. The---the---hansom---

JOHN. Why go to the Holland $^{\flat}$ After all—you $k_{100W_{\bullet}}$ Cvn, you re at home here

CYNTHIA. No, Jack, I'm not—I'm not at home here—unless—unless—

JOHN. Out with it!

CYNTHIA. [Buisting into tears.] Unless I—unless I m at home in your heart Tack!

JOHN. What do you think?

CYNTHIA. I don't believe you want me to stay

JOHN. Don't you?

CYNTHIA No, no, you hate me still. You never can forgive me I know you can't For I can never forgive myself Never, Jack, never, never' [She sobs and he takes her in his arms.]

JOHN [Very tenderly] Cyn! I love you! [Strongly]. And you've got to stay! And hereafter you can chuck chairs around till all's blue! Not a word now [He draw. her gently to a chair.]

CYNTHIA [Wiping her teats] Oh, Jack' Jack' JOHN I'm as hungry as a shark We'll nibble to gether (YNTHIA Well, all I can say is, I feel that of all the improprieties I ever committed this—this—

JOHN This takes the claret, eh? Oh, Lord how happy

CYNTHIA Now don't say that! You'll make me cro more [She urpes her eyes JOHN takes out the wedding ring from his pocket, he lifts a wine-glass, drops the ring into it and offers her the glass]

JOHN Cynthia!

CYNTHIA [Looking at it and wrping her eyes.] What is it?

JOHN. Benedictine!

CYNTHIA Why, you know I never take it

JOHN Take this one for my sake

CYNTHIA That's not benedictine [With gentle carrosity] What is it?

JOHN [Slides the sing out of the glass and puts his aim about CYNTHIA. He slips the ring on to her finger and, as he kisses her hand, says:] Your wedding ring!

POETS "IN TIME OF HESITATION": Hayne, Lanier, Sill, Dickinson, Crane, Moody

Paul Hamilton Hayne

1830 • 1886

A native of Charleston, and the nephew of Robert Y. Havne, to whom Webster made his famous reply in the year of the poet's birth, Paul Hamilton Hayne was educated at the Coates School, where his lifelong friendship with Henry Timrod began, and at the College of Charleston He was a member of the Charleston literary group, presided over by William Gilmore Simms, which tounded Russell's Magazine in 1857, and during its short life of four years Hayne was the editor of that notable literary journal. His house and library were destroyed when Sherman took Charleston in 1865. After the war, he lived at "Copse Hill" in the pine barrens near Augusta, Georgia, where he managed to support himself and his wife by his writing

Hayne's best poems describe emotionally and pictorially the aspects of nature which he knew most intimately—the mocking bird, for example, and the pine forest. His effects are vivid and delicate, though even his happiest work is marred by trite phrasing ("sylvan scene," "stately queen") and there is no great power of thought While his poems of protest to the North, written during reconstruction, show that he was capable of impassioned feeling and utterance, he lacked Timrod's iron strength as well as Timrod's control, metrical skill, and classical purity. Hayne is worthy of study, nevertheless, as a minor poet whose work is representative of much of the romantic verse of the Old South.

Aspects of the Pines

Tall, sombre, grim, against the morning sky
They rise, scarce touched by melancholy airs,
Which stir the fadeless foliage dreamfully,
As if from realms of mystical despairs

Tall, sombre, grim, they stand with dusky gleams
Brightening to gold within the woodland's core,
Beneath the gracious noontide's tranquil beams—
But the weird winds of morning sigh no more

A stillness, strange, divine, ineffable,
Broods round and o'er them in the wind's surcease
And on each tinted copse and shimmering dell
Rests the mute rapture of deep-hearted peace

Last, sunset comes—the solemn joy and might Borne from the West when cloudless day declines—
Low, flutelike breezes sweep the waves of light,
And lifting dark green tresses of the pines,

Till every lock is luminous—gently float,
Fraught with hale odors up the heavens afar
To faint when twilight on her virginal throat
Wears for a gem the tremulous vesper star

So rife with conscious beauty all the while, What could she do but smile At her own perfect loveliness below, Glassed in the tranquil flow Of crystal fountains and unruffled streams? Half lost in waking dreams, As down the loneliest forest dell I strayed, Lo! from a neighboring glade, Flashed through the drifts of moonshine swiftly came A fairy shape of flame It rose in dazzling spirals overhead, Whence to wild sweetness wed, Poured marvellous melodies, silvery trill on trill The very leaves grew still On the charmed trees to hearken, while for me, Heart-trilled to ecstasy, I followed-followed the bright shape that flew, Still circling up the blue, Till as a fountain that has reached its height, Falls back in sprays of light Slowly dissolved, so that enrapturing lay, Divinely melts away Through tremulous spaces to a music-mist, Soon by the fitful breeze How gently kissed Into remote and tender silences

The Mocking-Bird

A golden pallor of voluptuous light Filled the warm southern night The moon, clear orbed, above the sylvan scene Moved like a stately queen, Poverty

The poet is embittered by his own poverty and that of the South after the Civil War

Once I beheld thee, a lithe mountain maid, Embrowned by wholesome toils in lusty air, Whose clear blood, nurtured by strong, primitive cheer, Through Amazonian veins, flowed unafraid.

Broad-breasted, pearly-teethed, thy pure breath strayed, Sweet as deep-uddered kine's curled in the rare

Bright spaces of thy lofty atmosphere,
Oer some rude cottage in a fir-grown glade

Now, of each brave ideal virtue stripped,
O Poverty! I behold thee as thou art,
A ruthless hag, the image of woeful dearth
Or brute despair, gnawing its own starved heart
Thou ravening wretch! fierce-eyed and monster-lipped,
Why scourge forevermore God's beauteous earth?

Sidney Lanier

1842 • 1881

Sidney Lanier was a Southerner, but he did not belong to the planter aristocracy, nor was he in sympathy with their feudal ideals. His background was urban and professional his father was a lawyer, and the boy grew up in the little city of Macon, Georgia. When the Civil War broke out shortly after his graduation from Oglethorpe College, he enlisted as a Confederate soldier, and he served faithfully for the war's duration, spending the last five months in a federal prison. But in the novel based upon his war experiences (Tiger Lilies, 1867), there is no glorification of war as such, nor idealization of the "lost cause," nor nostalgia for the Southern order destroyed by the war. According to one of the characters in the story, the war was 'a rich man's war and a poor man's fight."

Lanier wanted ardently to be a musician and a poet And since there was little opportunity for the cultiva-

In that half-Northern, half-Southern city, in the 1870's, he played the flute with professional skill in the Peabody Symphony Orchestra, and lectured on English literature at the Johns Hopkins University. Before he was quite forty, death of tuberculosis cut short a career of promise

In addition to Tiger Lilies, his prose works include The English Novel, Shakspere and His Forerunners, and The Science of English Verse In The English Novel he prudishly condemns the eighteenth-century English novel as "unsayory muck," and finds the perfect flower of the novel's development in the work of George Eliot In Shakspere and His Forerunners he shows a surprising range of reading (in view of his limited opportunities) in English poetry, including Anglo-Saxon poetry, and is especially attracted to the Elizabethan sonnets. His most significant prose work is The Science of English Verse, which is an original and ingenious, though unconvincing, treatment of verse in terms of music. Verse he regards as 'in all respects a phenomenon of sound"; "the main distinction between music and verse is the difference between the scale of tones used in music and the scale of tones used by the human speakingvoice" His method of scansion, which employs the musical system of notation, makes a metronome an almost indispensable part of one's equipment

Ardent and excitable, Lanier wrote poetry which suffers from the lack of emotional and intellectual control. His eagerness to embrace all that seemed to him beautiful and noble and his attempt to deal with the problems of modern life resulted in poetry that is frequently confused and febrile, despite the sincerity of its moral idealism. Moreover, his metaphors are often unsuccessful. In "My Springs" his wife's eyes are "two dove-cotes of gray doves—which is too unnatural. In "Sunrise" the sun is "the great Sun-Bee," that flashes from its "hive-hole'—which is belittling. In "Corn" the abandoned Georgia hill is "gashed and hairy Lear"—which is too tragic. Perhaps Lanier read too indiscriminately and too susceptibly in the conceitful English sonnets of the 1590 s.

That he was capable of writing with clearly focused objectivity, however, is shown in his narrative poems (notably, "The Revenge of Hamish") and in brief passages in the philosophical poems. One is grateful for many true objective renderings of Southern land. scape, even though the objectivity may be only briefly sustained "the zigzag-cornered fence" and the intrenched sassafras of "Corn", the marsh-grass, "waisthigh, broad in the blade" of "The Marshes of Glynn." Lanier is worthy of praise also for his experiments with musical effects in verse "The Symphony" contains some extraordinary approximations of the sounds of individual instruments the flute, the violin, "the melting clarionet," "the bold straightforward horn" Equally remarkable is his attempt at "symphonic" structure. The problem must be referred to the musical experts at his never been dealt with adequately by Lanier's critics who unfortunately, have not been musicians. But it may be said here, simply, that "The Marshes of Glynn," for example, appears to be constructed after the manner of a symphony, and should be read as a sequence of sym phonic movements, the first of which is the magnificent ly sustained opening of twenty lines

Lanier's reputation as a poet does not stand nearly so high today as it did at the turn of the century. Hard boiled critics have resented his prudishness and sentimentality Logical critics have objected to both the unsoundness of his metaphors and the vagueness and confusion in his thought (a vagueness and confusion, it may be added, which can be found in generous measure in the Victorian poets of England) An influential school of Southern regionalists (see John Crowe Ransom, "Hearts and Heads," The American Review March 1934) has condemned Lanier for the very qualities which had recommended him to progressive Southerners in 1900, namely, in Professor Edwin Mims' phrase, "the cosmopolitanism and modernness of his mind 'But after whatever deductions, one may still find much in Lanier to admire. His high devotion to music and poetry was admirable. He has many lines which are felicitous and true. And the musical aspects of his verse are yet to be properly appreciated

Corn

In sending the manuscript of "Corn" to a friend for criticism, Lanier wrote as follows "I inclose the manuscript of a poem in which I have endeavored to carry some very prosaic matters up to a loftier plane. I have been struck with alarm in seeing the number of old, deserted homesteads and gullied hills in the older counties of Georgia; and though they are dreadfully commonplace, I have mought they are surely mournful enough to be poetic." For further evidence of Lanier's constructive interest in southern agricultural problems, the student should read his essay. "The New South," published in 1880.

After having been rejected by William Dean Howells, editor of the Atlantic Monthly, "Corn" was accepted by Lippincott's Magazine, in Philadelphia, and appeared in the February 1875 number. It was Lanier's first poem to win wide recognition.

Today the woods are trembling through and through With shimmering forms, that flash before my view. Then melt in green as dawn-stars melt in blue. The leaves that wave against my cheek caress. Like women's hands, the embracing boughs express. A subtlety of mighty tenderness, The copse-depths into little noises start, That sound anon like beatings of a heart, Anon like talk 'twixt lips not far apart. The beech dreams balm, as a dreamer hums a song, 10 Through that vague wafture, expirations strong. Throb from young hickories breathing deep and long. With stress and urgence bold of prisoned spring.

And ecstasy of burgeoning

Now, since the dew-plashed road of morn is dry,
Forth venture odors of more quality

And heavenlier giving Like Jove's locks awry,

Long muscadines

Rich-wreathe the spacious foreheads of great pines,
And breathe ambrosial passion from their vines
I pray with mosses, ferns and flowers shy
That hide like gentle nuns from human eye
To lift adoring perfumes to the sky.

I hear faint bridal-sighs of brown and green Dying to silent hints of kisses keen As far lights fringe into a pleasant sheen. I start at fragmentary whispers, blown From undertalks of leafy souls unknown, Vague purports sweet, of inarticulate tone.

Dreaming of gods, men, nuns and brides, between Old companies of oaks that inward lean
To join their radiant amplitudes of green
I slowly move, with ranging looks that pass
Up from the matted miracles of grass
Into yon veined complex of space,
Where sky and leafage interlace
So close, the heaven of blue is seen
Inwoven with a heaven of green

I wander to the zigzag-cornered fence Where sassafras, intrenched in brambles dense, Contests with stolid vehemence

The march of culture, setting limb and thorn As pikes against the army of the corn

There, while I pause, my fieldward-faring eyes
Take harvests, where the stately corn-ranks rise,
Of inward dignities
And large benignities and insights wise,
Graces and modest majesties
Thus, without theft, I reap another's field,
Thus, without tilth, I house a wondrous yield,
And heap my heart with quintuple crops concealed.

Look, out of line one tall corn-captain stands
Advanced beyond the foremost of his bands,
And waves his blades upon the very edge
And hottest thicket of the battling hedge
Thou lustrous stalk, that ne'er mayst walk nor talk,
Still shalt thou type the poet-soul sublime
That leads the vanward of his timid time
And sings up cowards with commanding rhyme—

The Symphony

Lanier wrote to a friend on March 24, 1875, concerning the composition of "The Symphony" "About four days ago, a certain poem which I had vaguely ruminated a week before took hold of me like a real James River ague, and I have been in a mortal shake with the same, day and night, ever since I call it "The Symphony" I personify each instrument in the orchestra, and make them discuss various deep social questions of the times, in the progress of the music" The "deep social questions' have to do with the evils of "Trade" the poem is an indictment of "Trade," by which Lanier means not only industrialism or the factory system, but all competitive business

Does business mean, Die, you—live, 19
Then 'Trade is trade' but sings a lie
'Tis only war grown miserly

Humanitarian sympathy, moral idealism, an artist's temperament, devotion to the chivalric code ("Trade killed Chivalry," he said), and the aristocratic Southern tradition—all unite, no doubt, to explain his contempt for the commercial spirit of the modern age

The proper name does not appear in the Biblical account (Luke 16 19-31), but owes its origin to the Latin adjective dives. (meaning rich.) In the Vulgate. The name is here applied to the banker of 1.1%. • 168 Future Sale, speculative selling for delivery at a future time, dealing in futures." • 169 Bulls, those who buy, expecting a rise in price. • 169 Bears, those who sell, expecting a fall in price. • 181 gamester's catipave, gambler's tool • 185 Lear. Cordelia, a reference to King Lear, of Shakespeare's play, who was cruelly abused by his older daughters, and devotedly cared for by his youngest daughter, Cordelia. • 194 vasty, vast. This word accurs in Shakespeare. • 196 largesse, bounty or reward.

The poem's argument is less interesting than its style Many lines are marvelously suggestive of the tones of the individual instruments and of orchestral effects

The poem first appeared in Lippincott's Magazine for June 1875

"O Trade! O Trade! would thou wert dead! The Time needs heart-'tis tired of head We're all for love," the violins said "Of what avail the rigorous tale Of bill for coin and box for bale? Grant thee, O Trade! thine uttermost hope: Level red gold with blue sky-slope, And base it deep as devils grope When all's done, what hast thou won Of the only sweet that's under the sun? Ay, canst thou buy a single sigh Of true love's least, least ecstas," Then, with a bridegroom's heart-beats trembling, All the mightier strings assembling Ranged them on the victins' side As when the bridegroom leads the bride, And, heart in voice, together cried "Yea, what avail the endless tale Of gain by cunning and plus by sale? Look up the land, look down the land, The poor, the poor, they stand Wedged by the pressing of Trade's hand Against an inward-opening door That pressure tightens evermore They sigh a monstrous foul-air sigh For the outside leagues of liberty, Where Art, sweet lark, translates the sky Into a heavenly melody 'Each day, all day' (these poor folks say), In the same old year-long, drear-long way, We weave in the mills and heave in the kilns. We sieve mine-meshes under the hills, And thieve much gold from the Devil's bank tills. To relieve, O God, what manner of ills?--The beasts, they hunger, and eat, and die, And so do we, and the world's a sty, Hush, tellow-swine why nuzzle and cry? Swinehood hath no remedy

Say many men, and hasten by,
Clamping the nose and blinking the eye.
But who said once, in the lordly tone,
Man shall not live by bread alone

But Trade saith No.

And the kilns and the curt-tongued mills say C.'

And servant, all love-eloquent. I heard, when 'All for love' the violins cried: So, Nature calls through all her system wide, Give me thy love, O man, so long denied. 170 Much time is run, and man hath changed his ways, Since Nature, in the antique fable-days, Was hid from man's true love by proxy fays, False fauns and rascal gods that stole her praise The nymphs, cold creatures of man's colder brain, Chilled Nature's streams till man's warm heart was fain Never to lave its love in them again Later, a sweet Voice Love thy neighbor said, Then first the bounds of neighborhood outspread Beyond all confines of old ethnic dread. 180 Vainly the Jew might wag his covenant head 'All men are neighbors,' so the sweet Voice said So, when man's arms had circled all man's race, The liberal compass of his warm embrace Stretched bigger yet in the dark bounds of space, With hands a-grope he felt smooth Nature's grace. Where Art and Nature sing and smile.

Trade' is thy heart all dead, all dead?

And hast thou nothing but a head?

I'm all for heart," the flute-voice said,

And into sudden silence fled,

Like as a blush that while 'tis red

Dies to a still, still white instead.

Thereto a thrilling calm succeeds, Till presently the silence breeds A little breeze among the reeds

That seems to blow by sea-marsh weeds: Then from the gentle stir and fret Sings out the melting clarionet, Like as a lady sings while yet Her eyes with salty tears are wet "O Trade' O Trade'" the Lady said, "I too will wish thee utterly dead If all thy heart is in thy head For O my God' and O my God' What shameful ways have women trod At beckoning of Trade's golden rod' Alas when sighs are traders' lies, And heart's-ease eyes and violet eyes

So hath Trade withered up Love's sinewy prime, Men love not women as in olden time Ah, not in these cold merchantable days Deem men their life an opal gray, where plays The one red Sweet of gracious ladies'-praise Now, comes a suitor with sharp prying eye-Says, Here, you Lady. if you'll sell, I'll buy. The Revenge of Hamish

The story of "The Revenge of Hamish" was based upon an incident in William Black's Macleod of Dare, a novel appearing serially in Harper's Magazine in 1878 (see A H Starke, Sidney Lanier, p 310) Lanier achieves in this poem something of the economy, naturalness, and directness of the old ballads Different in both style and subject matter from his usual work, "The Revenge of Hamish' is interesting not only in itself but as evidence of the craftsman's virtuosity and the catholic literary interests of its author.

It was three slim does and a ten-tined buck in the bracken lay,

And all of a sudden the sinister smell of a man, Awaft on a wind-shift, wavered and ran.

Down the hill-side and sifted along through the bracken and passed that way.

Then Nan got a-tremble at nostril, she was the dain'i-est doe,

In the print of her velvet flank on the velvet fern She reared, and rounded her ears in turn

Then the buck leapt up and his head as a king's to a crown did go

Full high in the breeze, and he stood as if Death had the form of a deer,

And the two slim does long lazily stretching arose 10 For their day-dream slowlier came to a close,

Till they woke and were still, breath-bound with waiting and wonder and fear.

Then Alan the huntsman sprang over the hillock the hounds shot by,

The does and the ten-tined buck made a marvellous bound,

The hounds swept after with never a sound,

But Alan loud winded his horn in sign that the quarry was nigh

For at dawn of that day proud Maclean of Lochbuy to the hunt had waxed wild,

And he cursed at old Alan till Alan fared off with the hounds

For to drive him the deer to the lower glen-grounds 'I will kill a red deer," quoth Maclean, 'in the sight of the wife and the child "

The Revenge of Hamish • 1 ten-tined, ten branches of the antier

50 gavly he paced with the wife and the child to his chosen stand;

But he hurried tall Hamish the henchman ahead. "Go turn."—

Cried Maclean,—"if the deer seek to cross to the burn, Do thou turn them to me nor fail, lest thy back be red as thy hand."

Non hard-fortuned Hamish, half blown of his breath with the height of the hill,

Was white in the face when the ten-tined buck and the does

Drew leaping to burn-ward, huskily rose

His shouts, and his nether lip twitched and his legs were o'er-weak for his will

So the deer darted lightly by Hamish and bounded away to the burn.

But Maclean never bating his watch tarried waiting below, 30

Still Hamish hung heavy with fear for to go

All the space of an hour, then he went, and his face was greenish and stern,

And his eye sat back in the socket, and shrunken the eye-balls shone.

As withdrawn from a vision of deeds it were shame

"Now, now, grim henchman, what is 't with thee?"

Brake Maclean, and his wrath rose red as a beacon the wind hath upblown

Three does and a ten-tined buck made out" spoke Hamish, full mild,

"And I ran for to turn, but my breath it was blown; and they passed,

I was weak, for ye called ere I broke me my fast" (ried Maclean "Now a ten-tined buck in the sight of the wife and the child

I had killed if the gluttonous kern had not wrought me a snail's own wrong!"

Then he sounded, and down came kinsmen and clansmen all

"Ten blows, for ten tine, on his back let fall,

And reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of thong!"

So Hamish made bare, and took him his strokes, at the last he smiled

"Now I'll to the burn,' quoth Maclean, "for it still may be.

If a slimmer-paunched henchman will hurry with me.

I shall kill me the ten-tined buck for a gift to the wife and the child!"

Then the clansmen departed, by this path and that, and over the hill

Sped Maclean with an outward wrath for an inward shame, 50

And that place of the lashing full quiet became,

And the wife and the child stood sad, and bloody-backed Hamish sat still

But look! red Hamish has risen, quick about and about turns he

"There is none betwixt me and the crag-top!" he screams under breath

Then, livid as Lazarus lately from death,

He snatches the child from the mother, and clambers the crag toward the sea

Now the mother drops breath, she is dumb, and her heart goes dead for a space

Till the motherhood, mistress of death, shricks shrieks through the glen,

And that place of the lashing is live with men,

And Maclean, and the gillie that told him, dash up in a desperate race

Not a breath's time for asking, an eye-glance reveals all the tale untold

They follow mad Hamish afar up the crag toward the sea,

And the lady cries "Clansmen, run for a fee"

Yon castle and lands to the two first hands that shall hook him and hold

²³ burn, brook • 41 kern, peasant, boor • 55 Lazarus The account of the raising of Lazarus from the dead is given in John 11

"Fast Hamish back from the brink!"—and ever she flies up the steep,

And the clansmen pant, and they sweat, and they jostle and strain.

But, mother, 'tis vain, but, father, 'tis vain,

Stern Hamish stands bold on the brink, and dangles the child o'er the deep.

Now a faintness falls on the men that run, and they all stand still.

And the wife prays Hamish as if he were God, on her knees, 70

Crying "Hamish! O Hamish! but please, but please For to spare him!" and Hamish still dangles the child, with a wavering will.

On a sudden he turns, with a sea-hawk scream, and a gibe, and a song, Cries "So, I will spare ye the child if, in sight of ye all, Ten blows on Maclean's bare back shall fall,

And ye reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of the thong!"

Then Maclean he set hardly his tooth to his lip that his tooth was red,

Breathed short for a space, said "Nay, but it never shall be"

Let me hurl off the damnable hound in the sea!"

But the wife "Can Hamish go fish us the child from the sea, if dead?" 80

"Say yea'—Let them lash me. Hamish?"—"Nay!"—
"Husband, the lashing will heal,

But, oh, who will heal me the bonny sweet bairn in his grave?

Could ye cure me my heart with the death of a knave?

Quick! Love! I will bare thee—so—kneel!' Then

Maclean 'gan slowly to kneel

With never a word, till presently downward he jerked to the earth

Then the henchman—he that smote Hamish—would tremble and lag,

"Strike, hard" quoth Hamish, full stern, from the crag. Then he struck him, and "One" sing Hamish, and danced with the child in his mirth And no man spake beside Hamish, he counted ε_{ach} stroke with a song

When the last stroke fell, then he moved him a pace down the height,

And he held forth the child in the heartaching sign; Of the mother, and looked all pitiful grave, as repenting a wrong

And there as the motherly arms stretched out with the thanksgiving prayer—

And there as the mother crept up with a fearful swift pace,

Till her finger nigh felt of the bairnie's face-

In a flash fierce Hamish turned round and lifted the child in the air,

And sprang with the child in his arms from the horrible height in the sea,

Shrill screeching, "Revenge!" in the wind-rush, and pallid Maclean,

Age-feeble with anger and impotent pain,

Crawled up on the crag, and lay flat, and locked hold of dead roots of a tree—

And gazed hungrily o'er, and the blood from his back drip-dripped in the brine,

And a sea-hawk flung down a skeleton fish as he flew And the mother stared white on the waste of blue

And the wind drove a cloud to seaward, and the sun began to shine

The Marshes of Glynn

"The Marshes of Glynn" first appeared in A Masque of Poets, a collection of anonymous verse by various authors published in Boston in 1878. The marshes described are located near Brunswick, Georgia. The poem shows "Lanier's spiritual maturity," says Starke, "to which he has worked through all his other poems." It is the best known and perhaps the best loved of his compositions.

Glooms of the live-oaks, beautiful-braided and woven With intricate shades of the vines that myriad-cloven Clamber the forks of the multiform boughs,—

Emerald twilights,— Virginal shy lights,

Wrought of the leaves to allure to the whisper of vows, When lovers pace timidly down through the green colonnades

Of the dim sweet woods, of the dear dark woods, Of the heavenly woods and glades,

That run to the radiant marginal sand-beach within The wide sea-marshes of Glynn,—

Beautiful glooms, soft dusks in the noon-day fire,—Wildwood privacies, closets of lone desire,

Chamber from chamber parted with wavering array of leaves.—

Cells for the passionate pleasure of prayer to the soul that grieves, Pure with a sense of the passing of saints through the wood.

Cool for the dutiful weighing of ill with good,-

O bruded dusks of the oak and woven shades of the vine, While the riotous noon-day sun of the June-day long did shine

Ye held me fast in your heart and I held you fast in mine,

But now when the noon is no more, and riot is rest,

And the sun is a-wait at the ponderous gate of the West, And the slant yellow beam down the wood-aisle doth

Like a lane into heaven that leads from a dream—

Ay now, when my soul all day hath drunken the soul of

And my heart is at ease from men, and the wearisome sound of the stroke

Of the scythe of time and the trowel of trade is low. And belief overmasters doubt, and I know that I know, And my spirit is grown to a lordly great compass

That the length and the breadth and the sweep of the marshes of Glynn

Will work me no fear like the fear they have wrought

When length was fatigue, and when breadth was but bitterness sore.

And when terror and shrinking and dreary unnamable pain

Drew over me out of the merciless miles of the plain,-

Oh, now, unafraid, I am fain to face

The vast sweet visage of space.

To the edge of the wood I am drawn, I am drawn,

Where the gray beach glimmering runs, as a belt of the dawn.

For a mete and a mark

To the forest-dark — 40

So

Affable live-oak, leaning low,-

Thus—with your favor—soft, with a reverent hand (N it lightly touching your person, Lord of the land!), Bending your beauty aside, with a step 1 stand. On the firm-packed sand,

Free

By a world of marsh that borders a world of sea

Sinuous southward and sinuous northward the shimmering band

Of the sand-beach fastens the fringe of the marsh to the folds of the land 50

Inward and outward to northward and southward the beach-lines linger and curl

As a silver-wrought garment that clings to and follows the firm sweet limbs of a girl

Vanishing, swerving, evermore curving again into sight, Softly the sand-beach wavers away to a dim gray looping of light

And what if behind me to westward the wall of the woods stands high?

The world lies east how ample, the marsh and the sea and the sky'

A league and a league of marsh-grass, waist-high, broad in the blade,

Green and all of a height, and unflecked with a light

Stretch leisurely off, in a pleasant plain,

To the terminal blue of the main

Oh, what is abroad in the marsh and the terminal sea? Somehow my soul seems suddenly free

From the weighing of fate and the sad discussion of sin, By the length and the breadth and the sweep of the marshes of Glynn

Ye marshes, how candid and simple and nothing-withholding and free

Ye publish yourselves to the sky and offer yourselves to the sea!

60

Tolerant plains, that suffer the sea and the rains and the sun,

Ye spread and span like the catholic man who hath mightily won

God out of knowledge and good out of infinite pain

And sight out of blindness and purity out of a stain 70

As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod,
Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God
I will fly in the greatness of God as the marsh-hen flies
In the freedom that fills all the space 'twixt the marsh and the skies

By so many roots as the marsh-grass sends in the sold I will heartily lay me a-hold on the greatness of God Oh, like to the greatness of God is the greatness within The range of the marshes, the liberal marshes of Glynn

And the sea lends large, as the marsh lo out of his plenty the sea

Pours fast full soon the time of the flood-tide must be

Look how the grace of the sea doth go

About and about through the intricate channels that flow Here and there,

Everywhere,

Till his waters have flooded the uttermost creeks and the low-lying lanes,

And the marsh is meshed with a million veins, That like as with rosy and silvery essences flow In the rose-and-silver evening glow

Farewell, my lord Sun!

The creeks overflow a thousand rivulets run
"Twixt the roots of the sod; the blades of the marshgrass stir.

Passeth a hurrying sound of wings that westward whirr, Passeth and all is still, and the currents cease to run, And the sea and the marsh are one

How still the plains of the waters be!
The tide is in his ecstasy
The tide is at his highest height
And it is night

And now from the Vast of the Lord will the waters of sleep

Roll in on the souls of men.

But who will reveal to our waking ken

The forms that swim and the shapes that creep Under the waters of sleep?

And I would I could know what swimmeth below when the tide comes in

On the length and the breadth of the marvellous marshes of Glynn

Edward Rowland Sill

1841 · 1887

Edward Rowland Sill, born in Windsor Connecticut, in 1841, was the descendant of a distinguished line of New England ancestors which included several ministers. He prepared for college at Phillips Exeter and attended Yale. Then followed a period of indecision which ended with his becoming a teacher and author at the University of California. In 1882 he retired from teaching and returned to the East, where he died in 188^7

With some differences in time and place, the pattern of Sill's living was reminiscent of the lives of earlier Brahmin poets. Sill thought of poetry much as they had It should express "a pure and rich nature." It should be "full of lovely images" and "in every way musical." It should be concerned with "both thought and feeling," should "bring about us troops of high and pure associations," and "leave us purer and richer than it found us" Putting such beliefs into practice in creative writing, Sill produced a number of poems which were very much in the vein of Longfellow—"The Arch," for instance, and "Spring Twilight," and two very popular poems, "The Fool's Prayer" and "Opportunity"

In cherishing such concepts and in producing such poetry, Sill showed his relationship with a sizable group of poets contemporaneous with him—Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Richard Watson Gilder, and others These writers carried over into the last decades of the nineteenth century the so-called genteel tradition" of the prewar period. As a rule, they were reminiscent, derivative, echoing songs of British or American Victorians. They prolonged a way of thinking about literature and a way of writing it which had flourished in different days. Hence Sill, though a minor poet, merits attention as a representative poet.

But Sill, in some of his poems, contrasted with these inachronistic authors in reflecting more of the puzzlement and the doubt of his period than they did. The certainties which had given the Brahmins both their stodginess and their appeal were crumbling, a Professor Newton Arvin has noted, "unlike any ican poet before him, or among his contemporari had the hardihood to express in verse a metap anxiety" Professor Arvin points out the significathis fact when he says "It is an old story to us no poetry of negation, but it was not an old story sixting ago. It took an uncommon moral refinement thave even the glimpses which Sill had into the Land. Sill was no Robinson, no Eliot, no But what is striking is that he gave so much progation as he did."

Alfred Kreymborg also sees Sill as an author of study. "Sill fell between the New England of and the national renascence, of which he was an officerunner.... Next to the jocund Longfello looms a courageous, truth-seeking individual, a was Poe's equal in the esthetic realm. And sin esthetic power bent his melancholia to an object of the poe's. Within the limits he set himself, I the purest artist in Nineteenth Century Am Poetry."

The Poetical Works of Edward Rowland Sill, Boston, 1906 •
Belmont Parker, Edward Rowland Sill, His Life and Work, Bost

Morning

One of Sill's Yale classmotes, as quoted by W. B. Parker, observed that while he and Sill were in college, the faculty was so strong for discipline that it often deliberately erected obstacles for students to overcome: "When [for instance], President Woolsey offered to cushion the bare seats in the chapel at his own expense, the proposition was turned down as tending to make the students effeminate. To this hated chapel, we were driven twice a day and four times on Sunday, one of the daily herdings being before daylight in winter. Some compensation for these monastic rigors lies in the fact that during one of them, Sill got the idea for 'Morning,' and it symbolized his feeling regarding the lights our teachers read by "

A fellow editor of the Yale Literary Magazine, in which the poem first appeared, said that the original composition contained a final line, "Was there not min my dream?" "I struck out the last line," he said cause, as I told Sill afterwards, 'a finger-post needed.' Instead of being vexed, he was grateful doubtedly, Sill's symbolism was adequate without the composition, although an early one, is indicathe author's discontent with older solutions, his eag to find better new ones

I entered once, at break of day,
A chapel, lichen-stained and gray,
Where a congregation dozed and heard
An old monk read from a written Word
No light through the window-panes could pass,
For shutters were closed on the rich stained-glass;
And in a gloom like the nether night
The monk read on by a taper's light.

Ghostly with shadows, that shrank and grew As the dim light flared, were aisle and pew; And the congregation that dozed around Listened without a stir or sound-Save one, who rose with wistful face And shifted a shutter from its place Then light flashed in like a flashing gem-For dawn had come unknown to them-And a slender beam, like a lance of gold. Shot to the crimson curtain-fold Over the bended head of him Who pored and pored by the taper dim; And it kindled over his wrinkled brow Such words "The law which was till now:" And I wondered that, under that morning ray, When night and shadow were scattered away, The monk should bow his locks of white By a taper's feebly flickering light-Should pore, and pore, and never seem To notice the golden morning-beam

The Fool's Prayer

W. C. Bartlett, a contemporary of Sill, at a memorial meeting in 1887, read a paper which told of the contemporary estimate of this poem "The grandest sermon that has been uttered in rhythmic lines in the last halfcentury, is in 'The Fool's Prayer' Not many fugitive poems have been more widely read. It has in it the voice of the prophet and the priest. It turns the footstool of the kina into a confessional. It abases and lifts up the fool into the holier atmosphere of humiliation, penitence and prayer It convicts the scoffing king and sends him away murmuring, 'Be merciful to me, a fool' It is a ritual fit not only for fools and kings, but for that large class who, being neither fools nor kings, prefer the ignoble and scoffing jest to any reverent expression for a faith that can save the world." A modern critic, probably, would be less enthusiastic

The royal feast was done, the King Sought some new sport to banish care, And to his jester cried "Sir Fool, Kneel now, and make for us a prayer!"

The jester doffed his cap and bells,
And stood the mocking court before;
They could not see the bitter smile
Behind the painted grin he wore.

He bowed his head, and bent his knee Upon the monarch's silken stool, His pleading voice arose "O Lord, Be merciful to me. a fool!

"No pity, Lord, could change the heart From red with wrong to white as wool; The rod must heal the sin but, Loid, Be merciful to me, a fool!

"T is not by guilt the onward sweep
Of truth and right, O Lord, we stay,
"T is by our follies that so long
We hold the earth from heaven away,

"These clumsy feet, still in the mire, Go crushing blossoms without end, These hard, well-meaning hands we thrust Among the heart-strings of a friend

"The ill-timed truth we might have kept— Who knows how sharp it pierced and stung? The word we had not sense to say— Who knows how grandly it had rung?

"Our faults no tenderness should ask,
The chastening stripes must cleanse them all;
But for our blunders—oh, in shame
Before the eyes of heaven we fall

"Earth bears no balsam for mistakes, Men crown the knave, and scourge the tool That did his will, but Thou, O Lord, Be merciful to me, a fool!"

The room was hushed, in silence rose
The King, and sought his gardens cool,
And walked apart, and murmured low,
"Be merciful to me, a fool!"

Opportunity

Like "The Fool's Prayer," this poem was very popular among the readers of the day, frequently it was reprinted in newspapers and grade-school readers. In setting and verse form, it resembles the work of one of the author's idols, Tennyson. It also continues the genteel tradition of Lowell and Longfellow.

This I beheld, or dreamed it in a dream -There spread a cloud of dust along a plain, And underneath the cloud, or in it, raged A turious battle, and men yelled, and swords Shocked upon swords and shields A prince's banner Wavered, then staggered backward, hemmed by foes A craven hung along the battle's edge, And thought, "Had I a sword of keener steel-That blue blade that the king's son bears,-but this Blunt thing-1" he snapt and flung it from his hand, 10 And lowering crept away and left the field Then came the king's son, wounded, sore bestead, And weaponless, and saw the broken sword, Hilt-buried in the dry and trodden sand, And ran and snatched it, and with battle-shout Lifted afresh he hewed his enemy down, And saved a great cause that heroic day

The Book of Hours

Certainly," says Professor Arvin, "Sill was tormented more than most men by his incapacity to see into the heart of things, more painfully haunted by doubtfulness and perplexity. There is a sonnet called 'The Book of Hours,' in which he figures himself as a man vainly attempting to read a tale in a language he imperfectly understands, and failing to be touched by its grace. ."

As one who reads a tale writ in a tongue He only partly knows,—runs over it And follows but the story, losing wit

And charm, and half the subtle links among

The haps and harms that the book's folk beset,—
So do we with our life. Night comes, and morn:
I know that one has died and one is born,

That this by love and that by hate is met.

But all the grace and glory of it fail.
To touch me, and the meanings they enfold.

The Spirit of the World hath told the tale,
And teils it and 't is very wise and old.

But oer the page there is a mist and veil.
I do not know the tongue in which 't is told.

Roland

Alfred Kreymborg sees in this poem a foretaste of "the cryptic Robinson and the later and still more cryptic Eliot", the style, indeed, is terse and suggestive rather than discursive. Thinking rather more of content than of style, perhaps, Professor Arvin sees it as foreshadowing both "Miniver Cheevy" (p. 928) and "J. Alfred Prufrock" (p. 976). It should be noted, however, that the resolution of the poem shows the ironically named hero—far from being a romantically valiant man—finding a solution of his problem. It is interesting and significant to note that it was a solution of a sort the author himself had sought throughout life.

A foolish creature full of fears,
He trembled for his fate,
And stood aghast to feel the earth
Swing round her dizzy freight

With timid foot he touched each plan, Sure that each plan would fail, Behemoth's tread was his, it seemed, And every bridge too frail

No glory of the night or day

Lit any crown for him,

The tranquil past but breathed a mist

To make the future dim

10

The world, his birthright, seemed a cell, An iron heritage; Man, a trapped creature, left to die Forgotten in his cage.

In every dark he held his breath And warded off a blow, While at his shoulder still he sought Some tagging ghost of woe.

Spying the thorns but not the flowers,
Through all the blossoming land
He hugged his careful heart and shunned
The path on either hand

The buds that broke their hearts to give New odors to the air He saw not, but he caught the scent Of dead leaves everywhere

Till on a day he came to know He had not made the world; That if he slept, as when he ran, Each onward planet whirled.

He knew not where the vision fell,
Only all things grew plain—
As if some thatch broke through and let
A sunbeam cross his brain.

In beauty flushed the morning light, With blessing dropped the rain, All creatures were to him most fair, Nor anything in vain.

He breathed the space that links the stars,
He rested on God's arm—
A man unmoved by accident,
Untouched by any harm.

The weary doubt if all is good,
They doubt if all is ill,
He left to Him who leaves to us
To know that all is well

Emily Dickinson

1830 · 1886

On April 16, 1862. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, a clergyman in Worcester, Mass, found in his mailbox a strange little note "Mr Higginson,—" it began, "Are you too deeply occupied to say if my verse is alive?" Enclosed were four extraordinary little poems and, tucked away in a separate envelope, as if the writer had wished to hide it, the poet's name—Emily Dickinson

The editor, intrigued by the quaint way his correspondent had written him and impressed by the unusual talent shown in the poetry, wrote of his admiration for Miss Dickinson's songs, asked to see more, and made some inquiries about his reticent correspondent's life. Her reply contained vague answers to his questions, as if she were eager to keep details about her life secret. To his query about her age, for instance, she replied somewhat irrelevantly that she had written little poetry "until this winter, sir" 'You ask of my companions," she said a few lines later "Hills, sir, and the sundown, and a dog large as myself, that my father bought me. They are better than beings because they know, but do not tell, and the noise in the pool at noon excels my piano" At the end she expressed fear that her 'story" was growing fatiguing and asked innocently whether her letter told what he had asked her to tell

The incident might typify the way knowledge of this she playful, odd poet has eluded biographers. Some facts about her are clear enough that she was the daughter of Lawyer Edward Dickinson of Amherst, Massachusetts, a rather stern Calvinist, that despite her repressive surroundings she was a vivacious, fun-loving girl, that she was well educated in the Amherst Academy and Mount Holyoke, that in time, something happened to her which caused her to become a recluse in her house at Amherst, writing much verse but refusing to publish it.

Exactly what led to Miss Dickinson's reclusiveness has been explained in various ways by various biographers, most of whom have found evidence of an unhappy love affair, though agreement has not been reached about even the identity of the man she supposedly loved Probably the most believable version of her story is that written by Professor George F Whicher His thesis is that most of Miss Dickinson's few relationships with men were completely intellectual, her only "love" vas all on her side and the object of it was never aware of it, and she did not become a recluse suddenly and dramatically but drifted by degrees into her habit of living apart from the world.

What is even more puzzling than the details of her life is the paradox of her personality. Here is a child of New England Puritanism sternly reared in a strict household, shut off from much of life, increasingly retiring But here also is a playful humorist, a passionate rebel, daring in her feeling, thinking, and expression Here, too, as more and more readers recognize, is a fine poet For, though details about Miss Dickinson's biography have led, in studies of her, to somewhat more emphasis on her personal history, somewhat less on her work, than may be desirable, she has been given growing recognition as a poet of significance. The first selection of her poetry, published posthumously in 1890, was frequently reprinted, and other selections appeared in 1892, 1896, 1914, 1924, 1929, 1936, and 1945 Beginning in the 1920's many critics have praised her, along with Whitman, for pioneering in modern poetry

The uses Miss Dickinson made of imperfect rhyme or eye-rhyme, the liberties she took with grammar and rhythm, and, in particular, her habit of packing her lines with cryptic meanings have endeared her to present-day readers. Too, her vivid imagination and her playful spirit made her as fond of poetic conceits as John Donne, idol of the moderns, had been in the seventeenth century. The resemblance to Donne was almost certainly not the result of imitation like the best modern poets, Miss Dickinson evolved a way of her own with words. Higginson, on reading her verse, thought perhaps Whitman's style had influenced her, but she said she had never read him—that she had been told "that he was disgraceful". Emerson, however, she knew in person and as an author, and Professor Boynton has noted important stylistic resemblances between the verse of the Transcendentalist leader and that of Miss Dickinson. "How many fairly discriminating readers." asks Mr. Boynton, "might be puzzled if asked to tell which of the poets wrote the following quatrains?

He who has no hands Perforce must use his tongue; Foxes are so cunning Because they are not strong.

Ever the Rock of Ages melts
Into the mineral air,
To be the quarry whence to build
Thought and its mansions fair.

They are, in fact, both Emerson's, but it is doubtful if any but Emersoniacs and Emilists could be certain in their ascriptions, and even then the answer would depend more on recognition than on judgment." Mr. Boynton correctly adds that despite this similarity it would be wrong to see in the younger poet either an imitator or an unconscious reflection of the older—that Emerson's influence at most simply was "effective in reinforcing what 'the candidate preliminary was " Yet the kinship of her technique with that of two of the most radical prosodic innovators of her time is significant

Significant also is the kinship of Miss Dickinson's was of thinking with that of her day As Professor Whicher says, "What she actually represents is the last surprising bloom-the November witch-hazel blossom-of New England's flowering time . . She was a child of the Golden Day and never lost the impress of the period Three of its strongest currents came to a confluence in her poetry. The Puritan tradition in which she was nurtured, the Yankee or, more broadly, American humor that was just coming out of the ground, and the spiritual unrest, typified by Emerson, which everywhere was melting the frost of custom Each was implicit in her sucroundings and was absorbed from the atmosphere of her time Blended, they gave her a style that was both original and native"

My Sabbath

This poem was one of the few published by Miss Dickinson herself during her lifetime it appeared in The Round Table, edited by the author's cousins, Henry E and Charles H Sweetser, on March 12, 1864 Millicent Todd Bingham, in Ancestor's Bracades, suggests that it might have been the reception given to this poem which convinced the poet that "it was useless to attempt to gain a hearing"

Some keep the Sabbath going to church, I keep it staying at home,

With a bobolink for a chorister, And an orchard for a dome

Some keep the Sabbath in surplice,
I just wear my wings.
And instead of tolling the bell for church,
Our little sexton sings

God preaches—a noted clergyman, And the sermon is never long. So instead of going to heaven at last, I'm going all along

10

Miss Dickinson had not consented to its publication when this poem appeared in the Springfield Republican, February 14, 1866. She was annoyed with some liberties taken by the editor in the division of lines and in the punctuation But she later made only a few changes in the wording 1.4, "sudden" was substituted for "instant", 1.11, "child" for "boy", 1.12, "morn" for "noon". Here, as in other poems, the author uses figurative expressions which not only portray accurately but also connote the emotion of the poet. Increasingly, it suggests the effects of the snake which are summarized in the last line—"zero at the bone.

A narrow fellow in the grass Occasionally rides, You may have met him,—did you not? His notice instant is

The grass divides as with a comb, A spotted shaft is seen, And then it closes at your feet And opens further on

He likes a boggy acre, A floor too cool for corn, Yet when a boy, and barefoot, I more than once, at noon,

Have passed, I thought, a whip-lash Unbraiding in the sun,— When, stooping to secure it, It wrinkled, and was gone

Several of nature's people I know, and they know me, I feel for them a transport Of cordiality,

But never met this fellow, Attended or alone, Without a tighter breathing, And zero at the bone. Poems of Emily Dickinson (1890), as the title-page announced, was "edited by two of her friends, Mabel Loomis Todd and T W Higginson. The editors chose "This Is My Letter as a fitting prelude. Despite its simplicity of form and language, the poem indicates the author's feeling about the nature of her work and typifies her compact yet rich way of expressing her ideas. The selections from Miss Dickinson's writings printed hereafter, unlike our selections from other authors, do not have the dates of publication affixed. These writings were all published posthumously, and the dates of their appearance have no relevance to the dates of their composition.

This is my letter to the world,

That never wrote to me,—

The simple news that Nature told,

With tender majesty

Her message is committed

To hands I cannot see,

For love of her, sweet countrymen,

Judge tenderly of me!

The Humming Bird

"The Humming Bird" is a revision of an earlier version, and Professor Whicher (This Was a Poet, pp. 261-262) gives an interesting analysis of the changes made "Here," he says of the final version, "is the whole sensation of hummingbird first, a dazzle of sudden sense impressions, movement, motion of wings, color, and whir (in the reiterated r s), all at once, then (the bird's departure taken for granted) the emptiness emphasized by the clear picture of nodding blossoms, and finally the startled mind of the (assumed) spectator regaining its poise with a whimsical comment. Nothing could be spared and no more is needed Emily Dickinson was never to write a better nature poem.

than this, but the stepping-stones that led up to her finest achievement are, many of them, monuments of an artistry only slightly less perfect." As this analysis indicates, the poem is a striking example of the author's skill in giving concrete expression to abstract ideas—one of her most notable abilities

A route of evanescence
With a revolving wheel,
A resonance of emerald,
A rush of cochineal,
And every blossom on the bush
Adjusts its tumbled head,—
The mail from Tunis, probably,
An easy morning's ride

I Like to See It Lap the Miles

"Your true poet," a character in Santayana's writings is made to say, 'catches the charm of something or anything, dropping the thing itself." Here Miss Dickinson depicts a locomotive as if it were a mythical and mighty horse. The metaphor makes possible suggestions of the superhuman power and the paradoxical servitude of this lapper of miles and parer of quarries.

I like to see it lap the miles, And lick the valleys up, And stop to feed itself at tanks, And then, prodigious, step

Around a pile of mountains, And, supercilious, peer In shanties by the sides of roads, And then a quarry pare

To fit its sides, and crawl between, Complaining all the while In horrid, hooting stanza, Then chase itself down hill And neigh tike Boanerges; Then, punctual as a star, Stop—docile and omnipotent— At its own stable door

10

This poem illustrates how, in Professor Whicher's words Miss Dickinson's line of thinking at times "rises to a where abstract ideas are personified and dramatized. filled with vital breath, and placed in exciting relation with each other" By telling vividly of the start of a journey by carriage to eternity, with Death as the coach man, the poem thus fancifully gives concrete expression to the hope for immortality. The details of the poem are arranged so as to disassociate the travelers more and more from earthly life. In the opening lines, "I could not stop" ambiguously suggests a laborer who could not put off toil. The second stanza shows that the poet has "put away" not only toil but also leisure Now the slow carriage passes children at play, oblivious of the nearby travelers next it passes fields which emphasize the lifelessness of the poet and the driver by "gazing" at them. After the darkness has come with the passing by of the setting sin, the travelers pause before a grave whose tenant has crumbled to dust even that semblance of being has dis appeared Such is the preparation for the final stanza, in which immortality has replaced completely the mortality of earth

Because I could not stop for Death, He kindly stopped for me, The carriage held but just ourselves And Immortality

We slowly drove, he knew no haste, And I had put away My labor and my leisure too, For his civility

We passed the school where children played At wrestling in a ring, We passed the fields of gazing grain, We passed the setting sun

We paused before a house that seemed A swelling of the ground, The roof was scarcely visible, The cornice but a mound

Since then 't is centuries, but each Feels shorter than the day | first surmised the horses' heads Were toward eternity

Papa Above

This is a mockery of anthropomorphism, the tendency of man to create God in his own image "Suppose," Miss Dickinson seems to have thought, "suppose a mouse conjured up a vision of God and eternity—what would this vision be like?" Playfully, then, she pictured the animal considering a Cat as the angel of death and conceiving of heaven as a snug cupboard where, for all eternity, the angel-mouse might nibble at his cheese. The irreverent way she played with religious concepts was much in the spirit of many contemporaneous nineteenth-century American humorists. Robert Burdette's "The Brakeman at Church" (1879), for instance, was a translation of the tenets of various religious sects into the jargon of the railroad man.

Papa above!

Regard a Mouse O erpowered by the Cat, Reserve within thy Kingdom A "mansion" for the Rat!

Snug in seraphic cupboards To nibble all the day, While unsuspecting cycles Wheel pompously away.

As Imperceptibly as Grief

Although it ostensibly tells of the imperceptible passing of summer, this composition also may be read as a comment upon change and death. The meaning is subtly suggested by figures such as "as imperceptibly as grief" and "without a wing," and by symbols. The symbols are figures perhaps only vaguely suggestive of their implications unless Miss Dickinson's peculiarly personal ways of using them in a number of her poems are taken into account. As Mr. Thomas Dillon Howells has noticed in an unpublished Master's dissertation, morning, for her, signifies "hope, purity, innocence", afternoon, customarily, is associated with death, funerals, twilight or dusk, "a solemn time of day, completion, peace."

As imperceptibly as grief The summer lapsed away.— Too imperceptible, at last, To seem like perfidy.

A quietness distilled, As twilight long begun, Or Nature, spending with herself Sequestered afternoon

The dusk drew earlier in,
The morning foreign shone,—
A courteous, yet harrowing grace,
As guest who would be gone

And thus, without a wing.

Or service of a keel,

Our summer made her light escape

Into the beautiful

The Preacher

Brought up by a strict Puritan father, Miss Dickinson, despite her rebellion against some of the excesses of Calvinism, probably resented the highly intellectualized and at times snobbish liberal religion which was replacing it The pretentious "modern" preacher, talking at length about virtues which perhaps could better be practiced than defined, gets his "come-uppance" in this ironic poem The final lines gibe at the figure conjured up at the start of the poem, first by comparing mock gold (pyrites) with gold (here, as elsewhere in Miss Dickinson's poetry, a symbol of integrity) and then by imagining how Christ would feel upon confronting him

He preached upon "breadth" till it argued him narrow,— The broad are too broad to define, And of "truth" until it proclaimed him a liar,-The truth never flaunted a sign

Simplicity fled from this counterfeit presence As gold the pyrites would shun What confusion would cover the innocent Jesus To meet so enabled a man!

Farther in Summer than the Birds

Mr Yvor Winters, who considers this poem one of the five or six of the greatest by Miss Dickinson, says that in it "we are shown the essential cleavage between man, as represented by the author-reader, and nature, as represented by the insects in the late summer grass, the subject is the plight of man, the willing and freely-moving entity, in a universe in which he is by virtue of his essential qualities a foreigner . . The change described in the last two lines is the change in the appearance of nature and in the feeling of the observer which results from a recognition of the cleavage . The first two lines of the last stanze are written in the author's personal grammatical short hand, they are no doubt defective in this respect, but the defect is minor. They mean There is as yet no diminution of beauty, no mark of change on the brightness. The twelfth line contains a meaningless inversion. On the other hand the false rhymes are employed with unusually fine modula tion, the first rhyme is perfect, the second and third represent successive stages of departure, and the last a return to what is roughly the stage of the second. These effects are complicated by the rhyming, both perfect and imper fect. from stanza to stanza The intense strangeness of the poem could not have been achieved with standard rhymina "

Farther in summer than the birds. Pathetic from the grass, A minor nation celebrates Is unobtrusive mass

No ordinance is seen, So gradual the grace. A pensive custom it becomes, Enlarging loneliness

Antiquest felt at noon When August, burning low, Calls forth this spectral canticle, Repose to typify

Remit as yet no grace, No furrow on the glow, Yet a druidic difference Enhances nature now

I Taste a Liquor Never Brewed

Thomas Bailey Aldrich thought that this composition needed "only a slight revision of the initial stanza to entitle it to rank with some of the swallow flights in Heine's lyr.cal intermezzos." He "tucked a rhyme into that opening stanza" to make it read

> I taste a liquor never brewed In vats along the Rhine, No tankard ever held a draught Of alcohol like mine

Miss Genevieve Taggard, in The Life and Mind of Emily Dickinson, defends the original version thus "From tankards scooped in pearl' enjoins our attention, after being so vandalized Quite apart from the sounds recrived and carried on by it, it runs the voice from the as in tankards' to the o's in 'scooped' and then produces the word 'pearl,' on which to let them culminate, the nk and the r in 'tankard' catching all the other consonants as the ripple of tone-colour runs down the line If anyone needs the pale device of rhyme after such interplay of sound, culminating in 'Yield such an alcohol,' he is tonedeaf and deserves to be so. But he should be told that. while he was hearing nothing, the stanza as a whole has been giving off the variations on the sound of 1, firmly placed in the middle of the first line, at the end of the second, near the beginning of the third to culminate in yield' and the I's of 'alcohol' "

I taste a liquor never brewed, From tankards scooped in pearl, Not all the vats upon the Rhine Yield such an alcohol!

Inebriate of air am I, And debauchee of dew, Reeling, through endless summer days. From inns of molten blue

When landlords turn the drunken bee Out of the foxglove's door, When butterflies renounce their drams, I shall but drink the more!

Till seraphs swing their snowy hats, And saints to windows run, To see the little tippler Leaning against the sun!

If You Were Coming in the Fall

If you were coming in the fall, I'd brush the summer by With half a smile and half a spurn, As housewives do a fly

If I could see you in a year I'd wind the months in balls, And put them each in separate drawers, Until their time befalls

If only centuries delayed, I'd count them on my hand Subtracting till my fingers dropped Into Van Dieman's land

If certain, when this life was out, That yours and mine should be, I'd toss it yonder like a rind, And taste eternity

But now, all ignorant of the length Of time's uncertain wing, It goads me, like the goblin bec, That will not state its sting

Because we're orchard-sprung—but were I Britain-born Id daisies spurn—
None but the Nut October fits Because through dropping it The seasons flit, I'm taught Without the snow's tableau

Winter were lie to me— Because I see New Englandly The Queen discerns like me Provincially

'Twas Warm at First Like Us

'Twas warm at first like us, Until there crept thereon A chill, like frost upon a glass Till all the scene be gone

The forehead copied stone, The fingers grew too cold To ache, and like a skater's brook The busy eyes congealed

It straightened- -that was all It crowded cold to cold— It multiplied induference As Pride were all it could

And even when with cords T was lowered like a freight, It made no signal, nor demuired, But dropped like adamant

1871 • 1900

For a biographical account of Stephen Crane and a consideration of his novels and short stories, see pages 627-628

Poems

Poems numbered 1-2 appeared in The Black Riders and Other Lines in 1895, poems numbered 3-6 appeared in War Is Kind and Other Lines in 1899

Critics have often pointed out Crane's indebtedness to Emily Dickinson and his anticipation of the Imagist poets Reacting against the popular tradition of Tennyson and Longfellow, Crane achieved something of the concentration, the impressionistic pictorial effect, and the irony of modern American poetry

1

God fashioned the ship of the world carefully With the infinite skill of an All-Master Made He the hull and the sails, Held He the rudder Ready for adjustment.

Erect stood He, scanning His work proudly. Then—at fateful time—a wrong called, And God turned, heeding.

Lo, the ship, at this opportunity, slipped slyly,

Making cunning noiseless travel down the ways
So that, for ever rudderless, it went upon the seas
Going ridiculous voyages,
Making quaint progress,
Turning as with serious purpose
Before stupid winds
And there were many in the sky
Who laughed at this thing

And the affrighted steed ran on alone, Do not weep War is kind

Hoarse, booming drums of the regiment,
Little souls who thirst for fight,
These men were born to drill and die
The unexplained glory flies above them.
(Treat is the battle-god, great, and his kingdom—
A field where a thousand corpses he

Do not weep, babe, for war is kind Because your father tumbled in the yellow trenches, Raged at his breast, gulped and died, Do not weep War is kind wift blazing flag of the regiment,

Ligle with crest of red and gold,
These men were born to drill and die
Point for them the virtue of slaughter,
Make plain to them the excellence of killing
And a field where a thousand corpses lie

Mother whose heart hung humble as a button On the bright splendid shroud of your son, Do not weep War is kind

The wayfarer,
Perceiving the pathway to truth,
Was struck with astonishment
It was thickly grown with weeds
Ha," he said
I see that none has passed here
In a long time"
Later he saw that each weed
Was a singular knife
Well, he mumbled at last,
Doubtless there are other roads"

The trees in the garden rained flowers Children ran there joyously They gathered the flowers Each to himself Now there were some Who gathered great hexps-Having opportunity and skill-Until, behold, only chance blossoms Remained for the feeble Then a little spindling tutor Ran importantly to the father, crying 'Pray, come hither' See this unjust thing in your garden! But when the fither had surveyed. He admonished the tutor 'Not so, small sage! This thing is just For, look you, Are not they who possess the flowers Stronger, bolder, shrewder Than they who have none? Why should the strong -The beautiful strong---Why should they not have the flowers? Upon reflection, the tutor bowed to the ground, My lord,' he said. The stars are displaced By this towering wisdom

William Vaughn Moody

1869 · 1910

The one American poet who stood out from among his fellows in the first decade of the twentieth century was William Vaughn Moody Like his friend Edwin Arlington Robinson (see p. 926), whose fame was to come later, Moody was on the whole traditional in his forms, although not slavishly so Frequently reminiscent of the later English Victorians, his verses nevertheless have the distinction of revealing a sensitive and observant individual whose bookishness did not obscure his tresh perceptions of a uniquely puzzling world. Moody saw the United States in the "progressive" era and he did not like its lack of direction, its materialism, its apparent desertion of ideals. But he was not bitter, as Crane was, nor a crusader, as were some of the novelists of his generation. His very detachment was to a degree a virtue, for it enabled him to describe with admirable balance the state of the American mind at the opening of a new century

Moody was born in a small town in south-central Indiana, but was brought up in New Albany, on the Ohio River across from Louisville. As a boy he was fond of outdoor exercise, but also of music and painting and study, his liking for all these stayed with him. The death of his father broke up the family while Moody was in art school, but with the help of an uncle he prepared for college and in 1889 entered Harvard Although he worked his way through, he found time for many contributions to the Harvard Monthly, the literary magazine, and for the rich friendships which became perhaps his greatest glory.

Having satisfied the requirements for graduation in three years, Moody spent his senior year in Europe tutoring a young man getting ready for Harvard They walked through the English lake country and the Black Forest saw the sights of Paris, Florence, and Athens Before he died, he returned to Europe five more times sometimes for months on end, like Howells and Henry James and many other Americans he found the other side of the Atlantic a second home. In 1893, however he went back to Cambridge for his own commence ment to read the Class Day poem, staying on at Har vaid for two years of graduate study. He then accepted an instructorship in English at the University of Chi cago, which was rising dramatically to eminence. In Chicago he spent the larger part of seven years, teach ing, editing school textbooks to supplement his in come, enjoying the companionship of a lively literary and artistic set leaving at intervals for vacations in Europe, northern Michigan, and Colorado moreover, there was writing, which he was coming to regard as his real profession. In 1902 he was enabled to give it his full time through the success of a textbook, A History of English Literature, written in collaboration with his friend Robert Morss Lovett Its royalties supported a farewell to the classroom

His true work had already begun with a poetic drama. The Manque of Judgment (1898), and a thin volume of Poems (1901), containing twenty-five pieces some of them previously published in magazines. Has production in the eight remaining years of his life was not large, primarily because he was fighting a losing battle with the tumorous condition which caused his death in 1910. Of the quality of what he did, however there has never been any question. A dozen adstronal short poems, The Fire-Bringer (1904, a second poetic drama which with The Masque of Judgment and the uncompleted "Death of Eve" forms his most ambitions work), and two prose plays, The Great Divide (produced in 1906, it ran for two years and gave him his first genuine financial security) and The Faith Healer (1909)—these and his letters are all that we have

There is nothing quite like Moody's writings in American literature for the combination of fresh experience and scholarship. The two poles of Moody's life and thought were Chicago and Europe—crude, throbbing, uncisciplined force on the one hand, the shaping and ever-present awareness of past excellence on the other Respect for power and a sense of the merits of tradition are combined in almost everything that Moody wrote, from his short lyrics to the trilogy in which he hoped to display the unity of God and man by reinterpreting the stories of Prometheus, the Day of Judgment, and Eve. Curiously enough, the combination is a fairly happy one. Like Whitman before him, Moody accepted the world and humanity, whatever their manifestations, as ultimately good and meaningful, refusing to separate the spiritual from the physical. He was no doubter, although he was often discouraged. Like Robert Browning whom he much resembles, Moody had the intellectuality and fastidiousness that come with systematic study of literary art. He lived in an age of doubt and uncertainty which he quite fully shared, but his humanism carried him through and he was able to comment with quiet penetration upon the world he saw.

An Ode in Time of Hesitation

[After seeing at Boston the statue of Robert Gould Shaw, killed while storming Fort Wagner, July 18, 1863, at the head of the first enlisted Negro regiment, the 54th Massachusetts]

On one of his walking tours in Europe in July 1897 Moody read the account of the dedication of Saint Gaudens monument to Col Robert Gould Shaw, on Boston Common across from the State House Professor Lovett, his companion, was able to tell of the stories of jeering at Shaw and his Negro regiment before their departure for the South After his return to the United States, Moody saw the monument and in 1900, deeply distressed that American troops were being used to put down the insurrection of the Filipinos led by Emilio Aguinaldo, he wrote the following poem, based upon the contrast between Shaw's idealism and the imperialistic policy which he believed was being followed in the Philippines. It was published in the Atlantic Monthly for May 1900. A few words were changed when Moody collected his poems for the 1901 volume.

The "Ode" was much admired from the first. Its relatively free form is typical of Moody, who in many ways anticipated the "new poetry" which became popular after 1915. Typical also are its allusions and literary echoes, its occasionally archaic diction and venturesome metaphor. Bookish but not exotic, it is a courageous political poem on a subject of which Americans have not yet heard the last word.

Before the solemn bronze Saint Gaudens made To thrill the heedless passer's heart with awe, And set here in the city's talk and trade To the good memory of Robert Shaw,

This bright March morn I stand,
And hear the distant spring come up the land;
Knowing that what I hear is not unheard
Of this boy soldier and his Negro band,
For all their gaze is fixed so stern ahead,
For all the fatal rhythm of their tread.

The land they died to save from death and shame
Trembles and waits, hearing the spring's great name,
And by her pangs these resolute ghosts are stirred

Through street and mall the tides of people go Heedless, the trees upon the Common show No hint of green, but to my listening heart The still earth doth impart Assurance of her jubilant emprise, And it is clear to my long-searching eyes That love at last has might upon the skies The ice is runneled in the little pond, A telltale patter drips from off the trees, The air is touched with southland spiceries, As if but yesterday it tossed the frond Of pendent mosses where the live-oaks grow Beyond Virginia and the Carolines, Or had its will among the fruits and vines Of aromatic isles asleep beyond Florida and the Gulf of Mexico

Soon shall the Cape Ann children shout in glee, Spying the arbutus, spring's dear recluse, Hill lads at dawn shall hearken the wild goose Go honking northward over Tennessee, West from Oswego to Sault Sainte-Marie, And on to where the Pictured Rocks are hung And yonder where, gigantic, willful, young, Chicago sitteth at the northwest gates, With restless violent hands and casual tongue Moulding her mighty fates, The Lakes shall robe them in ethereal sheen, And like a larger sea, the vital green Of springing wheat shall vastly be outflung Over Dakota and the prairie states By desert people immemorial On Arizonan mesas shall be done Dim rites unto the thunder and the sun.

Nor shall the primal gods lack sacrifice More splendid, when the white Sierras call Unto the Rockies straightway to arise And dance before the unveiled ark of the year, Sounding their windy cedars as for shawms. Unrolling rivers clear For flutter of broad phylacteries, While Shasta signals to Alaskan seas That watch old sluggish glaciers downward creep To fling their icebergs thundering from the steep, And Mariposa through the purple calms Gazes at far Hawaii crowned with palms Where East and West are met.-A rich seal on the ocean's bosom set To say that East and West are twain, With different loss and gain The Lord hath sundered them, let them be sundered yet

Alas! what sounds are these that come Sullenly over the Pacific seas,-Sounds of ignoble battle, striking dumb The season's half-awakened ecstasies? Must I be humble, then, New when my heart hath need of pride? Wild love falls on me from these sculptured men, 70 By loving much the land for which they died I would be justified My spirit was away on pinions wide To soothe in praise of her its passionate mood And ease it of its ache of gratitude, Too sorely heavy is the debt they lay On me and the companions of my day. I would remember now My country's goodliness, make sweet her name Alas! what shade art thou Of sorrow or of blame Liftest the lyric leafage from her brow And pointest a slow finger at her shame?

(rouched in the sea fog on the moaning sand All night he lay, speaking some simple word From hour to hour to the slow minds that heard, Holding each poor life gently in his hand 100 And breathing on the base rejected clay Till each dark face shone mystical and grand Against the breaking day, And lo, the shard the potter cast away Was grown a fiery chalice crystal-fine Fulfilled of the divine Great wine of battle wiath by God's ring-finger stirred Then upward, where the shadowy bastion loomed Huge on the mountain in the wet sea light, Whence now, and now, infernal flowerage bloomed, 110 Bloomed, burst, and scattered down its deadly seed,-They swept, and died like freemen on the height, Like freemen, and like men of noble breed, And when the battle fell away at night By hasty and contemptuous hands were thrust Obscurely in a common grave with him The fair-haired keeper of their love and trust Now limb doth mingle with dissolved limb In nature's busy old democracy To flush the mountain laurel when she blows 120 Sweet by the southern sea. And heart with crumbled heart climbs in the rose -The untaught hearts with the high heart that knew This mountain fortress for no earthly hold Of temporal quarrel, but the bastion old

Of spiritual wrong, Built by an unjust nation sheer and strong, Expugnable but by a nation's rue And bowing down before that equal shrine By all men held divine, 130 Whereof his band and he were the most holy sign. VII

O butter, butter shade! Wilt thou not put the scorn And instant tragic question from thine eyes? Do thy dark brows yet crave That swift and angry stave-Unmeet for this desirous morn--That I have striven striven to evade? Cazing on him, must I not deem they err Whose careless lips in street and shop aver 140 As common tidings deeds to make his cheek Flush from the bronze, and his dead throat to speak? Surely some elder singer would arise. Whose harp hath leave to threaten and to mourn Above this people when they go astray Is Whitman, the strong spirit, overworn? Has Whittier put his yearning wrath away? I will not and I dare not yet believe! Though furtively the sunlight seems to grieve, And the spring-laden breeze Out of the gladdening west is sinister With sounds of nameless battle overseas. Though when we turn and question in suspense If these things be indeed after these ways, And what things are to follow after these, Our fluent men of place and consequence Fumble and fill their mouths with hollow phrase, Or for the end-all of deep arguments Intone their dull commercial liturgies-I dare not yet believe! My ears are shut! 160 I will not hear the thin satiric praise And muffled laughter of our enemies, Bidding us never sheathe our valiant sword Till we have changed our birthright for a gourd Of wild pulse stolen from a barbarian's hut, Showing how wise it is to cast away The symbols of our spiritual sway, That so our hands with better ease May wield the driver's whip and grasp the jailer's keys.

VIII

Was it for this our fathers kept the law?

This crown shall crown their struggle and their ruth?

Are we the eagle nation Milton saw

Mewing its mighty youth,

Soon to possess the mountain winds of truth,

And be a swift familiar of the sun

Where aye before God's face his trumpets run?

Or have we but the talons and the maw,

And for the abject likeness of our heart

Shall some less lordly bird be set apart?—

Some gross-billed wader where the swamps are fat? 180

Some gorger in the sun? Some prowler with the bat?

IX

Ah no!

We have not fallen so

We are our fathers' sons let those who lead us know! 'T was only yesterday sick Cuba's cry
Came up the tropic wind, "Now help us, for we die!"
Then Alabama heard

And rising, pale, to Maine and Idaho

Shouted a burning word

Proud state with proud impassioned state conferred, 190 And at the lifting of a hand sprang forth,

East, west, and south, and north,

Beautiful armies Oh, by the sweet blood and young

Shed on the awful hill slope at San Juan, By the unforgotten names of eager boys

Who might have tasted girls love and been stung

With the old mystic joys

And starry gricts, now the spring nights come on,

But that the heart of youth is generous,—

We charge you, ye who lead us,

Breathe on their chivalry no hint of stain!

Turn not their new-world victories to gain!

One least leaf plucked for chaffer from the bays Of their dear praise,

One jot of their pure conquest put to hire, The implacable republic will require,

With clamor, in the glare and gaze of noon,

Or subtly, coming as a thief at night,

But surely, very surely, slow or soon

That insult deep we deeply will requite Tempt not our weakness, our cupidity!

For save we let the island men go free,

Those baffled and dislaureled ghosts

Will curse us from the lamentable coasts

Where walk the frustrate dead

The cup of trembling shall be drained quite, Eaten the sour bread of astonishment.

With ashes of the hearth shall be made white

Our hair, and wailing shall be in the tent,

Then on your guiltier head

Shall our intolerable self-disdain

Wreak suddenly its anger and its pain,

For manifest in that disastrous light

We shall discern the right

And do it, tardily —O ye who lead,

Take heed!

On a Soldier Fallen in the Philippines

Moody's opposition to imperialism was perhaps pre sented even more effectively in this poem, first published in the Atlantic Monthly in February 1901, than in "An Ode in Time of Hesitation". In March of the same year, with the capture of Aguinaldo, the Filipino independence movement was crushed.

Streets of the roaring town.

Hush for him, hush, be still!

He comes, who was stricken down

Doing the word of our will

Hush! Let him have his state,

Give him his soldier's crown

The grists of trade can wait

Their grinding at the mill,

But he cannot wait for his honor, now the trumpet has been blown

Wreathe pride now for his granite brow, lay love on his breast of stone

An Ode 172 Milton John Milton (1608 1674) wrote of England as an eagle mewing her mighty youth • 194 San Juan San Juan Hill, near Santiago de Cuba, was taken by American forces on July 1, 1898, with casualties amounting to 10 per cent of the attacking force. It was in this action that Theodore Roosevelt won distinction as a military leader.

Toll! Let the great bells toll
Till the clashing air is dim
Did we wrong this parted soul?
We will make it up to him
Toll! Let him never guess
What work we set him to Laurel, laurel, yes,
He did what we bade him do

Pilise, and never a whispered hint but the fight he fought was good,

Never a word that the blood on his sword was his country's own heart's-blood

A flag for the soldier's bier
Who dies that his land may live,
O, banners, banners here,
That he doubt not nor misgive!
That he heed not from the tomb
The evil days draw near
When the nation, robed in gloom,
With its faithless past shall strive.

Let him never dream that his bullet's scream went wide of its island mark

Home to the heart of his darling land where she stumbled and sinned in the dark

The Menagerie

First published in the 1901 collection, "The Menagerie" is a dramatic monologue. The "little man in trousers, slightly jagged," reflects, with a penetration which somewhat belies his condition, upon his place in the evolutionary scheme of things. More simply and attractively than anywhere else, perhaps, Moody here presents his faith in the unity of the universe, the inseparableness of soul and body, and the potential capacity of human beings for improvement. The humor is not without its sting.

Thank God my brain is not inclined to cut
Such capers every day! I'm just about Mellow, but then—There goes the tent-flap shut
Rain's in the wind. I thought so every snout
Was twitching when the keeper turned me out

That screaming parrot makes my blood run cold.
Gabriel's trump! the big bull clephant
Squeals "Rain! to the parched herd. The monkeys scold,
And Jabber that it's rain water they want
(It makes me sick to see a monkey pant.)

Ill foot it home, to try and make believe I'm sober After this I stick to beer, And drop the circus when the sane folks leave A man's a fool to look at things too near They look back, and begin to cut up queer

Beasts do, at any rate, especially Wild devils caged. They have the coolest way
Of being something else than what you see
You pass a sleek young zebra nosing hay,
A nylghau looking bored and distingué,—

And think you've seen a donkey and a bird

Not on your life! Just glance back, if you date

The zebra chews, the nylghtu hasn't stirred,

But something's happened, Heaven knows what or where.

To freeze your scalp and pompadour your hair

I'm not precisely an æolian lute Hung in the wandering winds of sentiment, But drown me if the ugliest, meanest brute Grunting and fretting in that sultry tent Didn't just floor me with embarrassment!

Twas like a thunder-clap from out the clear,— One minute they were circus beasts, some grand, Some ugly, some amusing, and some queer Rival attractions to the hobo band, The flying jenny, and the peanut stand

Next minute they were old hearth-mates of mine! Lost people, eyeing me with such a stare! Patient, satiric, devilish, divine, A gaze of hopeless envy, squalid care, Hatred, and thwarted love, and dim despair

Within my blood my ancient kindred spoke,— Grotesque and monstrous voices, heard afar Down ocean caves when behemoth awoke, Or through fern forests roared the plesiosaur Locked with the giant-bat in ghastly war 20

And suddenly, as in a flash of light, I saw great Nature working out her plan; Through all her shapes from mastodon to mire Forever groping, testing, passing on To find at last the shape and soul of Man.

Till in the fullness of accomplished time, Comes brother Forepaugh, upon business bent, Tracks her through frozen and through torrid clime, And shows us, neatly labeled in a tent, The stages of her huge experiment, 50

Blabbing aloud her shy and reticent hours, Dragging to light her blinking, slothful moods, Publishing fretful seasons when her powers Worked wild and sullen in her solitudes, Or when her mordant laughter shook the woods

Here, round about me, were her vagrant births, Sick dreams she had, fierce projects she essayed. Her qualms, her fiery prides, her crazy mirths, The troublings of her spirit as she strayed, Cringed, gloated, mocked, was lordly, was afraid,

On that long road she went to seek mankind, Here were the darkling coverts that she beat To find the Hider she was sent to find, Here the distracted footprints of her feet Whereby her soul's Desire she came to greet

But why should they, her botch-work, turn about And stare disdain at me, her finished job? Why was the place one vast suspended shout Of laughter? Why did all the daylight throb With soundless guffaw and dumb-stricken sob?

Helpless I stood among those awful cages,
The beasts were walking loose, and I was bagged!
I, I, last product of the toiling ages.
Goal of heroic feet that never lagged,—
A little man in trousers, slightly jagged

Deliver me from such another jury!
The Judgment-day will be a picnic to 't.
Their satire was more dreadful than their fury,
And worst of all was just a kind of brute
Disgust, and giving up, and sinking mute

Survival of the fittest, adaptation,
And all their other evolution terms,
Seem to omit one small consideration,
To wit, that tumblebugs and angleworms
Have souls there's soul in everything that squirms

And souls are restless, plagued, impatient things. All dream and unaccountable desire;
Crawling, but pestered with the thought of wings,
Spreading through every inch of earth's old mire
Mystical hanker after something higher

Wishes are horses, as I understand
I guess a wistful polyp that has strokes
Of feeling faint to gallivant on land
Will come to be a scandal to his folks,
Legs he will sprout, in spite of threats and jokes

And at the core of every life that crawls
Or runs or flies or swims or vegetates—
Churning the mammoth's heart-blood, in the galls
Of shark and tiger planting gorgeous hates,
Lighting the love of eagles for their mates,

Yes, in the dim brain of the jellied fish
That is and is not living—moved and stirred
From the beginning a mysterious wish,
A vision, a command, a fatal Word
The name of Man was uttered, and they heard

Upward along the æons of old war
They sought him wing and shank-bone, claw and bill
Were fashioned and rejected, wide and far
They roamed the twilight jungles of their will,
But still they sought him, and desired him still 110

Man they desired, but mind you, Perfect Man.
The radiant and the loving, yet to be!
I hardly wonder, when they came to scan
The upshot of their strenuosity,
They gazed with mixed emotions upon me.

Well, my advice to you is. Face the creatures, Or spot them sideways with your weather eye,

CRITICS OF AMERICAN SOCIETY: George, Bellamy, Steffens, Dunne, Sinclair, Adams

Henry George

1839 · 1897

Depression" is still a painful word to most Americans, who more than a decade later cannot erase the memories of personal misery which the history books will never quite catch in their accounts of the stock-market crash of 1929, the closing of the banks in 1933, and the measures of the "alphabet" agencies—NRA, RFC, AAA, CCC, PWA, and WPA Yet depressions have come so regularly to the United States—one about every twenty years—that many persons regard them as the inevitable end and fresh beginning of the 'business cycle' of capitalist economy

Others have always insisted that an industrialized society of enormous productive capacity ought somehow to be able to find a way of avoiding periodic breakdowns in its system of distribution. Wholesale bankruptcies,

the unemployment of able-bodied men and women, and starvation not for lack of food but for lack of buying power—these have seemed too high a price to pay for free enterprise. In the distress of deflationary eras the critics have always commanded attention. Brook Farm and the Socialism of Fourier were not lightly dismissed while the memories of the Panic of 1837 lingered. Technocracy and the Townsend Plan had their vogue in the nineteen-thirties, and the strength of the New Deal lay in the conviction of a majority of Americans that economic stability must be a concern of government. But when times are good, 'experimentation' is unpopular

In the aftermath of the Civil War there was a long stretch of hard times, between the Panic of 1873 and that of 1893 there was no genuine recovery. Social planners had time to perfect their schemes of amelioration through years when almost everyone demanded change. The result was a vast literature of social criticism, of which Henry George's Progress and Poverty (1879) and Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward (1888) are the best examples. Neither is perhaps a literary masterpiece, but few American books have been so directly influential. They and other works like them helped direct the political thought and action of two generations.

Henry George was a Philadelphian by birth. He did not do well in school and at thuteen was working as an errand boy. He clerked a bit, attended lectures at the Franklin Institute, went to sea for a year's voyage to Australia and India, learned the trade of typesetter, shipped again as a steward on a vessel bound for California. In San Francisco he left his ship and there he lived for most of the time between 1858 and 1880. He did not find life easy, particularly after his marriage at twenty-one in 1860, and the arrival of four children in quick succession. He worked at what he could find, but chiefly at printing, reporting, and editing. For a year in 1867-1868, he was managing editor of the San Francisco Times, at fifty dollars a week.

Early in 1869 he was in New York City, organizing a wire news service for the San Francisco Herald. There he had two revealing experiences. He had a first-hand demonstration of the power of monopoly when he saw his news service killed by the opposition of the Associated Press and its influence with, so he believed, the Western Union Telegraph Company. And in the streets of the city he had what he later called a "vision, a call"

"I saw," he said, "and recognized for the first time the shocking contrast between monstrous wealth and de basing want. And here I made a vow from which I have never faltered, to seek out, and remedy, if I could the cause that condemned little children to lead such a life as you know them to lead in the squalid districts.

Later in the same year, back in California, he found what he believed to be the cause, the reason for the shocking contrast he had noted. Riding in the hills around Oakland, a city just then in the gijp of a fever of land speculation, he asked a passing teamster what land thereabouts was worth. He was told that its worth was uncertain, but that a man "over there" would sell for a thousand dollars an acre. "Like a flash it came upon me that there was the reason of advancing poverty with ad vancing wealth. With the growth of population, land grows in value, and the men who work it must pay more for the privilege."

Land monopoly, he decided, had to be destroyed God gave the land for the use of men-of all men not merely a fortunate few He sat down to work out some means of halting the trend which he observed all around him, and which he was now convinced was the chief cause of poverty. In 1871 he published a forty-eight page pamphlet, Our Land and Land Policy, National and State, in which he argued that land should be taxed for its unearned value, that is to say in accordance with the difference between what it is worth when used and what it is worth by reason of its location. Improvements would not be considered, the owner of a vacant lot would have to pay just as much as the owner who had a store building on his lot. By this method of taxation he argued, land speculation would be brought to an end and the whole cost of government would be borne by land alone

George's pamphlet found few readers, and perhaps did not deserve to win more, for his knowledge of previous writers on political economy at this stage we relatively slight. But he had his idea, and he went on studying it. The Panic of 1873 and the long period of distress which followed accentuated his desire to make himself clear. In 1879 he printed, at his own expense Progress and Poverty: An Inquiry into the Cause of Industrial Depressions and of Increase of Want with Increase of Wealth. Early in 1880 Appleton's of New York undertook a commercial edition, and within a tew months Henry George's program for social and economic reform was everywhere under discussion. He took it on the lecture platform, he moved to New York and found generous support there, he visited Ireland and England in Social Problems (1883) he wrote on the relation of his scheme to such subjects as "Over-Production," "The Effects of Machinery," and "The Functions of Government. He founded and edited The Standar, 1 (1886-1892) a weekly magazine. After 1888 his plan was known as the Single Tax, and was frequently an issue in municipal, state, and even national elections. Twice he ran for mayor of New York City, dying in the last dats of his second campaign. By that time he had become one of the best-known public figures in the nation, a powerful force in tax reform and in various other movements designed to limit special privilege.

The majority of economists and tax experts have dismissed. George's solution as oversimplified or unworkable and the left wing of the present day is likely to be scornful of his rejection of Karl Marx' interpretation of history as class struggle. Yet George remains admired, for his clear criticism of certain positions of the English economists of the classical school (Thomas Robert Malthus, David Ricardo, and John Stuart Mill), for his powerful reaffirmation and extension to the economic sphere of the "natural rights" theories of the American Revolution, and for his basic moral strength, a quality none too common in the acquisitive era known as the Gilded Age.

Progress and Poverty

The forty-five chapters of Progress and Poverty are divided into ten books, preceded by the introduction which is here reprinted, and followed by a conclusion which is in actuality a brief sermon on Truth The full argument cannot be summarized, but, after stating his problem, George devotes about half his space to an examination of what is true and what false in economic science as developed before his time, the remainder of the book to a description of his remedy for the condition which he regards as the basic cause of poverty. All but the last paragraph of Chapter II, Book VIII, is here reprinted—the author's statement of the principle of the Single Tax Thereafter, as he himself said in a Preface written for the fourth edition (1880), George's inquiry passes into the realms of ethics and practical statesmanship. The student interested in economic theory will need to read the whole to understand George's position. He himself remarked of it, in summary 'What I have done in this book, if I have correctly solved the great problem I have sought to investigate, is, to unite the truth perceived by the schools of Smith and Ricardo to the truth perceived by the schools of Proudhon and LaSalle, to show that laissez faire (in its full true meaning) opens the way to a realization of the noble dreams of socialism, to identify social law with moral law. and to disprove ideas which in the minds of many cloud grand and elevating perceptions." The selections which follow are enough, however, to suggest the literary excellence of George's presentation. The clarity of his language, the richness of his allusions (surprisingly frequent for a man so largely self-taught), and the sweeping arandeur of his moral earnestness—these account for the vast audience which he has found Progress and Poverty has been translated into many foreign languages and several millions of copies have been printed

Introductory

THE PROBLEM

The present century has been marked by a prodigious increase in wealth-producing power. The utilization of steam and electricity, the introduction of improved processes and labor-saving machinery, the greater subdivision and grander scale of production, the wonderful facilitation of exchanges, have multiplied enormously the effectiveness of labor

At the beginning of this marvelous era it was natural to expect, and it was expected, that labor-saving inventions would lighten the toil and improve the condition of the laborer, that the enormous increase in the power of producing wealth would make real poverty a thing of the past Could a man of the last century—a Frank-10 lin or a Priestley-have seen, in a vision of the future, the steamship taking the place of the sailing vessel, the railroad train of the wagon, the reaping machine of the scythe, the threshing machine of the flail, could he have heard the throb of the engines that in obedience to human will, and for the satisfaction of human desire, exert a power greater than that of all the men and all the beasts of burden of the earth combined; could he have seen the forest tree transformed into finished lumber—into doors, sashes, blinds, boxes or barrels with hardly the touch of 20 a human hand, the great workshops where boots and shoes are turned out by the case with less labor than the old-fashioned cobbler could have put on a sole, the factories where, under the eye of a girl, cotton becomes cloth faster than hundreds of stalwart weavers could have turned it out with their hand-looms, could be have seen steam hammers shaping mammoth shafts and mighty anchors, and delicate machinery making tiny watches, the diamond drill cutting through the heart of the rocks, and coal oil spuing the whale, could he have 30 realized the enormous saving of labor resulting from improved facilities of exchange and communicationsheep killed in Australia eaten fresh in England, and the order given by the London banker in the afternoon executed in San Francisco in the morning of the same day, could he have conceived of the hundred thousand improvements which these only suggest, what would he have inferred as to the social condition of mankind?

It would not have seemed like an inference, further than the vision went it would have seemed as though he saw; and his heart would have leaped and his nerves would have thrilled, as one who from a height beholds just ahead of the thirst-stricken caravan the living gleam of rustling woods and the glint of laughing waters Plainly, in the sight of the imagination, he would have beheld these new forces elevating society from its very foundations, lifting the very poorest above the possibility of want, exempting the very lowest from anxiety for the material needs of life; he would have seen these slaves of the lamp of knowledge taking on themselves the traditional curse, these muscles of iron and sinews of steel making the poorest laborer's life a holiday in which every high quality and noble impulse could have scope to grow

And out of these bounteous material conditions he would have seen arising, as necessary sequences, moral conditions realizing the golden age of which mankind have always dreamed. Youth no longer stunted and starved, age no longer harried by avarice; the child at play with the tiger, the man with the muck-rake drinking in the glory of the stars. Foul things fled, fierce things tame, discord turned to harmony! For how could there be greed where all had enough? How could the vice, the crime, the ignorance, the brutality, that spring from poverty and the fear of poverty, exist where poverty had vanished? Who should crouch where all were freemen, who oppress where all were peers?

More or less vague or clear, these have been the hopes, these the dreams born of the improvements which give this wonderful century its preeminence. They have sunk so deeply into the popular mind as radically to change the currents of thought, to recast creeds and displace the most fundamental conceptions. The haunting visions of higher possibilities have not merely gathered splendor and vividness, but their direction has changed—instead of seeing behind the faint tinges of an expiring sunset, all the glory of the daybreak has decked the skies before

It is true that disappointment has followed disappointment, and that discovery upon discovery, and invention after invention, have neither lessened the toil of those who most need respite nor brought plenty to the poor But there have been so many things to which it seemed this failure could be laid, that up to our time the new faith has hardly weakened. We have better appreciated the difficulties to be overcome, but not the less trusted that the tendency of the times was to overcome them

Now, however, we are coming into collision with facts which there can be no mistaking. From all parts of the civilized world come complaints of industrial depression, of labor condemned to involuntary idleness. of capital massed and wasting, of pecuniary distress mong business men, of want and suffering and anxiety irnong the working classes All the dull, deadening pain, all the keen, maddening anguish, that to great misses of men are involved in the words "hard times," afflict the world to-day This state of things, common to communities differing so widely in situation, in political institutions, in fiscal and financial systems, in density of population and in social organization, can hardly be accounted for by local causes. There is distress where large standing armies are maintained, but there is also distress where the standing armies are nominal there is distress where protective tariffs stupidly and wastefully hamper trade, but there is also distress where trade is nearly free, there is distress where autocratic government yet prevails, but there is also distress where political power is wholly in the hands of the people, in countries where paper is money, and in countries where gold and silver are the only currency Evidently, beneath all such things as these, we must infer a common cause

That there is a common cause, and that it is either what we call material progress or something closely connected with material progress, becomes more than an inference when it is noted that the phenomena we class together and speak of as industrial depressions are but intensifications of phenomena which always accompany material progress, and which show themselves more clearly and strongly as material progress goes on Where the conditions to which material progress everywhere tends are most fully realized—that is to say, where population is densest, wealth greatest, and the machinery of production and exchange most highly developed—we find the deepest poverty, the sharpest struggle for existence, and the most of enforced idleness

It is to the newer countries—that is, to the countries where material progress is yet in its earlier stages—that laborers emigrate in search of higher wages, and capital flows in search of higher interest. It is in the older countries—that is to say, the countries where material progress has reached later stages—that widespread destitution is found in the midst of the greatest abundance. Go into one of the new communities where Anglo-Saxon vigor is just beginning the race of progress, where the machinery of production and exchange is yet rude and inefficient, where the increment of wealth is not yet great enough to enable any class to live in ease and 50 luxury, where the best house is but a cabin of logs or a cloth and paper shanty, and the richest man is forced to daily work—and though you will find an absence of wealth and all its concomitants, you will find no beggars. There is no luxury, but there is no destrution. No one makes an easy living, nor a very good living, but every one can make a living, and no one able and willing to work is oppressed by the fear of want.

But just as such a community realizes the conditions which all civilized communities are striving for, and ad- 60 vances in the scale of material progress—just as closer settlement and a more intimate connection with the rest of the world, and greater utilization of labor-saving machinery, make possible greater economies in production and exchange, and wealth in consequence increases, not merely in the aggregate, but in proportion to population -so does poverty take a darker aspect. Some get an infinitely better and easier living, but others find it hard to get a living at all The "tramp" comes with the locomotive, and almshouses and prisons are as surely the 70 marks of "material progress" as are costly dwellings, rich warehouses, and magnificent churches Upon streets lighted with gas and patrolled by uniformed policemen, beggars wait for the passer-by, and in the shadow of college, and library, and museum, are gathering the more hideous Huns and fiercer Vandals of whom Macaulay prophesied

This fact—the great fact that poverty and all its concomitants show themselves in communities just as they develop into the conditions toward which material progress tends—proves that the social difficulties existing wherever a certain stage of progress has been reached, do not arise from local circumstances, but are, in some way or another, engendered by progress itself

And, unpleasant as it may be to admit it, it is at last becoming evident that the enormous increase in productive power which has marked the present century and is still going on with accelerating ratio, has no tendency to extirpate poverty or to lighten the burdens of those compelled to toil It simply widens the gulf between Dives and Lazarus, and makes the struggle for existence more intense. The march of invention has clothed mankind with powers of which a century ago the boldest imagination could not have dreamed. But in factories where labor-saving machinery has reached its most wonderful development, little children are at work, wherever the new forces are anything like fully utilized, large 10 classes are maintained by charity or live on the verge of recourse to it, amid the greatest accumulations of wealth, men die of starvation, and puny infants suckle dry breasts, while everywhere the greed of gain, the worship of wealth, shows the force of the fear of want. The promised land flies before us like the mirage. The fruits of the tree of knowledge turn as we grasp them to apples of Sodom that crumble at the touch

It is true that wealth has been greatly increased, and that the average of comfort, leisure, and refinement has 20 been raised, but these gains are not general. In them the lowest class do not share. I do not mean that the condition of the lowest class has nowhere nor in anything been improved, but that there is nowhere any improvement which can be credited to increased productive power I mean that the tendency of what we call material progress is in nowise to improve the condition of the lowest class in the essentials of healthy, happy human life Nay, more, that it is still further to depress the condition of the lowest class The new forces, ele-30 vating in their nature though they be, do not act upon the social fabric from underneath, as was for a long time hoped and believed, but strike it at a point intermediate between top and bottom. It is as though an immense wedge were being forced, not underneath society, but through society. Those who are above the point of separation are elevated, but those who are below are crushed down

This depressing effect is not generally realized, for it is not apparent where there has long existed a class 40 just able to live. Where the lowest class barely lives, as has been the case for a long time in many parts of Europe, it is impossible for it to get any lower, for the next lowest step is out of existence, and no tendency to further depression can readily show itself. But in the progress of new settlements to the conditions of older communities it may clearly be seen that material prop. ress does not merely fail to relieve poverty-it actually produces it. In the United States it is clear that squalor and misery, and the vices and crimes that spring from them, everywhere increase as the village grows to the city, and the march of development brings the advantages of the improved methods of production and exchange It is in the older and richer sections of the Union that pauperism and distress among the working classes are becoming most painfully apparent. If there 15 less deep poverty in San Francisco than in New York, is it not because San Francisco is yet behind New York in all that both cities are striving for? When San Fran cisco reaches the point where New York now is who can doubt that there will also be ragged and barefooted children on her streets?

This association of poverty with progress is the great enigma of our times. It is the central fact from which spring industrial, social, and political difficulties that perplex the world, and with which statesmanship and philanthropy and education grapple in vain From it come the clouds that overhang the future of the most progressive and self-reliant nations. It is the riddle which the Sphinx of Fate puts to our civilization, and which not to answer is to be destroyed. So long as all the increased wealth which modern progress brings goes but to build up great fortunes, to increase luxury and make sharper the contrast between the House of Have and the House of Want, progress is not real and cannot be permanent The reaction must come The tower leans from its foundations, and every new story but hastens the final catastrophe. To educate men who must be condemned to poverty, is but to make them restive, to base

³ Dives and Lazarus See note, p. 733 • 16 apples of Sodom attractive fruit which when picked turned to ashes, according to an cient writers, it is believed to have been a variety of nightshade • 21 share. It is true that the poorest may now in certain ways enlow what the richest a century ago could not have commanded, but the does not show improvement of condition so long as the ability to obtain the necessaries of life is not increased. The beggar in a greatily may enjoy many things from which the backwoods farmer is deborred, but that does not prove the condition of the city beggar better than that of the independent farmer.—George • 69 Sphinx, an allusion to the monster of Thebes which killed travelers who could not answer the riddle. What animal is if that walks on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening?

on a state of most glaring social inequality political institutions under which men are theoretically equal, is to stand a pyramid on its apex

All-important as this question is, pressing itself from every quarter painfully upon attention, it has not yet received a solution which accounts for all the facts and points to any clear and simple remedy. This is shown by the widely varying attempts to account for the prevailing depression. They exhibit not merely a divergence 10 between vulgar notions and scientific theories, but also show that the concurrence which should exist between those who avow the same general theories breaks up upon practical questions into an anarchy of opinion Upon high conomic authority we have been told that the prevailing depression is due to over-consumption, upon equally high authority, that it is due to over-production, while the wastes of war, the extension of railroads, the attempts of workmen to keep up wages, the demonetization of silver, the issues of paper money, the increase of labor-2 saving machinery, the opening of shorter avenues to trade, etc., are separately pointed out as the cause, by writers of reputation

And while professors thus disagree, the ideas that there is a necessary conflict between capital and labor, that machinery is an evil, that competition must be restrained and interest abolished, that wealth may be created by the issue of money, that it is the duty of government to furnish capital or to furnish work, are rapidly making way among the great body of the people, who keenly feel a hurt and are sharply conscious of a wrong Such ideas, which bring great masses of men, the repositories of ultimate political power, under the leadership of charlatans and demagogues, are fraught with danger, but they cannot be successfully combated until political economy shall give some answer to the great question which shall be consistent with all her teachings, and which shall commend itself to the perceptions of the great masses of men

It must be within the province of political economy to give such an answer. For political economy is not a set of dogmas. It is the explanation of a certain set of facts. It is the science which, in the sequence of certain phenomena, seeks to trace mutual relations and to identify cause and effect, just as the physical sciences seek to do in other sets of phenomena. It lays its foundations upon firm ground The premises from which it makes its deductions are truths which have the highest sanction, axioms which we all recognize, upon which we safely base the reasoning and actions of everyday life, and which may be reduced to the metaphysical expression of the 50 physical law that motion seeks the line of least resistance -viz, that men seek to gratify their desires with the least exertion. Proceeding from a basis thus assured, its processes, which consist simply in identification and separation, have the same certainty. In this sense it is as exact a science as geometry, which, from similar truths relative to space, obtains its conclusions by similar means, and its conclusions when valid should be as self-apparent. And although in the domain of political economy we cannot test our theories by artificially pro- 60 duced combinations or conditions, as may be done in some of the other sciences, yet we can apply tests no less conclusive, by comparing societies in which different conditions exist, or by, in imagination, separating, combining adding or eliminating forces or factors of known direction

I propose in the following pages to attempt to solve by the methods of political economy the great problem I have outlined. I propose to seek the law which associates poverty with progress, and increases want with advancing wealth, and I believe that in the explanation of this paradox we shall find the explanation of those recurring seasons of industrial and commercial paralysis which, viewed independently of their relations to more general phenomena, seem so inexplicable. Properly commenced and carefully pursued, such an investigation must yield a conclusion that will stand every test, and as truth, will correlate with all other truth. For in the sequence of phenomena there is no accident. Every effect has a cause, and every fact implies a preceding fact.

That political economy, as at present taught, does not explain the persistence of poverty amid advancing wealth in a manner which accords with the deep-seated perceptions of men, that the unquestionable truths which it does teach are unrelated and disjointed, that it has failed to make the progress in popular thought that truth, even when unpleasant, must make, that, on the contrary, after a century of cultivation, during which it has engrossed the attention of some of the most subtle and powerful intellects, it should be spurned by the statesman, scouted by the masses, and relegated in the opinion of many educated and thinking men to the rank of a pseudo-science in which nothing is fixed or can be fixed-must, it seems to me, be due not to any inability of the science when properly pursued, but to some false step in its premises, or overlooked factor in its estimates And as such mistakes are generally concealed by the respect paid to authority, I propose in this inquiry to take nothing for granted, but to bring even accepted theories to the test 10 of first principles, and should they not stand the test, freshly to interrogate facts in the endeavor to discover their law.

I propose to beg no question, to shrink from no conclusion, but to follow truth wherever it may lead. Upon us is the responsibility of seeking the law, for in the very heart of our civilization to-day women faint and little children moan But what that law may prove to be is not our affair. If the conclusions that we reach run counter to our prejudices, let us not flinch, if they chal-20 lenge institutions that have long been deemed wise and natural, let us not turn back.

Book VIII, Chapter II

HOW EQUAL RIGHTS TO THE LAND MAY BE ASSERTED AND SECURED

We have traded the want and suffering that everywhere prevail among the working classes, the recurring paroxysms of industrial depression, the scarcity of employment, the stagnation of capital, the tendency of wages to the starvation point, that exhibit themselves more and more strongly as material progress goes on, to the fact that the land on which and from which all must live is made the exclusive property of some

We have seen that there is no possible remedy for these evils but the abolition of their cause, we have seen that private property in land has no warrant in justice, but stands condemned as the denial of natural right—a subversion of the law of nature that as social development goes on must condemn the masses of men to a slavery the hardest and most degrading

We have weighed every objection, and seen that neither on the ground of equity or expediency is there anything to deter us from making land common property

40 by confiscating rent.

But a question of method remains. How shall we do it?

We should satisfy the law of justice, we should meet all economic requirements, by at one stroke abolishing all private titles, declaring all land public property, and letting it out to the highest bidders in lots to suit, under such conditions as would sacredly guard the private right to improvements

Thus we should secure, in a more complex state of society, the same equality of rights that in a ruder state were secured by equal partitions of the soil, and by giving the use of the land to whoever could procure the most from it, we should secure the greatest produc-

Such a plan, instead of being a wild, impracticable vagary, has (with the exception that he suggests com pensation to the present holders of land-undoubtedly a careless concession which he upon reflection would reconsider) been indorsed by no less eminent a thinker than Herbert Spencer, who ("Social Statics," Chap IX, a Sec 8) says of it

"Such a doctrine is consistent with the highest state of civilization, may be carried out without involving a community of goods, and need cause no very serious revolution in existing arrangements. The change required would simply be a change of landlords Separate ownership would merge into the joint-stock ownership of the public Instead of being in the possession of individuals the country would be held by the great corporate body-society Instead of leasing his acres from an isolated proprietor, the farmer would lease them from the nation Instead of paying his rent to the agent of Sir John or his Grace, he would pay it to an agent or deputy agent of the community. Stewards would be public officials instead of private ones, and tenancy the only land tenure. A state of things so ordered would be in perfect harmoni with the moral law. Under it all men would be equally landlords, all men would be alike free to become tenants * * * Clearly, therefore, on such a system, the earth might be enclosed, occupied and cultivated, in entire subordination to the law of equal freedom."

But such a plan, though perfectly feasible, does not seem to me the best. Or rather I propose to accomplish the same thing in a simpler, easier, and quieter way, than that of formally confiscating all the land and formally letting it out to the highest bidders

To do that would involve a needless shock to present customs and habits of thought—which is to be avoided To do that would involve a needless extension of governmental machinery—which is to be avoided

It is an axiom of statesmanship, which the successful founders of tyranny have understood and acted upon—that great changes can best be brought about under old forms. We, who would free men, should heed the same truth. It is the natural method. When nature would make a higher type, she takes a lower one and develops it. This, also, is the law of social growth. Let us work by it. With the current we may glide fast and far Against it, it is hard pulling and slow progress.

I do not propose either to purchase or to confiscate private property in land. The first would be unjust, the second, needless. Let the individuals who now hold it still retain, if they want to, possession of what they are pleased to call their land. Let them continue to call it their land. Let them buy and sell, and bequeath and devise it. We may safely leave them the shell, if we take the kernel. It is not necessary to confiscate land, it is only necessary to confiscate rent.

Nor to take rent for public uses is it necessary that the State should bother with the letting of lands, and assume the chances of the favoritism, collusion, and corruption this might involve. It is not necessary that any new machinery should be created. The machinery already exists listead of extending it, all we have to do is to simplify and reduce it. By leaving to land owners a percentage of rent which would probably be much less than the cost and loss involved in attempting to rent lands through State agency, and by making use of this existing machinery, we may, without jar or shock, assert the common right to land by taking rent for public uses

We already take some rent in taxation. We have only to make some changes in our modes of taxation to take it all

What I, therefore, propose, as the simple yet sovereign remedy, which will raise wages, increase the earnings of capital, extirpate pauperism, abolish poverty, give remunerative employment to whoever wishes it, afford free scope to human powers, lessen crime, elevate morals, and taste, and intelligence purify government and carry so civilization to yet nobler heights, is—to appropriate rent by taxation.

In this way the State may become the universal landlord without calling herself so and without assuming a single new function. In form the ownership of land would remain just as now. No owner of land need be dispossessed and no restriction need be placed upon the amount of land any one could hold. For, rent being taken by the State in taxes, land, no matter in whose name it stood or in what parcels it was held, would be really so common property, and every member of the community would participate in the advantages of its ownership

Now, insomuch as the taxation of rent, or land values, must necessarily be increased just as we abolish other taxes, we may put the proposition into practical form by proposing—

To abolish all taxation save that upon land values

As we have seen, the value of land is at the beginning of society nothing, but as society develops by the increase of population and the advance of the arts, it becomes 70 greater and greater. In every civilized country, even the newest, the value of the land taken as a whole is sufficient to bear the entire expenses of government. In the better developed countries it is much more than sufficient Hence it will not be enough merely to place all taxes upon the value of land. It will be necessary, where rent exceeds the present governmental revenues, commensurately to increase the amount demanded in taxation, and to continue this increase as society progresses and rent advances. But this is so natural and easy a matter, that it 80 may be considered as involved, or at least understood, in the proposition to put all taxes on the value of land That is the first step, upon which the practical struggle must be made When the hare is once caught and killed, cooking him will follow as a matter of course. When the common right to land is so far appreciated that all taxes are abolished save those which fall upon rent, there is no danger of much more than is necessary to induce them to collect the public revenues being left to individual land holders

Experience has taught me (for I have been for some years endeavoring to popularize this proposition) that wherever the idea of concentrating all taxation upon land values finds lodgment sufficient to induce consideration, it invariably makes way, but there are few of the classes most to be benefited by it, who at first, or even for a long time afterward, see its full significance and power. It is difficult for workingmen to get over the idea that there is a real antagonism between capital and labor. It is difficult for small farmers and homestead owners to get over the idea that to put all taxes on the value of land would be unduly to tax them. It is difficult for both classes to get over the idea that to exempt capital from taxation would be to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. These ideas spring from confused thought But behind ignorance and prejudice there is a powerful in terest, which has hitherto dominated literature, education and opinion. A great wrong always dies hard, and the great wrong which in every civilized country condemns the masses of men to poverty and want, will not die without a bitter struggle.

Edward Bellamy

1850 · 1898

Like Henry George, Edward Bellamy was both a moralist and a product of long-continued hard times. He too had a "call" to reaffirm the philosophy of the rights of man and a "vision" of a society in which there would no longer be poverty for the many and riches for the few but abundance for all The similarity between George and Bellamy does not, however, go much further Bellamy a preacher's son with a highly developed social con science, was interested in many things, not in a singleminded study of economic science. His better world was to be achieved by a new nationalism, best described as a religion of democracy, closely akin to Christian socialism Bellamy belongs with the long line of New England reformers rather than with the philosophers, although no one would minimize his moral force. Very probably he reached more readers more quickly than did the author of Progress and Poverty. His vivid and concrete description of a technology organized for production rather than for profit is the most famous of American Utopias, and among the best visualizations of an ideal society in all literature. As Ida M Tarbell remarked not long ago, "there has never been one which gained the lasting hold on popular imagination of which carried with it such a sense of something reasoned, workable and fool-proof as that of Edward Bellamy."

Bellamy was born in Chicopee Falls, Massachusetts in 1850. Failing to achieve his ambition of an appointment to West Point, he entered Union College, but staved only one year. At eighteen he spent the better part of a year in Europe, where, as he wrote later, "my eyes were first fully opened to the extent and consequences of man's inhumanity to man." After 1869 there is almost continuous evidence of his anxiety to do something to better the condition of the oppressed and the unfortunate. After two years of study he was admitted to the bar, but he gave up law almost at once in favor of jour-nglism Seven of the next nine years he spent as editorial writer and reviewer, on the New York Evening Past (seven months in 1871-1872), the Springfield l'mon (1872-1877), and the Springfield Penny News (1880) in the last of which he was a partner with his brother In 1875 Bellamy began to contribute short stories to the national magazines and by 1880 had published nine times in Scribner's Monthly (later Century). Lippin ott's and Appleton's. Two novelettes came out in book form and a portion of a serial appeared in a Great Barrington, Massachusetts, newspaper The serial The Duke of Stockbridge: A Romance of Shavs' Refellion, reflects Bellamy's concern with Populism and the debtor classes Although most of it was written betore 1880, the book was not completed and published until 1900, two years after Bellamy's death Six to One A Nantucket Idyl (1878), a somewhat callow study of teminine psychology, is an early example of his persistent romanticism about women Dr Heidenhoff's Progress (1880) was a Hawthornesque treatment of the psychological effects of evil upon the evildoer. In the early eighties, after Bellamy had decided to give all of his time to his writing, another handful of short stories appeared and a third novelette, Miss Ludington's Sister: A Romance of Immortality (1884)

Then, late in 1886, the year of the Haymarket affair in Chicago, that most appalling testimony of the decade to the social and economic insecurity of the nation, Bellamy sat down at his desk "with the definite purpose of trying to reason out a method of economic organization by which the republic might guarantee the livelihood and material welfare of its citizens on a basis of equality corresponding to and supplementing their political equality." Looking Backward 2000-1887 the novel which resulted, was completed in August 1887 and published in the following January. It changed its author from a somewhat casual liberal to a leader of a Socialistic movement.

Looking Backward convinced thousands of Americans that the society it described was just what they wanted By the middle of June 1888 there was talk of a "Nationalist" movement and by the end of the year Nationalist clubs were being organized A monthly magazine, The Nationalist, began publication in Boston, May 1889. As the sales of his novel skyrocketed into the hundreds of thousands Bellamy elaborated his program in lectures and articles. In January 1891 he founded his own weekly, The New Nation, and it is probable that his followers lent their influence to the formation of the People's Party, founded in May 1891 on a platform which included, among other items, "national ownership of all means of public communication and transportation." Nationalism faded, however, even more quickly than Populism, partly because of lack of leadership but largely because of the same forces of conservatism which defeated William Jennings Bryan in the election of 1896.

The opposition to Nationalism is well summarized in the review of Looking Backward by W T Harris, one of the foremost philosophers and educators of his time, which appeared in The Forum for October 1889 Harris asserted that two assumptions of Bellamy's were unsupported by fact. The first is that under the principle of competition the rich grow richer and fewer while the poor grow poorer and more numerous. This idea Harris attributed to Karl Marx, "evolved from the depths of his consciousness, but not supported by any reliable or pertinent statistics." The second is that the few rich people are rich at the expense of the poor Harris also objected to the regimentation of Bellamy's system, concluding that "private property and free competition constitute the simple device by which civilization has been able to isolate individuals from one another and develop a sense of the sacredness of personality

Bellamy, never robust, was a sick man after 1896, but he managed a sequel to Looking Backward Equality (1897), though much more a tract than a novel, is well worth reading for its revelation of the breadth of his interests and his prophetic views of developments which have come in the last half century. Of especial interest are his comments on "How the Profit System Nullified the Benefit of Inventions" and "What Became of the Great Cities." There is scarcely an aspect of present day social planning with which he did not deal in some detail.

From CHAPTER V

Looking Backward

Julian West, the narrator, is a wealthy Bostonian who in 1887 is engaged to be married to Edith Bartlett. He is subject to insomnia and sleeps in a tomblike chamber beneath the foundation of his house, sometimes hiring a hypnotist to put him to sleep. No one knows of these arrangements except his servant and the hypnotist, and on May 30 the hypnotist leaves town and the servant dies in a fire which destroys West's house and, presumably, West himself In September of the year 2000 a Boston physician, Dr Leete, uncovers a mass of masonry in his garden, finds West, and resuscitates him Looking Backward is West's account of what he finds at the end of the twentieth century Among the wonders are airplanes, the radio, television, paper fabrics for clothing and draperies, electrical heat—all of them unknown in 1887. More important, however, is the peaceful Socialistic society, so much in contrast with that of 1887, which West describes as like a coach to which the masses of humanity are harnessed, while a few ride on top. The climax of the story is a nightmare in which West finds himself back in 1887, tries to tell of what he has seen, and is denounced as an anarchist Running through the story is the romance of West and Edith Leete, who turns out to be the greatgranddaughter of Edith Bartlett

In the chapters reprinted here will be found Dr Leete's account of how the change to the new society was accomplished and of how the "dirty work" gets done by the "industrial army," together with the description of the means by which regimentation is avoided. These are the crucial matters if we may believe the critics who attacked Bellamy. It should be added that many pages are devoted to displaying the extensive recreational facilities and the material comforts provided by the nationalized state.

When, in the course of the evening the ladies retired, leaving Dr. Leete and myself alone, he sounded me as to my disposition for sleep, saying that if I telt like it my bed was ready for me, but if I was inclined to wakefulness nothing would please him better than to bear me company "I am a late bird, myself," he said and, without suspicion of flattery. I may say that a companion more interesting than yourself could scarcely be imagined. It is decidedly not often that one has a chance to converse with a man of the nineteenth century."

Now I had been looking forward all the evening with some dread to the time when I should be alone, on retir ing for the night Surrounded by these most friendly strangers, stimulated and supported by their sympathetic interest, I had been able to keep my mental balance Even then, however, in pauses of the conversation I had had glimpses, vivid as lightning flashes, of the horror of strangeness that was waiting to be faced when I could no longer command diversion. I knew I could not sleep. that night, and as for lying awake and thinking, it argues no cowardice, I am sure, to confess that I was afraid [of] It When in reply to my host's question, I frankly told him this, he replied, that it would be strange if I did not feel just so, but that I need have no anxiety about sleeping, whenever I wanted to go to bed, he would give me a dose which would insure me a sound night's sleep without fail Next morning, no doubt, I would awake with the feeling of an old citizen

"Before I acquire that," I replied, "I must know a little more about the sort of Boston I have come back to You told me when we were upon the housetop that though a century only had elapsed since I fell asleep, it had been marked by greater changes in the conditions of humanity than many a previous millennium. With the city before me I could well believe that, but I am very curious to know what some of the changes have been. To make a beginning somewhere, for the subject is doubtless a large one, what solution, if any, have you found for the labor question? It was the Sphinx's riddle of the nine-teenth century, and when I dropped out the Sphinx was threatening to devour society, because the answer was not forthcoming. It is well worth sleeping a hundred years.

to learn what the right answer was, if, indeed, you have found it yet."

As no such thing as the labor question is known nowadays," replied Dr. Leete, "and there is no way in which it could arise, I suppose we may claim to have solved it. Society would indeed have fully deserved being devoured if it had failed to answer a riddle so entirely simple. In fact, to speak by the book, it was not necessary for society to solve the riddle at all. It may be said to have solved itself. The solution came as the result of a process of industrial evolution which could not have terminated otherwise. All that society had to do was to recognize and co-operate with that evolution, when its tendency had become unmistakable."

I can only say," I answered, "that at the time I fell isleep no such evolution had been recognized."

'It was in 1887 that you fell into this sleep, I think you said."

Yes, May 30th, 1887"

My companion regarded me musingly for some moments Then he observed, "And you tell me that even then there was no general recognition of the nature of the crisis which society was nearing? Of course 1 fully credit your statement. The singular blindness of your contemporaries to the signs of the times is a phenomenon commented on by many of our historians, but few facts of history are more difficult for us to realize, so obvious and unmistakable as we look back seem the indications. which must also have come under your eyes, of the transformation about to come to pass. I should be interested, Mr West, if you would give me a little more definite idea of the view which you and men of your grade of intellect took of the state and prospects of society in 1887 You must, at least, have realized that the widespread industrial and social troubles, and the underlying dissatisfaction of all classes with the inequalities of society, and the general misery of mankind, were portents of great changes of some sort "

'We did, indeed, fully realize that," I replied 'We felt that society was dragging anchor and in danger of going adrift. Whither it would drift nobody could say, but all feared the rocks."

"Nevertheless," said Dr Leete, "the set of the current was perfectly perceptible if you had but taken pains to observe it, and it was not toward the rocks, but toward a deeper channel."

"We had a popular proverb," I replied, "that 'hindsight is better than foresight,' the force of which I shall now, no doubt, appreciate more fully than ever. All I can say is, that the prospect was such when I went into so that long sleep that I should not have been surprised had I looked down from your housetop to-day on a heap of charred and moss-grown ruins instead of this glorious city"

Dr Leete had listened to me with close attention and nodded thoughtfully as I finished speaking. 'What you have said,' he observed, 'will be regarded as a most valuable vindication of Storior, whose account of your era has been generally thought exaggerated in its picture of the gloom and confusion of men's minds. That a 60 period of transition like that should be full of excitement and agitation was indeed to be looked for, but seeing how plain was the tendency of the forces in operation, it was nitural to believe that hope rather than fear would have been the prevailing temper of the popular mind."

You have not yet told me what was the answer to the riddle which you found, I said. I am impatient to know by what contradiction of natural sequence the peace and prosperity which you now seem to enjoy could have been the outcome of an era like my own."

"Fxcuse me, 'replied my host, 'but do you smoke?" It was not till our cigars were lighted and drawing well that ne resumed. "Since you are in the humor to talk rather than to sleep, as I certainly am, perhaps I cannot do better than to try to give you enough idea of our modern industrial system to dissipate at least the impression that there is any mystery about the process of its evolution. The Bostonians of your day had the reputation of being great askers of questions, and I am going to show my descent by asking you one to begin with. What should 80 you name as the most prominent feature of the labor troubles of your day?

"Why the strikes, of course, I replied

"Exactly, but what made the strikes so formidable?"

"The great labor organizations"

"And what was the motive of these great organizations?"

Text the first edition (1888) Bellamy later made some changes and revisions in the details of his scheme, good evidence of the seriousness of his social purpose • 58 Storiot, evidently a historian of Dr Leete's time

"The workmen claimed they had to organize to get their rights from the big corporations," I replied

"That is just it," said Dr Leete, "the organization of labor and the strikes were an effect, merely, of the concentration of capital in greater masses than had ever been known before Before this concentration began, while as yet commerce and industry were conducted by innumerable petty concerns with small capital, instead of a small number of great concerns with vast capital, the individual 10 workman was relatively important and independent in his relations to the employer Moreover, when a little capital or a new idea was enough to start a man in business for himself, workingmen were constantly becoming employers and there was no hard and fast line between the two classes Labor unions were needless then, and general strikes out of the question. But when the era of small concerns with small capital was succeeded by that of the great aggregations of capital, all this was changed The individual laborer who had been relatively impor-20 tant to the small employer was reduced to insignificance and powerlessness over against the great corporation, while, at the same time, the way upward to the grade of employer was closed to him Self-defence drove him to union with his fellows

"The records of the period show that the outery against the concentration of capital was furious. Men believed that it threatened society with a form of tyranny more abhorrent than it had ever endured. They believed that the great corporations were preparing for them the 30 yoke of a baser servitude than had ever been imposed on the race, servitude not to men but to soulless machines incapable of any motive but insatiable greed. Looking back, we cannot wonder at their desperation, for certainly humanity was never confronted with a fate more sordid and hideous than would have been the era of corporate tyranny which they anticipated.

"Meanwhile, without being in the smallest degree checked by the clamor against it, the absorption of business by ever larger monopolies continued. In the United States, where this tendency was later in developing than in Europe, there was not, after the beginning of the last quarter of the century, any opportunity whatever for individual enterprise in any important field of industry, unless backed by a great capital. During the last decade of the century, such small businesses as still remained were fast failing survivals of a past epoch, or mere parasites on the great corporations, or else existed in fields too small to attract the great capitalists Small businesses, as far as they still remained, were reduced to the condition of rats and mice, living in holes and corners, and counting on evading notice for the enjoyment of existence The railroads had gone on combining till a few great syndicates controlled every rail in the land. In manufactories every important staple was controlled by a syndicate These syndicates, pools, trusts, or whatever their name fixed prices and crushed all competition except when combinations as vast as themselves arose. Then a strug. gle, resulting in a still greater consolidation, ensued The great city bazar crushed its country rivals with branch stores, and in the city itself absorbed its smaller rivals till : the business of a whole quarter was concentrated under one roof, with a hundred former proprietors of shops serving as clerks Having no business of his own to put his money in, the small capitalist, at the same time that he took service under the corporation, found no other investment for his money but its stocks and bonds, thus becoming doubly dependent upon it

The fact that the desperate popular opposition to the consolidation of business in a few powerful hands had no effect to check it, proves that there must have been a strong economical reason for it. The small capitalists with their innumerable petty concerns, had, in fact, yielded the field to the great aggregations of capital, because they belonged to a day of small things and were totally incompetent to the demands of an age of steam and telegraphs and the gigantic scale of its enterprises To restore the former order of things, even if possible would have involved returning to the day of stagecoaches. Oppressive and intolerable as was the regime of the great consolidations of capital, even its victims . while they cursed it, were forced to admit the prodigious increase of efficiency which had been imparted to the national industries, the vast economies effected by concentration of management and unity of organization and to confess that since the new system had taken the place of the old, the wealth of the world had increased at a rate before undreamed of To be sure this vast increase had gone chiefly to make the rich richer, increasing the gap between them and the poor, but the fact remained that, as a means merely of producing wealth capital had been proved efficient in proportion to its consolidation The restoration of the old system with the subdivision of capital, if it were possible, might indeed bring back a greater equality of conditions with more individual dignity and freedom, but it would be at the price of general poverty and the arrest of material procress

Was there, then, no way of commanding the services of the mighty wealth-producing principle of consolidated capital, without bowing down to a plutocracy like that of Carthage? As soon as men began to ask themselves these questions, they found the answer ready for them. The movement toward the conduct of business by a larger and larger aggregations of capital, the tendency award monopolies, which had been so desperately and vainly resisted, was recognized at last, in its true significance, as a process which only needed to complete its logical evolution to open a golden future to humanity

Early in the last century the evolution was completed by the final consolidation of the entire capital of the nation The industry and commerce of the country, ceasing to be conducted by a set of irresponsible corporations and syndicates of private persons at their caprice and for their profit, were intrusted to a single syndicate representing the people, to be conducted in the common interest for the common profit The nation, that is to say, organized as the one great business corporation in which all other corporations were absorbed, it became the one capitalist in the place of all other capitalists, the sole employer, the final monopoly in which all previous and lesser monopolies were swallowed up, a monopoly in the profits and economies of which all citizens shared In a word, the people of the United States concluded to so assume the conduct of their own business, just as one hundred odd years before they had assumed the conduct of their own government, organizing now for industrial purposes on precisely the same grounds that they had then organized for political purposes At last, strangely late in the world's history, the obvious fact was perceived that no business is so essentially the public business as the industry and commerce on which the people's livelihood depends, and that to entrust it to private persons to be managed for private profit, is a folly similar in kind, though vastly greater in magnitude, to that of surrendering the functions of political government to kings and nobles to be conducted for their personal glorification"

'Such a stupendous change as you describe," said I. "did not, of course, take place without great bloodshed and terrible convulsions"

"On the contrary," replied Dr Leete, "there was absolutely no violence. The change had been long foreseen Public opinion had become fully ripe for it, and the whole mass of the people was behind it. There was no 50 more possibility of opposing it by force than by argument. On the other hand the popular sentiment toward the great corporations and those identified with them had ceased to be one of bitterness, as they came to realize their necessity as a link, a transition phase, in the evolution of the true industrial system. The most violent foes of the great private monopolies were now forced to recognize how invaluable and indispensable had been their office in educating the people up to the point of assuming control of their own business. Fifty years before, the 60 consolidation of the industries of the country under national control would have seemed a very daring experiment to the most sanguine. But by a series of object lessons, seen and studied by all men, the great corporations had taught the people an entirely new set of ideas on this subject. They had seen for many years syndicates handling revenues greater than those of states, and directing the labors of hundreds of thousands of men with an efficiency and economy unattainable in smaller operations. It had come to be recognized as an axiom that the 70 larger the business the simpler the principles that can be applied to it, that, as the machine is truer than the hand, so the system, which in a great concern does the work of the master's eye in a small business, turns out more accurate results. Thus it came about that, thanks to the corporations themselves, when it was proposed that the nation should assume their functions, the suggestion implied nothing which seemed impracticable even to the timid. To be sure it was a step beyond any yet taken, a broader generalization, but the very fact that the nation 80 would be the sole corporation in the field would, it was seen, relieve the undertaking of many difficulties with which the partial monopolics had contended "

CHAPTER VI

Dr Leete ceased speaking, and I remained silent, endeavoring to form some general conception of the changes in the arrangements of society implied in the tremendous revolution which he had described

⁷ Carthage, which was an oligarchy dominated by commercial interests • 28 shared in later editions Bellamy inserted the sentence 'The epoch of trusts had ended in The Great Trust

Finally I said, "The idea of such an extension of the functions of government is, to say the least, rather overwhelming"

"Extension!" he repeated, "where is the extension?"

"In my day," I replied, "it was considered that the proper functions of government, strictly speaking, were limited to keeping the peace and defending the people against the public enemy, that is, to the military and police powers."

"And, in heaven's name, who are the public enemies?" exclaimed Dr Leete "Are they France, England, Germany, or hunger, cold and nakedness? In your day governments were accustomed, on the slightest international misunderstanding, to seize upon the bodies of citizens and deliver them over by hundreds of thousands to death and mutilation, wasting their treasures the while like water, and all this oftenest for no imaginable profit to the victims. We have no wars now, and our governments no war powers, but in order to protect every 20 citizen against hunger, cold and nakedness, and provide for all his physical and mental needs, the function is assumed of directing his industry for a term of years No, Mr West, I am sure on reflection you will perceive that it was in your age, not in ours, that the extension of the functions of governments was extraordinary. Not even for the best ends would men now allow their governments such powers as were then used for the most maleficent "

"Leaving comparisons aside," I said, "the demagoguery and corruption of our public men would have been considered, in my day, insuperable objections to any assumption by government of the charge of the national industries. We should have thought that no arrangement could be worse than to entrust the politicians with control of the wealth-producing machinery of the country lts material interests were quite too much the football of parties as it was."

"No doubt you were right,' rejoined Dr Leete, "but all that is changed now. We have no parties or politi-40 cians, and as for demagoguery, and corruption, they are words having only an historical significance."

"Human nature itself must have changed very much," I said.

"Not at all," was Dr Leete's reply, "but the conditions of human life have changed, and with them the motives of human action. The organization of society no longer offers a premium on baseness. But these are matters which you can only understand as you come with time, to know us better."

"But you have not yet told me how you have settled the labor problem. It is the problem of capital which we have been discussing," I said "After the nation had assumed conduct of the mills, machinery, railroads farms, mines and capital in general of the country, the labor question still remained. In assuming the responsibilities of capital the nation had assumed the difficulties of the capitalist's position."

The moment the nation assumed the responsibilities of capital, those difficulties vanished," replied Dr. Leete "The national organization of labor under one direction was the complete solution of what was, in your day and under your system, justly regarded as the insoluble labor problem. When the nation became the sole employer, all the citizens, by virtue of their citizenship, became employees, to be distributed according to the needs of industry."

"That is," I suggested, "you have simply applied the principle of universal military service, as it was understood in our day, to the labor question."

"Yes," said Dr Leete, "that was something which followed as a matter of course as soon as the nation had become the sole capitalist. The people were already accustomed to the idea that the obligation of every citizen, not physically disabled, to contribute his military services to the defence of the nation, was equal and absolute That it was equally the duty of every citizen to contribute his quota of industrial or intellectual services to the maintenance of the nation, was equally evident. though it was not until the nation became the employer of labor that citizens were able to render this sort of : service with any pretence either of universality or equity No organization of labor was possible when the employing power was divided among hundreds or thousands of individuals and corporations, between which concert of any kind was neither desired, nor indeed feasible. It constantly happened then that vast numbers who desired to labor could find no opportunity, and on the other hand, those who desired to evade a part or all of their debt could easily do so"

⁴⁷ baseness. The point here was expanded by several sentences $\boldsymbol{\sigma}$ later editions

'Service, now, I suppose, is compulsory upon all," suggested.

'It is rather a matter of course than of compulsion," replied Dr Leete. "It is regarded as so absolutely natural and reasonable that the idea of its being compulsory has ceased to be thought of He would be hought to be an incredibly contemptible person who should need compulsion in such a case. Nevertheless, to speak of service being compulsory would be a weak way to state its absolute inevitableness. Our entire social order is so wholly based upon and deduced from it that if it were conceivable that a man could escape it, he would be left with no possible way to provide for his existence. He would have excluded himself from the world cut himself off from his kind, in a word, committed suicide."

Is the term of service in this industrial army for life?" Oh, no, it both begins later and ends earlier than the average working period in your day. Your workshops were filled with children and old men, but we hold the period of youth sacred to education, and the period of maturity, when the physical forces begin to flag, equally sacred to ease and agreeable relaxation. The period of industrial service is twenty-four years, beginning at the close of the course of education at twentyone and terminating at forty-five. After forty-five, while discharged from labor, the citizen still remains liable to special calls, in case of emergencies causing a sudden great increase in the demand for labor, till he reaches the age of fifty-five, but such calls are rarely, in fact almost never, made The fifteenth day of October of every year 15 what we call Muster Day, because those who have reached the age of twenty-one are then mustered into the industrial service, and at the same time those who, after twenty-four years service, have reached the age of fortythe are honorably mustered out. It is the great day of the year with us, whence we reckon all other events, our Olympiad, save that it is annual"

CHAPTER VII

It is after you have mustered your industrial army into service," I said, "that I should expect the chief difficulty to arise, for there its analogy with a military army must cease. Soldiers have all the same thing, and a very simple thing, to do, namely, to practice the manual of arms, to march and stand guard. But the industrial army must learn and follow two or three hundred diverse trades and avocations. What administrative talent can be equal to determining wisely what trade or business every individual in a great nation shall pursue?

"The administration has nothing to do with determining that point

"Who does determine it then?" Lasked

"Every man for himself in accordance with his natural aptitude, the utmost pains being taken to enable him to find out what his natural aptitude really is. The principle on which our industrial army is organized is that a man's natural endowments, mental and physical, determine what he can work at most profitably to the nation and most satisfactorily to himself. While the obligation of service in some form is not to be evaded, voluntary election, subject only to necessary regulation, is depended 60 on to determine the particular sort of service every man is to render. As an individual's satisfaction during his term of service depends on his having an occupation to his taste, parents and teachers watch from early years for indications of special aptitudes in children. Manual industrial training is no part of our educational system, which is directed to general culture and the humanities. but a theoretical knowledge of the processes of the various industries is given, and our youth are constantly encouraged to visit the workshops, and are frequently 70 taken on long excursions to acquire familiarity with special industries. Usually, long before he is mustered into service, a young man, if he has a taste for any special pursuit, has found it out and probably acquired a great deal of information about it. If, however he has no special taste, and makes no election when opportunity is offered, he is assigned to any avocation among those of an unskilled character which may be in need of men"

'Surely," I said "it can hardly be that the number of volunteers for any trade is exactly the number needed in 80 that trade. It must be generally either under or over the demand."

"The supply of volunteers is always expected to fully equal the demand," replied Dr. Leete. "It is the business of the administration to see that this is the case. The rate of volunteering for each trade is closely watched.

65 children. The remainder of this paragraph was later much revised

If there be a noticeably greater excess of volunteers over men needed in any trade, it is inferred that the trade offers greater attractions than others. On the other hand, if the number of volunteers for a trade tends to drop below the demand, it is inferred that it is thought more arduous. It is the business of the administration to seek constantly to equalize the attractions of the trades, so far as the conditions of labor in them are concerned, so that all trades shall be equally attractive to persons 10 having natural tastes for them. This is done by making the hours of labor in different trades to differ according to their arduousness The lighter trades, prosecuted under the most agreeable circumstances, have in this way the longest hours, while an arduous trade, such as mining, has very short hours. There is no theory, no a priori rule, by which the respective attractiveness of industries is determined. The administration, in taking burdens off one class of workers and adding them to other classes, simply follows the fluctuations of opinion 20 among the workers themselves as indicated by the rate of volunteering. The principle is that no man's work ought to be, on the whole, harder for him than any other man's for him, the workers themselves to be the judges. There are no limits to the application of this rule. If any particular occupation is in itself so arduous or so oppressive that, in order to induce volunteers, the day's work in it had to be reduced to ten minutes, it would be done. If, even then, no man was willing to do it, it would remain undone But of course, in point of fact, a moderate reduc-30 tion in the hours of labor, or addition of other privileges, suffices to secure all needed volunteers for any occupation necessary to men If, indeed, the unavoidable difficulties and dangers of such a necessary pursuit were so great that no inducement of compensating advantages would overcome men's repugnance to it, the administration would only need to take it out of the common order of occupations by declaring it 'extra hazardous,' and those who pursued it especially worthy of the national gratitude, to be overrun with volunteers. Our young men 40 are very greedy of honor, and do not let slip such opportunities Of course you will see that dependence on the purely voluntary choice of avocations involves the abolition in all of anything like unhygienic conditions or special peril to life and limb. Health and safety are conditions common to all industries. The nation does not maim and slaughter its workmen by thousands, as did the private capitalists and corporations of your day"

"When there are more who want to enter a particular trade than there is room for, how do you decide between the applicants?" I inquired

"Preference is given to those with the best general records in their preliminary service as unskilled laborers, and as youths in their educational course Noman, however, who through successive years remains persistent in his desire to show what he can do at any particular trade, is in the end denied an opportunity I should add, in reference to the counter-possibility of some sudden failure of volunteers in a particular trade or some sudden necessity of an increased force, that the administration, while depending on the voluntary system for filling up the trades as a rule, holds always in reserve the power to call for special volunteers or draft any force needed from any quarter. Generally, however all needs of this sort can be met by details from the class of unskilled or common laborers."

"How is this class of common laborers recruited? I asked "Surely nobody voluntarily enters that "It is the grade to which all new recruits belong for the first three years of their service. It is not till after this period, during which he is assignable to any work at the discretion of his superiors, that the young man is allowed to elect a special avocation. These three years of stringent discipline none are exempt from."

"As an industrial system, I should think this might be extremely efficient," I said, "but I don't see that it makes any provision for the professional classes, the men who serve the nation with brains instead of hands. Of course you can't get along without the brain-workers. How, then, are they selected from those who are to serve as farmers and mechanics? That must require a very delicate sort of sifting process, I should say."

"So it does," replied Dr Leete, "the most delicate possible test is needed here, and so we leave the question whether a man shall be a brain or hand worker entirch to him to settle. At the end of the term of three years as a common laborer, which every man must serve, it is for him to choose in accordance to his natural tastes whether he will fit himself for an art or profession or be a farmer or mechanic. If he feels that he can do better work with his brains than his muscles he finds every facility provided for testing the reality of his sup-

⁵¹ Preference In later editions this point was more fully dealt with

proted bent, of cultivating it, and if fit, of pursuing it as his avocation. The schools of technology, of medicine, or art, of music, of histrionics and of higher liberal learning, are always open to aspirants without condition.

Are not the schools flooded with young men whose only motive is to avoid work?"

Dr Leete smiled a little grimly

No one is at all likely to enter the professional shools for the purpose of avoiding work, I assure you," he said "They are intended for those with special aptitude for the branches they teach, and any one without it would find it easier to do double hours at his trade than try to keep up with the classes Of course many honestly mistake their vocation, and, finding themselves unequal to the requirements of the schools, drop out and return to the industrial service, no discredit attaches to such persons, for the public policy is to encourage all to develop suspected talents which only actual tests can prove the reality of The professional and scientific schools of your day depended on the patronage of their pupils for support, and the practice appears to have been common of giving diplomas to unfit persons, who afterwards found their way into the professions Our schools are national institutions, and to have passed their tests is a proof of special abilities not to be questioned

"This opportunity for a professional training," the doctor continued, "remains open to every man till the age of thirty-five is reached, after which students are not received, as there would remain too brief a period before the age of discharge in which to serve the nation in their professions. In your day young men had to choose their professions very young, and therefore, in a large proportion of instances, wholly mistook their vocations It is recognized nowadays that the natural aptitudes of some are later than those of others in developing, and therefore, while the choice of profession may be made as early as twenty-four, it remains open for eleven years longer I should add that the right of transfer, under proper restrictions, from a trade first chosen to one preferred later in life, also remains open to a man till thirty-five"

A question which had a dozen times before been on my lips, now found utterance, a question which touched upon what, in my time, had been regarded the most vital difficulty in the way of any final settlement of the industrial problem "It is an extraordinary thing." I said.

"that you should not yet have said a word about the method of adjusting wages. Since the nation is the sole employer the government must fix the rate of wages and so determine just how much everybody shall earn, from the doctors to the diggers. All I can say is, that this plan would never have worked with us, and I don't see how it can now unless human nature has changed. In my day, nobody was satisfied with his wages or salary. Even if he felt he received enough he was sure his neighbor had too much which was as bad. If the universal discontent on this subject, instead of being dissipated in curses and strikes directed against innumerable employers, could have been concentrated upon one, and that the government, the strongest ever devised would not have seen two pay days.

Dr Leete laughed heartily

"Very true, very true, he said, "a general strike would most probably have followed the first pay day, and a strike directed against a government is a revolution"

"How, then, do you avoid a revolution every pay day?" I demanded "Has some prodigious philosopher devised a new system of calculus satisfactory to all for determining the exact and comparative value of all sorts of service, whether by brawn or brain, by hand or voice, by ear or eye? Or has human nature itself changed, so that no man looks upon his own things but 'every man on the things of his neighbor?' One or the other of these events must be the explanation '

'Neither one nor the other, however, is," was my host's laughing response "And now, Mr West," he continued, "you must remember that you are my patient as well as my guest, and permit me to prescribe sleep for you before we have any more conversation. It is after 80 three o'clock."

"The prescription is, no doubt, a wise one," I said, 'I only hope it can be filled."

"I will see to that," the doctor replied, and he did, for he gave me a wine glass of something or other which sent me to sleep as soon as my head touched the pillow

In the next chapter not here reprinted, Dr. Leete explains how wages and money have been eliminated, each citizen being given at the beginning of each year a credit corresponding to his share of the annual product of the nation, on which he can obtain what he needs from the public storehouses.

Lincoln Steffens

1866 · 1936

In the second part of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress Christian and his wife, visiting the Interpreter's House, are shown into a room "where was a man that could look no way but downwards, with a muck-rake in his hand," although one who stood over him was proffering in exchange a celestial crown The scene revealed, so the Interpreter says, "that heaven is but as a fable to some, and that things here are counted the only things substantial" In 1906, when President Theodore Roosevelt wearied of the sensational disclosures of political and business corruption in McClure's, Collier's, and other popular magazines, he remembered his Bunyan and labeled the magazine writers "muckrakers" Because the reformers of the age of Roosevelt I devoted themselves largely to uncovering the unpalatable facts of graft and boss rule, without envisioning such futures as had guided Henry George and Edward Bellamy, muckraking is an apt description of an era

The chief of the muckrakers (although Roosevelt, his personal friend, specifically excepted him from the charge) was Lincoln Steffens. A Californian whose father was, up to a point, indulgent, Steffens graduated from the university of his native state in 1889, and then spent nearly three years in study in Bellin, Heidelberg, Leipzig, Paris, and London. He married a fellow American in Europe, but neglected to inform his family of the fact. When he landed in New York City in 1892, vaguely expecting to go West. "to teach or lecture on the theories of ethics while making a study of morals the professional ethics and the actual conduct of men in business, politics, and the professions." he found a letter from his father It informed him that he was now to support himself and contained a hundred dollars to carry him until he could find a job

Steffens found a place, not too easily, on the New York Evening Post, and was soon extraordinarily successful as a reporter. He had the knack of asking questions with such intelligence and penetration that important men took him into their confidence. Within six years he knew a great deal about Wall Street and the police department, and had become city editor of the Commercial Advertiser, a paper which contributed largely to the early political career of Theodore Roosevelt. By the investment of a small legacy from one of his Leipzig classmates he obtained financial freedom, which enabled him to pursue with few restrictions the task he set himself—an understanding of the ethical implications of social and political processes

His first real fame came in 1903, after he had joined the editorial staff of McClure's Visiting the great cities of the Middle West to investigate boss rule and reform movements, he was struck by the similarity between conditions in New York and those elsewhere, and gradually came to the conviction that corruption in politics and business was no local phenomenon, that democracy was on trial everywhere. Unlike most reformers he could not lay all the blame upon "evil individuals, he saw bribery and bossism and crime and organized vice as connected parts of a vast "System," for which the citizens themselves, however moral and upright might be their individual beliefs, were responsible andes later collected as The Shame of the Cities 1904), in The Struggle for Self-Government (1906). which was the most extensive interpretation of his collection of facts, and in various other books and articles, including some attempts at fiction. Steffens Iso wrote extensively for The American Magazine and Frankody's. His Autobiography (1931) seems likely o survive as one of the best first-hand reports on the years between 1900 and 1913 (the age of "Teddy the must-buster and of progressivism) and as an intelligent man's effort to understand the forces of the twentiethcentury world Steffens came in the end to prophesy the end of the middle class and a contest, not between capital and labor, but between ownership and management, with the fundamental issue being whether economic life and hence political life as well) should be regulated to protect those who live on dividends and interest or those who live on wages. His final conclusion was that "reform" was futile.

Steffens explored the System in a series of magazine

Whatever one may think of that, Steffens will never be found a dull writer. His intellectual curiosity, his liking for human beings whatever their state, condition, or morals, his lively style—all are suggested in the last sentences of his autobiography "My life was worth my living. And as for the world in general, all that was or is or ever will be wrong with that is my—our thinking about it."

From . The Shame of the Cities

Philadelphia: Corrupt and Contented

"Tweed Days in St Louis," the first of Steffens' famous series, was written in collaboration with a St Louis reporter and appeared in McClure's for October 1902 The other articles quickly followed "The Shame of Minneopolis' (January 1903), "The Shamelessness of St Louis (March), "Pittsburg A City Ashamed" (May), "Philadelphia Corrupt and Contented" (July), "Chicago Half Free and Fighting On" (October), and "New York Good Government to the Test" (November) When their author collected them in book form he added an introduction with "some conclusions," asserting that for misgovernment no one class, no one breed, no one group of interests was at fault. He refused to blame the conditions he observed upon foreigners, upon politicians, or upon the absence of businessmen in government "We Americans," he concluded, "may have failed. We may be mercenary and selfish Democracy with us may be impossible and corruption inevitable, but these articles—have demonstrated that we can stand the truth, that there is pride in the character of American citizenship, and that this pride may be a power in the land. So this little volume, a record of shame and yet of self-respect, a disgraceful confession, yet a declaration of honor, is dedicated, in all good faith, to the accused—to all the citizens of all the cities in the United States."

Noteworthy in Steffens' style is the constant alternation between his generalizations and the facts which he accumulated from his informants with the great care which was necessary to avoid libel suits. "Philadelphia. Corrupt and Contented" is an excellent example of the journalistic exposé, a type of writing by no means dead. The reader should remember that the entire state of Pennsylvania was dominated by Matthew S. Quay, from 1885 until his death in 1904 one of the most powerful political "bosses" in American history.

Other American cities, no matter how bad their own condition may be, all point with scorn to Philadelphia as worse—"the worst-governed city in the country" St. Louis, Minneapolis, Pittsburg submit with some patience to the jibes of any other community, the most friendly suggestion from Philadelphia is rejected with contempt. The Philadelphians are "supine," "asleep", hopelessly ring-ruled, they are "complacent" "Politically benighted," Philadelphia is supposed to have no light to throw upon a state of things that is almost universal

This is not fair Philadelphia is, indeed, corrupt, but it is not without significance. Every city and town in the country can learn something from the typical politi-10 cal experience of this great representative city. New York is excused for many of its ills because it is the metropolis, Chicago because of its forced development, Philadelphia is our "third largest" city and its growth has been gradual and natural Immigration has been blained for our municipal conditions, Philadelphia, with 17 per cent of the population native-born of nativeborn parents, is the most American of our greater cities It is "good, too, and intelligent I don't know just how to measure the intelligence of a community, but 20 a Pennsylvania college professor who declared to me his belief in education for the masses as a way out of political corruption, himself justified the "rake-off" of pieferred contractors on public works on the ground of a "fair business profit." Another plea we have made is that we are too busy to attend to public business, and we have promised, when we come to wealth and leisure, to do better Philadelphia has long enjoyed great and widely distributed prosperity, it is the city of homes, there is a dwelling house for every five persons,-men, women, 30 and children,—of the population, and the people give one a sense of more leisure and repose than any community I ever dwelt in Some Philadelphians account for their political state on the ground of their ease and comfort. There is another class of optimists whose hope is in an "aristocracy" that is to come by and by, Philadelphia is surer that it has a "real aristocracy" than any other place in the world, but its aristocrats, with few exceptions, are in the ring, with it, or of no political use. Then we hear that we are a young people and that 40 when we are older and "have traditions," like some of the old countries, we also will be honest. Philadelphia is one of the oldest of our cities and treasures for us scenes and relics of some of the noblest traditions of "our fair land" Yet I was told how once "for a joke" a party of boodlers counted out the "divvy" of their graft in unison with the ancient chime of Independence Hall

Philadelphia is representative. This very "joke," told as it was, with a laugh, is typical All our municipal governments are more or less bad, and all our people are optimists. Philadelphia is simply the most corrupt and the most contented. Minneapolis has cleaned up, Pittsburg has tried to, New York fights every other election. Chicago fights all the time. Even St. Louis has begun to stir (since the elections are over), and at the worst was only shameless. Philadelphia is proud, good people there defend corruption and boast of their machine. Micollege professor, with his philosophic view of "rake-ofts, is one Philadelphia type. Another is the man, who, driven to bay with his local pride, says. "At least you must admit that our machine is the best you have ever seen."

Disgraceful? Other cities say so But I say that if Philadelphia is a disgrace, it is a disgrace not to itself alone, nor to Pennsylvania, but to the United States and to American character. For this great city, so highly representative in other respects, is not behind in political experience, but ahead, with New York Philadelphia is a city that has had its reforms. Having passed through all the typical stages of corruption, Philadelphia reached the period of miscellaneous loot with a boss for chief thief under James McManes and the Gas Ring way back in the late sixties and seventies. This is the Tweed stage of corruption from which St Louis, for example is just emerging. Philadelphia, in two inspiring popular revolts, attacked the Gas Ring, broke it, and in 1885 achieved that dream of American cities—a good chaiter The present condition of Philadelphia, therefore, is not that which precedes, but that which follows reform, and in this distinction lies its startling general significance What has happened since the Bullitt Law or charter went into effect in Philadelphia may happen in any American : city 'after reform is over"

For reform with us is usually revolt, not government and is soon over. Our people do not seek, they avoid self-rule, and "reforms" are spasmodic efforts to punish bad rulers and get somebody that will give us good government or something that will make it A selfacting form of government is an ancient superstition We are an inventive people and we all think that we shall devise some day a legal machine that will turn out good government automatically The Philadelphians have treasured this belief longer than the rest of us and have tried it more often. Throughout their history they have sought this wonderful charter and they thought they had it when they got the Bullitt Law, which concentrates in the Mayor ample power, executive and political, and complete responsibility Moreover, it calls tor very little thought and action on the part of the people All they expected to have to do when the Bullitt Law went into effect was to elect as mayor a good business man, who with his probity and common sense would give them that good business administration which is the ideal of many reformers

The Bullitt Law went into effect in 1887 A committee of twelve-four men from the Union League, four from business organizations, and four from the bosses-picked out the first man to run under it on the Republican ticket, Edwin H Fitler, an able, upright business man, and he was elected Strange to say, his administration was satisfactory to the citizens, who speak well of it to this day, and to the politicians also, Boss McManes (the ring was broken, not the boss) took to the next national convention from Philadelphia a delegation solid for Fitler for President of the United States It was a farce, but it pleased Mr Fitler, so Matthew S F Quay, the State boss, let him have a complimentary vote on the first ballot The politicians "fooled" Mr Fitler, and they "fooled" also the next business mayor, Edwin S Stuart, likewise a most estimable gentleman Under these two administrations the foundation was laid for the present government of Philadelphia, the corruption to which Philadelphians seem so reconciled, and the machine which is "at least the best you have ever seen."

The Philadelphia machine isn't the best. It isn't sound, and I doubt if it would stand in New York or Chicago. The enduring strength of the typical American political machine is that it is a natural growth—a sucker, but deep-rooted in the people. The New Yorkers vote for Tammany Hall. The Philadelphians do not vote, they are disfranchised, and their disfranchisement is one anchor of the foundation of the Philadelphia organization.

This is no figure of speech. The honest citizens of Philadelphia have no more rights at the polls than the Negroes down South. Nor do they fight very hard for this basic privilege. You can arouse their Republican so ire by talking about the black Republican votes lost in the Southern States by white Democratic intimidation, but if you remind the average Philadelphian that he is in the same position, he will look startled, then say, "That's so, that's literally true, only I never thought of it in just that way." And it is literally true

The machine controls the whole process of voting, and practices fraud at every stage. The assessor's list is the voting list, and the assessor is the machine's man "The assessor of a division kept a disorderly house, he padded 60 his lists with fraudulent names registered from his house, two of these names were used by election officers . . . The constable of the division kept a disreputable house, a policeman was assessed as living there . The election was held in the disorderly nouse maintained by the as-The man named as judge had a criminal charge for a life offense pending against him . . . Two hundred and fifty-two votes were returned in a division that had less than one hundred legal votes within its boundaries" These extracts from a report of the 70 Municipal League suggest the election methods The assessor pads the list with the names of dead dogs, children, and non-existent persons. One newspaper printed the picture of a dog, another that of a little fouryear-old Negro boy, down on such a list A ring orator in a speech resenting sneers at his ward as "low down" reminded his hearers that that was the ward of Independence Hall, and, naming over signers of the Declaration of Independence, he closed his highest flight of eloquence with the statement that "these men, the 80 fathers of American liberty, voted down here once And," he added, with a catching grin, "they vote here yet" Rudolph Blankenburg, a persistent fighter for the right and the use of the right to vote (and, by the way, an immigrant), sent out just before one election a registered letter to each voter on the rolls of a certain selected division. Sixty-three per cent were returned marked "not at," "removed," "deceased," etc. From one fourstory house where forty-four voters were addressed, eighteen letters came back undelivered, from another of forty-eight voters, came back forty-one letters, from another sixty-one out of sixty-two, from another forty-four out of forty-seven. Six houses in one division were assessed at one hundred and seventy-two voters, more than the votes cast in the previous election in any one of two hundred entire divisions

The repeating is done boldly, for the machine controls the election officers, often choosing them from among the fraudulent names, and when no one appears to serve, assigning the heeler ready for the expected vacancy The police are forbidden by law to stand within thirty feet of the polls, but they are at the box and they are there to see that the machine's orders are obeyed and that repeaters whom they help to furnish are permitted 20 to vote without "intimidation" on the names they, the police, have supplied The editor of an anti-machine paper who was looking about for himself once told me that a ward leader who knew him well asked him into a polling place "I'll show you how it's done," he said, and he had the repeaters go round and round voting again and again on the names handed them on slips "But," as the editor said, "that isn't the way it's done" The repeaters go from one polling place to another, voting on slips, and on their return rounds change 30 coats, hats, etc. The business proceeds with very few hitches, there is more jesting than fighting. Violence in the past has had its effect, and is not often necessary nowadays, but if it is needed the police are there to apply it Several citizens told me that they had seen the police help to beat citizens or election officers who were trying to do their duty, then arrest the victim, and Mr Clinton Rogers Woodruff, the executive counsel of the Municipal League, has published a booklet of such cases But an official statement of the case is at hand in an an-40 nouncement by John Weaver, the new machine mayor of Philadelphia, that he is going to keep the police out of politics and away from the polls "I shall see," he added, "that every voter enjoys the full right of suffrage and that ballots may be placed in the ballot box without fear of intimidation "

But many Philadelphians do not try to vote They leave everything to the machine, and the machine cases their ballots for them. It is estimated that 150,000 voters did not go to the polls at the last election. Yet the machine rolled up a majority of 130,000 for Weaver with a fraudulent vote estimated all the way from form to eighty thousand, and this in a campaign so machine. made that it was called "no contest." Francis Fisher Kane, the Democrat, got 32,000 votes out of some 204,000 "What is the use of voting?" these stay-arhomes ask. A friend of mine told me he was on the lists in the three wards in which he had successively dwelt. He votes personally in none, but the leader of his present ward tells him how he has been voted Mr J C Reynolds, the proprietor of the St James Hotel, went to the polls at eleven o'clock last election day, only to be told that he had been voted He asked how many others from his house had voted An election officer took up a list, checked off twelve names, two down twice, and handed it to him. When Mr Reynolds got home he learned that one of these had voted, the others had been voted Another man said he rarely attempted to vote, but when he did, the officers let him, even though his name had already been voted on, and then the Negro repeaters would ask if his "brother was coming 'round to-day" They were going to vote him, as they vote all good-natured citizens who stay away "When this kind of man turns out," said a leader to me, "we simply have two repeaters extra-one to balance him and one more to the good" If necessary, after all this, the machine counts the vote "right," and there is little use appealing to the courts, since they have held, except in one case that the ballot box is secret and cannot be opened The only legal remedy lies in the purging of the assessors lists, and when the Municipal League had this done in 1899, they reported that there was "wholesale voting on the very names stricken off"

Deprived of self-government, the Philadelphians haven't even self-governing machine government. They have their own boss, but he and his machine are subject to the State ring and take their orders from the State boss, Matthew S. Quay, who is the proprietor of pennsylvania and the real ruler of Philadelphia, iust William Penn, the Great Proprietor, was. Philadelphians, especially the local bosses, dislike this descriprion of their government, and they point for refutation to their charter. But this very Bullitt Law was passed by Onay, and he put it through the Legislature, not for reform reasons, but at the instance of David H Lane, his Philadelphia lieutenant, as a check upon the power of Boss McManes Later, when McManes proved hopelessly insubordinate, Quay decided to have done with him torever He chose David Martin for boss, and from his seat in the United States Senate, Penn's successor raised up his man and set him over the people Croker, who rose by his own strength to the head of Tammany Hall, has tried twice to appoint a successor, no one else could. and he failed The boss of Tammany Hall is a growth So Croker has attempted to appoint district leaders and failed, a Tammany district leader is a growth Boss Martin, picked up and set down from above, was accepted by Philadelphia and the Philadelphia machine, and he removed old ward leaders and appointed new ones Some leaders in Philadelphia own their wards, of course, but Martin and, after him, Durham have sent men into a ward to lead it, and they have led it

The Philadelphia organization is upside down. It has its root in the air, or, rather, like the banyan tree, it sends its roots from the center out both up and down and all around, and there lies its peculiar strength For » when I said it was dependent and not sound, I did not mean that it was weak. It is dependent as a municipal machine, but the organization that rules Philadelphia is, as we have seen, not a mere municipal machine, but a city, State, and national organization. The people of Philadelphia are Republicans in a Republican city in a Republican State in a Republican nation, and they are bound ring on ring on ring The President of the United States and his patronage, the National Cabinet and their patronage, the Congress and the patronage of the Senators and the Congressmen from Pennsylvania, the Governor of the State and the State Legislature with their powers and patronage, and all that the mayor and city councils have of power and patronage—all these bear down upon Philadelphia to keep it in the control of Quay's boss and his little ring. This is the ideal of party organization, and, possibly, is the end toward which our democratic republic is tending. If it is, the end is absolutism. Nothing but a revolution could overthrow this oligarchy, and there is its danger. With no outlet at the polls for public feeling, the machine cannot be taught so anything it does not know excepting at the cost of annihilation.

But the Philadelphia machine-leaders know their business As I said in "Tweed Days in St. Louis," the politicians will learn, if the people won't, from exposure and reform The Pennsylvania bosses learned the "uses of reform", we have seen Quay applying it to discipline McManes, and he since has turned reformer himself, to punish local bosses. The bosses have learned also the danger of combination between citizens and the 60 Democrats To prevent this, Quay and his friends have spread sedulously the doctrine of "reform within the party," and, from the Committee of One Hundred on, the reformers have stuck pretty faithfully to this principle But lest the citizens should commit such a sin against their party, Martin formed a permanent combination of the Democratic with the Republican organization, using to that end a goodly share of the Federal and county patronage Thus the people of Philadelphia were "fixed" so that they couldn't vote if they wanted to, 70 and if they should want to, they couldn't vote for a Democrat, except of Republican or independent choosing In other words, having taken away their ballot, the bosses took away also the choice of parties

But the greatest lesson learned and applied was that of conciliation and "good government" The people must not want to vote or rebel against the ring. This ring, like any other, was formed for the exploitation of the city for private profit, and the cementing force is the "cohesive power of public plunder" But McManes 80 and Tweed had proved that miscellaneous larceny was dangerous, and why should a lot of cheap politicians get so much and the people nothing at all? The people had been taught to expect but little from their rulers good water, good light, clean streets well paved, fair transportation, the decent repression of vice, public order and public safety, and no scandalous or open corruption, would more than satisfy them It would be good business and good politics to give them these things Like Chris Magee, who studied out the problem with him, Martin took away from the rank and file of the party 10 and from the ward leaders and office holders the privilege of theft, and he formed companies and groups to handle the legitimate public business of the city It was all graft, but it was to be all lawful, and, in the main, it was Public franchises, public works, and public contracts were the principal branches of the business, and Martin adopted the dual boss idea which we have seen worked out by Magee and Flinn in Pittsburg In Philadelphia it was Martin and Porter, and just as Flinn had a firm, Booth & Flinn, Ltd, so Porter was Filbert and 20 Porter.

Filbert and Porter got all the public contracts they could handle, and the rest went to other contractors friendly to them and to the ring. Sometimes the preferred contractor was the lowest bidder, but he did not have to be. The law allowed awards to the "lowest and best," and the courts held that this gave the officials discretion. But since public criticism was to be considered, the ring, to keep up appearances, resorted to many tricks. One was to have fake bids made above the favorite. Another was to have the favorite bid high, but set an impossible time limit, the department of the city councils could extend the time afterwards. Still another was to arrange for specifications which would make outsiders bid high, then either openly alter the plans or let the ring firm perform work not up to requirements.

Many of Martin's deals and jobs were scandals, but they were safe, they were in the direction of public service, and the great mass of the business was done quietly. Moreover, the public was getting something for its money,—not full value, but a good percentage. In other words, there was a limit to the "rake-off," and some insiders have told me that it had been laid down as a principle with the ring that the people should have in value (that is in work or benefit, including a fair profit) ninety-five cents out of every dollar. In some of the deals I investigated, the "rake-off" over and above profit was as high as twenty-five per cent Still, even at this, there was "a limit," and the public was getting, as one of the lead ers told me, "a run for its money." Cynical as it all sounds, this view is taken by many Philadelphians almost if not quite as intelligent as my college professor

But there was another element in the policy of conciliation which is a potent factor in the contentment of Philadelphia, and I regard it as the key to that "apathy" which has made the community notorious We have seen how Quay had with him the Federal resources and those of the State, and the State ring, and we have seen how Martin, having the city, mayor and councils, won over the Democratic city leaders. Here they had under pay in office at least 15,000 men and women But each of these 15,000 persons was selected for office because he could deliver votes, either by organizations, by parties, or by families These must represent pretty near a majority of the city's voters But this is by no means the end of the ring's reach. In the State ring are the great corporations, the Standard Oil Company, Cramps Ship Yard, and the steel companies, with the Pennsylvania Railroad at their head, and all the local transportation and other public utility companies following after They get franchises, privileges, exemptions, etc., they have helped finance Quay through deals the Pennsylvania paid Martin, Quay said once, a large yearly salary, the Cramps get contracts to build United States ships, and for years have been begging for a subsidy on homemade ships The officers, directors, and stockholders of these companies, with their friends, their bankers, and their employees, are of the organization Better still, one of the local bosses of Philadelphia told me he could always give a worker a job with these companies, just as he could in a city department, or in the mint, or postoffice Then there are the bankers who enjoy, or may some day enjoy, public deposits, those that profit on loans to finance political financial deals, the promoting capitalists who share with the bosses on franchises, and

But we are not yet through Quay has made a specialty all his life of reformers, and he and his local bosses have won over so many that the list of former reformers is very, very long. Martin drove down his roots through race and religion, too Philadelphia was one of the hotbeds of "know-nothingism" Martin recognized the Catholic, and the Irish-Irish, and so drew off into the Republican party the great natural supply of the Demociats, and his successors have given high places to representative Jews "Surely this isn't corruption!" No, and neither is that corruption which makes the heads of great educational and charity institutions "go along," as they say in Pennsylvania, in order to get appropriations for their institutions from the State and land from the city They know what is going on, but they do not join reform movements The provost of the University of Pennsylvania declined to join in a revolt because, he said, it might impair his usefulness to the University. And so it is with others, and with clergymen who have favorite charities; with Sabbath associations and City Beautiful clubs, with lawyers who want briefs, with real estate dealers who like to know in advance about public improvements, and real estate owners who appreciate light assessments, with shopkeepers who don't want to be bothered with strict inspections always is the protective tariff "I don't care," said a manufacturer "What if they do plunder and rob us, it can't hurt me unless they raise the tax rates, and even that won't ruin me Our party keeps up the tariff. If 50 they should reduce that, my business would be ruined."

Such, then, are the ramifications of this machine, such is its strength. No wonder Martin could break his own rules, as he did, and commit excesses. Philadelphia is not merely corrupt, it is corrupted Martin's doom was proclaimed not in Philadelphia, but in the United States Senate, and his oftense was none of this business of his, but his failure to nominate as successor to Mayor Stuart the man, Boise Penrose, whom Matt Quay chose for that place Martin had consented, but at the last 60 moment he ordered the nomination of Charles F Warwick instead The day that happened Mr Quay arose on the floor of the Senate and, in a speech so irrelevant to the measure under consideration that nobody out of Pennsylvania understood it, said that there was in his town a man who had given as his reason for not doing what he had promised to do, the excuse that he was "under a heavy salary from a great corporation (the Pennsylvania Railroad) and was compelled to do what the corporation wished him to do And," added Senator 70 Ouay, "men in such a position with high power for good or evil ought . . . to go about . with the dollar mark of the corporation on their foreheads" Quay named as the new boss Israel W Durham, a ward leader under Martin

Martin having the city through Mayor Warwick fought Quay in the State, with Chris Magee for an ally, but Quay beat them both there and then prepared to beat them in their own cities His cry was Reform, and he soon had the people shouting for it.

Ouay responded with a Legislative committee to investigate abuses in the cities, but this so-called "Lexow" was called off before it amounted to much more than a momentary embarrassment to Martin Martin's friends, on the other hand, caught Quay and nearly sent him

²⁶ know-nothingism, a 'native American' political movement of the 1850's, taking its name from the oath of its members to answer all questions about their purposes with I don't know" . 59 Boise Penrose, Boies Penrose (1860-1921), United States senator from 1897 until 1921 • 61 Charles F. to prison. The People's Bank, James McManes, president, failed. The cashier, John S. Hopkins, had been speculating and letting Quay and other politicians have bank funds without collateral for stock gambling. In return Quay and the State Treasurer left heavy State deposits with the bank. Hopkins lost his nerve and shot himself. McManes happened to call in friends of Martin and advise him, and these suggested a Martin man for receiver They found among the items money 10 lent to Quay without security, except the State funds, and telegrams asking Hopkins to buy "1000 Met" (Metropolitan) and promising in return to "shake the plum tree" Quay, his son, Richard R, and Benjamin J Haywood, the State Treasurer, were indicted for conspiracy, and every effort was made to have the trial precede the next election for the Legislature which was to elect a successor to Quay in the United States Senate, but Quay got stays and postponements in the hopes that a more friendly District Attorney could be put in that office. 20 Martin secured the election of Peter F Rothermel, who was eager to try the case, and Ouav had to depend on other resources. The trial came in due course, and failed, Judge Biddle ruled out the essential evidence on the ground that it was excluded by the statute of limitation. Rothermel went on with the trial, but it was hopeless, Quay was acquitted and the other cases were abandoned

Popular feeling was excited by this exposure of Quay, but there was no action till the factional fighting sug30 gested a use for it. Quay had refused the second United States Senatorship to John Wanamaker, and Wanamaker led through the State and in Philadelphia a fight against the boss, which has never ceased. It took the form of a reform campaign, and Quay's methods were made plain, but the boss beat Wanamaker at every point, had Penrose made Senator, and through Penrose and Durham was gradually getting possession of Philadelphia. The final triumph came with the election of Samuel H. Ashbridge as mayor.

"Stars-and-Stripes Sam," as Ashbridge is sometimes called, was a speech-maker and a "joiner" That is to say, he made a practice of going to lodges, associations, brotherhoods, Sunday-schools, and all sorts of public and private meetings, joining some, but making at all speeches patriotic and sentimental. He was very popular. Under the Bullitt Law, as I have said, all that is necessary to a good administration and complete, though temporary reform, is a good mayor. The politicians feel that they must nominate a man in whom the people as well as themselves have faith. They had had faith in statement with the people, and Warwick had found it impossible to satisfy two such masters. Now they put their faith in Ashbridge, and so did Durham, and so did Martin. All interests accepted him, therefore, and all watched him with hope and more or less assurance; none more than the good people. And, indeed, no man could have promised more or better public service than Ashbridge. The result, however, was distracting.

Mr Ashbridge "threw down" Martin, and he recognized Quay's man, "Is" Durham, as the political boss Durham is a high type of boss, candid, but of few words. generous, but businesslike, complete master of himself, and a genius at organization For Pennsylvania politics he is a conservative leader, and there would have been no excesses under him, as there have been few "rows" But Mr Durham has not been the master of the Philadelphia situation He bowed to Quay, and he could not hold Ashbridge Philadelphians say that if it should come to a fight, Durham could beat Quay in 7 Philadelphia, but it doesn't come to a fight Another thing Philadelphians say is that he "keeps his word," yet he broke it (with notice) when Quay asked him to stand for Pennypacker for Governor As I said before, however, Philadelphia is so constituted that it apparently cannot have self-government, not even its own boss, so that the allegiance paid to Quay is comprehensible But the submission of the boss to the mayor was extraordinary, and it seemed to some sagacious politicians dangerous

For Mr Ashbridge broke through all the principles of moderate grafting developed by Martin. Durham formed his ring—taking in James P McNichol as coruler and preferred contractor, John M Mack as promoter and financier, and he widened the inside circle to include more individuals. But while he was more liberal toward his leaders, and not inclined "to grab off everything for himself," as one leader told me, he maintained the principle of concentration and strict control as good politics and good business. So, too, he adopted Martin's program of public improvements, the filtration, boulevards, etc., and added to it. When Ashbridge was well settled in office, these schemes were all started, and the mayor pushed them with a will. According to the "Philadelphia Plan," the mayor should not be in the ring. He should be an ambitious man, and his reward promotion, not riches If he is "out for the stuff," he is likely to be hurried by the fretful thought that his term is limited to four years, and since he cannot succeed himself as mayor, his interest in the future of the machine is less than that of a boss, who goes on forever

When he was nominated, Ashbridge had debts of record amounting to some $40,000 Before he was elected these were satisfied Soon after he took office he declared himself to former Postmaster Thomas L. Hicks Here is Mr Hicks's account of the incident

"At one of the early interviews I had with the mayor in his office, he said to me "Tom, I have been elected mayor of Philadelphia I have four years to serve I have no further ambitions I want no other office when I am out of this one, and I shall get out of this office all there is in it for Samuel H Ashbridge'

"I remarked that this was a very foolish thing to say Think how that could be construed,' I said

"I don't care anything about that,' he declared 'I mean to get out of this office everything there is in it for Samuel H. Ashbridge'."

When he retired from office last April, he became the president of a bank, and was reputed to be rich. Here is the summary published by the Municipal League at the close of his labors.

"The four years of the Ashbridge administration have passed into history, leaving behind them a scar on the fame and reputation of our city which will be a long time healing. Never before, and let us hope never again, "will there be such brazen defiance of public opinion, such flagrant disregard of public interest, such abuse of powers and responsibilities for private ends. These are not generalizations, but each statement can be abundantly proved by numerous instances."

These "numerous instances" are notorious in Philadelphia, some of them were reported all over the country

One of them was the attempted intimidation of John Wanamaker Thomas B Wanamaker, John Wanamaker's son, bought the North American, a newspaper which had been, and still is, exposing the abuses and corruption of 50 the political ring Abraham L English, Mr Ashbridge's Director of the Department of Public Safety, called on Mr John Wanamaker, said he had been having him watched, and was finally in a position to demand that the newspaper stop the attacks. The merchant exposed the whole thing, and a committee appointed to investigate reported that "Mr English has practically admitted that he attempted to intimidate a reputable citizen and unlawfully threatened him in an effort to silence criticism of a public newspaper, that from the mayor's 60 refusal to order an investigation of the conduct of Mr. English on the request of a town meeting of representative citizens, the community is justified in regarding him as aiding and abetting Mr English in the corrupt act committed, and that the mayor is therefore to be equally censured by the community"

The other "instances of brazen abuse of power" were the increase of protected vice—the importation from New York of the "white slavery system of prostitution," the growth of "speak-easies," and the spread of gambling and of policy-playing until it took in the school children. This last the North American exposed, but in vain till it named police officers who had refused when asked to interfere. Then a judge summoned the editors and reporters of the paper, the mayor, Director English, school children, and police officers to appear before him. The mayor's personal attorney spoke for the police during the inquiry, and it looked black for the newspaper till the children began to tell their stories. When the hearing was over the judge said.

"The evidence shows conclusively that our public school system in this city is in danger of being corrupted at its fountain, that in one of the schools over one hundred and fifty children were buyers of policy, as were also a large number of scholars in other schools. It was first discovered about eighteen months ago, and for about one year has been in full operation." The police officers were not punished, however.

That corruption had reached the public schools and was spreading rapidly through the system, was discovered by the exposure and conviction of three school directors of the twenty-eighth ward. It was known before that teachers and principals, like any other office holders, had to have a "pull" and pay assessments for election expenses. "Voluntary contributions" was the term used, but over the notices in blue pencil was written "2 per cent.," and teachers who asked directors and ward bosses what to do, were advised that they would "better pay." Those that sent less than the amount suggested, got receipts. "check received; shall we hold for balance or enter on account?" But the exposure in the twenty10 eighth ward brought it home to the parents of the children that the teachers were not chosen for fitness, but for political reasons, and that the political reasons had become cash.

Miss Rena A Haydock testified as follows "I went to see Mr. Travis, who was a friend of mine, in reference to getting a teacher's certificate He advised me to see all of the directors, especially Mr Brown They told me that it would be necessary for me to pay $120 to get the place. They told me of one girl who had offered $250, 20 and her application had been rejected. That was before they broached the subject of money to me. I said that I didn't have $120 to pay, and they replied that it was customary for teachers to pay $40 a month out of their first three months' salary The salary was $47. They told me they didn't want the money for themselves, but that it was necessary to buy the other faction Finally I agreed to the proposition, and they told me that I must be careful not to mention it to anybody or it would injure my reputation I went with my brother to pay 30 the money to Mr Johnson He held out a hat, and when my brother handed the money to him he took it behind the hat"

The regular business of the ring was like that of Pittsburg, but more extensive I have space only for one incident of one phase of it Widener and Elkins, the national franchise buyers, are Philadelphians, and they were in the old Martin ring They had combined all the street railways of the city before 1900, and they were withdrawing from politics, with their traction system 40 But the Pennsylvania rings will not let corporations that have risen in corruption reform and reture, and, besides, it was charged that in the Martin-Quay fight, the street railways had put up money to beat Quay for the United States Senate. At any rate, plans were laid to "mace" the street railways.

"Macing" is a form of high blackmail When they have sold out all they have, the politicians form a competing company and compel the old concern to buy out or sell out. While Widener and Elkins were ar sea, bound for Europe, in 1901, the Philadelphia ring went to the Legislature and had introduced there two bills, granting a charter to practically all the streets and alleys not covered by tracks in Philadelphia, and to run short stretches of the old companies' tracks to make connections. Clinton Rogers Woodruff, who was an Assemblyman, has told the story. Without notice the bills were introduced at 3 P.M. on Monday, May 29. they were reported from committee in five minutes, by 8 50 P.M. they were printed and on the members' desk. and by 9 P.M. were passed on first reading. The bills ε passed second reading the next day, Memorial Day, and on the third day were passed from the Senate to the House, where they were "jammed through" with similar haste and worse trickery In six legislative days the measures were before Governor Stone, who signed them June 7, at midnight, in the presence of Quay, Penrose, Congressman Foerderer, Mayor Ashbridge's Banker, James P McNichol, John M Mack, and other capitalists and politicians Under the law, one hundred charters were applied for the next morning—thirteen for Philadelphia The charters were granted on June 5, and that same day a special meeting of the Philadelphia Select Council was called for Monday There the citizens of Philadelphia met the oncoming charters, but their hearing was brief. The charters went through without a hitch, and were sent to Mayor Ashbridge on June 13

The mayor's secretary stated authoritatively in the morning that the mayor would not sign that day. But he did. An unexpected incident forced his hand. John Wanamaker sent him an offer of $2,500,000 for the afranchises about to be given away. Ashbridge threw the letter into the street unread. Mr. Wanamaker had deposited $250,000 as a guarantee of good faith and his action was becoming known. The ordinances were signed by midnight, and the city lost at least two and one-half millions of dollars; but the ring made it and much more. When Mr. Wanamaker's letter was published Congressman Foerderer, an incorporator of the company, answered for the machine. He said the offer was an advertisement; that it was late, and that they were sorry they hadn't had a chance to "call the bluff." Mr Wanamaker responded with a renewal of the offer of $2500,000 to the city, and, he said, "I will add $500,000 as a bonus to yourself and your associates personally for the conveyance of the grants and corporate privileges you now possess." That ended the controversy.

But the deal went on Two more bills, called "Trolley Chasers," were put through, to finish off the legislation. too hurriedly done to be perfect. One was to give the company the right to build either elevated or underground, or both, the second to forbid all further such grants without a hearing before a board consisting of the Governor, the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and the Attorney-General With all these franchises and exclusive privileges, the new company made the old one lease their plant in operation to the company which had nothing but "rights," or, in Pennsylvania slang, a "good, husky mace."

Ashbridgeism put Philadelphia and the Philadelphia machine to a test which candid ring leaders did not think it would stand. What did the Philadelphians do? Nothing They have their reformers they have men like Francis B. Reeves, who fought with every straight reform movement from the days of the Committee of One E Hundred: they have men like Rudolph Blankenburg, who have fought with every reform that promised any kind of relief; there are the Municipal League, with an organization by wards, the Citizens' Municipal League, the Allied Reform League, and the Law and Order Society, there are young men and veterans, there are disappointed politicians and ambitious men who are not advanced fast enough by the machine There is discontent in a good many hearts, and some men are ashamed But "the people" won't follow. One would think the @ Philadelphians would follow any leader; what should they care whether he is pure white or only gray? But hey do care. "The people" seem to prefer to be ruled by a known thief than an ambitious reformer. They will make you convict their Tweeds, McManeses, Butlers, and Shepherds, and even then they may forgive them and talk of monuments to their precious memory, but they take delight in the defeat of John Wanamaker because they suspect that he is a hypocrite and wants to go to the United States Senate.

All the stout-hearted reformers had made a campaign sa to re-elect Rothermel, the District Attorney who had dared to try Quay. Surely there was an official to support! But no, Quay was against him. The reformers used money, some $250,000, I believe,-fighting the devil with fire,-but the machine used more money, $700,000. from the teachers, "speak-easies," office holders, bankers, and corporations. The machine handled the ballot Rothermel was beaten by John Weaver There have been other campaigns, before and since, led by the Municipal League, which is managed with political sense, 60 but each successive defeat was by a larger majority for the machine

There is no check upon this machine excepting the chance of a mistake, the imminent fear of treachery, and the remote danger of revolt To meet this last, the machine, as a State organization, has set about throttling public criticism. Ashbridge found that blackmail was ineffective Durham, Quay, and Governor Pennypacker have passed a libel law which meant to muzzle the press The Governor was actuated apparently only 70 by his sufferings from cartoons and comments during his campaign, the Philadelphia ring has boodling plans ahead which exposure might make exasperating to the people The Philadelphia Press, the leading Republican organ in the State, puts it right "The Governor wanted it [the law] in the hope of escaping from the unescapable cartoon The gang wanted it in the hope of muzzling the opposition to jobs The act is distinctly designed to gag the press in the interest of the plunderers and against the interest of the people"

Disfranchised, without a choice of parties; denied, so the Municipal League declares, the ancient right of petition, and now to lose "free speech,"-is there no hope for Philadelphia? Yes, the Philadelphians have a very present hope. It is in their new mayor, John Weaver There is nothing in his record to inspire faith in an outsider. He speaks himself of two notorious "miscarriages of justice" during his term as District Attorney, he was the nominee of the ring; and the ring men have confidence in him. But so have the people, and Mr. Weaver makes fair promises. So did Ashbridge There is this difference, however. Mr. Weaver has made 10 a good start. He compromised with the machine on his appointments, but he declared against the protection of vice, for free voting, and he stopped some "wholesale grabs" or "maces" that appeared in the Legislature, just before he took office.

One was a bill to enable (ring) companies to "appropriate, take, and use all water within this commonwealth and belonging either to public or to private persons as it may require for its private purposes." This was a scheme to sell out the water works of Philadelphia, and all other such plants in the State. Another bill was to open the way to a seizure of the light and power of the city and of the State. Martin and Warwick "leased" the city gas works. Durham and his crowd wanted a whack at it. "It shall be lawful," the bill read, "for any city, town, or borough owning any gas works or electricallight plant for supplying light, heat, and power, to sell lease or otherwise dispose of the same to individuals or corporations, and in order to obtain the best possible returns therefor, such municipal body may vest in the lessees or purchasers the exclusive right, both as against such municipal corporations and against any and all other persons and corporations, to supply gas or electricity. "As in St. Louis, the public property of Philadelphia is to be sold off. These schemes are to go through later, I am told, but on Mr Weaver's declarations that he would not "stand for them," they were laid over

It looks as if the Philadelphians were right about Mr Weaver, but what if they are? Think of a city putting its whole faith in one man, in the hope that John. Weaver, an Englishman by birth, will give them good government! And why should he do that? Why should he serve the people and not the ring? The ring can make or break him; the people of Philadelphia can neither reward nor punish him. For even if he restores to them their ballots and proves himself a good mayor, he cannot succeed himself, the good charter forbids more than one term.

Finley Peter Dunne

1867 · 1936

What Jack Downing was for the opening decades of the nineteenth century, Mr Dooley, the character created by Finley Peter Dunne, was for its closing years. In Chicago, which had been Dunne's birthplace, he attended high school and worked his way up from office boy on a newspaper to a job as a reporter. When in 1892 he chanced to put a piece commenting on current affairs into the dialect of an Irish saloonkeeper, he hit upon a way of writing destined to make him famous

After some experiments and changes, the saloon-keeper became Martin Dooley, who, in his place on Archey Road, talked at length on all sorts of subjects At first it was chiefly a Chicago audience which enjoyed his remarks, but when Mr Dooley got to talking about the Spanish-American War in 1898, he became a national favorite. His monologues appeared in many newspapers, and when they were collected in books they found many purchasers. Dunne's books included Mr Dooley in Peace and War (1898), Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of His Countrymen (1899), Mr. Dooley's Philosophy (1900), Mr. Dooley's Opinions (1901), Observations of Mr. Dooley (1902), Dissertations by Mr Dooley (1906), Mr. Dooley Says (1910), New Dooley Book (1911), and Mr. Dooley on Making a Will (1919) After a long career as a satirical writer, Dunne died in 1936.

Mr Dooley's relationship with the long line of horsesense humorists admired by Americans is clear. His unlearned but vivid diction and his common-sensical philosophy show his alliance with such commentators. It is noteworthy, however, that this well-realized character was more closely related to the earlier figures, such as Downing and Biglow, than to the literary comedians almost contemporaneous with him. For his immediate readers, as Mr. Mark Sullivan says, "Mr Dooley supplied the softening solvent of humor to the American atmosphere in times of acute controversy. Just when we were getting worked up into factional passion, with everybody searching the cellar of his vocabulary for verbal lumps of coal, Mr Dooley would come out in the Sunday papers with a picture of the situation that made every reader laugh at it, and at himself." For later readers, Dunne furnished saltily phrased essays which amusingly illuminate the times which produced them. They do more because they are rich in their commentary upon human foibles of all periods, they have enduring merit. Much of Mr Dooley's talk, without change or, at most, with changes in only a few names, has the sting of satire on affairs of the present day. And Mr Dooley and a good many of those whom he talks about continue to be vividly human characterizations

Mr. Dooley in Peace and War

ON WAR PREPARATIONS

Says Professor Ellis, introducing this piece. "The operal bouffe character of certain aspects of the Spanish-American War in 1898 furnished Mr Dooley with subjects for comment that increased his circle of admirers enormously. The confusion of organizing an army was more than evident in the newspapers of the day. The two chief concentration camps were at Chickamauga Park and Tampa. The fondness of the commanding general, Nelson A. Miles, for public statements and gold braids was often noted. When he left Washington to 'take the field' at Tampa, he was accompanied by Mrs. Miles, a daughter, and a son."

Mr. Dooley, one of the few of our crackerbox sages to be blessed, himself, with a sense of humor, has a delightful time ironically jesting about Gin'ral Miles' strange Preparations for warfare.

Well," Mr Hennessy asked, "how goes th' war?"
"Splendid, thank ye," said Mr Dooley "Fine, fine.

"We're a gr-reat people," said Mr. Hennessy, earnestly "We ar-re," said Mr. Dooley "We ar-re that. An' th best iv it is, we know we ar-re."

ON REFORM CANDIDATES

A product of the dissatisfaction of some with local government in this period was the "reform candidate," here satirized by Mr. Dooley Too often, as the sage Irishman points out, the silk-stocking office seeker was completely unaware of the mass of voters who lived out beyond the best business and residential districts—a mass so numerous that it could decide many elections. Willie Boye, amusingly sketched by Mr. Dooley, is an example Flannigan, on the other hand, is the practical ward politician who gets acquainted intimately with the people of the slums. Mr. Dooley's story is a vivid little parable about impractical versus practical politics.

"That frind iv ye'ers, Dugan, is an intilligent man, said Mr Dooley. "All he needs is an index an' a few illusthrations to make him a bicyclopedja iv useless information"

"Well," said Mr. Hennessy, judiciously, "he ain't no Socrates an' he ain't no answers-to-questions colum but he's a good man that goes to his jooty, an' as handt with a pick as some people are with a cocktail spoon What's he been doin' again ye?"

"Nawthin'," said Mr. Dooley, "but he was in here Choosday 'Did ye vote?' says I. 'I did,' says he 'Which wan iv th' distinguished bunko steerers got ye'er invalu'ble suffrage?' says I. 'I didn't have none with me says he, 'but I voted f'r Charter Haitch,' says he 'Tre been with him in six ilictions,' says he, 'an' he's a good man,' he says 'D'ye think ye're votin' f'r th' best?' says I 'Why, man alive,' I says, 'Charter Haitch was assassinated three years ago,' I says 'Was he?' says Dugan. 'Ah, we'll he's lived that down be this time. He was a good man' he says.

"Ye see, that's what thim rayform lads wint up again If I liked rayformers, Hinnissy, an' wanted fr to see thim win out wanst in their lifetime, I'd buy thim each

ON CHARITY

The preceding accounts of Mr Dooley show his practical mind, his sense of humor, his witty way of making a point. "On Charity" not only sets forth his ideas but also catches some of the tenderer qualities of the man His charity, inconsistent as it is with his preachments, makes him not only an amusing character but also a lovable one.

Mr Dooley's remarks were cut short by a cry from the back room It was unmistakably a baby's cry Mr McKenna turned suddenly in amazement as Mr. Dooley bolted

"Well, in the name of the saints, what's all this?" he cried, following his friend into the back room. He

The little girl went to sleep on Mr Dooley's white 20 apron He lifted her tenderly and carried her over to his bed. Then he tiptoed out with an apprehensive face, and whispered. "It's Jawn Donahue's kid that wandherd away fr'im home, an' wint to sleep on me dure-step. I sint th' Dorsey boy to tell th' mother, but he's a long time gone. Upton Sinclair

1878 •

"Readers of my novels," Upton Sinclair has said in his autobiography, American Outpost, "know that I have one favorite theme, the contrast of the social classes, there are characters from both worlds, the rich and the poor, and the plot is contrived to carry you from one to the other" He might have added that his rich folk are useless, extravagant, and, with a few exceptions, unprincipled, while his poor and essentially noble characters are almost invariably pushed around by an industrial and capitalistic society Sinclair is, in short, the foremost of our "proletarian" writers, a Socialist who has long been certain that in practically every American institution there is a canker of plutocracy. Author of nearly one hundred books and pamphlets on nearly every conceivable aspect of modern life, he is master of the literary method of "exposure," and is best known for

The Jungle (1906) and Dragon's Teeth (1942) The former, a revelation of the conditions in Chicago's meat-packing industry, helped to strengthen the first Pure Food and Drug Act, the latter, third of the "Lanny Budd" series, won the Pulitzer Prize for fiction by portraying conditions in Nazi-dominated Europe

Sinclair was born in Baltimore but brought up in New York, where he was graduated from the College of the City of New York in 1898. By that time he was already earning his own living by selling stories and jokes. He estimates that for a stretch of some months he turned out fifty-six thousand words a week for the pulppaper magazines, an almost incredible task. His first serious novel was published in 1901, shortly before he became active as a Socialist. "Muckraking" made him famous, as it did his friend Lincoln Steffens, but Sinclair did not grow discouraged with the failure of progressivism. Despite much ridicule and some actual persecution, he has remained a wholehearted believer in the perfectibility of man and the ultimate triumph of social justice.

Nor have his energies gone entirely into his books. The League for Industrial Democracy (formerly the Intercollegiate Socialist Society) and the American Civil Liberties Union are largely of his creation Three times he has run for Congress, and three times for the governorship of California, where he has lived since 1915. Usually he has been a Socialist, but he supported Woodrow Wilson, and his last campaign for the governorship was waged as a Democrat In I, Governor of California and How I Ended Poverty (1933) and other pamphlets he set forth his platform, EPIC (End Poverty in California), explaining the depression as a result of private ownership of complex tools and of the "economic insanity" of limiting production. His program found wide public support in the early days of the New Deal and he was very nearly elected

In addition to the books already mentioned, the best examples of Sinclair's fiction are King Coal (1917), Oil! (1927), Boston (1928), and The Wet Parade (1931), which deal with coal strikes in Colorado, the exploitation of the California oil fields, the Sacco-Vanzetti case, and prohibition, respectively Like the Lanny Budd novels, which have been more widely read, these books are essentially current history, interpreted less as class warfare than as a lesson to the middle-class liberal, to whom Sinclair has hoped to bring home his conviction of brotherhood with the workers. His best-known direct attacks on the status quo are probably The Brass Check (1919), a blast at the capitalist press, and The Goose-Step (1923), which charges American schools with subservience to upper-class ideals.

Sinclair has always written with amazing fluency and a consequent unevenness. He is a propagandist, akin in spirit to Thomas Paine but writing in the idiom of an industrialized nation well aware of the theories of Karl Marx. A chronic protester and iconoclast, he has enough good nature and humor to lighten the tedium of innumerable and often repetitive details Much of his work has been translated from the English and he is doubtless one of the chief interpreters of the United States to other nations. Conservative critics have found him radical and unsound, extreme left-wing thinkers have condemned him for not adhering strictly enough to the Marxist line. Of his earnestness and honesty there is no longer much question.

The Jungle

The circumstances of composition, publication, and reception of The Jungle are explained by Sinclair in American Outpost (pp. 153-171). The story was commissioned by a Socialist magazine, The Appeal to Reason, which advanced $500 for a novel of wage-slavery. Sinclair selected the Chicago stockyards for his scene, spent seven weeks there in the fall of 1904, and after a month of collecting data found his characters by observing a wedding party in the rear room of a saloon. Returning to a farm near Princeton, New Jersey, he began writing on Christmas Day, completing the novel in the summer of 1905. It was by that time appearing as a serial Five publishers refused to print the novel in book form, although one of them had advanced another $500 after reading the first chapters. Before Doubleday, Page and Company took it over, having made a careful investigation to avoid possible libel suits, Sinclair had made arrangements to print it himself. The trade edition appeared in February 1906. Unperturbed by the condition of the workers, the public was horrified by the evidence of criminal negligence in meat inspection. The packers aided the success of the book by efforts to answer its charges and President Theodore Roosevelt, prodded by a flood of letters from convinced readers, arranged an investigation. The Pure Food and Drug Act was at that time being perfected Roosevelt signed it on June 30 For six months The Jungle was a best seller and it was soon translated into seventeen languages. Sinclair was famous although, as he said, he aimed at the public's heart and hit its stomach.

The Jungle retains its power even though not all readers will agree with Jack London's conviction that it is the Uncle Tom's Cabin of wage-slavery, "written of sweat and blood, and groans and tears." The chapter which follows is not the most spectacular in the novel, but it shows its author's Socialism and contains numerous implications that Brown's and Durham's were not overcareful of public health. It is also notable as a description of industrial processes, a type of exposition at which Sinclair excels.

CHAPTER III

In his capacity as delicatessen vender, Jokubas Szedvilas had many acquaintances. Among these was one of the special policemen employed by Durham, whose duty it frequently was to pick out men for employment. Jokubas had never tried it, but he expressed a certainty that he could get some of his friends a job through this man. It was agreed, after consultation, that he should make the effort with old Antanas and with Jonas. Jurgis was confident of his ability to get work for himself, unassisted by any one

As we have said before, he was not mistaken in this He had gone to Brown's and stood there not more than half an hour before one of the bosses noticed his form towering above the rest, and signalled to him. The colloquy which followed was brief and to the point — "Speak English?"

"No, Lit-uanian" (Jurgis had studied this word carefully)

"Job?" "Je." (A nod.) "Worked here before?"

"No 'stand'"

(Signals and gesticulations on the part of the boss. Vigorous shakes of the head by Jurgis)

"Shovel guts?"

"No 'stand." (More shakes of the head)

"Zarnos Pagaiksztis Szluota!" (Imitative motions.)

"Ie"

"See door Durys?" (Pointing)

"Je"

"To-morrow, seven o'clock Understand? Rytoj Prieszpietys! Septyni!"

"Dekui, tamistai!" (Thank you, sir) And that was all. Jurgis turned away, and then in a sudden rush the full realization of his triumph swept over him, and he gave a yell and a jump, and started off on a run. He had a job! He had a job! And he went all the way home as if upon wings, and burst into the house like a cyclone, to the rage of the numerous lodgers who had just turned in for their daily sleep.

Meantime Jokubas had been to see his friend the policeman, and received encouragement, so it was a happy party. There being no more to be done that day, the shop was left under the care of Lucija, and her husband sallied forth to show his friends the sights of Packingtown. Jokubas did this with the air of a country gentleman escorting a party of visitors over his estate, he was an old-time resident, and all these wonders had grown up under his eyes, and he had a personal pride in them. The packers might own the land, but he claimed so the landscape, and there was no one to say nay to this

They passed down the busy street that led to the yards It was still early morning, and everything was at its high tide of activity. A steady stream of employees was pouring through the gate—employees of the higher sort, at this hour, clerks and stenographers and such For the women there were waiting big two-horse wagons, which set off at a gallop as fast as they were filled. In the distance there was heard again the loving of the cattle, a sound as of a far-off ocean calling. They followed it, 60 this time, as eager as children in sight of a circus menagerie—which, indeed, the scene a good deal resembled. They crossed the railroad tracks, and then on each side of the street were the pens full of cattle, they would have stopped to look, but Jokubas hurried them on, to where there was a stairway and a raised gallery, from which everything could be seen. Here they stood, staring, breathless with wonder

There is over a square mile of space in the yards, and more than half of it is occupied by cattle-pens, north and south as far as the eye can reach there stretches a sea of pens And they were all filled-so many cattle no one had ever dreamed existed in the world Red cattle, black, white, and yellow cattle, old cattle and young cattle, great 10 bellowing bulls and little calves not an hour born, meekeyed milch cows and fierce, long-horned Texas steers The sound of them here was as of all the barnyards of the universe, and as for counting them-it would have taken all day simply to count the pens. Here and there ran long alleys, blocked at intervals by gates, and Jokubas told them that the number of these gates was twenty-five thousand Jokubas had recently been reading a newspaper article which was full of statistics such as that, and he was very proud as he repeated them and made his 20 guests cry out with wonder Jurgis too had a little of this sense of pride Had he not just gotten a job, and become a sharer in all this activity, a cog in this marvellous machine?

Here and there about the alleys galloped men upon horseback, booted, and carrying long whips, they were very busy, calling to each other, and to those who were driving the cattle They were drovers and stock-raisers, who had come from far states, and brokers and commission-merchants, and buyers for all the big packing-houses 30 Here and there they would stop to inspect a bunch of cattle, and there would be a parley, brief and businesslike The buyer would nod or drop his whip, and that would mean a bargun, and he would note it in his little book. along with hundreds of others he had made that morning Then Jokubas pointed out the place where the cattle were driven to be weighed, upon a great scale that would weigh a hundred thousand pounds at once and record it automatically It was near to the east entrance that they stood, and all along this east side of the yards ran the 40 railroad tracks, into which the cars were run, loaded with cattle All night long this had been going on, and now the pens were full, by to-night they would all be empty, and the same thing would be done again

"And what will become of all these creatures?" cried Teta Elzbieta

"By to-night," Jokubas answered, "they will all be killed and cut up, and over there on the other side of the packing-houses are more railroad tracks, where the cars come to take them away."

There were two hundred and fifty miles of track within s the yards, their guide went on to tell them They brought about ten thousand head of cattle every day, and as many hogs, and half as many sheep-which meant some eight or ten million live creatures turned into food every year One stood and watched, and little by little caught the drift of the tide, as it set in the direction of the packinghouses There were groups of cattle being driven to the chutes, which were roadways about fifteen feet wide, raised high above the pens. In these chutes the stream of animals was continuous, it was quite uncanny to e watch them, pressing on to their fate, all unsuspiciousa very river of death. Our friends were not poetical, and the sight suggested to them no metaphors of human destiny, they thought only of the wonderful efficiency of it all. The chutes into which the hogs went climbed high up-to the very top of the distant buildings, and Jokubas explained that the hogs went up by the power of their own legs, and then their weight carried them back through all the processes necessary to make them into pork

"They don't waste anything here," said the guide, and then he laughed and added a witticism, which he was pleased that his unsophisticated friends should take to be his own "They use everything about the hog except the squeal" In front of Brown's General Office building there grows a tiny plot of grass, and this, you may learn, is the only bit of green thing in Packingtown, likewise this jest about the hog and his squeal, the stock in trade of all the guides, is the one gleam of humor that you will find there

After they had seen enough of the pens, the party went up the street, to the mass of buildings which occupy the centre of the yards. These buildings, made of brick and stained with innumerable layers of Packingtown smoke, were painted all over with advertising signs, from which the visitor realized suddenly that he had come to the home of many of the torments of his life. It was here that they made those products with the wonders of which they pestered him so—by placards that defaced the land-scape when he travelled, and by staring advertisements in the newspapers and magazines—by silly little jingles that he could not get out of his mind, and gaudy pictures that lurked for him around every street corner. Here was where they made Brown's Imperial Hams and Bacon, Brown's Dressed Beef, Brown's Excelsior Sausages! Here was the headquarters of Durham's Pure Leat Lard, of Durham's Breakfast Bacon, Durham's Canned Beef, Potted Ham, Devilled Chicken, Peerless Fertilizer!

Entering one of the Durham buildings, they found a number of other visitors waiting, and before long there came a guide, to escort them through the place. They make a great feature of showing strangers through the packing-plants, for it is a good advertisement. But ponas Jokubas whispered maliciously that the visitors did not see any more than the packers wanted them to

They climbed a long series of stairways outside of the building, to the top of its five or six stories. Here were the chute, with its river of hogs, all patiently toiling upward, there was a place for them to rest to cool off, and then through another passageway they went into a room from which there is no returning for hogs.

It was a long, narrow room, with a gallery along it for visitors. At the head there was a great iron wheel, about twenty feet in circumference, with rings here and there along its edge. Upon both sides of this wheel there was a narrow space, into which came the hogs at the end of their journey, in the midst of them stood a great burly. Negro, bare-armed and bare-chested. He was resting for the moment, for the wheel had stopped while men were cleaning up. In a minute or two, however, it began slowly to revolve, and then the men upon each side of it sprang to work. They had chains which they fastened about the leg of the nearest hog, and the other end of the chain they hooked into one of the rings upon the wheel. So, as the wheel turned, a hog was suddenly jerked off his feet and borne aloft.

At the same instant the ear was assailed by a most terrifying shriek, the visitors started in alarm, the women turned pale and shrank back. The shriek was followed to by another, louder and yet more agonizing—for once started upon that journey, the hog never came back, at the top of the wheel he was shunted off upon a trolley, and went sailing down the room. And meantime another was swung up, and then another, and another, until there was a double line of them, each dangling by a foot and kicking in frenzy—and squealing. The uproar was appalling, perilous to the ear-drums, one feared there was too much sound for the room to hold—that the walls must give way or the ceiling crack. There were high squeals and low squeals, grunts, and wails of agony; there would come a momentary lull, and then a fresh outburst, louder than ever, surging up to a deafening climax. It was too much for some of the visitors—the men would look at each other, laughing nervously, and the women would stand with hands clenched, and the blood rushing to their faces, and the tears starting in their eyes.

Meanwhile, heedless of all these things, the men upon the floor were going about their work. Neither squeals of hogs nor tears of visitors made any difference to them; one by one they hooked up the hogs, and one by one with a swift stroke they slit their throats. There was a long line of hogs, with squeals and life-blood ebbing away together, until at last each started again, and vanished with a splash into a huge vat of boiling water.

It was all so very businesslike that one watched it fascinated. It was pork-making by machinery, pork-making by applied mathematics. And yet somehow the most matter-of-fact person could not help thinking of the hogs, they were so innocent, they came so very trustingly, and they were so very human in their protests—and so 70 perfectly within their rights! They had done nothing to deserve it, and it was adding insult to injury, as the thing was done here, swinging them up in this cold-blooded, impersonal way, without a pretence at apology, without the homage of a tear. Now and then a visitor wept, to be sure, but this slaughtering-machine ran on, visitors or no visitors. It was like some horrible crime committed in a dungeon, all unseen and unheeded, buried out of sight and of memory.

One could not stand and watch very long without 80 becoming philosophical, without beginning to deal in symbols and similes, and to hear the hog-squeal of the universe. Was it permitted to believe that there was nowhere upon the earth, or above the earth, a heaven for hogs, where they were requited for all this suffering?

Each one of these hogs was a separate creature Some were white hogs, some were black, some were brown, some were spotted, some were old, some were young, some were long and lean, some were monstrous And each of them had an individuality of his own, a will of his own, a hope and a heart's desire, each was full of selfconfidence, of self-importance, and a sense of dignity And trusting and strong in faith he had gone about his business, the while a black shadow hung over him and 10 a horrid Fate waited in his pathway. Now suddenly it had swooped upon him, and had seized him by the leg. Relentless, remorseless, it was, all his protests, his screams, were nothing to it-it did its cruel will with him, as if his wishes, his feelings, had simply no existence at all, it cut his throat and watched him gasp out his life. And now was one to believe that there was nowhere a god of hogs, to whom this hog-personality was precious, to whom these hog-squeals and agonies had a meaning? Who would take this hog into his arms and 20 comfort him, reward him for his work well done, and show him the meaning of his sacrifice? Perhaps some glimpse of all this was in the thoughts of our humbleminded Jurgis, as he turned to go on with the rest of the party, and muttered "Dieve-but I'm glad I'm not a hog!"

The carcass hog was scooped out of the vat by machinery, and then it fell to the second floor, passing on the way through a wonderful machine with numerous scrapers, which adjusted themselves to the size and shape 30 of the animal, and sent it out at the other end with nearly all of its bristles removed. It was then again strung up by machinery, and sent upon another trolley ride, this time passing between two lines of men, who sat upon a raised platform, each doing a certain single thing to the carcass as it came to him. One scraped the outside of a leg, another scraped the inside of the same leg One with a swift stroke cut the throat, another with two swift strokes severed the head, which fell to the floor and vanished through a hole. Another made a slit down the 40 body, a second opened the body wider, a third with a saw cut the breast-bone, a fourth loosened the entrails, a fifth pulled them out-and they also slid through a hole in the floor There were men to scrape each side and men to scrape the back, there were men to clean the carcass inside, to trim it and wash it Looking down this room, one saw, creeping slowly, a line of dangling hogs a hundred yards in length, and for every yard there was a man, working as if a demon were after him. At the end of this hog's progress every inch of the carcass had been gone over several times, and then it was rolled into the chilling-room, where it stayed for twenty-four hours, and where a stranger might lose himself in a forest of freezing hogs.

Before the carcass was admitted here, however, it had to pass a government inspector, who sat in the doorway and felt of the glands in the neck for tuberculosis This government inspector did not have the manner of a man who was worked to death, he was apparently not haunted by a fear that the hog might get by him before he had quite willing to enter into conversation with you, and to explain to you the deadly nature of the promaines which are found in tubercular pork, and while he was talking with you you could hardly be so ungrateful as to notice that a dozen carcasses were passing him untouched. This inspector wore an imposing silver badge, and he gave an atmosphere of authority to the scene, and, as it were, put the stamp of official approval upon the things which were done in Durham's

Jurgis went down the line with the rest of the visitors, staring open-mouthed, lost in wonder. He had dressed hogs himself in the forest of Lithuania, but he had never expected to live to see one hog dressed by several hundred men. It was like a wonderful poem to him, and he took it all in guilelessly—even to the conspicuous signs demanding immaculate cleanliness of the employees. Jurgis was vexed when the cynical Jokubas translated these signs with sarcastic comments, offering to take them to the secret rooms where the spoiled meats went to be doctored.

The party descended to the next floor, where the various waste materials were treated. Here came the entrails, to be scraped and washed clean for sausage-casings, men and women worked here in the midst of a sickening stench, which caused the visitors to hasten by, gasping. To another room came all the scraps to be "tanked," which meant boiling and pumping off the grease to make soap and lard, below they took out the refuse, and this, too, was a region in which the visitors did not linger. In still other places men were engaged in cutting up the carcasses that had been through the chilling-rooms. First there were the "splitters," the most expert workmen in the plant, who earned as high as fifty cents an hour, and did not a thing all day except chop hogs down the middle Then there were "cleaver men," great giants with muscles of iron, each had two men to attend him-to slide the half carcass in front of him on the table, and hold it while he chopped it, and then turn each piece so that he might chop it once more His to cleaver had a blade about two feet long, and he never made but one cut, he made it so neatly, too, that his implement did not smite through and dull itself-there was just enough force for a perfect cut, and no more So through various yawning holes there slipped to the floor below-to one room hams, to another forequarters, to another sides of pork. One might go down to this floor and see the pickling-rooms, where the hams were put into vats, and the great smoke-rooms, with their airtight iron doors. In other rooms they prepared salt-2 pork-there were whole cellars full of it, built up in great towers to the ceiling. In yet other rooms they were putting up meat in boxes and barrels, and wrapping hams and bacon in oiled paper, sealing and labelling and sewing them From the doors of these rooms went men with loaded trucks, to the platform where freight-cars were waiting to be filled, and one went out there and realized with a start that he had come at last to the ground floor of this enormous building

Then the party went across the street to where they did the killing of beef—where every hour they turned four or five hundred cattle into meat. Unlike the place they had left, all this work was done on one floor, and instead of there being one line of carcasses which moved to the workmen, there were fifteen or twenty lines, and the men moved from one to another of these. This made a scene of intense activity, a picture of human power wonderful to watch. It was all in one great room, like a circus amphitheatre, with a gallery for visitors running over the centre.

Along one side of the room ran a narrow gallery, a few feet from the floor, into which gallery the cattle were driven by men with goads which gave them electric shocks. Once crowded in here, the creatures were prisoned, each in a separate pen, by gates that shut, leaving them no room to turn around, and while they stood bellowing and plunging, over the top of the pen there leaned one of the "knockers," armed with a sledgehammer, and watching for a chance to deal a blow. The room echoed with the thuds in quick succession, and the stamping and kicking of the steers. The instant the ani- 50 mal had fallen, the "knocker" passed on to another, while a second man raised a lever, and the side of the pen was raised, and the animal, still kicking and struggling, slid out to the "killing-bed". Here a man put shackles about one leg, and pressed another lever, and the body was jerked up into the air. There were fifteen or twenty such pens, and it was a matter of only a couple of minutes to knock fifteen or twenty cattle and roll them out Then once more the gates were opened, and another lot rushed in, and so out of each pen there flowed a steady stream 60 of carcasses, which the men upon the killing-beds had to get out of the way

The manner in which they did this was something to be seen and never forgotten They worked with furious intensity, literally upon the run-at a pace with which there is nothing to be compared except a football game It was all highly specialized labor, each man having his task to do, generally this would consist of only two or three specific cuts, and he would pass down the line of fifteen or twenty carcasses, making these cuts upon each 70 First there came the "butcher," to bleed them, this meant one swift stroke, so swift that you could not see it-only the flash of the knife, and before you could realize it, the man had darted on to the next line, and a stream of bright red was pouring out upon the floor This floor was half an inch deep with blood, in spite of the best efforts of men who kept shovelling it through holes, it must have made the floor slippery, but no one could have guessed this by watching the men at work.

The carcass hung for a few minutes to bleed, there was no time lost, however, for there were several hanging in each line, and one was always ready. It was let down to the ground, and there came the "headsman," whose task it was to sever the head, with two or three swift strokes. Then came the "flor isman," to make the first cut in the skin, and then another to finish ripping the skin down the centre, and then half a dozen more in swift succession, to finish the skinning. After they were through, the carcass was again swung up, and while a man with a stick examined the skin, to make sure that it so had not been cut, and another rolled it up and tumbled it through one of the inevitable holes in the floor, the beef proceeded on its journey. There were men to cut it, and men to split it, and men to gut it and scrape it clean inside. There were some with hose which threw jets of boiling water upon it, and others who removed the feet and added the final touches. In the end, as with the hogs, the finished beef was run into the chilling-room, to hang its appointed time.

The visitors were taken there and shown them, all neatly hung in rows, labeled conspicuously with the tags of the government inspectors-and some, which had been killed by a special process marked with the sign of the "kosher" rabbi, certifying that it was fit for sale to the orthodox And then the visitors were taken to the other parts of the building, to see what became of each particle of the waste material that had vanished through the floor, and to the pickling-rooms, and the saltingrooms, the canning-rooms, and the packing-rooms, where 20 choice meat was prepared for shipping in refrigeratorcars, destined to be eaten in all the four corners of civilization Afterward they went outside, wandering about among the mazes of buildings in which was done the work auxiliary to this great industry. There was scarcely a thing needed in the business that Durham and Company did not make for themselves There was a great steam-power plant and an electricity plant. There was a barrel factory, and a boiler-repair shop. There was a building to which the grease was piped, and made into 30 soap and lard, and then there was a factory for making lard cans, and another for making soap boxes. There was a building in which the bristles were cleaned and dried, for the making of hair cushions and such things, there was a building where the skins were dried and tanned. there was another where heads and feet were made into glue, and another where bones were made into fertilizer No timest particle of organic matter was wasted in Durham's Out of the horns of the cattle they made combs, buttons, hair-pins, and imitation ivory, out of the 40 shin bones and other big bones they cut knife and toothbrush handles, and mouthpieces for pipes, out of the hoofs they cut hair-pins and buttons, before they made the rest into glue. From such things as feet, knuckles, hide clippings, and sinews came such strange and unlikely products as gelatin, isinglass, and phosphorus, bone-black, shoe-blacking, and bone-oil They had curled-hair works for the cattle tails, and a "wool-pullery" for the sheep skins, they made pepsin from the stomachs of the pigs, and albumen from the blood, and violin strings from the ill-smelling entrails When there was nothing else to be done with a thing, they first put it into a tank and got out of it all the tallow and grease, and then they made it into fertilizer. All these industries were gathered into buildings near by, connected by galleries and railroads with the main establishment, and it was estimated that they had handled nearly a quarter of a billion of animals since the founding of the plant by the elder Durham a generation and more ago If you counted with it the other big plants-and they were now really all one -it was, so Jokubas informed them, the greatest aggregation of labor and capital ever gathered in one place. It employed thirty thousand men, it supported directly two hundred and fifty thousand people in its neighborhood, and indirectly it supported half a million. It sent its products to every country in the civilized world, and it furnished the food for no less than thirty million people!

To all of these things our friends would listen openmouthed-it seemed to them impossible of belief that anything so stupendous could have been devised by mortal man. That was why to Jurgis it seemed almost pro- π fanity to speak about the place as did Jokubas, sceptically, it was a thing as tremendous as the universe—the laws and ways of its working no more than the universe to be questioned or understood. All that a mere man could do, it seemed to Jurgis, was to take a thing like this as he found it, and do as he was told, to be given a place in it and a share in its wonderful activities was a blessing to be grateful for, as one was grateful for the sunshine and the rain Jurgis was even glad that he had not seen the place before meeting with his triumph, for he felt $\ensuremath{\wp}$ that the size of it would have overwhelmed him But now he had been admitted—he was a part of it all! He had the feeling that this whole huge establishment had taken him under its protection, and had become responsible for his welfare So guileless was he, and ignorant of the nature of business, that he did not even realize that he had become an employee of Brown's, and that Brown and Durham were supposed by all the world to be deadly rivals—were even required to be deadly rivals by the law of the land, and ordered to try to ruin each $\, \mathfrak{v} \,$ other under penalty of fine and imprisonment!

Henry Adams

1838 · 1918

"Probably no child, born in the same year, held better cards than he" In these words Henry Adams, in mature life, assessed the circumstances of his own birth, which had occurred in Boston in 1838. His remark was less a snobbish boast than an objective statement of fact. The cards had been good indeed no financial problem faced him, his mother was the daughter of the wealthiest man in his native city. Part of the infant's heritage was a brilliant mind, and his family cherished fine old traditions of culture and useful service. His forebears, including two Presidents of the United States and three ministers to England as well as several notable scholars, had been most distinguished. The Adamses were one of the honored families of Massachusetts, and many people in New England took for granted that any member of the tribe was destined to have an outstanding career

It was not surprising that, after Henry Adams had been trained in a Boston private school, then in Harvard, and finally—for some years—in centers of European culture, he showed real talents for several different kinds of endeavor. During the Civil War period, he efficiently acted as secretary to his father, who served for a time as United States congressman and later as minister to England. Between 1868 and 1870, he was a journalistic commentator, of much promise, upon domestic and foreign affairs. Between 1870 and 1876, he was the competent editor of a long-established and distinguished magazine, the North American Review. Simultaneously he was a highly successful teacher of medieval history at Harvard, where, among other important innovations, he introduced the graduate seminar.

In Washington, D. C, to which he moved from Boston, Adams composed two noteworthy novels, Democracy (1880) and Esther (1884), as well as several studies in American history. These included, in addition to shorter works, a pair of excellent biographies, Life of Albert Gallatin (1879) and John Randolph (1882). and a much admired nine-volume History of the United States During the Administrations of Jefferson and Madison (1889-1891). His interpretation of medieval life, Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (1904, revised in 1913), was praised by literary critics as well as by historians (Professor John Spencer Bassett, in the Cambridge History of American Literature, calls the book "probably the best expression of the Middle Ages yet published in the English language.") His crowning achievement, in the opinion of most, was a philosophical autobiography cryptically titled The Education of Henry Adams, privately printed in 1907 but not made available to the general public until 1918, the year of the author's death

The aptitudes thus displayed, considering Adams' nature and nurture, were not surprising But the varied nature of his efforts was an outward sign of an inward discontent The "education" which he achieved, one which did not end with college but extended throughout a long lifetime, was, in Adams' opinion, an indecisive one Despite the fine cards dealt to him by fate, he said, characteristically writing of himself in the third person, "he never got to the point of playing the game at all, he lost himself in the study of it, watching the errors of the players " His aim, in large part, as he watched and thoughtfully pondered what he saw, was to find some secret of orderliness, some meaningful scheme, in the complex world of his time Widely traveled though he was not only in Europe but in America, Mexico, the South Seas, Egypt, and Russia as well, closely acquainted though he was with a host of the leading figures of the day in several fields, well read though he was in books on many subjects, he found that the answer consistently proved elusive

Adams' first novel, Democracy, shows what discouraging conclusions he reached when he studied and weighed the values of one important phase of American life—our governmental system. Sternly, in the spirit of doubt which was moving many of our authors in the 1880's, Adams tells a story underlining faults which he had seen in our government while living in Washington. As

Ludwig Lewisohn observes, in Expression in America, "He rejects the life of the American collectivity at its densest and most representative place and point, he despairs of the Republic; he leaves the reader with not a shred of illusion concerning the national government and its method." And Adams' skepticism about ways of living in his era became much more inclusive by the time he reached his sixties and wrote his two most famous books

These books, Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres and The Education, dramatically indicate the great problem which this author attempted to solve, and record his search for a solution The former examines the point in the long history of the human race at which, he believes, "man had held the highest idea of himself as a unit in a unified universe" The art and the architecture of the medieval period during which were erected the two great cathedrals of his title, Adams contends, are symbols of an age of unity, an age during which man had found answers satisfactory to himself to questions about the nature of the universe and man's place in it Such an age of peaceful adjustment was made possible, Adams holds, by man's transference of the vital power of the Virgin-Mary, the central figure of medieval faithinto both belief and action

Adams thus looks back with wistful nostalgia at the distant age which had solved the problem of living But when he turns to his own time he sees a contrast which creates a different mood. He sees the age in which he has lived as one not of unity but of chaotic multiplicity His Education gives an account of its author's continuously baffled search-in many parts of the earth during a long period-for some up-to-date, unified meaning or faith comparable to that which had motivated medieval worshipers. In politics, in religion, in philosophy, in physics, in biology, in psychology, he finds evidence which leads him to draw a distressing conclusion "Chaos was the law of nature, Order was the dream of man" Adams' autobiography, therefore, marks the attainment of a high point in the skepticism characteristic of its author's period. But it has more than a negative value for one thing, it sets forth Adams' "dynamic theory of history," which interestingly attempts to interpret cause-effect relationships in our past in terms of certain laws of the physical world. For another, it positively insists upon our need for "a new social mind" to grapple with complex modern life, and thus it foreshadows a growing concern of the present day.

The form employed by Adams in his life story makes both the account and the message memorable. No hysteria of the sort far too frequent in American pessimistic writing enters into it, rather the whole thoughtful narrative is set down with detachment and quiet irony. Adams was equipped, by training and temperament, not only for an objective, amused consideration of the world in which he lived but also for something even more noteworthy—a smiling contemplation of himself, scion of the great Adams family, scurrying over the face of the earth to carry on a lifelong quest which, although it is always frustrated, is eternally hopeful. His very use of the third person (instead of the first person typical of autobiography) emphasizes his playful objectivity. His refusal to consider in any detail several deeply tragic events in his life—such as the death of his wife in 1885—helps him maintain the tone of high comedy. His style is quiet, reserved, cynical—implicit in its nuances rather than explicit and direct The Education, descriptive of chaos though it is, is anything but chaotic subtlety and sureness down to the minutest detail make the book an outstanding masterpiece among American works of its genre

Chapter XXV

THE DYNAMO AND THE VIRGIN (1900)

Chapter XXV of Adams' autobiography tells how, at the Paris Exposition of 1900, instructed by the scientist Langley, Adams became aware of the power and the mystery of the dynamo. "As he grew accustomed to the great gallery of machines," he writes of himself, "he began to feel the forty-foot dynamos as a moral force, much as the early Christians felt the Cross" Was it possible, he wondered, for a historian to chart man's development in terms of this twentieth-century embodiment of force? "Symbol or energy," he writes, "the Virgin had acted as the greatest force the Western world ever felt and had drawn man's activities to herself more strongly than any other power, natural or supernatural, had ever done; the historian's business was to follow the track of the energy, to find where it came from and where it went to; its complex source and shifting channels; its values, equivalents, conversions" The chapter tells how the dynamo and the thoughts it stimulated brought additional puzzlement to Adams and started him on a new search for understanding.

Intil the Great Exposition of 1900 closed its doors in November, Adams haunted it, aching to absorb knowledge, and helpless to find it. He would have liked to know how much of it could have been grasped by the best-informed man in the world. While he was thus meditating chaos. Langley came by, and showed it to him At Langley's behest, the Exhibition dropped its superfluous rags and stripped itself to the skin, for Langley knew what to study, and why, and how, while Adams might as well have stood outside in the night, 10 staring at the Milky Way Yet Langley said nothing new, and taught nothing that one might not have learned from Lord Bacon, three hundred years before, but though one should have known the "Advancement of Science" as well as one knew the "Comedy of Errors," the literary knowledge counted for nothing until some teacher should show how to apply 1 Bacon took a vast deal of trouble in teaching King James I and his subjects, American or other, towards the year 1620, that true science was the development or economy of forces, 20 vet an elderly American in 1900 knew neither the formula nor the forces, or even so much as to say to himself that his historical business in the Exposition concerned only the economies or developments of force since 1893, when he began the study at Chicago.

Nothing in education is so astonishing as the amount of ignorance it accumulates in the form of inert facts. Adams had looked at most of the accumulations of art in the storehouses called Art Museums, yet he did not know how to look at the art exhibits of 1900. He had studied Karl Marx and his doctrines of history with profound attention, yet he could not apply them at 10 Paris Langley, with the ease of a great master of experiment, threw out of the field every exhibit that did not reveal a new application of force, and naturally threw out, to begin with, almost the whole art exhibit Equally, he ignored almost the whole industrial exhibit He led his pupil directly to the forces. His chief interest was in new motors to make his airship feasible, and he taught Adams the astonishing complexities of the new Daimler motor, and of the automobile, which, since 1893, had become a nightmare at a hundred 20 kilometres an hour, almost as destructive as the electric tram which was only ten years older, and threatening to become as terrible as the locomotive steam-engine itself, which was almost exactly Adams's own age

Then he showed his scholar the great hall of dynamos, and explained how little he knew about electricity or force of any kind, even of his own special sun, which spouted heat in inconceivable volume, but which, as far as he knew, might spout less or more, at any time, for all the certainty he felt in it. To him, the dynamo itself 30 was but an ingenious channel for conveying somewhere the heat latent in a few tons of poor coal hidden in a dirty engine-house carefully kept out of sight, but to Adams the dynamo became a symbol of infinity. As he grew accustomed to the great gallery of machines, he began to feel the forty-foot dynamos as a moral force, much as the early Christians felt the Cross The planet itself seemed less impressive, in its old-fashioned, deliberate, annual or daily revolution, than this huge wheel, revolving within arm's-length at some vertiginous speed, 40 and barely murmuring—scarcely humming an audible warning to stand a hair's-breadth further for respect of power-while it would not wake the baby lying close against its frame Before the end, one began to pray to it, inherited instinct taught the natural expression of man before silent and infinite force. Among the thousand symbols of ultimate energy, the dynamo was not so human as some, but it was the most expressive

Yet the dynamo, next to the steam-engine, was the most familiar of exhibits. For Adams's objects its value lay chiefly in its occult mechanism. Between the dynamo in the gallery of machines and the engine-house outside, the break of continuity amounted to abysmal fracture for a historian's objects. No more relation could he discover between the steam and the electric current than between the Cross and the cathedral The forces were interchangeable if not reversible, but he could see only an absolute fiat in electricity as in faith Langley could not help him Indeed, Langley seemed to be worried by the same trouble, for he constantly repeated that the new forces were anarchical, and specially that he was not responsible for the new rays. that were little short of parricidal in their wicked spirit towards science His own rays, with which he had doubled the solar spectrum, were altogether harmless and beneficent, but Radium denied its God-or, what was to Langley the same thing, denied the truths of his Science The force was wholly new

A historian who asked only to learn enough to be as futile as Langley or Kelvin, made rapid progress under this teaching, and mixed himself up in the tangle of ideas 7. until he achieved a sort of Paradise of ignorance vastly consoling to his fatigued senses He wrapped himself in vibrations and rays which were new, and he would have hugged Marconi and Branly had he met them, as he hugged the dynamo, while he lost his arithmetic in trying to figure out the equation between the discoveries and the economies of force The economies, like the discoveries, were absolute, supersensual, occult, incapable of expression in horse-power What mathematical equivalent could he suggest as the value of a Branly of coherer? Frozen air, or the electric furnace, had some scale of measurement, no doubt, if somebody could invent a thermometer adequate to the purpose, but X-rays had played no part whatever in man's consciousness, and the atom itself had figured only as a fiction of thought. In these seven years man had translated himself into a new universe which had no common scale of measurement with the old. He had entered a supersensual world, in which he could measure nothing except by chance collisions of movements imperceptible to his senses, perhaps even imperceptible to his instruments, but perceptible to each other, and so to some known ray at the end of the scale. Langley seemed prepared for anything, even for an indeterminable number of universes interfused—physics stark mad in metaphysics.

Historians undertake to arrange sequences,-called stories, or histories-assuming in silence a relation of cause and effect These assumptions, hidden in the depths of dusty libraries, have been astounding, but commonly unconscious and childlike, so much so, that if any captious critic were to drag them to light, historians would probably reply, with one voice, that they had never 20 supposed themselves required to know what they were talking about Adams, for one, had toiled in vain to find out what he meant He had even published a dozen volumes of American history for no other purpose than to satisfy himself whether, by the severest process of stating, with the least possible comment, such facts as seemed sure, in such order as seemed rigorously consequent, he could fix for a familiar moment a necessary sequence of human movement. The result had satisfied him as little as at Harvard College Where he saw 30 sequence, other men saw something quite different, and no one saw the same unit of measure. He cared little about his experiments and less about his statesmen, who seemed to him quite as ignorant as himself and, as a rule, no more honest, but he insisted on a relation of sequence, and if he could not reach it by one method, he would try as many methods as science knew Satisfied that the sequence of men led to nothing and that the sequence of their society could lead no further, while the mere sequence of time was artificial, and the sequence of 40 thought was chaos, he turned at last to the sequence of force, and thus it happened that, after ten years' pursuit, he found himself lying in the Gallery of Machines at the Great Exposition of 1900, his historical neck broken by the sudden irruption of forces totally new

Since no one else showed much concern, an elderly person without other cares had no need to betray alarm The year 1900 was not the first to upset schoolmasters Copernicus and Galileo had broken many professorial necks about 1600, Columbus had stood the world on its head towards 1500, but the nearest approach to the 50 revolution of 1900 was that of 310, when Constantine set up the Cross The rays that Langley disowned, as well as those which he fathered, were occult, supersensual, irrational, they were what, in terms of medieval science, were called immediate modes of the divine substance.

The historian was thus reduced to his last resources Clearly if he was bound to reduce all these forces to a common value, this common value could have no measure but that of their attraction on his own mind He must treat them as they had been felt, as convertible, 60 reversible, interchangeable attractions on thought He made up his mind to venture it, he would risk translating rays into faith. Such a reversible process would vastly amuse a chemist, but the chemist could not deny that he, or some of his fellow physicists, could feel the force of both When Adams was a boy in Boston, the best chemist in the place had probably never heard of Venus except by way of scandal, or of the Virgin except as idolatry, neither had he heard of dynamos or automobiles or radium, yet his mind was ready to feel the 70 force of all, though the rays were unborn and the women were dead

Here opened another totally new education, which promised to be by far the most hazardous of all. The knife-edge along which he must crawl, like Sir Lancelot in the twelfth century, divided two kingdoms of force which had nothing in common but attraction. They were as different as a magnet is from gravitation, or love. The force of the Virgin was still felt at Lourdes, 80 and seemed to be as potent as X-rays but in America neither Venus nor Virgin ever had value as a force—at most as sentiment. No American had ever truly been afraid of either

This problem in dynamics gravely perplexed an American historian. The Woman had once been supreme; in France she still seemed potent, not merely as a sentiment, but as a force. Why was she unknown in America? For evidently America was ashamed of her, and she was ashamed of herself, otherwise they would not have strewn fig-leaves so profusely all over her. When she was a true force, she was ignorant of fig-leaves, but the monthly-magazine-made American female had not a feature that would have been recognized by Adam The trait was notorious, and often 10 humorous, but any one brought up among Puritans knew that sex was a sin In any previous age, sex was strength Neither art nor beauty was needed Every one, even among Puritans, knew that neither Diana of the Ephesians nor any of the Oriental goddesses was worshipped for her beauty. She was goddess because of her force, she was the animated dynamo, she was reproduction—the greatest and most mysterious of all energies; all she needed was to be fecund Singularly enough, not one of Adams's many schools of education had ever 20 drawn his attention to the opening lines of Lucretius. though they were perhaps the finest in all Latin literature, where the poet invoked Venus exactly as Dante invoked the Virgin -

"Quae quoniam rerum naturam sola gubernas."

The Venus of Epicurean philosophy survived in the Virgin of the Schools —

"Donna, sei tanto grande, e tanto vali, Che qual vuol grazia, e a te non ricorre, Sua disianza vuol volar senz' ali "

30 All this was to American thought as though it had never existed. The true American knew something of the facts, but nothing of the feelings, he read the letter, but he never felt the law. Before this historical chasm, a mind like that of Adams felt itself helpless, he turned from the Virgin to the Dynamo as though he were a Branly coherer. On one side, at the Louvie and at Chartres, as he knew by the record of work actually done and still before his eyes, was the highest energy ever known to man, the creator of four-fifths of his noblest art, exercising vastly more attraction over the human mind than all the steam-engines and dynamos ever dreamed of, and yet this energy was unknown to the American mind. An American Virgin would never dare command, an American Venus would never dare exist.

The question, which to any plain American of the nineteenth century seemed as remote as it did to Adams drew him almost violently to study, once it was posed and on this point Langleys were as useless as though they were Herbert Spencers or dynamos. The idea survived only as art. There one turned as naturally as s though the artist were himself a woman Adams began to ponder, asking himself whether he knew of any American artist who had ever insisted on the power of sex, as every classic had always done, but he could think only of Walt Whitman, Bret Harte, as far as the magazines would let him venture, and one or two painters, for the flesh-tones. All the rest had used sex for sentiment, never for force, to them, Eve was a tender flower, and Herodias an unfeminine horror American art, like the American language and American 6 education, was as far as possible sexless Society regarded this victory over sex as its greatest triumph, and the historian readily admitted it, since the moral issue. for the moment, did not concern one who was studying the relations of unmoral force. He cared nothing for the sex of the dynamo until he could measure its energy

Vaguely seeking a clue, he wandered through the art exhibit, and, in his stroll, stopped almost every day before St. Gaudens's General Sherman, which had been given the central post of honor. St. Gaudens himself it was in Paris, putting on the work his usual interminable last touches, and listening to the usual contradictory suggestions of brother sculptors. Of all the American artists who gave to American art whatever life it breathed in the seventies, St. Gaudens was perhaps the most sympathetic, but certainly the most inarticulate General Grant or Don Cameron had scarcely less instinct of rhetoric than he All the others—the Hunts, Richardson, John La Farge, Stanford White—were explorant, only St Gaudens could never discuss or dilate on an emotion, or suggest artistic arguments for giving to his work the forms that he felt. He never laid down the law, or affected the despot, or became brutalized like Whistler by the brutalities of his world. He required no incense, he was no egoist, his simplicity of thought was excessive, he could not imitate, or give any form but his own to the creations of his hand. No one felt more strongly than he the strength of other men, but the idea that they could affect him never stirred an image in his mind.

This summer his health was poor and his spirits were low. For such a temper, Adams was not the best companion, since his own gaiety was not folle; but he risked going now and then to the studio on Mont Parnasse to draw him out for a stroll in the Bois de Boulogne, or dinner as pleased his moods, and in return St. Gaudens sometimes let Adams go about in his company

Once St Gaudens took him down to Amiens, with a party of Frenchmen, to see the cathedral Not until they found themselves actually studying the sculpture of the western portal, did it dawn on Adams's mind that, for his purposes, St Gaudens on that spot had more interest to him than the cathedral itself. Great men before great monuments express great truths, provided they are not taken too solemnly Adams never tired of quoting the supreme phrase of his idol Gibbon, before the Gothic 30 cathedrals "I darted a contemptuous look on the stately monuments of superstition" Even in the footnotes of his history, Gibbon had never inserted a bit of humor more human than this, and one would have paid largely for a photograph of the fat little historian, on the background of Notre Dame of Amiens, trying to persuade his readers-perhaps himself-that he was darting a contemptuous look on the stately monument, for which he felt in fact the respect which every man of his vast study and active mind always feels before objects worthy 40 of 1t, but besides the humor, one felt also the relation. Gibbon ignored the Virgin, because in 1789 religious monuments were out of fashion. In 1900 his remark sounded fresh and simple as the green fields to ears that had heard a hundred years of other remarks, mostly no more fresh and certainly less simple. Without malice, one might find it more instructive than a whole lecture of Ruskin. One sees what one brings, and at that moment Gibbon brought the French Revolution. Ruskin brought reaction against the Revolution. St. Gaudens had passed beyond all. He liked the stately monuments so much more than he liked Gibbon or Ruskin; he loved their dignity, their unity, their scale, their lines, their lights and shadows, their decorative sculpture, but he was even less conscious than they of the force that created it all—the Virgin, the Woman—by whose genius "the stately monuments of superstition" were built, through which she was expressed He would have seen more meaning in Isis with the cow's horns, at Edfoo, who expressed the same thought. The art remained, but the energy was lost even upon the artist

Yet in mind and person St Gaudens was a survival of the 1500, he bore the stamp of the Renaissance, and should have carried an image of the Virgin round his neck, or stuck in his hat, like Louis XI. In mere time he was a lost soul that had strayed by chance into the twentieth century, and forgotten where it came from. He writhed and cursed at his ignorance, much as Adams did at his own, but in the opposite sense St Gaudens was a child of Benvenuto Cellini, smothered in an American cradle Adams was a quintessence of Boston, devoured 70 by curiosity to think like Benvenuto St Gaudens's art was starved from birth, and Adams's instinct was blighted from babyhood Each had but half of a nature, and when they came together before the Virgin of Amiens they ought both to have felt in her the force that made them one, but it was not so To Adams she became more than ever a channel of force, to St. Gaudens she remained as before a channel of taste

For a symbol of power, St Gaudens instinctively preferred the horse, as was plain in his horse and Victory so of the Sherman monument. Doubtless Sherman also felt it so. The attitude was so American that, for at least forty years, Adams had never realized that any other could be in sound taste. How many years had he taken to admit a notion of what Michael Angelo and Rubens were driving at? He could not say, but he knew that only since 1895 had he begun to feel the Virgin or Venus as force, and not everywhere even so At Chartres-perhaps at Lourdes-possibly at Cnidos if one could still find there the divinely naked Aphrodite 10 of Praxiteles-but otherwise one must look for force to the goddesses of Indian mythology. The idea died out long ago in the German and English stock St Gaudens at Amiens was hardly less sensitive to the force of the female energy than Matthew Arnold at the Grande Chartreuse Neither of them felt goddesses as poweronly as reflected emotion, human expression, beauty, purity, taste, scarcely even as sympathy They felt a railway train as power, yet they, and all other artists, constantly complained that the power embodied in a 20 railway train could never be embodied in art. All the steam in the world could not, like the Virgin, build Chartres

Yet in mechanics, whatever the mechanicians might think, both energies acted as interchangeable forces on man, and by action on man all known force may be measured Indeed, few men of science measured force in any other way. After once admitting that a straight line was the shortest distance between two points, no serious mathematician cared to deny anything that 30 suited his convenience, and rejected no symbol, unproved or unproveable, that helped him to accomplish work The symbol was force, as a compass-needle or a triangle was force, as the mechanist might prove by losing it, and nothing could be gained by ignoring their value Symbol or energy, the Virgin had acted as the greatest force the Western world ever felt, and had drawn man's activities to herself more strongly than any other power, natural or supernatural, had ever done, the historian's business was to follow the track of the en-40 ergy, to find where it came from and where it went to, its complex source and shifting channels, its values, equivalents, conversions It could scarcely be more complex than radium, it could hardly be deflected, diverted, polarized, absorbed more perplexingly than other radiant matter Adams knew nothing about any of them, but as a mathematical problem of influence on human progress, though all were occult, all reacted on his mind, and he rather inclined to think the Virgin easiest to handle.

The pursuit turned out to be long and tortuous, lead, ing at last into the vast forests of scholastic science. From Zeno to Descartes, hand in hand with Thomas Aquinas Montaigne, and Pascal, one stumbled as stupidly as though one were still a German student of 1860 Only with the instinct of despair could one force one's self into this old thicket of ignorance after having been repulsed at a score of entrances more promising and more popular Thus far, no path had led anywhere, unless perhaps to an exceedingly modest living Fortyfive years of study had proved to be quite futile for the 6 pursuit of power, one controlled no more force in 1900 than in 1850, although the amount of force controlled by society had enormously increased. The secret of education still hid itself somewhere behind ignorance, and one fumbled over it as feebly as ever In such labyrinths, the staff is a force almost more necessary than the legs, the pen becomes a sort of blind-man's dog, to keep him from falling into the gutters. The pen works for itself, and acts like a hand, modelling the plastic material over and over again to the form that suits it π best The form is never arbitrary, but is a sort of growth like crystallization, as any artist knows too well, for often the pencil or pen runs into side-paths and shapelessness, loses its relations, stops or is bogged. Then it has to return on its trail, and recover, if it can, its line of force. The result of a year's work depends more on what is struck out than on what is left in, on the sequence of the main lines of thought, than on their play or variety Compelled once more to lean heavily on this support, Adams covered more thousands of pages with ϵ figures as formal as though they were algebra, laboriously striking out, altering, burning, experimenting, until the year had expired, the Exposition had long been closed, and winter drawing to its end before he sailed from Cherbourg, on January 19, 1901 for home.

A DYNAMIC THEORY OF HISTORY (1904)

In 1910, Adams sent out to a number of his fellow historians A Letter to American Teachers of History. In his letter, he (1) held that the hypothesis of evolution had been overthrown by a discovery in physics—the second law of thermodynamics, which suggested that the unrestorable mechanical energy of the earth was being dissipated, (2) urged his colleagues to work out a formula for the course of history in terms of this law. Though historians in general worked on no such scheme. Adams had tentatively formulated his use of the principle in an essay, "The Rule of Phase Applied to History" (later published in The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma in 1918), and in two chapters (XXXIII and XXXIV) of The Education. In "Henry Adams on History" (New England Quarterly, June 1935), Roy F Nichols summarizes the theory thus "Adams's studies of force led him to believe that thought followed its developments. The order of the appearance of the areat forces conveniently corresponded to the order of their intensity. First, there was human reproductive energy as represented by women, second, faith, culminating in Christianity, third, mechanical power, fourth, electricity, and finally, radium "

Chapter XXXIII applies the formula to the course of man's experiences down to 1900. The concluding lines are transitional to Chapter XXXIV, "A Law of Acceleration," which suggests that as the forces involved in successive phases became increasingly powerful, the phases became of briefer and briefer duration.

Mr Nichols notes "the veritable revolution in science" which has taken place since Adams' day because "the theory of relativity, the phenomena of radioactivity, and quantum mechanics have come to the fore" As a result, he concludes, "Henry Adams's challenge to teachers of history to seek a dynamic interpretation still stands, even though his own attempt to formulate it must be discarded. Historian and scientist may well work together—but they will work in a different direction from that pointed out by Adams" Even after historian and scientist succeed in this endeavor, however—if they ever do—Adams' account will continue to be of interest as an interpretation of the past of mankind based upon the suggestions of the science of the day and also upon the pessimistic ronclusions of its author.

A dynamic theory, like most theories, begins by begging the question it defines Progress as the development and economy of Forces Further, it defines force as anything that does, or helps to do work Man is a force, so is the sun, so is a mathematical point, though without dimensions or known existence

Man commonly begs the question again by taking for granted that he captures the forces. A dynamic theory, assigning attractive force to opposing bodies in proportion to the law of mass, takes for granted that to the forces of nature capture man. The sum of force attracts, the feeble atom or molecule called man is attracted, he suffers education or growth, he is the sum of the forces that attract him, his body and his thought are alike their product, the movement of the forces controls the progress of his mind, since he can know nothing but the motions which impinge on his senses, whose sum makes education

For convenience as an image, the theory may liken man to a spider in its web, watching for chance prey 20 Forces of nature dance like flies before the net, and the spider pounces on them when it can, but it makes many fatal mistakes, though its theory of force is sound. The spider-mind acquires a faculty of memory, and, with it, a singular skill of analysis and synthesis taking apart and putting together in different relations the meshes of its trap. Man had in the beginning no power of analysis or synthesis approaching that of the spider, or even of the honey-bee, but he had acute sensibility to the higher forces. Fire taught him secrets that no other 30 animal could learn, running water probably taught him even more, especially in his first lessons of mechanics, the animals helped to educate him, trusting themselves into his hands merely for the sake of their food, and carrying his burdens or supplying his clothing, the grasses and grains were academies of study. With little or no effort on his part, all these forces formed his thought, induced his action, and even shaped his figure.

Long before history began, his education was complete, for the record could not have been started until 40 he had been taught to record. The universe that had formed him took shape in his mind as a reflection of his own unity, containing all forces except himself Either separately, or in groups, or as a whole, those forces never ceased to act on him, enlarging his mind as they enlarged the surface foliage of a vegetable, and the mind needed only to respond, as the forcests did, to these attractions. Susceptibility to the highest forces is the highest genius; selection between them is the highest science; their mass is the highest educator. Man always made, and still makes, grotesque blunders in selecting and measuring forces, taken at random from the heap, but he never made a mistake in the value he set on the whole, which he symbolized as unity and worshipped as God. To this day, his attitude towards it has never changed, though science can no longer give to force a name.

Man's function as a force of nature was to assimilate other forces as he assimilated food. He called it the love of power. He felt his own feebleness, and he sought for an ass or a camel, a bow or a sling, to widen his range of power, as he sought a fetish or a planet in the world beyond. He cared little to know its immediate use, he could afford to throw nothing away which he could conceive to have possible value in this or any other existence. He waited for the object to teach him its use, or want of use, and the process was slow. He may 20 have gone on for hundreds of thousands of years, waiting for Nature to tell him her secrets, and, to his rivals among the monkeys, Nature has taught no more than at their start, but certain lines of force were capable of acting on individual apes, and mechanically selecting types of race or sources of variation. The individual that responded or reacted to lines of new force then was possibly the same individual that reacts on it now, and his conception of the unity seems never to have changed in spite of the increasing diversity of forces, but so the theory of variation is an affair of other science than history, and matters nothing to dynamics. The individual or the race would be educated on the same lines of illusion, which, according to Arthur Balfour, had not essentially varied down to the year 1900.

To the highest attractive energy, man gave the name of divine, and for its control he invented the science called Religion, a word which meant, and still means, cultivation of occult force whether in detail or mass. Unable to define Force as a unity, man symbolized it to and pursued it, both in himself, and in the infinite, as philosophy and theology, the mind is itself the subtlest of all known forces, and its self-introspection necessarily created a science which had the singular value of lifting his education, at the start, to the finest, subtlest, and broadest training both in analysis and synthesis, so that, if language is a test, he must have reached his highest powers early in his history; while the mere motive remained as simple an appetite for power as the tribal greed which led him to trap an elephant. Hunger, whether for food or for the infinite, sets in motion multiplicity and infinity of thought, and the sure hope of gaining a share of infinite power in eternal life would lift most minds to effort.

He had reached this completeness five thousand years ago, and added nothing to his stock of known forces for a very long time. The mass of nature exercised on him so feeble an attraction that one can scarcely account for his apparent motion. Only a historian of very exceptional knowledge would venture to say at what date between 3000 B.C. and 1000 A.D., the momentum of Europe was greatest; but such progress as the world made consisted in economies of energy rather than in its development; it was proved in mathematics, measured by names like Archimedes, Aristarchus, Ptolemy, and Euclid; or in Civil Law, measured by a number of names which Adams had begun life by failing to learn, or in coinage, which was most beautiful near its beginning. and most barbarous at its close; or it was shown in roads, or the size of ships, or harbors; or by the use of metals, instruments, and writing, all of them economies 7 of force, sometimes more forceful than the forces they helped, but the roads were still travelled by the horse, the ass, the camel, or the slave, the ships were still propelled by sails or oars; the lever, the spring, and the screw bounded the region of applied mechanics. Even the metals were old.

Much of the same thing could be said of religious or supernatural forces. Down to the year 300 of the Christian era they were little changed, and in spite of Plato and the sceptics were more apparently chaotic than ever so The experience of three thousand years had educated society to feel the vastness of Nature, and the infinity of her resources of power, but even this increase of attraction had not yet caused economies in its methods of pursuit

There the Western world stood till the year A.D. 305, when the Emperor Diocletian abdicated; and there it was that Adams broke down on the steps of Ara Coeli. his path blocked by the scandalous failure of civilization at the moment it had achieved complete success. In the year 305 the empire had solved the problems of Europe more completely than they have ever been solved since. The Pax Romana, the Civil Law, and Free Trade should, in four hundred years, have put Europe tar in advance of the point reached by modern society in the four hundred years since 1500, when conditions were less simple.

The efforts to explain, or explain away, this scandal had been incessant, but none suited Adams unless it were the economic theory of adverse exchanges and exhaustion of minerals, but nations are not ruined beyond a certain point by adverse exchanges, and Rome had by no means exhausted her resources. On the contrary, the empire developed resources and energies quite astounding No other four hundred years of history before A.D. 1800 knew anything like it, and although z some of these developments, like the Civil Law, the roads, aqueducts, and harbors, were rather economies than force, yet in northwestern Europe alone the empire had developed three energies-France, England, and Germany-competent to master the world The trouble seemed rather to be that the empire developed too much energy, and too fast.

A dynamic law requires that two masses-nature and man-must go on, reacting upon each other, without stop, as the sun and a comet react on each other, and " that any appearance of stoppage is illusive. The theory seems to exact excess, rather than deficiency, of action and reaction to account for the dissolution of the Roman Empire, which should, as a problem of mechanics, have been torn to pieces by acceleration. If the student means to try the experiment of framing a dynamic law, he must assign values to the forces of attraction that caused the trouble, and in this case he has them in plain evidence With the relentless logic that stamped Roman thought, the empire, which had established unity on earth, 40 could not help establishing unity in heaven. It was induced by its dynamic necessities to economize the gods

The Church has never ceased to protest against the charge that Christianity ruined the empire, and, with its usual force, has pointed out that its reforms alone saved the State Any dynamic theory gladly admits it All it asks is to find and follow the force that attracts. The Church points out this force in the Cross, and history needs only to follow it. The empire loudly asserted its motive. Good taste forbids saying that Constantine the Great speculated as audaciously as a modern 50 stock-broker on values of which he knew at the utmost only the volume; or that he merged all uncertain forces into a single trust, which he enormously overcapitalized, and forced on the market, but this is the substance of what Constantine himself said in his Edict of Milan in the year 313, which admitted Christianity into the Trust of State Religions. Regarded as an Act of Congress, it runs "We have resolved to grant to Christians as well as all others the liberty to practise the religion they prefer, in order that whatever exists of divinity or 60 celestial power may help and favor us and all who are under our government." The empire pursued powernot merely spiritual but physical-in the sense in which Constantine issued his army order the year before, at the battle of the Milvian Bridge In boc signo vinces! using the Cross as a train of artillery, which, to his mind, it was Society accepted it in the same character. Eighty years afterwards, Theodosius marched against his rival Eugene with the Cross for physical champion; and Eugene raised the image of Hercules to fight for 70 the pagans, while society on both sides looked on, as though it were a boxing-match, to decide a final test of force between the divine powers. The Church was powerless to raise the ideal. What is now known as religion affected the mind of old society but little. The laity, the people, the million, almost to a man, bet on the gods as they bet on a horse

No doubt the Church did all it could to purify the process, but society was almost wholly pagan in its point of view, and was drawn to the Cross because, in 80 its system of physics, the Cross had absorbed all the old occult or fetish-power. The symbol represented the sum of nature—the Energy of modern science—and society believed it to be as real as X-rays, perhaps it was! The emperors used it like rays in medicine; the dying clung to it as the quintessence of force, to protect them from the forces of evil on their road to the next life.

Throughout these four centuries the empire knew

⁶ Pax Romana, Roman peace • 49 Constantine, See note, p. 813 • 65 Milvian Bridge, ancient bridge over the Tiber, where Maxentius was drowned after his defeat (312 AD) by Constantine . 65 In hoc . . vinces! that religion disturbed economy, for even the cost of heathen incense affected the exchanges; but no one could afford to buy or construct a costly and complicated machine when he could hire an occult force at trifling expense. Fetish-power was cheap and satisfactory, down to a certain point. Turgot and Auguste Comte long ago fixed this stage of economy as a necessary phase of social education, and historians seem now to accept it as the only gain yet made towards scientific history. Great numbers of educated people—perhaps a majority—cling to the method still, and practise it more or less strictly, but, until quite recently, no other was known. The only occult power at man's disposal was fetish Against it, no mechanical force could compete except within narrow limits.

Outside of occult or fetish-power, the Roman world was incredibly poor. It knew but one productive energy resembling a modern machine—the slave. No artificial force of serious value was applied to production or transportation, and when society developed itself so rapidly in political and social lines, it had no other means of keeping its economy on the same level than to extend its slave-system and its fetish-system to the utmost

The result might have been stated in a mathematical formula as early as the time of Archimedes, six hundred years before Rome fell. The economic needs of a violently centralizing society forced the empire to enlarge its slave-system until the slave-system consumed itself and the empire too, leaving society no resource but further enlargement of its religious system in order to compensate for the losses and horrors of the failure. For a vicious circle, its mathematical completeness approached perfection. The dynamic law of attraction and reaction needed only a Newton to fix it in algebraic form.

At last, in 410, Alaric sacked Rome, and the slave-ridden, agricultural, uncommercial Western Empire—the poorer and less Christianized half—went to pieces Society, though terribly shocked by the horrors of Alaric's storm, felt still more deeply the disappointment in its new power, the Cross, which had failed to protect its Church. The outcry against the Cross became so loud among Christians that its literary champion, Bishop Augustine of Hippo—a town between Algiers and Tunis—was led to write a famous treatise in defence of the Cross, familiar still to every scholar, in which he defended feebly the mechanical value of the symbol—arguing only that pagan symbols equally failed—but insisted on its spiritual value in the Civitas Dei which had taken the place of the Civitas Romae in human interest "Granted that we have lost all we had! Have we lost faith? Have we lost piety? Have we lost the wealth of the inner man who is rich before God? These are the wealth of Christians!" The Civitas Dei, in its turn, became the sum of attraction for the Western world, though it also showed the same weakness in mechanics that had wrecked the Civitas Romae. St Augustine and his people perished at Hippo towards 430, leaving society in appearance dull to new attraction.

Yet the attraction remained constant. The delight of experimenting on occult force of every kind is such as to absorb all the free thought of the human race. The gods did their work, history has no quarrel with them they led, educated, enlarged the mind, taught knowl edge, betrayed ignorance, stimulated effort So little is known about the mind-whether social, racial, sexual or heritable; whether material or spiritual; whether animal, regetable or mineral-that history is inclined to avoid it altogether, but nothing forbids one to admit, for con venience, that it may assimilate food like the body. storing up new force and growing, like a forest, with the storage. The brain has not yet revealed its myster rious mechanism of gray matter. Never has Nature offered it so violent a stimulant as when she opened to it the possibility of sharing infinite power in eternal life, and it might well need a thousand years of prolonged and intense experiment to prove the value of the motive During these so-called Middle Ages, the Western mind reacted in many forms, on many sides, expressing its motives in modes, such as Romanesque and Gothic architecture, glass windows and mosaic walls, sculpture and poetry, war and love, which still affect some people as the noblest work of man, so that, even today, great masses of idle and ignorant tourists travel from far countries to look at Ravenna and San Marco, Palermo and Pisa, Assisi, Cordova, Chartres, with vague notions about the force that created them, but with a certain surprise that a social mind of such singular energy and unity should still lurk in their shadows

The tourist more rarely visits Constantinople or studies the architecture of Sancta Sofia, but when he does he is distinctly conscious of forces not quite the same lustinian has not the simplicity of Charlemagne The Rastern Empire showed an activity and variety of forces that classical Europe had never possessed. The navy of Nicephoras Phocas in the tenth century would have innihilated in half an hour any navy that Carthage or Athens or Rome ever set afloat. The dynamic scheme began by asserting rather recklessly that between the Pyramids (B.C. 3000), and the Cross (A.D. 300), no new force affected Western progress, and antiquarians may easily dispute the fact, but in any case the motive influence, old or new, which raised both Pyramids and Cross was the same attraction of power in a future life that raised the dome of Sancta Sofia and the Cathedral at Amiens, however much it was altered enlarged, or removed to distance in space. Therefore, no single event has more puzzled historians than the sudden, unexplained .. appearance of at least two new natural forces of the highest educational value in mechanics, for the first time within record of history. Literally, these two forces seemed to drop from the sky at the precise moment when the Cross on one side and the Crescent on the other, proclaimed the complete triumph of the Civitas Det Had the Manichean doctrine of Good and Evil as rival deities been orthodox, it would alone have accounted for this simultaneous victory of hostile powers

Of the compass, as a step towards demonstration of w the dynamic law, one may confidently say it proved, better than any other force, the widening scope of the mind, since it widened immensely the range of contact between nature and thought The compass educated This must prove itself as needing no proof

Of Greek fire and gunpowder, the same thing cannot certainly be said, for they have the air of accidents due to the attraction of religious motives They belong to the spiritual world, or to the doubtful ground of Magic which lay between Good and Evil They were -0 chemical forces, mostly explosive, which acted and still act as the most violent educators ever known to man, but they were justly feared as diabolic, and whatever insolence man may have risked towards the milder teachers of his infancy, he was an abject pupil towards explosives The Sieur de Joinville left a record of the energy with which the relatively harmless Greek fire educated and enlarged the French mind in a single night in the year 1249, when the crusaders were trying to advance on Cairo The good king St. Louis and all his staff dropped on their knees at every fiery flame that 50 flew by, praying--"God have pity on us!" and never man had more reason to call on his gods than they, for the battle of religion between Christian and Saracen was trifling compared with that of education between gunpowder and the Cross

The fiction that society educated itself, or aimed at a conscious purpose, was upset by the compass and gunpowder which dragged and drove Europe at will through frightful bogs of learning. At first, the apparent lag for want of volume in the new energies lasted one or two 60 centuries, which closed the great epochs of emotion by the Gothic cathedrals and scholastic theology. The moment had Greek beauty and more than Greek unity, but it was brief, and for another century or two, Western society seemed to float in space without apparent motion. Yet the attractive mass of nature's energy continued to attract, and education became more rapid than ever before Society began to resist, but the individual showed greater and greater insistence, without realizing what he was doing. When the Crescent drove 70 the Cross in ignominy from Constantinople in 1453, Gutenberg and Fust were printing their first Bible at Mainz under the impression that they were helping the Cross When Columbus discovered the West Indies in 1492, the Church looked on it as a victory for the Cross When Luther and Calvin upset Europe half a century later, they were trying, like St Augustine, to substitute the Civitas Dei for the Civitas Romae When the Puritans set out for New England in 1620, they too were looking to found a Civitas Dei in State Street, 80 and when Bunyan made his Pilgrimage in 1678, he repeated St Jerome Even when, after centuries of license, the Church reformed its discipline, and, to prove it, burned Giordano Bruno in 1600, besides condemning Galileo in 1630—as science goes on repeating to us every day—it condemned anarchists, not atheists None of the astronomers were irreligious men, all of them made a point of magnifying God through his works a form of science which did their religion no credit 10 Neither Galileo nor Kepler, neither Spinoza nor Descartes, neither Leibnitz nor Newton, any more than Constantine the Great—if so much—doubted Unity. The utmost range of their heresies reached only its personality

This persistence of thought-inertia is the leading idea of modern history Except as reflected in himself, man has no reason for assuming unity in the universe, or an ultimate substance, or a prime-motor. The a priori insistence on this unity ended by fatiguing the more 20 active-or reactive-minds, and Lord Bacon tried to stop it. He urged society to lay aside the idea of evolving the universe from a thought, and to try evolving thought from the universe. The mind should observe and register forces-take them apart and put them together-without assuming unity at all "Nature, to be commanded, must be obeyed. 'The imagination must be given not wings but weights. As Galileo reversed the action of earth and sun, Bacon reversed the relation of thought to force The mind was thenceforth to follow the move-30 ment of matter, and unity must be left to shift for itself

The revolution in attitude seemed voluntary, but in fact was as mechanical as the fall of a feather. Man created nothing. After 1500, the speed of progress so rapidly surpassed man's gait as to alarm every one, as though it were the acceleration of a falling body which the dynamic theory takes it to be Lord Bacon was as much astonished by it as the Church was, and with reason Suddenly society felt itself dragged into situa-40 tions altogether new and anarchic-situations which it could not affect, but which painfully affected it Instinct taught it that the universe in its thought must be in danger when its reflection lost itself in space. The danger was all the greater because men of science covered it with "larger synthesis," and poets called the undevout astronomer mad Society knew better Yet the telescope held it rigidly standing on its head, the microscope revealed a universe that defied the senses, gunpowder killed whole races that lagged behind, the compass coerced the most imbruted mariner to act on the impossible idea that the earth was round, the press drenched Europe with anarchism Europe saw itself. violently resisting, wrenched into false positions, drawn along new lines as a fish that is caught on a hook, but unable to understand by what force it was controlled The resistance was often bloody, sometimes humorous. always constant. Its contortions in the eighteenth century are best studied in the wit of Voltaire, but all history and all philosophy from Montaigne and Pascal to Schopenhauer and Nietzsche deal with nothing else. and still, throughout it all the Baconian law held good. thought did not evolve nature, but nature evolved thought Not one considerable man of science dared face the stream of thought, and the whole number of those who acted, like Franklin, as electric conductors of the new forces from nature to man, down to the year 1800, did not exceed a few score, confined to a few towns in Western Europe. Asia refused to be touched by the stream, and America, except for Franklin, stood

Very slowly the accretion of these new forces, chemical and mechanical, grew in volume until they acquired sufficient mass to take the place of the old religious science, substituting their attraction for the attractions of the Civitas Dei, but the process remained the same. Nature, not mind, did the work that the sun does on the planets. Man depended more and more absolutely on forces other than his own, and on instruments which superseded his senses. Bacon forefold it "Neither the naked hand nor the understanding, left to itself, can effect a much. It is by instruments and helps that work is done. Once done, the mind resumed its illusion, and society forgot its impotence, but no one better than Bacon knew its tricks and for his true followers science always means self-restraint, obedience, sensitiveness to impulse from without. "Non fingendum aut excogitandum sed inveniendum quid Natura faciat aut ferat"

The success of this method staggers belief, and even to-day can be treated by history only as a miracle of growth, like the sports of nature Evidently a new variety of mind had appeared Certain men merely held out their hands—like Newton, watched an apple, like Franklin, flew a kite, like Watt, played with a tea-kettleand great forces of nature stuck to them as though she were playing ball. Governments did almost nothing but resist Even gunpowder and ordnance, the great weapon of government, showed little development between 1400 and 1800. Society was hostile or indifferent, as Priestly and Jenner, and even Fulton, with reason complained in the most advanced societies in the world, while its resistance became acute wherever the Church held control, until all mankind seemed to draw itself out in a long series of groups, dragged on by an attractive power in advance, which even the leaders obeyed without understanding, as the planets obeyed gravity, or the trees obeyed heat and light.

The influx of new force was nearly spontaneous The reaction of mind on the mass of nature seemed not greater than that of a comet on the sun, and had the spontaneous influx of force stopped in Europe, society must have stood still, or gone backward, as in Asia or Africa. Then only economies of process would have counted as new force, and society would have been better pleased; for the idea that new force must be in itself a good is only an animal or vegetable instinct. As Nature developed her hidden energies, they tended to become destructive. Thought itself became tortured, suffering reluctantly, impatiently, painfully, the coercion of new method. Easy thought had always been movement of inertia, and mostly mere sentiment, but even the processes of mathematics measured feebly the needs of force.

The stupendous acceleration after 1800 ended in 1900 with the appearance of the new class of supersensual forces, before which the man of science stood at first as bewildered and helpless, as in the fourth century, a priest of Isis before the Cross of Christ.

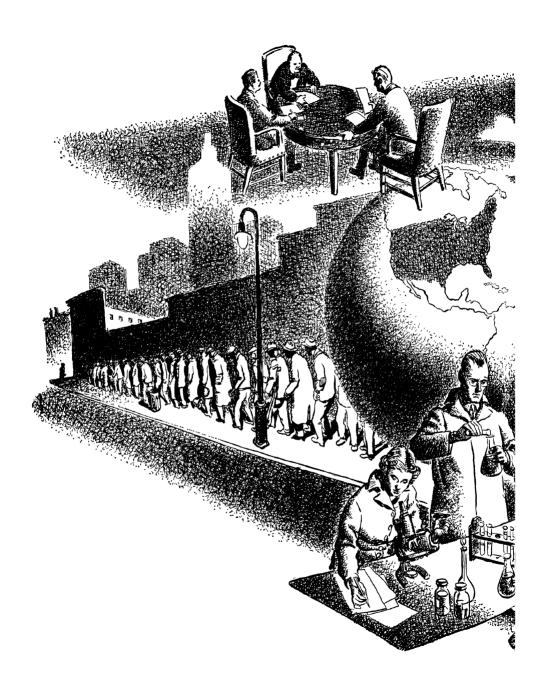

This, then, or something like this, would be a dynamic formula of history. Any schoolboy knows enough to object at once that it is the oldest and most universal of all theories. Church and State, theology and philosophy, have always preached it, differing only in the allotment of energy between nature and man Whether the attractive energy has been called God or Nature, the mechanism has been always the same, and history is not so obliged to decide whether the Ultimate tends to a purpose or not, or whether ultimate energy is one or many. Every one admits that the will is a free force, habitually decided by motives. No one denies that motives exist adequate to decide the will, even though it may not always be conscious of them. Science has proved that torces, sensible and occult, physical and metaphysical, simple and complex, surround, traverse, vibrate, rotate, repel, attract, without stop, that man's senses are conscious of few, and only in a partial degree, but that, from 60 the beginning of organic existence his consciousness has been induced, expanded, trained in the lines of his sensitiveness, and that the rise of his faculties from a lower power to a higher, or from a narrower to a wider field, may be due to the function of assimilating and storing outside force or forces. There is nothing unscientific in the idea that, beyond the lines of force felt by the senses, the universe may be-as it has always been-either a supersensuous chaos or a divine unity, which irresistibly attracts, and is either life or death to 70 penetrate. Thus far, religion, philosophy, and science seem to go hand in hand. The schools begin their vital battle only there. In the earlier stages of progress, the forces to be assimilated were simple and easy to absorb, but, as the mind of man enlarged its range, it enlarged the field of complexity, and must continue to do so, even into chaos, until the reservoirs of sensuous or supersensuous energies are exhausted, or cease to affect him, or until he succumbs to their excess

For past history, this way of grouping its sequences 80 may answer for a chart of relations although any serious student would need to invent another, to compare or correct its errors, but past history is only a value of relation to the future, and this value is wholly one of convenience, which can be tested only by experiment Any law of movement must include, to make it a convenience, some mechanical formula of acceleration

The MODERN PESSIMISM

Thinking of the Civil War, Hawthorne spoke of the tragedy in the lives of the women whose husbands and sweethearts were killed in battle. "The girls that would have loved them," he said, "and made happy firesides for them, will pine and wither, and tread along many sour and discontented years, and at last go out of life without knowing what life is. Every shot that takes effect kills one and worse than kills the other." This aspect of war's aftermath found expression in many literary works during and after the first World War. Two illustrations will suffice: Amy Lowell's "Patterns" (1915) and Eugene O'Neill's Strange Interlude (1928). The poem is a powerful expression of sexual frustration:

For the man who should loose me is dead, Fighting with the Duke of Flanders,
In a pattern called a war.
Christ! What are patterns for?

In the "strangled explosion" of the last line, "half-oath, half-prayer" (as Miss Lowell's biographer aptly describes it) is compressed much of war's misery. Instead of Miss Lowell's rigid control, O'Neill, in a similar situation, shows breakdown. After the death of her fiancé in the war, Nina Leeds went to pieces, giving herself promiscuously to the men in an army hospital. One of the characters in the play attributed her behavior to "a desire to be kind" and "a morbid longing for martyrdom." In both instances the psychological effects of war on women are poignantly portrayed.

Other literary works deal with participants in the war. John Dos Passos' Three Soldiers (1921) is concerned chiefly with the irksomeness of army life to a man of aesthetic temperament. John Andrews, graduate of Harvard, wanted to write great music. When he was arrested tor desertion at the end of the story, the wind scattered about the room the leaves of the musical score on which he had been working. War is hateful to the artist, Dos Passos said, and destructive of his art. In the minds of many men—whether artists or persons of average sensitivity—the war left memories of experiences which they tried in vain to forget. The case of the war veteran, Stetson, in T. S. Eliot's Waste Land (1922) is a classic instance. Stetson's tragic experience is likened to a corpse "planted" in a garden, which will either be dug up by "the Dog" of memory or "sprout" and "bloom" in the subconscious mind.

The tragic effects of World War I are best epitomized perhaps in Ernest Hemingway's The Sun Also Rises (1926) and A Farewell to Arms (1929). In The Sun Also Rises we are shown the "lost generation" of expatriates who, with shattered nerves and illusions, sought amusement and forgetfulness at bullfights in Spain and in the cafés of Paris. The chief character, Jake Barnes, had been made sexually impotent by a physical injury received in the war. His condition is symbolic of the spiritual impotence of the "lost generation." In A Farewell to Arms also the war deprived its victims of high aims and ideals. After the "Retreat from Caporetto" (which has been justly called the finest account in all literature of the collapse of an army) Frederic Henry, the American ambulance driver, could see nothing worth living for except physical satisfactions. In the wreckage of the world about him, thought became a torment and a futile occupation. Hence his famous conclusion: "I was not made to think. I was made to eat. My God, yes. Eat and drink and sleep with Catherine."

A New Criticism of America

We had entered World War I, as Woodrow Wilson (p. 1126) expressed it, "to make the world safe for democracy," and the failure of that high mission produced a cynical reaction in many minds. Possibly the United States was hardly qualified to play such an exalted rôle. It was natural that many writers should turn a critical—sometimes a jaundiced—eye upon the American scene and that they should see much more to condemn than to admire. "Debunking" became a favorite literary approach; after Pearl Harbor it was called "selling America short."

Biographers of the 1920's attempted to show that our national idols had feet of clay. Historians insisted that materialistic rather than idealistic motives had determined the entire course of our history since Jamestown and Plymouth Rock. The most popular magazine of the period among the literate was H. L. Mencken's American Mercury, which exposed in a monthly department called "Americana" a wealth of current stupidities—at once laughable and deplorable—culled from the newspapers of the forty-eight states.

The most effective and the most popular criticism of the American scene of the twenties was written by Sinclair Lewis (p. 892). Main Street (p. 893) satirized the small town of the Middle West, where Lewis found "dullness made God." Babbitt (1922) ridiculed the American businessman so successfully that "Babbitt" and "Babbittry" were added to the dictionary. The hard-hitting satire got under the skins of many Rotarians and boosters. Among the items in Lewis' indictment were questionable business ethics, an undeveloped literary taste, commercial criteria of success, and ultraconservatism in social and political thinking. Babbiti epitomized the unlovely aspects of the Harding era. Arrowsmith (1925) showed an America inimical to scholarship and pure research. Heroically devoted to medical experimentation, Dr. Martin Arrowsmith found many stupid obstacles in his path. Dodsworth (1929) satirized the American woman. Fran Dodsworth was unmercifully exposed as a pampered, selfish, superficial, pretentious snob; she is the most damning portrait in Lewis' entire gallery. Reading between the lines today, one can see that Lewis really enjoyed many of the people whom he ridiculed and relished much in the life which he professed to view with contempt. He appears today as a folksy humorist who would not exchange his Gopher Prairie or his Zenith for Utopia. But readers in the 1920's saw only the devastating satire; they hailed him as the greatest of all debunkers, being unaware that he transcended the narrow boundaries of the debunking age. His greatness may very well lie in the subtle quality which escaped his current readers.

Though Lewis was the chief of the satirists in the 1920's, many other writers presented indictments of America. Theodore Dreiser's An American Tragedy (1925) showed a society vitiated by perverted notions of the good life. Though the reader might wonder if Clyde Griffiths would have amounted to much under ideal conditions, the mores of his materialistic and class-conscious world were bad enough to corrupt a stronger character. Carl Sandburg (p. 960) exposed the increasing evils of capitalism: "people living in shanties," "$6 a week department store girls," "steel trust wops, dead without having lived, gray and shrunken at forty years of age." Allied with Big Business, the Church, Sandburg charged, travestied the teachings of Jesus. Following Sandburg's lead, other writers directed attention to conditions among the workers, and the word "proletariat" came for the first time into general American use. O'Neill's Hairy Ape (p. 998) presented the worker's growing dissociation from his work, his growing feeling of not "belonging." Carlyle had pointed out nearly a hundred years earlier the inadequacy, from the human standpoint, of the "cash-payment nexus": a feeling of loyalty, of belonging, is necessary to a man's satisfaction in his work. It is still perhaps the central problem of modern industrialism. While O'Neill expressed the problem in stirring modern terms, he offered nothing constructive: the conclusion of The Hairy Ape is futile and defeatist. In another remarkable play of the twenties (The Adding Machine, 1923) Elmer Rice argued that the modern machine had a degrading effect upon the worker, that machine-tending is the lowest of all serfdoms in human history, and that man deteriorates as the machine improves. It seemed bitterly ironical to the author that "the finest triumph of the evolutionary process" should be a machine-tender, "operating a super-hyper-adding machine with the great toe of his right foot." A distinguished anthropologist expressed a similar view of the problem when he said: "There is real danger that the engineers will make apes of all of us. By the invention of tools, engineers brought man up from the level of an ape, but the human curve starts downward when tools can be used without cerebral exertion, when the individual is allowed not only to stop sweating but also to stop thinking."

Despite these and other searching criticisms, the America of the 1920's was relatively complacent. For the three consecutive administrations of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, conservatism was in the saddle. We enjoyed a better-than-average prosperity. Yale undergraduates (see Lewis' Dodsworth) aspired to become Wall Street brokers and owners of yachts. A few economists foresaw the crash of 1929, but their warnings were lost in the general optimism. Irving Fisher and President Hoover assured us to the bitter end that the economic structure of the country was "fundamentally sound." After the crash came the Great Depression

During the years of the Great Depression, criticism of America in literature became more serious, more bitter, and more brutal. Whether the accounts presented were of contemporary life or of life in an earlier period, many writers joined in a strident, damning chorus. With lurid, Gothic power, William Faulkner's novels (p. 1019) told of violence and moral perversion in "Jefferson," Mississippi. In the words of his best interpreter, Faulkner "projected in fiction the conflict between his inherent traditional values and the modern world." With equal brutality, but in more natural and more human situations, James T. Farrell's Studs Longan (1932-1935) showed the collapse of the middle-class morality in southside Chicago. The traditional character-building institutions—the home, the school, and the church—were powerless to prevent the moral ruin of Studs. Again starkly, but with human warmth, John Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath (p. 1064)—perhaps the best single expression in our literature of the difficulties peculiar to the Depression—told of the Joads of Oklahoma, who were tractored off the land, of their Westward migration in a jalopy, and of their sufferings in California, where the family of seven workers, including women and children, were able to earn the sum total of $3.50 a day. The book gives an impression of a powerful mass movement: the Okies are less arresting as individuals than as representatives of the mass. The proletarian novel "arrived" in The Grapes of Wrath.

The Dominance of Science and Quasi-Science

Not only the wreckage of war and the mounting criticism of American economic and social life, but science also contributed to the dominant mood of pessimism between the wars. Perhaps it would be more correct to say "popular science," for the reference is not to science as such, but to its embodiment in literature, where it is easily susceptible of misconstruction and falsification. In any case, the scientist is hardly to blame. It is regrettable that some of his discoveries had unfortunate results.

The new physics gave the impression to the lay mind that the universe is somehow doomed. Historians and interpreters of science had much to say in the twenties and thirties about the second law of thermodynamics or the law of entropy, which seemed to mean that energy is deteriorating or becoming less available, that the universe is cooling off and running down, and that the earth will someday be unfit for human habitation. The ultimate destination of man on this planet appeared to be the "heat-death." This view of things colored the thinking of many moderns, writers and readers alike; it found its most forceful literary expression in the poetry of Robinson Jeffers (p. 950), who wrote in "To the Stone-Cutters":

... man will be blotted out, the blithe earth die, the brave sun Die blind, his heart blackening.

It was better so, the poet reasoned, for he saw in man's deepest nature a subconscious desire to return to the prenatal darkness and silence of the womb. In "Night" he declared,

The sun-lovers have a blond favorite,

A father of lights and noises, wars, weeping, and laughter,

Hot labor, lust and delight and the other blemishes. Quietness

Flows from her deeper fountain; and he [the sun] will die; and she

[the night] is immortal.

Inspired by the new physics, Jeffers regarded life as a "blemish," and extinction as the greatest good.

Freudian psychology left its mark everywhere in the literature between the wars. Possibly the first fictional work in America to exemplify the conscious and deliberate use of Freudian principles was Sherwood Anderson's Winesburg, Obio (1919), where almost everyone is abnormal and the abnormalities are explained in terms of sexual repression O'Neill's Strange Interlude (1928) and Mourning Becomes Electra (1931) appear to have been constructed from Freudian blueprints. Faulkner's novels seemed designed, from a psychological point of view, to illustrate all of the sexual perversions described by Krafft-Ebing, the German neurologist, in Psychopathia Sexualis. The new psychological principles were employed also in biography and literary history. Psychoanalyzing Poe (Edgar Allan Poe, 1926). Joseph Wood Krutch discovered that Poe's sexual impotence accounted for much that is distinctive in his poems and tales. Applying Freud to American literary history (Expression in America, 1932), Ludwig Lewisohn was able to reveal an amazing number and variety of psychological maladies among men of letters: Hawthorne's sense of guilt, for example, was 'precipitated by the incest wish of infancy." By the middle thirties many sophisticated moderns, through a kind of "scientific" mania for sex-analysis and sex-experimentation, had succeeded in making themselves almost as morbid on the subject as the prudish, hypocritical Victorians, whom they regarded with unmitigated horror (note Lewisohn's remarks on Howells in Expression in America). It appeared about time to call a halt when no one could quite escape the glint of a psychiatric eye, when all behavior, however natural, was psychiatrically suspect.

Closely associated in the popular mind with Freudian psychology was the biology of glandular secretions, which, to many, seemed a new source of tyranny. Oversexed persons, like Lady Brett in Hemingway's The Sun Also Rises, could blame the endocrine or some other glands for their immoral behavior. Stupid, brutal persons, like Lennie in Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men (1937), could point to hypothyroidism as the sign of their fate. Little by little, the modern sciences, which had begun as a great liberating force, seemed to be imprisoning man as tightly as he had ever been imprisoned by the pseudo-sciences of the Middle Ages.

The new sciences of economics and sociology tended to overplay their legitimate rôles. Charles A. Beard (The Economic Interpretation of the Constitution, 1913) and his successors exaggerated the importance of economic factors in American history. V. L. Parrington (Main Currents in American Thought, 1927-1930) and his disciples likewise exaggerated the importance of economic elements in American literature. It is not surprising that in much of the fiction of the period economic pressure appeared decisive or that before the end of the period man's life appeared to consist, contrary to Holy Writ, in the amount of commodities which he possessed. Meanwhile social pressures vied strenuously with the economic ones for the honor of being the chief determinant in human destiny. William Graham Sumner had declared that folkways were decisive, and his successors elaborated and illustrated the proposition. Clyde Griffiths in Dreiser's An American Tragedy and Studs Lonigan in Farrell's trilogy demonstrated brilliantly enough the apparent impossibility of escape from the mores.

The Helplessness of the Individual

Many signs, in short, seemed to point to the growing helplessness of the individual. There appeared no longer to be any such thing as an autonomous and morally responsible person. In actual life, of course, there continued to be many such persons, but the species well-nigh disappeared from books written in the spirit of the age. This spirit found its best philosophical statement in Joseph Wood Krutch's The Modern Temper (1929). Modern civilization, to Krutch, was decadent, for thought itself is a mark of decadence. The future belongs, as always, to the barbarians, "absorbed in the processes of life for their own sake, eating without asking if it is worth while to eat, begetting children without asking why they should beget them, and conquering without asking for what purpose they conquer."

The poets brilliantly expressed the mood of failure and despair. Robinson's "man against the sky" was by no means sure that he was not pursuing a blind atomic pilgrimage

Whereon by crass chance billeted we go. . . .

Eliot gave the classic picture of futility in Prufrock (p. 976):

"I have measured out my life with coffee spoons. . . ."

The Hamlet of A. MacLeish (1928) echoed, with modern mutations and overtones, the despair of Shakespeare's Hamlet:

Thou wouldst not think

How ill all's here about my heart!

These three poems may be taken as sufficiently characteristic of the period. The Hamlet mood was congenial to all of them, but they exemplified Hamlet's confusion and indecision rather than his capacity for heroic action. Submerged in endless debate, the man against the sky or Prufrock or MacLeish's Hamlet could never have killed the king.

While Krutch and the intellectual poets were displaying the helplessness of the thinking man, entangled in the toils of thought, the novelists were discovering another kind of helplessness in the masses of men—a helplessness obviously not explicable by intellectualism, but by biological and social determinism. Several novels already mentioned—An American Tragedy, Studs Lonigan, The Grapes of Wrath—abundantly illustrate the tyranny of social and economic pressure and the impotence of the individual in the face of overwhelming circumstance. But the most complete illustration in American fiction of the modern determinism is Dos Passos' U. S. A. (1930-1936), which is at once—in the apt description of Alfred Kazin—"the dominant social novel of the thirties" and "the coldest and most mechanical of tragic novels". It is indeed our largest and most comprehensive fictional gallery of human automatons. The reader finds it difficult, if not impossible, to take an interest in its people as persons: it has been justly said that Dos Passos did not create character. The twenty-odd people in U. S. A (p. 1044) exhibit the mechanical behavior, the unawareness, the moral irresponsibility, of robots, as they are pushed about over the continents by irrational force. A contradiction in the novel, of which the author may not have been aware, affords the only ground for hope: unlike the fictional characters, the subjects of the "biographies," which were taken from contemporary history, are by no means helpless. The discrepancy suggests how far the pattern of the social novel in the middle thirties had deviated from life.

COUNTER ATTITUDES

American literature between the wars was thus predominantly pessimistic. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that all American literature in this period was negative and despairing. The old positive forces were not dead; they were rooted too deep in man's nature to die. It goes without saying that certain names appearing among those supporting the prevalent pessimism will reappear among those expressing more positive views, for few writers were entirely negative or completely pessimistic.

First among the positive forces was what Browning called "our manhood's prime vigor". "How good is man's life, the mere living!" exclaimed that now unfashionable Victorian poet. However outmoded his message, one would not expect to find an entire generation of American writers silent on this theme. In fact, it appears frequently in the literature of the period between the wars. The most notable examples of élan vital are found in the writings of those incorrigible romanticists, Ernest Hemingway (p. 987) and Thomas Wolfe (p. 1085). Whatever the state of the world at large might be, these writers were still able to enjoy living. No author has ever shown a greater avidity for life than Wolfe. In this respect he stands at the opposite pole from Jeffers. No author has ever celebrated friendship and love with greater ardor and tenderness than Hemingway. At the end of For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940), Robert Jordan "told himself," "You had a lot of luck to have had such a good life."

Other instrictive forces which would not down, no matter how mechanical or scientific the age, were the love of the earth, the love of humanity, the love of country—they appeared separately and combined in a variety of patterns. The good earth was never better than in the poems of Robert Frost (p. 931), and was never exhibited with greater tang or economic urgency than in the essays of the Southern Agrarians (I'll Take My Stand, 1930), who brilliantly argued for the way of life of Thomas Jefferson and John Taylor of Caroline. Love of humanity still manifested itself, ranging from individuals to the mass, from personal kindness to faith in the common man. Sandburg was devoted to "the people" with an ardor as warm as Whitman's and more militant. People were "beautiful" to William Saroyan. Steinbeck's characters had a friendly warmth: human kindness could hardly go further than in the concluding scene of The Grapes of Wrath. Love of country still flourished, ranging between a lively sense of the past and its historic glories and a passionate, instinctive attachment to the place of one's birth. Stephen Vincent Benét was inspired by the history of the Civil War to write our best historical narrative in verse in John Brown's Body (1928). Wolfe's devotion to America was more instinctive. To him, it was the "fabulous country—the place where miracles not only happen, but where they happen all the time" (Of Time and the River, 1935). Like Whitman, he tried to take in all of America equally, though neither quite succeeded; for just as Whitman's affection was intensely localized in Manhattan and the Brooklyn Ferry, so Wolfe's was rooted deepest in "old Catawba, there in the hills of home."

The positive forces thus far considered were largely instinctive, but there were also positive intellectual and moral forces at work in the literature of the twenties and thirties. In the midst of a world which appeared given over to naturalism and lawlessness, the "neohumanists"-More, Babbitt, and Foerster-argued for the necessity of discipline, of standards of excellence, and of traditional values. Control must come from within, they reasoned; the "inner check" is the only saving virtue, and the most available sources of that virtue are the classic disciplines (Humanism and America, 1930, by Foerster and others). Less "humanistic" but more human and genuinely fortifying was the note sounded with charm and firmness by two of the finest novelists of the period-Ellen Glasgow and Willa Cather. While most of the male novelists were advertising failure, it was natural that Miss Glasgow and Miss Cather should carry banners inscribed with the legend "Success," for women have often been more courageous than men. In Barren Ground (1925), Miss Glasgow reversed two stock pictures of failure: failure on the farm and failure through disappointment in love. It had been generally supposed since Garland's Main-Travelled Roads (1891) that success of any sort on an American farm was no longer possible, but Dorinda Oakley actually reclaimed the barren ground, thereby fulfilling Lanier's prophecy in "Corn" fifty years earlier. It had been generally supposed, too-especially in the South-that a girl could scarcely survive disappointment in love, but Dorinda survived. "Dorinda exists," Miss Glasgow declared, "wherever the spirit of fortitude has triumphed over the sense of futility." Miss Cather also liked to show the triumph of fortitude. My Ántonia (1918) portrayed a pioneer immigrant woman, passionately devoted to her family and to her life on the Nebraska prairie, triumphant over difficulties which would have defeated a less robust soul. It is a beautiful and heart-warming picture. Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927) is likewise a story of heroism—the heroism of two Catholic missionaries in the Spanish Southwest. They made a great team: Latour curbing Vaillant's rashness, Vaillant stimulating and inspiring Latour. The building of the cathedral in Santa Fé was a splendid culmination of their efforts. Even in the pessimistic gloom of the years between the wars, Miss Cather and Miss Glasgow—brave women—were able to say: Success is the reward of the stronghearted. This is the meaning of America, and of life.

One other force on the positive side must be mentioned, religious faith. In the literature of no other period in our history had the note of religious faith been so nearly absent. Its rare occurrence seemed anachronistic to many readers, though later generations may judge otherwise of—to mention two commanding examples—Death Comes for the Archbishop and Ash-Wednesday (p. 981). "Where there is great love," Father Latour said, "there are always miracles. The miracles of the Church seem to me to rest not so much upon faces or voices or healing power coming suddenly near to us from afar off, but upon our perceptions being made finer, so that for a moment our eyes can see and our ears can hear what there is about us always." If Miss Cather's case for religion was chiefly emotional and aesthetic, T. S. Eliot's was chiefly intellectual. After the futility of "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (1917) and the despair of The Waste Land (1922)—the most powerful single statement of the aridity of the world between the wars and the most influential poem of the century—Eliot moved firmly on to the religious position of Ash-Wednesday (1930). The poem does not record an easy victory. There is no disposition to nurse the illusion that the modern man can recover the spontaneous, unquestioning faith of an earlier age: the poet does not "hope to know again the infirm glory of the positive hour." The road to belief is a tortuous one, and is symbolized in the poem by a staircase which one climbs with difficulty, and down which one can see the "twisted shapes" left below. Final attainment is possible only through realizing the necessity of surrendering the individual will to the divine will. Ash-Wednesday concludes with Dante's words, "Our peace in His will," which are themselves a rephrasing of the words of Jesus, "Not my will but thine be done."

The usual contemporary comment on the religious attitudes of Miss Cather and Eliot was that they were impossible because they were essentially medieval attitudes inapplicable to modern times. The objection loses its weight if the values of religion are timeless.

The POLITICAL STRUGGLE

The years between 1914 and 1946 seem today to fall into a series of periods each of which profoundly affected the lives of all Americans. World War I, reluctantly entered by the United States in 1917; the period of peacemaking, which ended with general disillusionment about the value of war, the boom-time era, which, after several portents had been unnoted, ended with the stock-market crash of 1929; the period of depression, followed by slow recovery; then the period during which the world drifted toward another great war; and finally World War II and its aftermath.

Each of these eras was marked by political disputes, some of them unusually bitter. Looking back, we may see that the domestic conflict centered upon the rôle of the state versus the rôle of the individual, while the conflict concerning our foreign relations set isolationism against participation in world affairs.

The domestic policies of the Democrats under Woodrow Wilson (p. 1120) were thus summarized by the party in 1916: "We found our country hampered by special privilege, a vicious tariff, obsolete banking laws and an inelastic currency. . . Under our administration, under a leadership that has never faltered, these abuses have been corrected and our people freed therefrom." Such was the work of Wilson's "New Freedom," as seen by his followers. The Republican Presidents who came into office after the war, by contrast, tended to give business a freer hand and to increase tariffs. Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover (p. 1135) tended to emphasize free enterprise and minimize governmental activity. Hoover wrote in 1922. "Salvation will not come to us out of the wreckage of individualism. What we need today is steady devotion to a better, brighter, broader individualism—an individualism that carries increasing responsibility and service to our fellows." Those who took an opposing point of view, championed by Franklin D. Roosevelt (p. 1148), came into power after Hoover's policies failed to end the depression which had begun in 1929. Their position was that the federal government had to assume a greater responsibility in curbing a ruthless economic individualism and in assisting its victims. The "New Deal," as a result, comprised many measures which limited the scope of free enterprise. On into the 1940's the battle of free enterprise versus a modified form of collectivism continued.

The attitude of the general public moved more in harmony in the discussion of international affairs. At the end of World War I, the public was in favor of the League of Nations and the participation of the United States in world affairs. After the disillusionment of the peace, however, the country tended toward pacifism and isolationism. As Fascism and Nazism developed in the 1930's, and as the inevitability of war became increasingly apparent, a growing group became convinced that the United States would eventually become involved, though there was a widespread hope that the evil day might be indefinitely postponed.

PEARL HARBOR and "The SHAPE of BOOKS to COME"

Pearl Harbor was a rude awakening. With war thrust upon us, many felt that we were "spiritually unprepared" for the conflict. Although the positive forces enumerated were by no means negligible, by and large they had been overwhelmed for more than twenty years by the negative forces of pessimism. If life was a futile thing, why fight? If America was a sorry spectacle, why fight? A generation of readers had gone to school to the pessimists. Some of the more articulate war patriots felt that we had been betrayed by our writers, that they had committed a kind of spiritual sabotage and were guilty of a profound and insidious treason. Articles appeared in the press sharply censuring all writers who had belittled the human spirit or deprecated the American way of life. But it is doubtful if this censure was just: perhaps the authors were the voice of the age rather than its creator.

Some of the older authors—like Steinbeck—went to the front to report the everyday life of the soldiers. A few seemed to experience a spiritual conversion. The author of The Hamlet of A. MacLeish, for example, spoke out boldly against "The Irresponsibles" (A Time to Speak). As Allen Tate (p. 985) ironically put it, referring to the earlier influence of The Waste Land:

Spirits grown Eliotic Now patriotic

Are.

But most of the writers who had flourished between the wars were stunned into silence. Literature passed largely into the hands of the statesmen, the war correspondents, and the news analysts.

Meanwhile, there has been much speculation concerning "the shape of books to come." Naturalism in fiction seems to have reached its ne plus ultra. The cult of the esoteric in poetry and literary criticism appears to have stultified itself. Though we shall continue to respect science for its contributions to physical well-being, we can no longer worship it as the infallible savior of mankind. The modern pessimism is at last seen to be suicidal. Some sort of radical change in our thought and literature appears to be indicated.

It is therefore conjectured by some that literature will now be more rational and balanced, healthier and more genuinely human. These qualities will inform postwar literature only if they inform the postwar world. The tone of literature will depend less upon the writers than upon the spiritual atmosphere in which they find themselves.

R.S.

II Literary Trends

If names meant anything, the literary movement which began about 1914 was, at first, a "little" movement. In cities and towns all over the nation and, after World War I, in Paris and London, "little groups" devoted themselves to the modest project of revolutionizing literature. They produced plays in "little theaters" and published poems and stories in "little magazines". The oft-repeated word "little" proclaimed hostility to "big" theatrical producers and "big" national magazines and publishing houses which catered to masses of people

The word also implied rebellion against the alleged conservatism and shallowness of writers for large audiences. Such writers, the rebels contended, prolonged the thoughtless optimism, the prudishness, the simple and unlifelike depictions, of "The Victorians." Like literary rebels who had started movements in previous ages, modern writers looked to other times and other lands for models which met their peculiar needs. Dramatists turned for inspiration to the experimental playwrights of Europe. Poets turned to radical American poets of the past (such as Emily Dickinson, Walt Whitman, and Stephen Crane) and to the poets of France and Great Britain. Novelists looked back to American realists and naturalists or looked abroad for contemporary models. Adapting the methods of a host of un-Victorian authors, American writers between World Wars I and II produced highly experimental works which they believed represented life more truly than older writings had.

And though the movement, at the start, was "little," in the end it tended to dominate our national literature. Group theaters developed leading playwrights; and several poets and fiction writers who had started as contributors to Poetry, The Little Review, transition, Story, or other little magazines eventually won national or even international recognition. Other authors of importance who came late in the period clearly showed the influence of the "little group" pioneers. In the end, drama, poetry, and fiction, the outstanding literary forms of the period, were greatly changed as a result of the movement.

EXPERIMENTS in DRAMA

After 1910, many intelligent Americans felt that the commercial theater in this country was unsatisfactory because, having capitulated to the movies, it no longer provided "road shows" carrying drama to remote parts of the country, and because it was too much concerned with box-office success to give art much of a chance. Many young Americans traveling abroad between 1900 and 1916 found European theaters very stimulating. The Théâtre-Libre of Paris, which had been founded in 1887, the Abbey Theater of Dublin (1894), the Moscow Art Theater (1897), the Kleines Theater of Berlin (1902) all were carrying on interesting experiments in the drama which seemed to point the way to healthy changes.

Returning home, these travelers preached their new gospel and won converts. During the first two decades of the twentieth century, numerous community playhouses or workshops—little theaters—were established all over the country, from Boston, where the Toy Theater produced plays, to Palo Alto, California, where the Stanford University Theater was active. A number of colleges, simultaneously, offered work in playwrighting and production under such teachers as George Pierce Baker of Harvard, Thomas Wood Stevens of Carnegie Institute of Technology, A. M. Drummond of Cornell, E. C. Mabie of Iowa, and Frederick Henry Koch of North Carolina. In little theaters and campus workshops, amateur authors, actors, and producers carried on experiments more radical than any which commercial theatrical folk were likely to attempt.

In time, this movement had impacts upon the commercial theater. It cultivated audiences receptive to novelty in dramatic writing and staging. It supplied producers, actors, and playwrights who had learned their trade in community playhouses and college classrooms. And in three important instances, little theater groups became leading commercial producers. The Washington Square Players, founded in Greenwich Village in 1915, became the Theatre Guild in 1918, the Provincetown Players, also founded in 1915, left their fishing smack playhouse on Cape Cod to go to New York City and to become active in production there; and the Group Theatre, founded by some insurgent Theatre Guild members, became professionally active in 1931. These organizations, which were successful both commercially and artistically, were responsible for initial productions of plays by outstanding authors such as Edna St. Vincent Millay, Paul Green, Eugene O'Neill, and Clifford Odets.

Imagination and Realism

Authors writing for the new theater not only tried to avoid the clichés of plot, characterization, dialogue, acting, and staging which had caused the older theater to become dull, in addition, they experimented in a very imaginative fashion with modes and methods. Even when they were highly successful with one type of play, a number of authors gladly tried their hands at completely different types.

Two men trained by Professor Baker of Harvard, for instance, alternated between writing highly successful social comedies in the tradition of Royall Tyler's The Contrast and Langdon Mitchell's The New York Idea (p. 681) and the writing of fantasies: Philip Barry won success with his sparkling You and I (1923), then wrote a poetic play about street cleaners—White Wings (1927); and S. N. Behrman, after making a hit with The Second Man (1927), offered a comic version of a classic legend in Amphitryon 38 (1937). Later, both wrote additional social comedies. Marc Connelly, who began his career as a collaborator with George S. Kaufman in writing satirical comedies such as To the Ladies (1922), turned, with Kaufman, to the writing of the expressionistic play, Beggar on Horseback (1924), and later wrote, solo, the prize-winning folk Biblical play, The Green Pastures (1930), based upon Roark Bradford's Negro Sunday School stories. Elmer Rice, trained by the Morningside Players, a little theater group, succeeded equally well in writing his expressionistic Adding Machine (1923) and his realistic Street Scene (1929). Maxwell Anderson, a graduate of Stanford, collaborated with Laurence Stallings in the realistic war play What Price Glory: (1924), and later authored verse dramas such as Elizabeth the Queen (1930) and Winterset (1935); the prose satire, Both Your Houses; and a musical comedy satire. Kinckerbocker Holiday (1938). Paul Green, trained in the playwrighting courses of the University of North Carolina, became widely known for his realistic Negro play, In Abraham's Bosom (1927) but followed it with Roll, Sweet Chariot (1934), "a symphonic play of the Negro people," then with Johnny Johnson (1937), a musical comedy fantasy

Clearly, the writers and the public of this period saw values in both realistic modes of writing and the more imaginative modes. Such hospitality led to one development, evident in some dramas, which was more or less peculiar to the period—the mingling of the realistic with the romantic or the fanciful. The "folk plays" of Paul Green, staged by little theater groups and by experimental New York producers, are an example, since they show life close to the soil but employ songs and poetic dialogue.

Expressionism and "The Hairy Ape"

An extreme of this sort of mingling is found in various expressionistic plays popular during the period—Beggar on Horseback, for instance. This play starts with a scene in the apartment of the hero, Neil, a penniless composer. The settings are realistic. The characters are introduced as true-to-life figures—the workingwoman with whom the hero is in love, the rich Gladys Cady, whom he is tempted to marry, and Gladys' money-grubbing family. Then the hero takes a sedative and has a dream forecasting the life he is to have if he marries the rich girl. The dream, thereafter, is presented objectively on the stage, with the distortion, the stylization, the symbolism of some dreams, set forth in dialogue which often has the repetitious quality, the rhythmic cadences, and the vocabulary of poetry. The costumes and settings are not realistic but are like those in dreams. A few lines of the stage directions at the time the dream starts suggest the technique

When the dream has concluded, the scene again becomes the composer's apartment, and the action returns to the realm of the everyday world

Similar experiments mark this whole period. In addition, the drama, rather more than in previous periods, spoke out in behalf of political, social, and economic beliefs, many of them decidedly leftist in tendency. In the 1920's, Beggar on Horseback satirized wealth and big business. Later, as the populace in general tended leftward, authors such as Lillian Hellman and Clifford Odets wrote plays supporting labor or attacking Fascistic tendencies. The Group Theatre, quite active in this movement, attracted attention when, in 1935, it produced Odets' with animal for Lefty. This depiction of a strike of taxical drivers used a number of the devices of little theater productions—the presentation of action in the auditorium as well as on the stage, the unfolding of the story in episodic blackouts, and the employment of rhetorical language. And its purpose was to vivify the difficulties of laborers and to plead their cause.

Eugene O'Neill, who was, by general agreement, the outstanding diamatist of the interwar period, represents several of the main tendencies of the time. He studied playwrighting in Professor Baker's class at Harvard, and he had his first plays produced by the Provincetown Players and his later plays produced by the Theatre Guild. A highly experimental author, he shifted from realistic writing in plays such as Beyond the Horizon (1920) and Anna Christie (1921) to expressionistic writing in plays such as The Emperor Jones (1920) and The Harry Ape (1922), then to naturalistic dramas, and then to still other types (see p. 997).

The Harry Ape is an expressionistic drama which forcefully voices the discontentment of the proletariat. Some of the scenery and much of the dialogue and action are realistic. In some scenes, however, the masked characters, the marionette like processions, the monologues, and the choric effects lift the action into the realin of fantasy. The primitive Yank, despite his tough vocabulary, has an articulateness which is more in character for O'Neill than for the battered stoker. The rhythms of much of the dialogue are much more poetic than those of ordinary speech. Reading this play one easily sees why O'Neill, as he once wrote Professor Quinn, "sets most store by himself as a bit of a poet, who has labored with the spoken word to evolve original rhythms of beauty where beauty apparently isn't—Jones, Ape. God's Chillun. Desire, etc—and to see the transfiguring nobility of tragedy, in as near the Greek sense as one can grasp it, in seemingly the most ignoble, debased lives." The formula is one which applies to many dramatists of the period. O'Neill stands out from the rest, not because he has attempted something entirely unique, but because he brings to his task a unique talent.

The POETIC RENAISSANCE

Although various dates have been mentioned as marking the beginning of the poetic renaissance, the date most widely accepted is 1912, the year of the founding of Poetry: A Magazine of Verse by Harriet Monroe (1860-1936) and a group of subscribers. The motive of this publication, as the first issue stated it, was "to give to poetry her own place, her own voice." "The popular magazines," explained the editors, "can afford her but scant courtesy—a Cinderella corner in the ashes—because they seek a large public which is not hers, a public which buys them not for their verse but for their stories, pictures, journalism, rarely for their literature even in prose. . . . We believe that there is a public for poetry, that it will grow, and that as it becomes more numerous and more appreciative the work produced in this art will grow in power, in beauty, in significance."

The magazine, from its founding down to the present, has admirably fulfilled its function, and in time its prophecy was justified. Poetry introduced many new poets to the public. The books of some poets, notably Masters' Spoon River Anthology (1915), which was extraordinarily popular for poetry, attracted additional readers. Poets who lectured—Frost, Sandburg, and Lindsay in particular—won a wider audience. Then there were various little magazines which, following the lead of Poetry, devoted much space to poems and to critical discussion: Contemporary Verse (1916-1929), The Double Dealer (1921-1926), Fugitive (1923-1925), Palms (1923-1940), and others. Books on the new poetry by persuasive critics (Amy Lowell, Louis Untermeyer, John Crowe Ransom, Cleanth Brooks, and Allen Tate, to name but a few) helped cultivate understanding and appreciation. The result was the creation of a sizable cultured public which bought contemporary poetry and read it with enthusiasm

Critics of modern poetry, many of whom urged the detailed analysis of poems (illustrated by Tate's "Narcissus as Narcissus," p. 1113), found that a common attitude among the new poets was one of rebellion against Victorian poetry. Sometimes, as in the works of E. A. Robinson (p. 926), this rebellion was visible chiefly in what the poet said—the voicing of un-Victorian philosophical attitudes. More often, however, the poets rebelled not only against conventional beliefs but also against conventional poetic techniques—a rebellion indicated by how the poet expressed himself.

In poetry, as in the drama, there were innumerable experiments. As Frost observed humorously, "Poetry . . . was tried without punctuation. It was tried without capital letters. It was tried without any image but those to the eye. . . . It was tried without content under the name of poesie pure. It was tried without phrase, epigram, coherence, logic, and consistency. It was tried without ability. . . . It was tried without feeling or sentiment. . . ." The sources of these experimental techniques were also numerous—the English metaphysical poets of the seventeenth century, the symbolists of France, the "radical" American poets of the nineteenth century, and others. A complete consideration of the period, therefore, would deal with innovations and influences by the score. Our more limited consideration will deal with three of the chief rebellions against older techniques (1) against the older ideas about the 'seriousness' proper to poetry, (2) against conventional versification, and (3) against conventional "poetic" diction

"Serious Humor"

During the last decades of the nineteenth century and the early years of the twentieth century, poets in general lagged behind radical realistic and naturalistic fiction writers in adapting their methods to changing views of life in the United States. The more advanced novelists, dissatisfied with what they had thought were romantic simplifications, had turned to realism and naturalism partly because they believed that these modes made possible more inclusive—and truer—representations of life. But most poets had continued to write romantic poetry. Love or hate or sorrow had continued to be an "all out" business with them, completely disconnected from workaday concerns such as digging ditches, say, or sipping coffee, or selecting neckties. The attitude of the best poetry, in literal accordance with the urgings of Matthew Arnold and other leading critics, was one of "high seriousness." Poets had values about which they cherished no doubts, and though their poems sometimes showed vacillations, they moved forward steadily to firm conclusions.

There had been some exceptions: Whitman (p. 148) had fused "fleshly" and "spiritual" viewpoints; Emily Dickinson (p. 746) had been simultaneously playful and serious while writing of love, religion, or even death; William Vaughn Moody had assumed the comic rôle of "a little man in trousers, slightly jagged," to discuss the serious problem of evolution (p. 763); Stephen Crane (p. 756) had told with irony of the indifference of the universe to man's suffering. These poets, it now developed, foreshadowed the conception of "seriousness" combined with humor which was to shape interwar poetry. Cleanth Brooks, in Modern Poetry and the Tradition, interestingly contrasts the new conception with the older one.

The two conceptions are almost diametrically opposed. Arnold's sincerity expresses itself as a vigilance which keeps out of the poem all those extraneous and distracting elements which might seem to contradict what the poet wishes to communicate to his audience. It is the sincerity of the conscientious expositor who makes his point, even at the expense of suppressions and exclusions. . . . The second conception of poetry, on the other hand, reveals itself as an unwillingness to ignore the complexity of experience. The poet attempts to fuse the conflicting elements in a harmonious whole.

Modern poets, in other words, feeling that life is more complicated than most romantic poets have admitted, reveal its conflicting aspects, its colliding values. Inevitably, therefore, their poems—excepting those of Jeffers and others who view life as completely tragic—deal with incongruities; and humor, wit, or irony of varied shades become important even in very serious poems. The poet is not necessarily vacillating indecisively; in making up his mind, he is trying to take into account manifold aspects of life.

Incongruity in many of Lindsay's best poems, for instance, is akin to that in American tolklore. In such poems, one may hear echoes of the fireside talk of frontier yarnspinners. Lindsay is a mythmaker—and though his myths stop short of the most inventive tall tales, they achieve comparable fusings of the real and the imagined. His Andrew Jackson "was eight feet tall. . . . His sword was so long he dragged it on the ground." His General Booth (p. 944) enters a Heaven which is part supernatural, part Illinois country town. His Simon Legree is the legendary creation of a Negro poet, and his Congo blacks (p. 946) are a white man's fabulous interpretation of savagery. Even his Lincoln, stalking through Springfield at night (p. 949), assumes the guise of a folk creation.

Sandburg, likewise, embodies playful myths and imaginative tall tales in serious poems. His "Chicago" (p. 961) is a giant personification comparable to the frontier braggarts; he re-creates a half-mythical Lincoln by giving folk pictures of him (p. 972); he praises the people by telling of their folklore. In addition to frontier or rural humor, however, he makes use of the wry humor of the dispossessed as it is voiced in hobo ballads which he has reproduced in his American Songbag: it mingles hate, bitter contempt, and tenderness in "To a Contemporary Bunkshooter" (p. 962) and "A.E.F." (p. 968).

The humor of two New England poets, Robinson and Frost, as Constance Rourke has remarked in American Humor, also prolongs an older tradition:

For companions in the legendary village of Tilbury Town Robinson has chosen types recurrent throughout early American comedy, ne'erdo-wells, hars, the quirky, the large-hearted and lost, spendthrifts of time and money and love. Robinson is master of that unobtrusive irony that has belonged to the Yankee; like the older Yankee he turns constantly to a dry metaphor—"an old vanity that is half as rich in salvage as old ashes." . . . A reticent humor runs through much of Robinson's poetry, so quietly as to pass unnoticed by many readers, yet producing a constant lightning and relief and change, with a balance of forces against the impending tragedy. . . . Frost [too] has kept the native humor, often deepened to a bitter irony, but delicately infused; most of his humor, like that of the early Yankee tradition, is so deeply inwoven with his further speech as to be almost inseparable from it

These poets of New England, then, show relationships to the Yankee humor of the Farmer's Almanacs and of Seba Smith.

Four modern poets, to summarize, re-create in serious poetry the extravagant humor of the old West or the dry humor of Down East. Another group—which includes poets such as John Crowe Ransom, Archibald MacLeish, E. E. Cummings, Robert Penn Warren, Wallace Stevens, and others, and which is represented in this text by Eliot and Tate—embodies more subtle (albeit ironic) incongruities in its poetry. Cleanth Brooks sees "wit" as the instrument used by these poets in fusing disparates; and his definition of wit shows how it may be used for serious purposes:

Wit is not only an acute perception of analogies; it is a lively awareness of the fact that the obvious attitude toward a given situation is not the only possible attitude. Because wit, for us, is still associated with levity, it may be well to state it in its most serious terms. The witty poet's glancing at other attitudes is not merely "play"—an attempt to puzzle or show off his acuteness of perception; it is possible to describe it as merely his refusal to blind himself to a multiplicity which exists.

The perception of such multiplicity has frequently caused poets in this group to discard or greatly modify older ways of organizing poems in favor of "witty" organizations which emphasize ironic incongruities. Contrasting aspects or values are placed side by side and their disparate qualities are emphasized by the omission of most transitions. What Eliot calls "'links in the chain,' of explanatory and connecting matter" are left out. Though such arrangements may, for a time, puzzle readers used to Victorian poetry, they are, considering the poets' assumptions about reality, inevitable. As Eliot has pointed out, "Such selection of sequences of images and ideas has nothing chaotic about it. There is a logic of imagination as well as a logic of concepts." Eliot and others of his group, in their poems, seek to arrange details in accordance with what he calls "the logic of the imagination."

A poem held together by what Eliot calls "the logic of concepts" might begin with a poetic statement of the idea that modern man is less romantic than man was in the past. "Look upon modern man," it might continue, and thereupon it might describe modern man in unromantic terms. The description might be followed by a transition—"It was not so with man in other days"—and the transition might introduce a description of a romantic character of the past. Possibly the poet might thereafter summarize the whole idea of the poem, and then lament the departure of romance. In such a structure no "links in the chain" would be missing and the meaning would be explicitly formulated. Contrast Eliot's "logic of imagination" in a terse passage in The Waste Land. Note that there are no transitions, generalizations, or statements of attitudes—simply juxtaposed images, with those of the opening two lines providing a meaningful ironic contrast with those of the last four:

At the violet hour, the evening hour that strives

Homeward, and brings the sailor home from sea,

The typist home at teatime, clears her breakfast, lights

Her stove, and lays out food in tins.

Out of the window perilously spread

Her drying combinations touched by the sun's last rays. . . .

The opening two lines here connote the romance of purple twilight for adventurous sailors turning homeward; the remaining lines show the drab office worker clearing up dirty breakfast dishes, dining on canned food, and then washing and hanging out her underwear

Comparable ironic contrasts—or ironic parallelisms—or (more often) parallelisms and contrasts combined—are implied in the order of the images in many modern poems. In "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (p. 976), "The Hippopotamus," or "Gerontion" (p. 979) the images are much more complex, but the juxtaposition is the essential thing. Thus "the logic of the imagination" which shapes these poems expresses irony, and in its "serious humor" Eliot's poetry shows its kinship to that of even such a broadly humorous poet as Vachel Lindsay.

New Rhythms

During the early years of the poetic renaissance, one great battle was for the recognition of free verse. Keith Preston, a Chicago newspaper columnist, implied what was a widespread belief when he wrote, in a witty quatrain:

Of all the literary scenes,

The saddest that I see

Are graves of little magazines

That died to make verse free.

Casual readers, for a long time, thought that "the new poetry" and "free verse" were synonymous. Many leaders in the movement did for a time write much free verse—Amy Lowell, Edgar Lee Masters, John Gould Fletcher, Hilda Doolittle, Wallace Stevens, and others. Writers of such verse, obviously in the tradition of Whitman, are represented in this text by Carl Sandburg.

By degrees, poets won this battle. They were aided by the growth of Whitman's reputation which took place during this period, by the popular success of the Spoon River Anthology, by critics, poets, and teachers who championed vers libre. By 1940, radio plays written in free verse appealed to wide audiences, and many an amateur poet who mailed his early efforts to the home-town newspaper wrote, without any sense of being during, in free verse.

Free verse won its spurs, but after a period during which it was used by more and more poets, there came a period during which it was used by fewer and fewer. By 1941, many leading poets considered it rather old-fashioned. Having won all the freedom they wanted, many poets eventually decided that they could do with less freedom than very libral allowed. Nevertheless, free verse had important effects, for it offered clues about possible variations in verse forms. Robinson, for instance, in some ways highly conventional in his prosody, diverged from regularity rather more than he probably would have done in an earlier period—and was less criticized for his divergences. And other poets, when they departed from established prosodic methods, did so without a twinge, and without disastrous consequences.

Even so 'classical' a poet as Robert Frost has not been untouched by the new tendency toward freedom. His theory of prosody, as Lawrance Thompson explains in Fire and Ice. attempts to reconcile "three separate planes of sound" which affect rhythms:

The first of these is the basic and theoretically rigid meter, which Frost is willing to reduce 'virtually' to "strict iambic" and "loose iambic." These basic accents, fitted to the variable structure of the line and of the stanza, offer an underlying foundation of words and phrases. The second plane of sound is derived from the words and phrases as they might be pronounced without regard to meaning, without regard to context. The third plane of sound is derived from the tones of voice which give particularly intended shades of meaning to the words when they are spoken as units in their contexts of phrases and sentences.

For instance, in the opening lines of "Mending Wall" (p. 934), the "basic pattern" is iambic pentameter. However, normal accentuation, regardless of contexts, in such words as "something," "ground-swell," and "makes gaps" causes deviations from the regular iambic pattern. A proper reading of the poem, also, will suggest the character of the speaker and the quizzical, teasing tone of his remarks: such a character, probably, would maliciously emphasize and caress with his tongue the word "spills"—a word which embodies the whole playful destruction of walls by nature which so distresses the orderly neighbor. And later, in line 15, the word "between," important as it is in the concept being developed, may properly be given a stress—may properly be set off by a significant pause—suggestive of its contextual importance. The sense Frost manifests, here and in other poems, of these three different planes of sound doubtless does much to account for a quality which many critics have seen in his poems: often they are, for poetry, extraordinarily close in their rhythms to the everyday talk of New England farmers.

Vachel Lindsay, as his remarks here and there about metrics indicate, learned a great deal about versification from three poets—John Dryden (1631-1700), Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849), and Algernon Charles Swinburne (1837-1909). Each of these achieved noteworthy effects by varying established rhythms and by exploiting, to the full, possibilities of tone-color—vowel and consonant arrangements. Dryden's "A Song for St. Cecilia's Day" brilliantly utilizes variations possible in an irregular ode to contrast the sounds of musical instruments.

and it is not difficult to imagine Lindsay writing a gloss for Dryden comparable to that on "The Congo" offering instructions like those italicized below for the reading of the lines:

The trumpet's loud clangor

Shrilly and with increasing

Excites us to arms speed.

With shrill notes of anger

And mortal alarms.

The double, double beat

To be chanted in deep hass,

Of the thundering drum

all the heavy accents very

Cries hark! the foes come:

heary.

Charge, charge, 'tis too late to retreat!

The soft complaining flute

To be read slowly and softly In dying notes discovers in the manner of insinuating

The woes of hopeless lovers, music, all the o sounds very

Whose dirge is whispered by the warbling lute.

golden.

So glossed, Dryden's lines show clearly the source of some of Lindsay's practices.

But Lindsay's rhythms also had more immediate sources. During his boyhood in Springfield, Lindsay came to know well the rhythms of church oratory, both white and Negro, and also those of open-air political oratory. While at Hiram College, he was well trained in the florid public speaking fashionable during his young manhood. The rhythms of the Gregorian Chant were also, he acknowledged, influential "From Boston to Los Angeles," he wrote, "we American versifiers, democratic poets, face the problem of our potential audiences of one million or one hundred million that we have never conquered, but which the Chataugua orator like Bryan . . . may reach any day. From this standpoint, Bryan is the one living American poet till we make a few songs sturdy enough to endure the confusion of the Chatauqua tent" To capture such audiences, Lindsay wrote such poems as "General William Booth" and "The Congo"—experiments in what he called "The Higher Vaudeville"—designed to attract popular attention. Recited as this poet recited such poems, these and other songs proved attractive to unsophisticated high-school students and even to tired businessmen

Although T. S. Eliot, Allen Tate, and other poets in their "school" probably are not overfond of Lindsay, they adapt rhythms to materials in a comparable fashion. Eliot, who wrote a few poems close to free verse in form during his early career, eventually came to use rhyme and fairly conventional meters. Like Lindsay, however, he found contrasts in rhythms useful to enforce contrasting moods, attitudes, or materials. That Tate conceives of rhythm similarly is indicated by his discussion of his own prosody in "Narcissus as Narcissus."

Jeffers started his career as a conventional versifier, but his later poetry—that most admired by his critics—follows a metrical scheme which, as he says, is a "compromise" avoiding both "arbitrary form and capricious lack or disruption of form." Jeffers says of his meter.

I want it rhythmic and not rhymed—moulded more closely to the subject than in older English poetry—but as formed as alcaics if that were possible too. The event is of course a compromise My feeling is for the number of beats to the line. There is a quantitative element too in which the unstressed syllables have part.

Taking this statement as a clue, Herbert Klein made a study reported in The Prosody of Robinson Jeffers (1930). His finding was that, considered carefully, the rhythms of this poet are much less chaotic than, at first glance, they appear to be. The reason is that Jeffers has been aware not only of the patterns of English verse but also of the quantitative patterns common to classical poetry. Says Klein:

Some of his readings are available on records issued by Columbia University. Listening to such records, or to those of Frost, Sandburg, or Eliot, is of great value to the student.

Briefly, my conclusion is that Jeffers uses stress to define and limit the line; quantity to regulate it. That is to say, the sheer possible syllabic length of the line is set (within exceptionally broad limits) by the number of stresses which the beat pattern of the poem permits. But the tempo of the lines, the contrast of breathless haste in one line (or joyful skipping) with sonorous deliberation (or hard wrenching plodding) in another is due to quantity.

Because, then, of a knowledge of ancient poetry rather uncommon for modern American poets (with the exception of Frost), Jeffers has achieved metrical effects which are new, individual, and arresting.

The effect, in the end, of all the experimentation with rhythms was to give interwar poets a very wide range indeed in their handling of rhythms. Patterns of emphasis could be adjusted in many ways to the thoughts and emotions expressed in poems, and readers accustomed to the new poetry readily accepted any metrical patterns, no matter how bizarre, which justified themselves by their achievements. And the flexible rhythms became highly appropriate to the expression of the contrasts and the incongruities so important in many modern poems.

The Language of Modern Poetry

After 1914 there was about as much variety in the kinds of language used as there was in the kinds of rhythms. Robinson, in general, used the same sort of diction as had been used in the Victorian period, though shorn of clichés and many of its ornaments, and so did some other poets. However, at the start of the period, some poets—like Dryden, Wordsworth, and Whitman before them—consciously rebelled against what they believed to be "unnatural" or ineffective ways of saying things characteristic of older poetry. The rebellion was justified, so writers said, by several convictions—that a new language was needed to cope in a real way with the modern world, that expressions not worn threadbare had particular impact, that concrete rather than abstract words were best for stating truth, and that poets did well to draw upon the common speech which still was a great source of poetry.

The ways of rebelling, however, differed. They differed, quite often, in accordance with the poets' ideas about the ways "common speech" should be translated into poetry. For in this period when the talk of various classes differed greatly, naturally it was possible to disagree about the class of men whose talk should be imitated. Should it be the class of the factory worker, say, of the farmer, or of the learned scholar? And naturally, even after deciding upon the kind of speech to be used in poetry, poets differed about the selection, the intensification necessary if ordinary talk was to be transmuted.

Robert Frost conceives of himself as a user of the talk of New Hampshire farmers. He has approvingly quoted Emerson's lines about Down East talk in "Monadnock," lines which point out that country folk, with their paltry vocabularies of a hundred words or so, are "the masters who can teach" the poet our "ancient speech," and he has admired dialogues in Shake-speare, made up as they are of "lean sharp sentences, with the give and take, the thread of thought and action quick, nor lost in a maze of metaphor and adjective." Frost usually lives up to his implied ideal. He uses an extraordinarily large proportion of monosyllables (forty in a row, for instance, at one point in "The Death of the Hired Man," p. 935), and very few long words; he often employs provincialisms. His lines, whether they serve as dialogue or as first-person voicings of the poet's thought, often have a sparse epigrammatic quality like that of folk speech. (Note, for instance, Il. 1, 27, 32-33 in "Mending Wall," p. 934). Since Frost deliberately uses such simple, undecorated diction, very close to ordinary speech, he perforce suggests poetic meanings in subtle and delicate ways; and the unwary reader is likely to miss complexities firmly embodied in his laconic poems.

Lindsay and Sandburg employ words in a fashion in some ways comparable to Frost's some of their poems are couched in the Middlewestern counterpart of New England farm language. Each of these poets, however, following the example of Whitman (whom both admire), mingles poetic words with more vernacular expressions. And each experiments with somewhat different elements in our national speech. The language which Lindsay calls "really American" is the pure and simple English of the Elizabethan period, still spoken in unspoiled rural districts he cites as an example of it Mark Twain's Rongbing It (see p. 161). But he conceives of this language as potentially "eloquent' since its speakers "are all orators and preserve in eloquent periods the United States language." Such are the elements in our speech which Lindsay tries to utilize in his poetry—"the Grand Style" but employed with earthiness and native humor. Sandburg draws upon the talk of common men for the epigrams and sayings in some of his poems. He draws, in addition, upon the language of the factory or of the city sidewalk for such expressions as "where do you get that stuff"; "the . bunch backing you"; "a good four flusher", and "he starts people puking"—all in "To a Contemporary Bunkshooter"—language highly appropriate to express the proletarian sentiments of the speaker.

Jeffers, over the years, has varied his diction. His earlier poems are, on the whole, pretty conventional: they embody expressions typical of older poetry and contain frequent inversions. Later poems are couched in a larger vocabulary which draws upon science—physics, biochemistry, geology, botany—for many words. But mingled with these learned expressions are colloquial phrases, contractions (he'd. you'd. I'd). And the style also is richly figurative.

Jeffers, at times, writes moderately obscure lines—one may cite these in "Roan Stallion" (p. 952):

The atom bounds-breaking,

Nucleus to sun, electrons to planets, with recognition

Not praying, self-equaling, the whole to the whole, the microcosm

Not entering nor accepting entrance, more equally, more utterly, more incredibly conjugate

With the other extreme and greatness; passionately perceptive of identity....

But he is not alone in being obscure. Even such an old-fashioned poet as Robinson is obscure now and then, and so are such ordinarily forthright poets as Lindsay and Sandburg. Modern poetry, as a matter of fact, has been much criticized for the obscurity of its language.

Such obscurity is not, as some claim, the result of a deliberate attempt to blur meaning: actually it attempts to express meaning which is hard to decipher chiefly because it is complicated. Many difficult passages are at least as justifiable as those explained by Tate in his convincing apologia for their use in a specific poem (p. 1113). Tate works in a fashion similar to that of Eliot, and though Eliot writes poetry not immediately clear even to sophisticated readers, he amply justifies his diction in notably intelligent critical writings.

Difficult though some of his poetry is, Eliot indicates in his writings that he shares the belief that poets do well to write verse after the manner of the actual talk of men. He praises Donne, the seventeenth-century British metaphysical poet, for "managing to maintain a tone of direct and informal address"; he commends Dryden for having a talent which is "exactly the same" as Donne's; he holds that "no serious critic" will disapprove of Wordsworth's avowed attempt "to imitate, and as far as possible, to adopt, the very language of men." In general, carrying out his own theories, Eliot does achieve a conversational tone in his poems.

But Eliot sees clearly that at times certain demands of poetry may make conversational language unsatisfactory. "There is," he says, "no conversational or other form which can be applied indiscriminately", some ideas and feelings may be best expressed in other styles. Moreover, he feels that the poet cannot "talk like any class of society," since he has to talk "like himself—rather better, we hope, than any actual class; though when any class of society happens to have the best word, phrase, or expletive for anything, then the poet is entitled to it."

And indeed the poet who achieves all that Eliot sees him doing must be an artist in manipulating language. The language important to the poet, Eliot feels, "is that which is smuggling to digest and express new objects, new groups of objects, new feelings, new aspects...." Such living language, this poet holds, combines traditional with novel meanings: "whatever words a writer employs, he benefits by knowing as much as possible of the history of those words, of the uses to which they have already been applied The essential of tradition is this: in getting as much as possible the whole weight of the history of the language behind his word." Hence a sense of the traditional is valuable. The essential of novelty, by contrast, is the expression of that which is characteristic not only of the age but also of the individual poet. The modern poet, aware of the complexity of his period and of his reactions to it, must "become more and more comprehensive, more allusive, more indirect, in order to torce, to dislocate if necessary, language into his meaning." In addition to thus expressing what is traditional and what is unique, the language of today's poetry, Eliot thinks, fuses two other elements—feeling and thought. Poets of today will be condemned if, like Tennyson and Browning, "they do not feel their thought as immediately as the odour of the rose." Instead each should reveal in his words "a direct sensuous apprehension of thought, or re-creation of thought into feeling, which is exactly what we find in Donne," greatly admired by Eliot as well as other modern authors.

The title and one of the lines of a poem by Eliot offer examples of these fusings in diction. The words "love song" in the title, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," have traditional signification: in past periods, they stood for an expression of affection which was direct and passionate. This individual love song, by contrast, represents our peculiar era by not expressing affection and by being indirect and unimpassioned. Similarly, the word "song," which in the past stood for simple singing, in this poem stands for complex thinking. Again, in "J. Alfred Prufrock" (one of those names "parted on the side," today typical of some pretentious people), "Alfred" has been traditionally associated with the man of action, Alfred the Great; but in this individual poem, it applies to a "hero" who is exactly the opposite of a man of action. Fusion of thought and feeling is illustrated by line 51, in which Prufrock thinks "I have measured out my life with coffee spoons." Prufrock's thought is that he has wasted his life in meaningless social rituals; but this is expressed in sensory terms—terms of feeling—in the image of annoyed frustration: the delicate handling of ineffectual little spoons from which coffee cannot be savored but must be sipped.

Some modern poets, then, for all their approval of the use of conversational language, often depart from the simplicities of social talk in order to express complex meanings. Therefore the language aids the "serious humor" and the varied rhythms in appropriately voicing the ideas and feelings poets have about the modern world.

The NEW FICTION

During the period between 1912 and 1920, as we have seen, "the new drama" and "the new poetry" reached notable heights. "The new fiction," by contrast—at least that which people bought and talked about a great deal—lagged behind. Consistent authors of best sellers included Gene Stratton Porter, Harold Bell Wright, Zane Grey, and Eleanor H Porter. The most popular novels left out the less savory aspects of American life, and their optimistic plots showed virtuous characters triumphant, after a struggle, over vicious villains. Obviously this fiction, although written in the twentieth century, prolonged the tradition of nineteenth-century sentimentalism.

Early in the 1920's, though, the beginnings of a change became apparent. On the best-seller list appeared F. Scott Fitzgerald's This Side of Paradise. Edith Wharton's The Age of Innocence, and Sinclair Lewis' Main Street, books in sharp contrast with previous best sellers. The last of these shortly became sensationally successful. In an article in Bookman, September 1921, a British novelist, Archibald Marshall, considered "half a dozen novels said to represent a new development in American fiction, all of which are now being widely read." There was, indeed, "a new development." During the years that followed, pre-1920 novelists tended slowly to recede in importance while very different writers such as Lewis, Hemingway, Faulkner, Dos Passos, Steinbeck, and Wolfe replaced them not only in critical esteem but also—at least at times—in general popularity.

Probably the huge audience which fictionists had was in large measure responsible for the late burgeoning of the new fiction. A larger audience than either poetry or drama reached, fiction readers were, for a long time, content with old-fashioned narratives. They preferred "pure" and "sweet" stories to the more rugged works of the Stephen Cranes and the Theodore Dreisers. But after many readers had been disillusioned by the outcome of World War I or had been converted by preachers of disillusionment such as Henry Adams and H. L. Mencken, a part of the older audience seceded and began to demand fictional works of a different sort. These were joined by a large share of the younger readers. Increasing numbers approved of the tendency which Archibald Marshall saw in best sellers "to portray the meanness of life in a particular [American] community." Attacks made by older neglected novelists, voiced anew, were considered with respect. Interest in Howe, Kirkland, and Crane was reawakened and redoubled. Dreiser's reputation prospered, and in 1925, when Dreiser published An American Tragedy, he found to his pleased surprise that the new audience was large enough to make that book for a time a best seller. By the 1930's, many books as stern as Dreiser's managed to win wide and appreciative audiences—not such wide ones, to be sure, as escapist novels like Anthony Adverse and Gone with the Wind but very respectable audiences nevertheless.

Readers, then, who turned to fiction writers of the newer sort did so less because of their manner than because of their matter. But the authors of the new fiction, like the interwar poets, rebelled against older techniques, and they naturally needed new techniques appropriate to their preachments. Looking back to their most sympathetic predecessors, the realists and naturalists of the period 1880-1920, they found useful hints. And considering their new views of life, they hit upon methods of unfolding narratives which served their purposes.

Regardless of the sources of their procedures, fiction writers tended to drop the old argument concerning the relative merits of romanticism, realism, naturalism, expressionism, and other "isms," and to agree with Percy Lubbock, an admired critic of fiction, when he wrote "The best form is that which makes the most of its subject—there is no other definition of the meaning of form in fiction." Authors and critics admired equally the novels of Dreiser and Farrell, cast in the form of naturalism; those of James Branch Cabell, written after the pattern of romances; and those of Robert Nathan, in the form of fantasy. What mattered most was that the fiction, as the phrase constantly had it, should "tell the real truth about life as it was." Detail, plot, and characterization were manipulated chiefly to achieve the end Mencken had in mind when he spoke of the "fundamental purpose" as being "to make the novel true"

Detail in Modern Fiction

Two ways of handling detail, perhaps, are outstanding in modern fiction—the "documentary" way and the "poetic" way. The documentary method, discoverable in the writings of Sinclair Lewis, John Dos Passos, and many modern novelists, is notable for its mass of detail Probably Dreiser, as much as any previous author, is its parent, and its ideal is something like scientific accuracy and completeness. An example of this method in an extreme form is the chapter in Main Street wherein Lewis tells of Carol Kennicott's stroll down the street after which the novel is named. A grocery is thus described.

Howland & Gould's Grocery. In the display window, black, overripe bananas and lettuce on which a cat was sleeping. Shelves lined with red crèpe paper which was now faded and torn and concentrically spotted. Flat against the wall of the second story the signs of lodges—the Knights of Pythias, the Maccabees, the Woodmen, the Masons

In similar detail, for several pages, building after building along the street is told about—a total of twenty-five of them. The method is almost photographic in the multiplicity of descriptive touches used. The intention behind it, apparently, is to give such overwhelming documentation that the reader feels that the picture must be accurate.

Similarly, when Lewis records conversations, he sets down something close to a complete transcript: the repetitions of phrase, the peculiarities of expression, seem to be mimicked to perfection. Consider this snatch of conversation between Babbitt and Littlefield, after Babbitt has brought up the subject of politics.

"In my opinion, what the country needs, first and foremost, is a good, sound, business-like conduct of its affairs. What we need is—a business administration!" said Littleheld.

"I'm glad to hear you say that! said Babbitt I certainly am glad to hear you say that! I didn't know how you'd feel about it, with all your associations with colleges and so on, and I'm glad you feel that way. What the country needs—just at this present juncture—is neither a college president nor a lot of monkeying with foreign affairs, but a good—sound—economical—business—administration, that will give us a chance to have something like a decent turnover."

The details in this speech and others monotonously repeating phrases and "thoughts" seem almost stenographic in their accuracy and their completeness.

Of course, there is selection even in such passages as these, and other authors who use this method are likely to be somewhat more selective than Lewis. The basis of the selection is the author's view of the scene or speech he is presenting. Lewis, for instance, gives an impression of the tawdriness, the dullness of Main Street in the first passage, and an impression of the unintellectual, standardized attitudes of Americans in the second. The abundant details are so chosen as to document amply each interpretation

The "poetic" handling of detail, by contrast, is very highly selective, and although the details are likely to be literally accurate, they are also likely to be symbolically, i.e., poetically, significant—reminiscent not so much of Dreiser as of Stephen Crane and Frank Norris.

Willa Cather discussed the problem of detail in 'The Novel Démeublé' (the unfurnished novel). She quotes approvingly Mérimée's dictum to the effect that the art of choosing from innumerable details is more important than attentive observation or exact rendition, and scoffs at the "popular superstition that 'realism' asserts itself in the cataloguing of a great number of material objects . . . and in minutely and unsparingly describing physical sensations "Balzac, she holds, failed as an artist in so far as he "tried out the value of literalness . . . to the uttermost." Tolstoy, by contrast, succeeded because he made the physical details "so much a part of the emotions of the people that they are perfectly synthesized." Hawthorne, too, used details sparsely but made all he used unobtrusively valuable to the mood of the story. Miss Cather concludes:

Whatever is felt upon the page without being specifically named there—that, one might say, is created. It is the inexplicable presence of the thing not named, of the overtone divined by the ear but not heard by it, the verbal mood, the emotional aura of the fact or the thing or the deed, that gives high quality to the novel or the drama, as well as to poetry itself.

The implication, of course, is that the details in a novel by Miss Cather, if she puts her theories into practice, will have an "emotional aura," an implicit value, comparable to that of the images in poetry.

Ernest Hemingway, although unlike Miss Cather in many respects, has similar theories about the handling of details. In all save one of his books (To Huve and Huve Not, 1937, wherein he briefly tries, with dubious success, to write like Dos Passos), Hemingway reduces descriptive detail to the minimum. His problem—the problem of all writers—as he sees it, consists of "knowing what you truly felt, rather than what you were supposed to feel," and then setting down "the real thing, the sequence of motion and fact which made the emotion." Details, in other words, primarily are valuable to suggest the experiencing of feelings, and Hemingway believes that if these are stated "purely enough," they will be "valid . . . always." "All good books are alike," he has said, "in that they are truer than if they had really happened and after you are finished reading one you will feel that all that happened to you and afterwards it all belongs to you, the good and the bad, the ecstasy, the remorse and the sorrow, the people and the places and how the weather was. If you can get so you can give that to people, then you are a writer." The details, selected with the lyric skill necessary for such an achievement, ideally get what this author calls "a fourth and fifth dimension"—perhaps the prototype of Miss Cather's "whatever is felt upon the page without being specifically named." The fact or the detail becomes a symbol, and Hemingway, like his master, the Mark Twain of Huckleherry Finn. achieves poetry in what appears to be matter-of-fact-prose.

This may be seen in the opening paragraph of "In Another Country" (p 994)

In the fall the war was always there, but we did not go to it any more. It was cold in the fall in Milan and the dark came very early. Then the electric lights came on, and it was pleasant along the streets looking in the windows. There was much game hanging outside the shops, and the snow powdered in the fur of the foxes and wind blew their tails. The deer hung stiff and heavy and empty, and small birds blew in the wind and the wind turned their feathers. It was a cold fall and the wind came down from the mountains

The paragraph is factual, but it contrasts with Lewis' description of Main Street because of the nature of its details. Hemingway's details are sparse, and they are more than literal: they are symbolic as well as accurate. Poetically they stand for the "other countries" which the lonely characters portrayed in the story sense but do not enter—the country of battle from which their wounds have removed them, that of peace which they glimpse through lighted windows from darkened streets, the country of nature symbolized by the game, and the country, finally, of death—connoted by the cold, the dark, and by the wind which blows from the mountains.

Poetic details comparable to those in the passage by Hemingway just quoted are to be found, as one would expect, in the writings of Willa Cather. They are to be found in Steinbeck and Wolfe, although both of these writers often employ the literal method characteristic of Lewis. In fact, if a trend in the handling of detail is to be discovered in the interwar period, it is a trend toward selectivity and poetic suggestion rather than exhaustive documentation.

Plot Patterns

When, in December 1930, Sinclair Lewis accepted the Nobel Prize, he made an address, "The American Fear of Literature." in which he catalogued conservative criticisms of contemporaneous writers. Eugene O'Neill, for instance, who had transformed American drama "from a false world of neat and complete trickery to a world of splendor and fear and greatness," was criticized because "he has seen life as not to be neatly arranged in the study of a scholar but as a terrifying, magnificent, and often quite horrible thing akin to the tornado, the earthquake, the devastating fire." The description applies not only to this dramatist but also to a number of fiction writers. They, too, refused to arrange happenings in neat and complete patterns comparable to those in older fiction. It was this fact, probably, that Archibald Marshall had in mind when he accused the new fictionists of failing to tell a story. "There is no progress," he complained.

Like Marshall, readers fond of Victorian plots believe that many modern novels, especially those of the twenties, bewilderingly depart from established narrative forms. Often, novelists, like Dreiser, whom many of them admire, are satisfied to write simply the biographies of characters—sometimes from birth to death, sometimes from day to day over a shorter but not particularly exciting period. Such biographies often tell of characters who do not change: like picaresque figures they merely do various things and meet a series of people. Marshall instanced Carol Kennicott in Main Street, who, he said, "remains at the end much as she was at the beginning." "And her successive revolts," he added, "have little dramatic quality in them." Similarly, in Babbitt, Arrowsmuth, Elmer Gantry, Dodsworth, and other novels, as Carl Van Doren notices, Sinclair Lewis "employs an easy arrangement nearer chronicle than drama." James T. Farrell and Thomas Wolfe, in their novels, also use such arrangements as are supplied by apparently unmanipulated biography, although they continue their biographies through several volumes.

John Dos Passos uses a similar technique in Three Soldien, but he tends to complicate his story element by unfolding, simultaneously, several biographical chronicles—moving briskly and without transitions from one to the other. "Manhattan Transfer," as Professor Beach remarks in American Fiction. 1920-1940, "is a picture of chaos moral and social; and the narrative technique corresponds to the theme. Each chapter is a loose bundle of incidents from the lives of many different persons or groups, anywhere from four or sixteen in number, completely unrelated save in time and their common involvement in the chaos of Manhattan." U.S. A. does much the same thing with a broader picture screen, the entire nation, as a background. The biographies of twelve people, scattered from the east to the west coast, are presented in fragmentary parts. These people encounter many characters who move into and out of their lives. In addition, at intervals, "Newsreels," "The Camera Eye," and biographies of leading public figures are interspersed. The newsreels present impressionistic pictures of the nation of the day. The "Camera Eye" passages offer stream-of-consciousness interpretations. The brief biographies show, with selected details, the lives of leaders in ways which emphasize the trends of the times. These thumbnail biographical accounts are comparable, as a result,

to the biographies of major characters, although their parts are drawn together—are not separated by stretches of narrative

But there are many modern narratives, nevertheless, which do show developments, developments which occur when the characters learn something—discover something. Faulkner's narratives often show a discovery of the terrible in human existence. "A Rose for Emily" (p. 1020), although it is comparatively uncomplicated, shows the method in miniature, for it tells how the villagers learn, detail by detail, of the horror of Miss Emily Grierson's life Sometimes it is not the characters so much as the readers who make the discovery. The Sound and the Fury (1929), for example, one of Faulkner's best works, follows a jumbled plan, even as to time, which is justifiable largely because it makes such an unfolding possible. The order and relationships of happenings are further obscured because the story is told as it is seen not by one character but by three characters, in turn, and then the author. But the result of the whole procedure is a parading of various fragments which finally cease to be disconnected and become, instead, interrelated parts of a terrible picture. The discovery, therefore, takes place in the mind of the reader rather than in that of anyone in the story. And Faulkner uses similar schemes—in eventual effect, at any rate—in other narratives.

The plot of discovery may be useful, of course, for affirmative as well as negative fictional works. Willa Cather, rather often, shows characters seeking and finding satisfactory self-fulfillment—the artist in Song of the Lark, the pioneer in My Ántonia, the soldier in One of Ours, the intellectual in The Professor's House, religious men in Death Comes for the Arch-bishop. When, in the latter part of the 1930's, fiction writers (like writers in other fields) began to forsake critical attacks in favor of positive preachments, this pattern tended to be prevalent.

apprehending some of the terror of the world—apprehending ruthlessness and violence, not through books and motion pictures but through first-hand experiences. Hemingway's early novels (The Sun Also Rises and A Farewell to Arms) and various short stories show characters making discoveries, usually of such a primitive sort that they indicate not the rehabilitation of human values so much as their disintegration. The chief character in To Have and Have Not and even more notably the chief character in For Whom the Bell Tolls find a faith beyond individual creature comfort, a social faith. Increasingly, as the United States moved toward World War II, and affirmations became more important for some novelists than attacks, fictional narratives tended to show similar discoveries—in Lewis' Work of Art and It Can't Happen Here, in Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath, and in Wolfe's You Can't Go Home Again. In the later part of the period, nevertheless, as in the earlier, the plots of discovery served admirably for the development of the authors' ideas.

Characterization and Psychology

From the beginning, authors of fiction have had certain limited ways of characterizing—showing the characteristics of the people about whose lives they wrote—they could comment upon them, describe their physical backgrounds and their outward appearance, tell of their actions or of their thoughts, set forth their conversations or the conversations of others about them. During the interwar period, fictionists did not manage to hit upon any new devices, but in various ways they manipulated and modified the older ones. One older device tended to disappear—the comment of the author upon the characters. Fearful of appearing to moralize, and dubious, as a matter of fact, about their ability to state positive values, the authors in these years tended to drop out of their stories, to become relatively dramatic—objective—in their characterization. The characters were shown, and the reader was allowed to draw his conclusions.

Two other characterizing devices, although they did not disappear, were used rather sparingly. Some authors, as has been suggested, depended upon detailed description of background and upon description of physical appearance, but the description was minimized. Characterization was chiefly achieved, therefore, by the presentation of words, deeds, and thoughts of the characters.

The handling of these was shaped largely by the science of psychology, which, as has been stated (p. 832), was of great importance in modern fiction. Seemingly, like Henry James before them (see p. 541), modern authors found central to their writing problem the selection of a fictional point of view—the kind of insight or insights they as authors were to have into the minds of their characters. And, of course, the statement of the insights was determined by the authors' concepts of psychology. Hemingway, for example, in some of his writings, seems to follow one lead suggested by behavioristic psychologists? when they scoffed at the scientific value of a study of "consciousness" and urged, instead, the observation of human activity behavior. Often, Hemingway objectively sets down remarks and actions of the characters, or. as he puts it, "what really happens in action"—but he leaves to be inferred what the characters feel or think. "The Killers" is a perfect example, set forth as it is without a single glimpse into its characters' thoughts: it has the dramatic objectivity of a play. And first-person narrative though it is, "In Another Country" holds to a minimum the unfolding of the narrator's thoughts. When such a technique is used, to be sure, whether Hemingway's characters in a given narrative are sophisticates or prizefighters, the subtle nuances of their thoughts and feelings-exactly the things with which Henry James was chiefly concerned-are not and cannot be presented. Hemingway's belief, apparently, is that such subtleties are relatively unimportant—that the primitive and universal emotions related to physical pleasure or pain are those most significant both in life and in art. Hence Hemingway, at times, has been classified as a "primitivist."

The chief scholarly consideration is J B Watson's Behavior An Introduction to Comparative Psychology, New York, 1914, the chief popular study is a best-selling book by G A Dorsey Why We Behave Like Human Beings, New York 1914 in the 1920's behaviorism was quite influential in psychological study.

Steinbeck, too, is often a primitivist in his psychology. His tendency, as Edmund Wilson notices in The Boys in the Back Room (1941), is "to present life in animal terms," to deal "either with the lower animals or with human beings so rudimentary that they are almost on the animal level." In consequence, as Wilson says, "The chief subject of Mr. Steinbeck's fiction has been . . . not those aspects of humanity in which it is most thoughtful, imaginative, constructive, nor even those aspects of animals that seem most attractive to humans, but rather the processes of life itself. . . . And it is only, as a rule, on this primitive level that Mr. Steinbeck deals with moral questions, the virtues like the crimes for Mr. Steinbeck are still a part of . . . planless and almost aimless, of . . . almost unconscious, processes of life." Even the psychology of labor movements, as this author sees it, is animal-like. Striking fruit-pickers become "groupmen," and a character thus describes them: "It was like all of them disappeared, and it was just one big animal, going down the road. Just all one animal . ."

The somewhat similar psychological technique employed by Dos Passos also might well have stemmed from the "animal psychology" of the behaviorists—a psychology which tends to reduce action to two elements, stimuli and responses. His vast collection of human beings, though varied, seem, as Professor Beach suggests, to be capable of only a few responses to basic stimuli. Dos Passos' characters behave in a pretty automatic fashion. "The presence of a given organism within the field of vision," as Beach perceives, "provokes the response of 'love'; discomfort drives one to a more comfortable attitude; a feeling of emptiness provokes boredom and sets one on the track of entertainment and novelty; a business opportunity releases effort and ambition." Dos Passos' human beings are comparable to laboratory mice which react one way when a bell rings, another way when a light flashes.

Such psychology tends to make characterization simpler in modern fiction than it was in the older fiction. In some instances, by contrast, modern psychological concepts tend to make characterization rather more complex. Freud and his various followers have made authors aware of the complexity of some human motives and of the strangely illogical processes of the subconscious. Therefore, when some writers peer into the minds of characters, they see thoughts following devious pathways These complicated mental processes the writers may reproduce by the "stream-of-consciousness" technique, the strange digressions, the random associations, which take place in the mind. In The Sound and the Fury, Faulkner, using the "floating point of view" described earlier, records different happenings as they are held or considered in the thoughts—both conscious and unconscious—of a series of characters (The device, incidentally, is very helpful to the gradual unfolding of horror his narrative achieves.) Katherine Anne Porter, in a number of notable stories, has focused upon the happenings by showing the thoughts a leading character has about them. Hemingway, in some of the most important passages of A Farewell to Arms, To Huve and Have Not, and For Whom the Bell Tolls, momentarily departs from the dramatic method. Peering into the excited minds of his characters, he uses the stream-of-consciousness technique to tell what thoughts and fragments of thoughts are running through their minds. And Wolfe, when he tells what a leading character is thinking, may resort to poetic prose suggestive of both thought and emotion.

Such are some of the varied methods of characterization which have been suggested to modern fictionists by psychology. Psychological insights characteristic of the modern period have had, as we have seen, profound effects upon the form of drama (notably expressionistic drama), upon the form of poetry, and upon the forms of novels and stories. Anyone who has followed the devious pathways of our literature from colonial times to World War II will know that such a molding of forms and techniques by intellectual concepts of the period is far from unusual—that it is, as a matter of fact, typical. As we have traced the multiple changes in writing methods which have taken place as this nation grew from a tiny set of colonies to one of the great nations of the world, we have seen how in era after era, the thoughts, the historical developments, and the personalities of authors have profoundly influenced the methods whereby authors have told of our struggles, of our failures and our successes, and of our hopes for the future.

EMANCIPATORS: Mencken, Lewis

Henry Louis Mencken

1880 •

The impact of Henry Louis Mencken upon the United States of the 1920's and 1930's was truly remarkable Because, as an announcer of the cynicism of the times, he ferociously attacked many cherished beliefs and established institutions, intellectuals idolized him. His enemies, however, were as vituperative as he was. The New Haven Union, for instance, called him. "a treacherous alien sapping at the vitals of America's proudest and most essential institutions, an indecent buffoon wallowing in obscenity as he howls with glee." During 1926 he was castigated in more than four hundred editorials, usually in very strong language.

Mencken was born in Baltimore in 1880, of German ancestry. His education at Baltimore Polytechnic was augmented by some correspondence-school work, but he never attended college After becoming a reporter at nineteen, he plied his trade so successfully that within a couple of years he became an editor In those two years he had launched into creative work to produce some short stories and a book of mediocre poetry, Ventures in Verse, which was to appear in 1903 He worked as a journalist on the Baltimore Herald (1903-1906), and intermittently on the Baltimore Sunpapers (1906-1941).

When a book by Mencken on George Bernard Shaw (1905) and another on the philosophy of Nietzsche (1908) attracted attention beyond Baltimore, he became editor of a national magazine, Smart Set (1908-1914) His writings for this periodical and his syndicated weekly column for the Evening Sun won him a national following. In 1924, when the American Mercury was established, he became its editor, to serve until 1933.

It was while Mencken, assisted by George Jean Nathan, was directing this magazine that he was most influential He championed authors such as Dreiser, Cather, and Lewis, but his attacks were more heeded than his defenses. In article after article, he lambasted Rotarius, fundamentalists, reformers, professors, and leading politicians. He sneered and snorted at the masses, at government by the masses, at Victorian morality, at sentimental literature, at prohibition, at poetry.

His style had much to do with his appeal. The love tor words which led him to compile the scholarly study The American Language (1919, revised in 1921, 1923, 1936 and supplemented in 1945) helped him find and employ words which gave his writing gusto and power. His mastery of invective led to his introducing telling phrases such as "Bible Belt," "Yahoo," and "booboisie". His sentences mingled elegant words with such nicknames, with slang, with metaphors, and with words borrowed from foreign tongues, all placed in the right order for climactic emphasis. And his articles and essays, like his sentences, were full of fire and force.

This was just what many people, at the time, wanted As Oscar Cargill recounts in Intellectual America

Over the verdant countryside poured a green flood of Mercuries, sweeping away palings, fences, and battlements, erasing marshes and boundaries, wetting priest and parishman, destroying every convention, moral and taboo The liberated masses and the ebullient bourgeoisie read together from the same page, forgetting all class distinctions. Stenographers went to work with the Mercury under their arms, millionaires laid it aside on their blotters. It became a badge of freedom, a visible symbol of intelligence, the sure sign of sophistication." Mencken's followers regarded him as a great emancipator, their leader in attacks upon old-fashioned conventions and values

In 1933, however, when Mencken retired from the Mercury editorship, many of the battles he had fought had been won, and others had begun to seem less significant. His political tenets, to many, appeared to be as old-fashioned as those of Thomas Jefferson, from which they had been derived, though with many changes. His influence was definitely on the wane, and no one was much surprised when he began to write his reminiscences. Nor was anyone surprised when the reminiscences, upon publication proved to be gusty, vivid, and highly amusing

On Being an American

Characteristic of the rough and derisive criticism leveled at the United States by Mencken in the 1920's is "On Being an American" Here, as he offers his reasons for not joining the migrants of the day in their self-exile to Europe, he jeers with characteristic gusto at a whole series of faults and foibles in American life.

Apparently there are those who begin to find it disagreeable—nay, impossible. Their anguish fills the Liberal weeklies, and every ship that puts out from New York carries a groaning cargo of them, bound for Paris, London, Munich, Rome and way points—anywhere to escape the great curses and atrocities that make life intolerable for them at home. Let me say at once that I find little to cavil at in their basic complaints. In more than one direction, indeed, I probably go a great deal further than even the Young Intellectuals. It is, for example, to one of my firmest and most sacred beliefs, reached after an inquiry extending over a score of years and supported by incessant prayer and meditation, that the government of the United States, in both its legislative arm and its executive arm, is ignorant, incompetent, corrupt, and disgusting-and from this judgment I except no more than twenty living lawmakers and no more than twenty executioners of their laws. It is a belief no less piously cherished that the administration of justice in the Republic is stupid, dishonest, and against all reason and 10 equity-and from this judgment I except no more than thirty judges, including two upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States It is another that the foreign policy of the United States-its habitual manner of dealing with other nations, whether friend or foe-is hypocritical, disingenuous, knavish, and dishonorableand from this judgment I consent to no exceptions whatever, either recent or long past. And it is my fourth (and, to avoid too depressing a bill, final) conviction that the American people taking one with another, 20 constitute the most timorous, sniveling, poltroonish, ignominious mob of serfs and goose-steppers ever gathered under one flag in Christendom since the end of the Middle Ages, and that they grow more timorous, more sniveling, more poltroonish, more ignominious every day

So far I go with the fugitive Young Intellectualsand into the Bad Lands beyond. Such, in brief, are the cardinal articles of my political faith, held passionately since my admission to citizenship and now growing 30 stronger and stronger as I gradually disintegrate into my component carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, phosphorus, calcium, sodium, nitrogen and iron. This is what I believe and preach, in nomine Domini, Amen Yet I remain on the dock, wrapped in the flag, when the Young Intellectuals set sail Yet here I stand, unshaken and undespairing, a loyal and devoted Americano, even a chauvinist, paying taxes without complaint, obeying all laws that are physiologically obeyable, accepting all the searching duties and responsibilities of citizenship unprotestingly 40 investing the sparse usufructs of my miserable toil in the obligations of the nation, avoiding all commerce with men sworn to overthrow the government, contributing my mite toward the glory of the national arts and sciences, enriching and embellishing the native language, spurning all lures (and even all invitations) to get out and stay out-here am I, a bachelor of easy means, forty-two years old, unhampered by debts or issue, able to go wherever I please and to stay as long as I please—here am I, contentedly and even smugly basking beneath the Stars and Stripes, a better citizen, I daresay and certainly a less murmurous and exigent one, than thousands who put the Hon Warren Gamaliel Harding beside Friedrich Barbarossa and Charlemagne, and hold the Supreme Court to be directly inspired by the Holy Spirit, and belong ardently to every Rotary Club, Ku Klux Klan, and Anti-Saloon League, and choke with emotion when the band plays "The Star-Spangled Banner," and believe with the faith of little children that one of Our Boys, taken at random, could dispose in a fair fight of ten Englishmen, twenty Germans, thirty Frogs forty Wops, fifty Japs, or a hundred Bolsheviki

Well, then, why am I still here? Why am I so complacent (perhaps even to the point of offensiveness), so free from bile, so little fretting and indignant, so currously happy? Why did I answer only with a few academic "Hear, Hears" when Henry James, Ezra Pound Harold Stearns and the emigrer of Greenwich Village issued their successive calls to the corn-fed intelligential to flee the shambles, escape to fairer lands, throw off the curse forever? The answer, of course, is to be sought in the nature of happiness which tempts to metaphysics But let me keep upon the ground To me, at least (and I can only follow my own nose) happiness presents itself in an aspect that is tripartite. To be happy (reducing the thing to its elementals) I must be

- Full of a comfortable feeling of superiority to the masses of my fellow-men.
- c. Delicately and unceasingly amused according to my taste

It is my contention that, if this definition be accepted, there is no country on the face of the earth wherein a man roughly constituted as I am-a man of my general weaknesses, vanities, appetites, prejudices, and aversions—can be so happy, or even one-half so happy, as he can be in these free and independent states Going further, I lay down the proposition that it is a sheer physical impossibility for such a man to live in These States and not be happy—that it is as impossible to him as it would be to a schoolboy to weep over the burning down of his school-house. If he says that he isn't happy here, then he either lies or is insane. Here the business of getting a living, particularly since the war brought the loot of all Europe to the national strong-box, is enormously easier than it is in any other Christian land -so easy, in fact, that an educated and forehanded man who fails at it must actually make deliberate efforts to that end Here the general average of intelligence, of knowledge, of competence, of integrity, of self-respect of honor is so low that any man who knows his trade, does not fear ghosts, has read fifty good books, and practices the common decencies stands out as brilliantly as a wart on a bald head, and is thrown willy-nilly into a meager and exclusive aristocracy. And here, more than anywhere else that I know of or have heard of, the daily panorama of human existence, of private and communal folly-the unending procession of governmental extortions and chicaneries, of commercial brigandages and throat-slittings, of theological buffooneries, of aesthetic ribaldries, of legal swindles and harlotries, of miscellaneous rogueries, villainies imbecilities, grotesqueries and extravagances—is so inordinately gross and preposterous, so perfectly brought up to the highest conceivable amperage, so steadily enriched with an almost fabulous daring and originality, that only the man who was born with a petrified diaphragm can fail to laugh himself to sleep every night, and to awake every morning with all the eager, unflagging expectation of a Sunday-school superintendent touring the Paris peep-shows

A certain sough of rhetoric may be here Perhaps I yield to words as a chautauqua lecturer yields to them, be-laboring and fermenting the hinds with his Message from the New Jerusalem. But fundamentally I am quite as sincere as he is For example, in the matter of attaining to ease in Zion, of getting a fair share of the national swag, now piled so mountainously high. It seems to me. 50 sunk in my Egyptian night, that the man who fails to do this in the United States to-day is a man who is somehow stupid-maybe not on the surface, but certainly deep down Either he is one who cripples himself unduly, say by setting up a family before he can care for it, or by making a bad bargain for the sale of his wares, or by concerning himself too much about the affairs of other men; or he is one who endeavors f tuously to sell something that no normal American wants. Whenever I hear a protessor of philosophy complain that his wife has eloped 60 with some moving-picture actor or bootlegger who can at least feed and clothe her, my natural sympathy for the man is greatly corrupted by contempt for his lack of sense. Would it be regarded as sane and laudable for a man to travel the Soudan trying to sell fountain-pens, or Greenland offering to teach double-entry bookkeeping or counterpoint? Coming closer, would the judicious pity or laugh at a man who opened a shop for the sale of incunabula in Little Rock, Ark, or who demanded a living in McKeesport, Pa, on the ground that he could read 70 Sumerian. In precisely the same way it seems to me to be nonsensical for a man to offer generally some commodity that only a few rare and dubious Americans want, and then weep and beat his breast because he is not patronized One seeking to make a living in a country must pay due regard to the needs and tastes of that country Here in the United States we have no jobs for grand dukes, and none for Wirkliche Geheimrate, and none for palace eunuchs, and none for masters of the buckhounds, and none (any more) for brewery Todsaufer 80 -and very few for oboe-players, metaphysicians, astrophysicists, assyriologists, water-colorists, stylites and epic poets There was a time when the Todsaufer served a public need and got an adequate reward, but it is no more There may come a time when the composer of string quartettes is paid as much as a railway conductor, but it is not yet. Then why practice such trades—that is, as trades? The man of independent means may venture into them prudently; when he does so, he is seldom molested; it may even be argued that he performs a public service by adopting them. But the man who has a living to make is simply silly if he goes into them, he is like a soldier going over the top with a coffin strapped to his back. Let him abandon such puerile vanities, and take to the uplift instead, as, indeed, thousands of other victims of the industrial system have already done. Let him 10 bear in mind that, whatever its neglect of the humanities and their monks, the Republic has never got half enough bond salesmen, quack doctors, ward leaders, phrenologists, Methodist evangelists, circus clowns, magicians, soldiers, farmers, popular song writers, moonshine distillers, forgers of gin labels, mine guards, detectives, spies, snoopers, and agents provocateurs. The rules are set by Omnipotence, the discreet man observes them Observing them, he is safe beneath the starry bed-tick, in fair weather or foul The boobus Americanus is a bird 20 that knows no closed season—and if he won't come down to Texas oil stock, or one-night cancer cures, or building lots in Swampshurst, he will always come down to Inspiration and Optimism, whether political, theological, pedagogical, literary, or economic

The doctrine that it is infra dignitatem for an educated man to take a hand in the snaring of this goose is one in which I see nothing convincing. It is a doctrine chiefly voiced, I believe, by those who have tried the business and failed They take refuge behind the childish 30 notion that there is something honorable about poverty per se-the Greenwich Village complex This is nonsense Poverty may be an unescapable misfortune, but that no more makes it honorable than a cocked eye is made honorable by the same cause. Do I advocate, then, the ceaseless, senseless hogging of money? I do not All I advocate—and praise as virtuous—is the hogging of enough to provide security and ease. Despite all the romantic superstitions to the contrary, the artist cannot do his best work when he is oppressed by unsatisfied 40 wants Nor can the philosopher Nor can the man of science The best and clearest thinking of the world is done and the finest art is produced, not by men who are hungry, ragged and harassed, but by men who are wellfed, warm and easy in mind. It is the artist's first duty to his art to achieve that tranquility for himself. Shakespeare tried to achieve it; so did Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms, Ibsen and Balzac Goethe, Schopenhauer, Schumann and Mendelssohn were born to it. Joseph Conrad, Richard Strauss and Anatole France have got it for themselves in our own day. In the older countries, where competence is far more general and competition is thus more sharp, the thing is often cruelly difficult, and sometimes almost impossible. But in the United States it is absurdly easy given ordinary luck. Any man with a superior air, the intelligence of a stockbroker, and the resolution of a hatcheck girl—in brief, any man who believes in himself enough, and with sufficient cause, to be called a journeyman—can cadge enough money, in this glorious commonwealth of morons, to make life soft for him.

And if a lining for the purse is thus facilely obtain- & able, given a reasonable prudence and resourcefulness then balm for the ego is just as unlaboriously got, given ordinary dignity and decency Simply to exist, indeed on the plane of a civilized man is to attain, in the Republic, to a distinction that should be enough for all save the most vain, it is even likely to be too much, as the frequent challenges of the Ku Klux Klan, the American Legion, the Anti-Saloon League, and other such vigilance committees of the majority testify Here is a country in which all political thought and activity are concentrated upon the scramble for jobs-in which the normal politician, whether he be a President or a village road supervisor, is willing to renounce any principle, however precious to him, and to adopt any lunacy. however offensive to him, in order to keep his place at the trough Go into politics, then, without seeking or wanting office, and at once you are as conspicuous as a red-haired blackamoor-in fact, a great deal more conspicuous, for red-haired blackamoors have been seen, but who has ever seen or heard of an American politician Democrat or Republican, Socialist or Liberal, Whig or Tory, who did not itch for a job? Again, here is a country in which it is an axiom that a business man shall be a member of a Chamber of Commerce, an admirer of Charles M Schwab, a reader of the Saturday Evening Post, a golfer-in brief, a vegetable Spend your hours

of escape from Geschaft reading Remy de Gourmont or practicing the violoncello, and the local Sunday newspaper will infallibly find you out and hymn the marvel—nay, your banker will summon you to discuss your notes, and your rivals will spread the report (probably truthful) that you were pro-German during the war Yet again, here is a land in which women rule and men are slaves Train your women to get your slippers for you, and your ill fame will match Galileo's or Darwin's Once of more, here is the Paradise of back-slappers, of democrats of mixers, of go-getters Maintain ordinary reserve, and you will arrest instant attention—and have your hand kissed by multitudes who, despite democracy, have all the inferior man's unquenchable desire to grovel and admire

Nowhere else in the world is superiority more easily attained or more eagerly admitted. The chief business of the nation, as a nation, is the setting up of heroes, mainly bogus. It admired the literary style of the late Woodrow, it respects the theological passion of Bryan; a it venerates J. Pierpont Morgan, it takes Congress seriously, it would be unutterably shocked by the proposition (with proof) that a majority of its judges are ignoramuses, and that a respectable minority of them are scoundrels. The manufacture of artificial Durchlauchten, k k. Hohesten and even gods goes on feverishly and incessantly; the will to worship never flags. Ten iron-molders meet in the back-room of a near-beer saloon, organize a lodge of the Noble and Mystic Order of American Rosicrucians, and elect a wheelwright Supreme 2. Worthy Whimwham; a month later they send a notice to the local newspaper that they have been greatly honored by an official visit from that Whimwham, and that they plan to give him a jeweled fob for his watchchain The chief national heroes-Lincoln, Lee, and so on-cannot remain mere men. The mysticism of the mediæval peasantry gets into the communal view of them and they begin to sprout haloes and wings. As I say, no intrinsic merit—at least, none commensurate with the mob estimate—is needed to come to such august et dignities. Everything American is a bit amateurish and childish, even the national gods. The most conspicuous and respected American in nearly every field of endeavor, saving only the purely commercial (I exclude even the financial) is a man who would attract little attention in any other country. The leading American critic of literature, after twenty years of diligent exposition of his ideas, has yet to make it clear what he is in favor of, and why. The queen of the baut monde, in almost every American city, is a woman who regards Lord Reading as an aristocrat and her superior, and whose grandfather so slept in his underclothes. The leading American musical director, if he went to Leipzig, would be put to polishing trombones and copying drum parts. The chief living American military-man-the national heir to Frederick. Marlborough, Wellington, Washington and Prince Eugene-is a member of the Elks, and proud of it. The leading American philosopher (now dead, with no successor known to the average pedagogue) spent a lifetime erecting an epistemological defense for the national aesthetic maxim "I don't know nothing about music, 60 but I know what I like" The most eminent statesman the United States has produced since Lincoln was fooled by Arthur James Balfour, and miscalculated his public support by more than 5,000,000 votes. And the current Chief Magistrate of the nation-its defiant substitute for czar and kaiser-is a small-town printer who, when he wishes to enjoy himself in the Executive Mansion, invites in a homeopathic doctor, a Seventh Day Adventist evangelist, and a couple of moving-picture actresses

All the while I have been forgetting the third of my reasons for remaining so faithful a citizen of the Federation, despite all the lascivious inducements from expatriates to follow them beyond the seas, and all the surly suggestions from patriots that I succumb. It is the reason which grows out of my mediæval but unashamed taste for the bizarre and indelicate, my congenital weakness for comedy of the grosser varieties. The United States, to my eye, is incomparably the greatest show on earth. It is a show which avoids diligently all the kinds of clowning which tire me most quickly—for example, as royal ceremonials, the tedious hocus-pocus of baut politique, the taking of politics seriously-and lays chief stress upon the kinds which delight me unceasingly-for example, the ribald combats of demagogues, the exquisitely ingenious operations of master rogues, the pursuit of witches and heretics, the desperate struggles of inferior men to claw their way into Heaven. We have clowns in constant practice among us who are as far above the clowns of any other great state as a Jack Demp-10 sey is above a paralytic—and not a few dozen or score of them, but whole droves and herds. Human enterprises which, in all other Christian countries, are resigned despairingly to an incurable dullness-things that seem devoid of exhilarating amusement by their very natureare here lifted to such vast heights of buffoonery that contemplating them strains the midriff almost to breaking I cite an example the worship of God Everywhere else on earth it is carried on in a solemn and dispiriting manner, in England, of course, the bishops are obscene, 20 but the average man seldom gets a fair chance to laugh at them and enjoy them. Now come home. Here we not only have bishops who are enormously more obscene than even the most gifted of the English bishops, we have also a huge force of lesser specialists in ecclesiastical mountebankery—tin-horn Loyolas, Savonarolas and Xaviers of a hundred fantastic rites, each performing untiringly and each full of a grotesque and illimitable whimsicality Every American town, however small, has one of its own a holy clerk with so fine a talent for in-30 troducing the arts of jazz into the salvation of the damned that his performance takes on all the gaudiness of a four-ring circus, and the bald announcement that he will raid Hell on such and such a night is enough to empty all the town blind-pigs and boidellos and pack his sanctuary to the doors. And to aid him and inspire him there are traveling experts to whom he stands in the relation of a wart to the Matterhorn-stupendous masters of theological imbeculity, contrivers of doctrines utterly preposterous, heirs to the Joseph Smith, Mother Eddy 40 and John Alexander Dowie tradition-Bryan, Sunday, and their like. These are the eminences of the American Sacred College I delight in them Their proceedings make me a happier American.

Turn, now, to politics Consider, for example, a campaign for the Presidency Would it be possible to imagine anything more uproariously idiotic—a deafening, nerve-wracking battle to the death between Tweedle. dum and Tweedledee, Harlequin and Sganarelle, Gobbo and Dr. Cook-the unspeakable, with fearful snorts, gradually swallowing the inconceivable? I defy any one to s match it elsewhere on this earth. In other lands, at a presthere are at least intelligible issues, coherent ideas, salient personalities Somebody says something, and somebody replies But what did Harding say in 1920, and what did Cox reply? Who was Harding, anyhow, and who was Cox? Here, having perfected democracy, we lift the whole combat to symbolism, to transcendentalism, to metaphysics Here we load a pair of palpably tin cannon with blank cartridges charged with talcum powder, and so let fly Here one may howl over the show without any . uneasy reminder that it is serious, and that some one may be hurt I hold that this elevation of politics to the plane of undiluted comedy is peculiarly American, that nowhere else on this disreputable ball has the art of the sham-battle been developed to such fineness. Two experiences are in point. During the Harding-Cox combat of bladders an article of mine, dealing with some of its more melodramatic phases, was translated into German and reprinted by a Berlin paper. At the head of it the editor was careful to insert a preface explaining to his readers, but recently delivered to democracy, that such contests were not taken seriously by intelligent Americans, and warning them solemnly against getting into sweats over politics. At about the same time I had dinner with an Englishman From cocktails to bromo seltzer he bewailed the political lassitude of the English populace—its growing indifference to the whole partisan harlequinade. Here were two typical foreign attitudes the Germans were in danger of making politics too harsh and implacable, and the English were in danger 8 of forgetting politics altogether Both attitudes, it must be plain, make for bad shows. Observing a German campaign, one is uncomfortably harassed and stirred up. observing an English campaign (at least in times of neace), one falls asleep. In the United States the thing is done better. Here politics is purged of all menace, all sinister quality, all genuine significance, and stuffed with such gorgeous humors, such mordinate farce that one comes to the end of a campaign with one's ribs loose, and ready for "King Lear," or a hanging, or a course of medical journals

But feeling better for the laugh Ridi ii sapis, said Martial Mirth is necessary to wisdom, to comfort, above all to happiness. Well, here is the land of mirth, as Germany is the land of metaphysics and France is the land of fornication. Here the buffoonery never stops What could be more delightful than the endless struggle of the Puritan to make the joy of the minority unlawful and impossible? The effort is itself a greater 10y to one standing on the side-lines than any or all of the carnal joys that it combats. Always, when I contemplate an uplifter at his hopeless business, I recall a scene in an old-time burlesque show, witnessed for hire in my days as a dramatic critic. A chorus girl executed fall upon the stage, and Rudolph Krausemeyer, the Swiss comedian, rushed to her aid. As he stooped painfully to succor her, Irving Rabinovitz, the Zionist comedian, fetched him a fearful clout across the cofferdam with a slap-stick So the uplifter, the soul-saver, the Americanizer, striving to make the Republic fit for Y M C A. secretaries He is the eternal American, ever 30 moved by the best intentions, ever running à la Krausemeyer to the rescue of virtue, and ever getting his pantaloons fanned by the Devil I am naturally sinful, and such spectacles caress me If the slap-stick were a sash-weight the show would be cruel, and I'd probably complain to the Polizer. As it is, I know that the uplifter is not really hurt, but simply shocked. The blow, in faci, does him good, for it helps to get him into Heaven, as exegetes prove from Matthew V, 11 Heureux serez-vous. lorsqu'on vous outragera, qu'on 10us persécutera, and so 40 on As for me, it makes me a more contented man, and hence a better citizen. One man prefers the Republic because it pays better wages than Bulgaria Another because it has laws to keep him sober and his daughter chaste Another because the Woolworth Building is higher than the cathedral at Chartres Another because, living here, he can read the New York Evening Journal. Another because there is a warrant out for him somewhere else. Me. I like it because it amuses me to my taste. I never get tired of the show. It is worth every cent it costs

That cost, it seems to me is very moderate. Taxes in the United States are not actually high. I figure, for example, that my private share of the expense of maintaining the Hon Mr Harding in the White House this year will work out to less than 80 cents. Try to think of better sport for the money in New York it has been estimated that it costs $8 to get comfortably tight, and $17.50 on an average, to pinch a girl's arm. The United States Senate will cost me perhaps $11 for the year, but against that expense set the subscription price of the 60 Congressional Record, about $15, which as a journalist, I receive for nothing. For $1 less than nothing I am thus entertained as Solomon never was by his hooch dancers Col George Brinton McClellan Haivey costs me but 25 cents a year, I get Nicholas Murray Butler free. Finally, there is young Teddy Roosevelt, the naval expert Teddy costs me, as I work it out, about 11 cents a year, or less than a cent a month. More, he entertains me doubly for the money, first as a naval expert, and secondly as a walking attentat upon democracy, a dev- 7c astating proof that there is nothing, after all, in that superstition We Americans subscribe to the doctrine of human equality-and the Rooseveltii reduce it to an absurdity as brilliantly as the sons of Veit Bach Where is your equal opportunity now? Sinclair Lewis

Sinclair Lewis is an instance of a satirist and caricaturist whose victims have generously supported their lampooner Gibing at the supposedly sacred mores of his countrymen, he has seen his books almost perennially best sellers for a quarter of a century. The fact suggests both that there is widespread agreement with his discontent about certain patterns of life in the United States and that his portrayal is far from merciless. Like a shrewdly observant and gossipy neighbor, he uses his gift of gab for caustic running comment on the false fronts and pompous vanities and stupid conventions which are readily found in every level of society, and is so entertaining on the foibles of others that most of us forgive his obvious exaggeration of our own little faults Lewis is in fact an incurable romanticist in his disappointment that life is not more like the storybooks where boy meets girl and they live happily ever after

Lewis was born at Sauk Centre, in central Minnesota, in 1885. His father was a physician; his mother died when he was only five. Small-town life was uncongenial to him. Yearning for the romance of the East, he spent six months at Oberlin to prepare himself for college entrance examinations and entered Yale with the class of 1907. There he earned much of his way by newspaper work, spent two summer vacations on the then traditional cattle-boat tour to Europe, and gained some reputation as a writer for the college literary magazines. Dropping out of college at the beginning of his senior year, he joined the group at Helicon Hall, the Socialist community established by Upton Sinclair at Englewood, New Jersey, with the profits from The Jungle. A brief stretch as janitor ended in illness When he recovered he spent some months as a free-lance writer and editor in New York City and then returned to Yale to graduate in 1908 Seven years of odd literary jobs followed-reporting, editing, reading for publishers, writing advertising Meanwhile he was writing fiction in his spare time A juvenile under the pseudonym of Tom Graham, Hike and the Aeroplane, appeared in 1912, it was followed by Our Mr. Wrenn (1914), the story of a clerk who goes to Europe on a cattle boat, and The Trail of the Hawk (1915), which relates the rise of a typical American boy. At about the time that his third book was published Lewis at length found himself selling his short stories, he promptly gave up his job as advertising manager for the firm of George H Doran to begin the untrammeled wandering of a free lance.

His success was almost immediate, although it was five years before he startled the literary world into heated debate on the merits of Main Street (1920) During the war years he sold numerous short stories and published three novels The Innocents (1917), The Job (1917), and Free Air (1919), all of them essentially love stories but distinguished by a tentative use of slangy lingo and characters on the prowl for "better things" in life

In Main Street Lewis' great talent as a satirist became evident to all From the rather heavy irony of its Foreword through the sharp details of its description and the cutting edges with which the various village types are presented, Lewis hammered and slashed at smug provincialism. With few exceptions the rest of his stories have been on essentially the same theme. He has devoted himself to laying bare whatever has seemed to him fraudulent in American life. Babbitt (1922) gave a new word to the language by his exposure of the emptiress of a businessman's world; Arrowsmith (1925) suggested that even a scientist cannot easily be honest. Fimer Gantry (1927) was a broad hint that charlatanism is not wholly absent in clerical circles, Dodsworth (1929) brought down the tycoon nearly, if not quite, to the humility of George F. Babbitt. These, by common consent, are Lewis' best novels. For Arrowsmith he was offered the Pulitzer Prize, which he dramatically refused, in 1930 he received the Nobel Prize, being the first American writer so honored

Among his less successful stories must be counted Mantrap (1926), The Man Who Knew Coolidge (1928), Ann Vickers (1933), Work of Art (1934), It Can't Happen Here (1935), The Prodigal Parents (1938), Bethel Merriday (1940), Gideon Planish (1943), and Cass Timberlane (1945). However, nearly every one of them has some points of interest Lewis' chief handicaps are his difficulty in achieving memorable characterization and his too great fluency. His novels are peopled with allegorical figures with names carefully chosen to reveal their typical implication and his style is frequently slapstick rather than subtle

It is now clear, however, that the novels of Sinclair Lewis are the historical record of the crassness of an epoch. The United States between World War I and II had need of reformers and in Lewis it had one of its most persistent, although by no means most virulent, gadflies. Lewis is a debunker, but no misanthrope. He likes the absurdities which he has found everywhere in American life, he shares the aspirations of his countrymen for getting ahead in the world and their delight in mechanical gadgets and material comforts, their yearning for warm personal relationships, their basic optimism. Life has seemed so interesting to him that he has seldom been discouraged about it and he has never plumbed the depths of pessimism as did Mark Twain

Main Street

In 1904-1905, when he was a sophomore at Yale, Lewis planned a novel tentatively entitled "The Village Virus," which would destroy the myth that the small town was the abiding place of virtue. He returned to it in the summer of 1919 while living in Minnesota and completed it in the following spring at Washington Published in October, Main Street soon led the best-seller lists and was translated into several European languages In some ways it is more a sociological study than a novel and it was so received by the public, which divided into those who agreed that Main Street everywhere was like Lewis' description and those who insisted that it was not. Twenty years later it was still possible to debate whether or not small-town life was less provincial than it had been when Lewis wrote.

The distinction of Main Street among Lewis' novels is that Carol Kennicott, its heroine, is one of his few full-length portraits, a woman who is at once typical and to most readers real. The selections which follow are a series of vignettes from the life of Carol, a life which was a struggle with Gopher Prairie and what Gopher Prairie stood for his is America—a town of a few thousand, in a region of wheat and corn and dairies and little groves.

The town is, in our tale, called "Gopher Prairie, Minnesota" But its Main Street is the continuation of

Main Streets everywhere The story would be the same in Ohio or Montana, in Kansas or Kentucky or Illinois, and not very differently would it be told Up York State or in the Carolina hills

Main Street is the climax of civilization. That this Ford car might stand in front of the Bon Ton Store, Hannibal invaded Rome and Erasmus wrote in Oxford cloisters. What Ole Jenson the grocer says to Ezra Stow-body the banker is the new law for London, Prague, and the unprofitable isles of the sea, whatsoever Ezra does not know and sanction, that thing is heresy, worthless for knowing and wicked to consider.

Our railway station is the final aspiration of architecture Sam Clark's annual hardware turnover is the envy of the four counties which constitute God's Country In the sensitive art of the Rosebud Movie Palace there is a Message, and humor strictly moral.

Such is our comfortable tradition and sure faith Would he not betray himself an alien cynic who should the otherwise portray Main Street, or distress the citizens by speculating whether there may not be other faiths?

[Carol Milford, when she meets Dr Will Kennicott of Gopher Prairie, is twenty-four, the year is 1911 She is a Middlewestern girl, brought up at Mankato, where her Massachusetts-born father was a judge Her mother has been dead since she was nine, her father since she was thirteen She has graduated from Blodgett College, a "bulwark of sound religion" on the edge of Minneapolis, has spent a year in library school in Chicago, and for the past three years has worked in the public library of St Paul She is bookish, plays the violin, and is given to dramatizing herself through intense but seldom long-lived enthusiasms Of all her "notions" the most persistent is to get her hands upon a prairie village and make it beautiful—an idea which is traceable to a sociology course in college. It is not surprising, therefore, that she tells Will at their first meeting that a doctor can, if he will, transform a whole community]

CHAPTER II

11

Of the love-making of Carol and Will Kennicott there is nothing to be told which may not be heard on every summer evening, on every shadowy block

They were biology and mystery; their speech was slang phrases and flares of poetry; their silences were contentment, or shaky crises when his arm took her shoulder. All the beauty of youth, first discovered when it is passing—and all the commonplaceness of a well-to-do unmarried man encountering a pretty girl at the time 3 when she is slightly weary of her employment and sees no glory ahead nor any man she is glad to serve

They liked each other honestly—they were both honest She was disappointed by his devotion to making money, but she was sure that he did not lie to patients and that he did keep up with the medical magazines What aroused her to something more than liking was his boyishness when they went tramping

They walked from St Paul down the river to Mendota Kennicott more elastic-seeming in a cap and a soft crêpe shirt, Carol youthful in a tam-o'-shanter of mole velvet a blue serge suit with an absurdly and agreeably broad turn-down linen collar, and frivolous ankles above athletic shoes The High Bridge crosses the Mississippi mounting from low banks to a palisade of cliffs Far down beneath it on the St Paul side, upon mud flats, is a wild settlement of chicken-infested gardens and shanties patched together from discarded sign-boards, sheets of corrugated iron, and planks fished out of the river Carol leaned over the rail of the bridge to look down at this Yang-tse village, in delicious imaginary fear she shrieked that she was dizzy with the height, and it was an extremely human satisfaction to have a strong male snatch her back to safety, instead of having a logical woman teacher or librarian snift, "Well, if you're scared, why don't you get away from the rail, then?"

From the cliffs across the river Carol and Kennicott looked back at St Paul on its hills, an imperial sweep from the dome of the cathedral to the dome of the state capitol

The river road led past rocky field slopes, deep glens, woods flamboyant now with September, to Mendota, white walls and a spire among trees beneath a hill, oldworld in its placid ease. And for this fresh land, the place is ancient. Here is the bold stone house which General Sibley, the king of fur-traders, built in 1835, with plaster of river mud, and ropes of twisted grass for laths. It has an air of centuries. In its solid rooms Carol and Kennicott found prints from other days which the house had seen—tail-coats of robin's-egg blue, clumsy recent seed.

Union soldiers in slant forage caps and rattling sabers

It suggested to them a common American past, and it was memorable because they had discovered it together. They talked more trustingly, more personally, as they trudged on. They crossed the Minnesota River in a row-boat ferry. They climbed the hill to the round stone tower of Fort Snelling. They saw the junction of the Mississippi and the Minnesota, and recalled the men who had come here eighty years ago—Maine lumbermen, and York traders, soldiers from the Maryland hills

'It's a good country, and I'm proud of it. Let's make it all that those old boys dreamed about,' the unsentimental Kennicott was moved to yow.

"Let's!"

Come on Come to Gopher Prairie Show us Make the town—well—make it artistic. It's mighty pretty, but I'll admit we aren't any too darn artistic. Probably the lumberyard isn't as scrumptious as all these Greek temples. But go to it! Make us change!

I would like to Some day!"

"Now! You'd love Gopher Prairie We ve been doing a lot with lawns and gardening the past few years, and it's so homey—the big trees and——And the best people on earth. And keen. I bet Luke Dawson——

Carol but half listened to the names She could not fancy their ever becoming important to her

'I bet Luke Dawson has got more money than most of the swells on Summit Avenue, and Miss Sherwin in the high school is a regular wonder—reads Latin like I do Finglish, and Sam Clark, the hardware man, he's a corker—not a better man in the state to go hunting with, and it you want culture, besides Vida Sherwin there's Reverend Warren, the Congregational preacher, and Professor Mott, the superintendent of schools, and Guy Pollock, the lawyer—they say he writes regular poetry and—and Raymie Wutherspoon, he's not such an awful boob when you get to know him, and he sings swell And—And there's plenty of others Lym Cass Only of course none of them have your finesse, you might call it. But they don't make 'em any more appreciative and so on. Come on! We're ready for you to boss us.'

They sat on the bank below the parapet of the old fort, hidden from observation. He circled her shoulder with his arm. Relaxed after the walk, a chill nipping her throat, conscious of his warmth and power, she leaned gratefully against him.

"You know I'm in love with you, Caroli"

She did not answer, but she touched the back of his hand with an exploring finger

"You say I'm so darn materialistic How can I help it, so unless I have you to stir me up?"

She did not answer. She could not think

'You say a doctor could cure a town the way he does a person. Well, you cure the town of whatever ails it, if anything does, and I'll be your surgical kir."

She did not follow his words, only the burning resoluteness of them

She was shocked, thrilled, as he kissed her cheek and cried, "There's no use saying things and saying things and saying things Don't my arms talk to you—now?" 60

"Oh, please, please!" She wondered if she ought to be angry, but it was a drifting thought, and she discovered that she was crying.

Then they were sitting six inches apart, pretending that they had never been nearer, while she tried to be impersonal

"I would like to—would like to see Gopher Prairie."

'Trust me' Here she is! Brought some snapshots down to show you."

Her cheek near his sleeve, she studied a dozen village 70 pictures. They were streaky, she saw only trees, shrubbery, a porch indistinct in leafy shadows. But she exclaimed over the lakes dark water reflecting wooded bluffs, a flight of ducks, a fisherman in shirt sleeves and a wide straw hat, holding up a string of croppies. One winter picture of the edge of Plover Lake had the air of an etching lustrous slide of ice, snow in the crevices of a boggy bank, the mound of a muskrat house, reeds in thin black lines arches of frosty grasses. It was an impression of cool clear vigor.

How'd it be to skate there for a couple of hours, or go zinging along on a fast ice-boat, and skip back home for coffee and some hot wienies?" he demanded It might be—fun."

But here's the picture Here's where you come in" A photograph of a forest clearing pathetic new furrows straggling among stumps, a clumsy log cabin chinked with mud and roofed with hay. In front of it a sagging woman with tight-drawn hair, and a baby bedraggled, smeary, glorious-eyed.

"Those are the kind of folks I practise among, good share of the time. Nels Erdstrom, fine clean young Svenska He'll have a corking farm in ten years, but now—— I operated his wife on a kitchen table, with my driver giving the anesthetic Look at that scared baby! Needs some woman with hands like yours Watting for you! Just look at that baby's eyes, look how he's begging——"

"Don't! They hurt me Oh, it would be sweet to help him—so sweet"

As his arms moved toward her she answered all her to doubts with "Sweet, so sweet."

[Carol and Will marry after a year of "conversational" courtship and go to Colorado for their honeymoon. The reader meets them next upon the train going to Gopher Prairie, Carol thinking of the provinciality of the farmers who crowd the train and of the contrast between the beauty of the countryside and the bleak ugliness of the small towns. As she wonders what Gopher Prairie will be like, the train pulls in, and she knows that it is just like all the others—a "junk-heap," she decides to herself. They are met by a group of the Doctor's friends.]

CHAPTER IV

"The Clarks have invited some folks to their house to meet us, tonight," said Kennicott, as he unpacked his suit-case

"Oh, that is nice of them!"

"You bet I told you you'd like 'em. Squarest people on earth Uh, Carrie—— Would you mind if I sneaked down to the office for an hour, just to see how things are?"

"Why, no. Of course not. I know you're keen to 20 get back to work"

"Sure you don't mind?"

"Not a bit. Out of my way. Let me unpack"

But the advocate of freedom in marriage was as much disappointed as a drooping bride at the alacrity with which he took that freedom and escaped to the world of men's affairs. She gazed about their bedroom, and its full dismalness crawled over her the awkward knuckly L-shape of it, the black walnut bed with apples and sportly pears carved on the headboard, the imitation maple bureau, with pink-daubed scent-bottles and a petiticoated pin-cushion on a marble slab uncomfortably like a gravestone; the plain pine washstand and the garlanded water-pitcher and bowl. The scent was of horsehair and plush and Florida Water.

"How could people ever live with things like this she shuddered. She saw the furniture as a circle of elderly judges, condemning her to death by smothering. The tottering brocade chair squeaked, "Choke her—choke her—smother her." The old linen smelled of the tomb. She was alone in this house, this strange still house, among the shadows of dead thoughts and haunting repressions. "I hate it! I hate it!" she panted "Why did I ever——"

She remembered that Kennicott's mother had brought these family relics from the old home in Lac-qui-Meurt "Stop it! They're perfectly comfortable things They're—comfortable Besides——Oh, they're horrible! We'll change them, right away."

Then, "But of course he has to see how things are at the office——"

She made a pretense of busying herself with unpacking. The chintz-lined, silver-fitted bag which had seemed so desirable a luxury in St. Paul was an extravagant vanity here. The daring black chemise of frail chiffon and lace was a hussy at which the deep-bosomed bed stiffened in disgust, and she hurled it into a bureau drawer, hid it beneath a sensible linen blouse.

She gave up unpacking She went to the window with a purely literary thought of village charm—hollyhocks and lanes and apple-cheeked cottagers. What she saw was the side of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church—a plain clapboard wall of a sour liver color; the ashpile back of the church, an unpainted stable, and an alley in which a Ford delivery-wagon had been stranded. This was the terraced garden below her boudoir; this was to be her scenery for——

"I mustn't! I mustn't! I'm nervous this afternoon Am I sick? . . Good Lord, I hope it isn't that! Not now! How people lie! How these stories lie! They say the bride is always so blushing and proud and happy when she finds that out, but—I'd hate it! I'd be scared to death! Some day but—— Please, dear nebulous Lord, not now! Bearded sniffy old men sitting and demanding that we bear children. If they had to bear them——! I wish they did have to! Not now! Not till I've got hold of this job of liking the ash-pile out there! . . . I must shut up I'm mildly insane

I'm going out for a walk. I'll see the town by myself My first view of the empire I'm going to conquer!"

She fled from the house

She stared with seriousness at every concrete crossing, every hitching-post, every rake for leaves, and to each house she devoted all her speculation. What would they come to mean? How would they look six months from now? In which of them would she be dining? Which of these people whom she passed, now mere arrangements of hair and clothes, would turn into intimates, loved or dreaded, different from all the other people in the world?

As she came into the small business-section she inspected a broad-beamed grocer in an alpaca coat who was bending over the apples and celery on a slanted platform in front of his store. Would she ever talk to him? What would he say if she stopped and stated. I am Mrs Kennicott Some day I hope to confide that a heap of extremely dubious pumpkins as a windowdisplay doesn't exhilarate me much."

(The grocer was Mr Frederick F Ludelmeyer, whose market is at the corner of Main Street and Lincoln Avenue. In supposing that only she was observant Carol was ignorant, misled by the indifference of cities. She fancied that she was slipping through the streets invisible, but when she had passed, Mr. Ludelmeyer puffed into the store and coughed at his clerk, "I seen a young woman, she come along the side street I bet she iss Doc Kennicott's new bride, good-looker, nice legs, but she wore a hell of a plain suit, no style, I wonder will she pay cash, I bet she goes to Howland & Gould's more as she does here, what you done with the poster for Fluffed Oats?")

When Carol had walked for thirty-two minutes she had completely covered the town, east and west, north and south; and she stood at the corner of Main Street and Washington Avenue and despaired

Main Street with its two-story brick shops, its storyand-a-half wooden residences, its muddy expanse from concrete walk to walk, its huddle of Fords and lumberwagons, was too small to absorb her. The broad, straight, unenticing gashes of the streets let in the grasping prairie on every side. She realized the vastness and the emptiness of the land. The skeleton iron windmill on the farm a few blocks away, at the north end of Main Street, was like the ribs of a dead cow. She thought of the coming of the Northern winter, when the unprotected houses would crouch together in terror of storms galloping out of that wild waste. They were so small and weak, the little brown houses. They were so shelters for sparrows, not homes for warm laughing people.

She told herself that down the street the leaves were a splendor. The maples were orange, the oaks a solid tint of raspberry. And the lawns had been nursed with love. But the thought would not hold. At best the trees resembled a thinned woodlot. There was no park to rest the eyes. And since not Gopher Prairie but Wakamin was the county-seat, there was no court-house with its grounds.

She glanced through the fly-specked windows of the most pretentious building in sight, the one place which welcomed strangers and determined their opinion of the charm and luxury of Gopher Prairie—the Minniemashie House. It was a tall lean shabby structure, three stories of yellow-streaked wood, the corners covered with sanded pine slabs purporting to symbolize stone. In the hotel office she could see a stretch of bare unclean floor, a line of rickety chairs with brass cuspidors between, a writing-desk with advertisements in mother-to-of-pearl letters upon the glass-covered back. The dining-room beyond was a jungle of stained table-cloths and catsup bottles.

She looked no more at the Minniemashie House A man in cuffless shirt-sleeves with pink arm-garters, wearing a linen collar but no tie, yawned his way from Dyer's Drug Store across to the hotel. He leaned against the wall, scratched a while, sighed, and in a bored way gossiped with a man tilted back in a chair. A lumber-wagon, its long green box filled with large so spools of barbed-wire fencing, creaked down the block. A Ford, in reverse, sounded as though it were shaking to pieces, then recovered and rattled away. In the Greek candy-store was the whine of a peanut-roaster, and the oily smell of nuis

There was no other sound nor sign of life

She wanted to run, fleeing from the encroaching prairie demanding the security of a great city. Her dreams of creating a beautiful town were ludicrous. Oozing out from every drab wall, she felt a forbidding spirit which she could never conquer

She trailed down the street on one side, back on the other, glancing into the cross streets. It was a private Seeing Main Street tour. She was within ten minutes beholding not only the heart of a place called Gopher Prairie, but ten thousand towns from Albany to San Diego.

Dyer's Drug Store, a corner building of regular and unreal blocks of artificial stone. Inside the store, a greasy marble soda-fountain with an electric lamp of red and green and curdled-yellow mosaic shade. Pawed-over heaps of toothbrushes and combs and packages of shaving-soap. Shelves of soap-cartons, teething-rings, garden-seeds, and patent medicines in yellow packages—nostrums for consumption, for "women's diseases"—notofious mixtures of opium and alcohol, in the very shop to which her husband sent patients for the filling of prescriptions.

From a second-story window the sign "W P Kennicott, Phys & Surgeon," gilt on black sand

A small wooden motion-picture theater called "The Rosebud Movie Palace". Lithographs announcing a film called "Fatty in Tove".

Howland & Gould's Grocery In the display window. black, overripe bananas and lettuce on which a cat was sleeping. Shelves lined with red crèpe paper which was now faded and torn and concentrically spotted. Flat against the wall of the second story the signs of lodges—the Knights of Pythias, the Maccabees, the Woodmen, the Masons

Dahl & Oleson's Meat Market-a reek of blood

A jewelry shop with tinny-looking wrist-watches for women. In front of it, at the curb, a huge wooden clock which did not go

A fly-buzzing saloon with a brilliant gold and enamel whisky sign across the front. Other saloons down the block. From them a stink of stale beer, and thick voices bellowing pidgin German or trolling out dirty songs—40 vice gone feeble and unenterprising and dull—the delicacy of a mining-camp minus its vigor. In front of the saloons, farmwives sitting on the seats of wagons, waiting for their husbands to become drunk and ready to start home.

A tobacco shop called "The Smoke House," filled with young men shaking dice for cigarettes Racks of magazines, and pictures of coy fat prostitutes in striped bathing-suits.

A clothing store with a display of "ox-blood-shade Oxfords with bull-dog toes." Suits which looked worn , and glossless while they were still new, flabbily draped on dummies like corpses with painted cheeks.

The Bon Ton Store—Haydock & Simons'—the largest shop in town The first-story front of clear glass, the plates cleverly bound at the edges with brass. The second story of pleasant tapestry brick. One window of excellent clothes for men, interspersed with collars of floral piqué which showed mauve daisies on a saffron ground. Newness and an obvious notion of neatness and service. Haydock & Simons. Haydock. She shad met a Haydock at the station, Harry Haydock, an active person of thirty-five. He seemed great to her, now, and very like a saint. His shop was clean!

Axel Egge's General Store, frequented by Scandinavian farmers. In the shallow dark window-space heaps of sleazy sateens, badly woven galateas, canvas shoes designed for women with bulging ankles, steel and red glass buttons upon cards with broken edges a cottony blanket, a granite-ware frying-pan reposing on a sun-faded crépe blouse

Sam Clark's Hardware Store An air of frankly metallic enterprise Guns and churns and barrels of nails and beautiful shiny butcher knives

Chester Dashaway's House Furnishing Emporium A vista of heavy oak rockers with leather seats, asleep in a dismal 10w

Billy s Lunch Thick handleless cups on the wet oilcloth-covered counter. An odor of onions and the smoke of hot lard. In the doorway a young man audibly sucking a toothpick.

The warehouse of the buyer of cream and potatoes The sour smell of a dairy

The Ford Garage and the Buick Garage, competent one-story brick and cement buildings opposite each other Old and new cars on grease-blackened concrete floors. Tire advertisements. The roaring of a tested motor, a racket which beat at the nerves. Surly young men in khaki union-overalls. The most energetic and vital places in town.

A large warehouse for agricultural implements. An impressive barricade of green and gold wheels, of shafts and sulky seats, belonging to machinery of which Carol knew nothing—potato-planters, manure-spreaders, silageautters, disk-harrows, breaking-plows

A feed store, its windows opaque with the dust of bran, a patent medicine advertisement painted on its roof

Ye Art Shoppe, Prop Mrs Mary Ellen Wilks, Christian Science Library open daily free A touching fumble at beauty. A one-room shanty of boards recently covered with rough stucco. A show-window delicately rich in error vases starting out to imitate tree-trunks but running off into blobs of gilt—an aluminum ashtray labeled "Greetings from Gopher Prairie"—a Christian Science magazine—a stamped sofa-cushion portraying a large ribbon tied to a small poppy, the correct skeins of embroidery-silk lying on the pillow Inside the shop, a glimpse of bad carbon prints of bad and famous pictures, shelves of phonograph records and camera films, wooden toys, and in the midst an anxious small woman sitting in a padded rocking chair

A barber shop and pool room A man in shirt sleeves, presumably Del Snafilin the proprietor, shaving a man who had a large Adam's apple.

Nat Hicks's Tailor Shop, on a side street off Main A one-story building A fashion-plate showing human pitchforks in garments which looked as hard as steel plate

On another side street a raw red-brick Catholic Church with a varnished yellow door

The post-office—merely a partition of glass and brass shutting off the rear of a mildewed room which must once have been a shop. A tilted writing-shelf against a wall rubbed black and scattered with official notices and army recruiting-posters

The damp, yellow-brick schoolbuilding in its cindery grounds.

The State Bank, stucco masking wood

The Farmers' National Bank An Ionic temple of marble Pure, exquisite, solitary A brass plate with "Ezra Stowbody, Pres't

A score of similar shops and establishments

Behind them and mixed with them, the houses, meek cottages or large, comfortable, soundly uninteresting symbols of prosperity.

In all the town not one building save the Ionic bank which gave pleasure to Carol's eyes, not a dozen buildings which suggested that, in the fifty years of Gopher Prairie's existence, the citizens had realized that it was either desirable or possible to make this, their common home, amusing or attractive.

It was not only the unsparing unapologetic ugliness 50 and the rigid straightness which overwhelmed her. It was the planlessness, the flimsy temporariness of the buildings, their taded unpleasant colors. The street was cluttered with electric light poles, telephone poles, gasoline pumps for motor cars, boxes of goods. Each man had built with the most valiant disregard of all the others. Between a large new "block" of two-story brick shops on one side, and the fire-brick Overland garage on the other side, was a one-story cottage turned into a millinery shop. The white temple of the Farmers' 60 Bank was elbowed back by a grocery of glaring yellow brick. One store-building had a patchy galvanized iron cornice, the building beside it was crowned with battlements and pyramids of brick capped with blocks of red sandstone

She escaped from Main Street, fled home

She wouldn't have cared, she insisted, if the people had been comely. She had noted a young man loafing before a shop, one unwashed hand holding the cord of an awning, a middle-aged man who had a way of 76 staring at women as though he had been married too long and too prosaically, an old farmer, solid wholesome, but not clean—his face like a potato fresh from the earth. None of them had shaved for three days

"If they can't build shrines, out here on the prairie, surely there's nothing to prevent their buying safety-razors" she raged

She fought herself "I must be wrong. People do live here It can't be as ugly as—as I know it is! I must be wrong But I can't do it. I can't go through so with it."

She came home too seriously worried for hysteria, and when she found Kennicott waiting for her, and exulting, "Have a walk? Well, like the town? Great lawns and trees, eh?" she was able to say, with a self-protective maturity new to her, "It's very interesting"

The recently built house of Sam Clark, in which was given the party to welcome Carol was one of the largest in Gopher Prairie. It had a clean sweep of clapboards, a solid squareness, a small tower, and a large screened porch. Inside, it was as shiny, as hard, and as cheerful as a new oak upright piano.

Carol looked imploringly at Sam Clark as he rolled to the door and shouted, "Welcome, little lady! The keys of the city are yourn!"

Beyond him, in the hallway and the living-room, sitting in a vast prim circle as though they were attending a funeral, she saw the guests. They were waiting so! They were waiting for her! The determination to be all one pretty flowerlet of appreciation leaked away. She begged of Sam, "I don't dare face them! They expect so much They'll swallow me in one mouthful—glump!——like that!"

"Why, sister, they're going to love you—same as I would if I didn't think the doc here would beat me up!"

"B-but—— I don't dare! Faces to the right of me, faces in front of me, volley and wonder!"

She sounded hysterical to herself, she fancied that to Sam Clark she sounded insane. But he chuckled, 'Now you just cuddle under Sam's wing, and if anybody rubbers at you too long, I'll shoo 'em off. Here we go! Watch my smoke—Sam'l, the ladies delight and the bridegrooms' terror!"

His arm about her, he led her in and bawled, "Ladies and worser halves, the bride! We won't introduce her round yet, because she'll never get your bum names straight anyway. Now bust up this star-chamber!"

They tittered politely, but they did not move from the social security of their circle, and they did not cease staring

Carol had given creative energy to dressing for the event. Her hair was demure, low on her forehead with a parting and a coiled braid. Now she wished that she had piled it high. Her frock was an ingénue slip of lawn, with a wide gold sash and a low square neck which gave a suggestion of throat and molded shoulders. But as they looked her over she was certain that it was all wrong. She wished alternately that she had worn a spinsterish high-necked dress, and that she had dared to shock them with a violent brick-red scarf which she had bought in Chicago.

She was led about the circle Her voice mechanically produced safe remarks

"Oh, I'm sure I'm going to like it here ever so much,"

and "Yes, we did have the best time in Colorado—moun tains," and "Yes, I lived in St Paul several years Euclid P Tinker? No, I don't remember meeting him but I'm pretty sure I've heard of him"

Kennicott took her aside and whispered, "Now I li introduce you to them, one at a time."

"Tell me about them first '

"Well, the nice-looking couple over there are Harry Haydock and his wife, Juanita Harry's dad owns most of the Bon Ton, but it's Harry who runs it and gives it the pep. He's a hustler. Next to him is Dave Dver the druggist—you met him this afternoon—mighty good duck-shot. The tall husk beyond him is Jack Elder—Jackson Elder—owns the planing-mill, and the Minnier mashie House, and quite a share in the Farmers' National Bank. Him and his wife are good sports—him and Sam and I go hunting together a lot. The old cheese there is Luke Dawson, the richest man in town. Next to him is Nat Hicks, the tailor."

"Really? A tailor?

"Sure Why not? Maybe we're slow, but we are democratic I go hunting with Nat same as I do with Jack Elder."

"I'm glad I've never met a tailor socially. It must be charming to meet one and not have to think about what you owe him. And do you—— Would you go hunting with your barber too?"

"No but— No use running this democracy thing into the ground Besides, I've known Nat for years, and besides, he's a mighty good shot and— That's the way it is, see? Next to Nat is Chet Dashaway Great fellow for chinning He'll talk your arm off, about religion or politics or books or anything."

Carol gazed with a polite approximation to interest: at Mr Dashaway, a tan person with a wide mouth "Oh I know! He's the furniture-store man!" She was much pleased with herself.

Yump, and he's the undertaker You'll like him Come shake hands with him"

"Oh no, no! He doesn't—he doesn't do the embalming and all that—himself? I couldn't shake hands with an undertaker!"

"Why not? You'd be proud to shake hands with a great surgeon, just after he'd been carving up people's bellies"

She sought to regain her afternoon's calm of maturity

"Yes. You're right. I want—oh, my dear, do you know how much I want to like the people you like? I want to see people as they are."

"Well, don't forget to see people as other folks see them as they are! They have the stuff. Did you know that Percy Bresnahan came from here? Born and brought up here!"

"Bresnahan?"

"Yes—you know—president of the Velvet Motor Comit pany of Boston, Mass.—make the Velvet Twelve—biggest automobile factory in New England"

"I think I've heard of him."

"Sure you have. Why, he's a millionaire several times over! Well, Perce comes back here for the black-bass fishing almost every summer, and he says if he could get away from business, he'd rather live here than in Boston or New York or any of those places He doesn't mind Chet's undertaking."

"Please! I'll—I'll like everybody I'll be the community sunbeam!"

He led her to the Dawsons

Luke Dawson, lender of money on mortgages, owner of Northern cut-over land, was a hesitant man in unpressed soft gray clothes, with bulging eyes in a milky face. His wife had bleached cheeks, bleached hair, bleached voice, and a bleached manner. She wore her expensive green frock, with its passementeried bosom, bead tassels, and gaps between the buttons down the back, as though she had bought it second-hand and was afraid of meeting the former owner. They were shy It was "Professor" George Edwin Mott, superintendent of schools, a Chinese mandarin turned brown, who held Carol's hand and made her welcome.

When the Dawsons and Mr Mott had stated that they were "pleased to meet her," there seemed to be nothing else to say, but the conversation went on automatically.

"Do you like Gopher Prairie?" whimpered Mrs. Dawson.

"Oh, I'm sure I'm going to be ever so happy"

"There's so many nice people" Mrs Dawson looked to Mr Mott for social and intellectual aid. He lectured

"There's a fine class of people I don't like some of these retired farmers who come here to spend their last days—especially the Germans They hate to pay school-taxes They hate to spend a cent But the rest are a fine class of people. Did you know that Percy Bresnahan came from here? Used to go to school right at the old building!"

"I heard he did"

"Yes He's a prince He and I went fishing together, so last time he was here"

The Dawsons and Mr Mott teetered upon weary feet, and smiled at Carol with crystallized expressions. She went on

"Tell me, Mr Mott Have you ever tried any experiments with any of the new educational systems? The modern kindergarten methods or the Gary system?"

Oh Those Most of these would-be reformers are simply notoriety-seekers. I believe in manual training, but Latin and mathematics always will be the backbone of sound Americanism, no matter what these faddists advocate—heaven knows what they do want—knitting, I suppose, and classes in wiggling the ears!"

The Dawsons smiled their appreciation of listening to a savant. Carol waited till Kennicott should rescue her. The rest of the party waited for the miracle of being amused.

Harry and Juanita Haydock, Rita Simons and Dr Terry Gould—the young smart set of Gopher Prairie She was led to them Juanita Haydock flung at her in 70 a high, cackling, friendly voice

"Well, this is 10 nice to have you here We'll have some good parties—dances and everything You'll have to join the Jolly Seventeen We play bridge and we have a supper once a month You play, of course?"

"N-no, I don't"

"Really? In St Paul?"

"I've always been such a book-worm"

"We'll have to teach you Bridge is half the fun of life" Juanita had become patronizing, and she so glanced disrespectfully at Carol's golden sash, which she had previously admired

Harry Haydock said politely, "How do you think you're going to like the old burg?"

"I'm sure I shall like it tremendorsly"

"Best people on earth here Great hustlers, too Course I've had lots of chances to go live in Minneapolis, but we like it here Real he-town Did you know that Percy Bresnahan came from here?"

Carol perceived that she had been weakened in the % biological struggle by disclosing her lack of bridge Roused to nervous desire to regain her position she turned on Dr. Terry Gould, the young and pool-playing competitor of her husband Her eyes coquetted with him while she gushed

"I'll learn bridge. But what I really love most is the outdoors Can't we all get up a boating party, and fish, or whatever you do, and have a picnic supper afterwards?"

"Now you're talking!" Dr Gould affirmed He looked rather too obviously at the cream-smooth slope of her shoulder "Like fishing? Fishing is my middle name I'll teach you bridge Like cards at all?"

"I used to be rather good at bezique"

She knew that bezique was a game of cards—or a game of something else Roulette, possibly But her lie was a triumph Juanita's handsome, high-colored, horsey face showed doubt Harry stroked his nose and said humbly, "Bezique" Used to be great gambling game, wasn't it?"

While others drifted to her group, Carol snatched 20 up the conversation. She laughed and was frivolous and rather brittle. She could not distinguish their eyes. They were a blurry theater-audience before which she self-consciously enacted the comedy of being the Clever Little Bride of Doc Kennicott

"These-here celebrated Open Spaces, that's what I'm going out for I'll never read anything but the sporting-page again. Will converted me on our Colorado trip. There were so many mousey tourists who were afraid to get out of the motor bus that I decided to be Annie 30 Oakley, the Wild Western Wampire, and I bought oh! a vociferous skirt which revealed my perfectly nice ankles to the Presbyterian glare of all the Ioway schoolma'ams, and I leaped from peak to peak like the nimble chamoys, and—— You may think that Herr Doctor Kennicott is a Nimrod, but you ought to have seen me daring him to strip to his B. V. D's and go swimming in an icy mountain brook."

She knew that they were thinking of becoming shocked, but Juanita Haydock was admiring, at least. She swag-40 gered on

"I'm sure I'm going to ruin Will as a respectable practitioner—— Is he a good doctor, Dr. Gould?"

Kennicott's rival gasped at this insult to professional ethics, and he took an appreciable second before he recovered his social manner "I'll tell you, Mrs. Kennicott." He smiled at Kennicott, to imply that whatever he might say in the stress of being witty was not to count against him in the commercio-medical warfare. "There's some people in town that say the doc is a fair to middlin' diagnostician and prescription-writer, but let me whisper this to you—but for heaven's sake don't tell him? I said so—don't you ever go to him for anything more serious than a pendectomy of the left ear or a strabismus of the cardiograph."

No one save Kennicott knew exactly what this meant but they laughed, and Sam Clark's party assumed a glittering lemon-yellow color of brocade panels and champagne and tulle and crystal chandeliers and sporting duchesses Carol saw that George Edwin Mott and the blanched Mr and Mrs Dawson were not yet hypnotized. They looked as though they wondered whether they ought to look as though they disapproved. She concentrated on them

"But I know whom I wouldn't have dared to go to Colorado with' Mr Dawson there! I'm sure hes a regular heartbreaker. When we were introduced he held my hand and squeezed it frightfully."

"Haw! Haw! Haw!" The entire company applauded Mr Dawson was beatified. He had been called many things—loan-shark, skinflint, tightwad, pussyfoot—but he had never before been called a flirt.

"He is wicked, isn't he, Mrs Dawson? Don't you have to lock him up?"

"Oh no, but maybe I better," attempted Mrs Dawson a tint on her pallid face

For fifteen minutes Carol kept it up. She asserted that she was going to stage a musical comedy, that she preferred café parfait to beefsteak, that she hoped Dr Kennicott would never lose his ability to make love to charming women, and that she had a pair of gold stockings. They gaped for more But she could not keep it up. She retired to a chair behind Sam Clark's bulk. The smile-wrinkles solemnly flattened out in the faces of all the other collaborators in having a party, and again they stood about hoping but not expecting to be amused.

Carol listened She discovered that conversation did not exist in Gopher Prairie. Even at this affair, which brought out the young smart set, the hunting squire set, the respectable intellectual set, and the solid financial set, they sat up with gaiety as with a corpse

Juanita Haydock talked a good deal in her rattling voice but it was invariably of personalities the rumor that Raymie Wutherspoon was going to send for a pair of patent leather shoes with gray buttoned tops, the rheumatism of Champ Perry; the state of Guy Pollock's grippe, and the dementia of Jim Howland in painting his fence salmon-pink.

Sam Clark had been talking to Carol about motor cars, but he felt his duties as host. While he droned, his brows popped up and down. He interrupted himself. Must stir 'em up". He worried at his wife, "Don't you think I better stir 'em up?" He shouldered into the center of the room, and cried.

"Let's have some stunts, folks"

"Yes, let's1" shrieked Juanita Haydock.

"Say, Dave, give us that stunt about the Norwegian catching a hen"

"You bet, that's a slick stunt; do that, Dave!" cheered Chet Dashaway.

Mr Dave Dyer obliged.

All the guests moved their lips in anticipation of being salled on for their own stunts

"Ella, come on and recite 'Old Sweetheart of Mine,' for us." demanded Sam

Miss Ella Stowbody, the spinster daughter of the Ionic bank, scratched her dry palms and blushed "Oh, you don't want to hear that old thing again"

'Sure we do! You bet!" asserted Sam

"My voice is in terrible shape tonight."

"Tut' Come on!"

Sam loudly explained to Carol, "Ella is our shark at elocuting She's had professional training. She studied singing and oratory and dramatic art and shorthand for year, in Milwaukee."

Miss Stowbody was reciting As encore to "An Old Sweetheart of Mine," she gave a peculiarly optimistic poem regarding the value of smiles

There were four other stunts one Jewish, one Irish, one juvenile, and Nat Hicks's parody of Mark Antony's tuneral oration

During the winter Carol was to hear Dave Dyer's hen-catching impersonation seven times, "An Old Sweetheart of Mine" nine times, the Jewish story and the funeral oration twice; but now she was ardent and, because she did so want to be happy and simple-hearted, she was as disappointed as the others when the stunts were finished, and the party instantly sank back into coma

They gave up trying to be festive; they began to talk naturally, as they did at their shops and homes.

The men and women divided, as they had been tending to do all evening. Carol was deserted by the men, left so to a group of matrons who steadily pattered of children, sickness, and cooks—their own shop-talk. She was piqued. She remembered visions of herself as a smart married woman in a drawing-room, fencing with clever men. Her dejection was relieved by speculation as to what the men were discussing, in the corner between the piano and the phonograph. Did they rise from these housewifely personalities to a larger world of abstractions and affairs?

She made her best curtsy to Mrs. Dawson; she twit- 60 tered, "I won't have my husband leaving me so soon! I'm going over and pull the wretch's ears." She rose with a jenne fille bow. She was self-absorbed and self-approving because she had attained that quality of sentimentality. She proudly dipped across the room and, to the interest and commendation of all beholders, sat on the arm of Kennicott's chair.

He was gossiping with Sam Clark, Luke Dawson, Jackson Elder of the planing-mill, Chet Dashaway, Dave Dyer, Harry Haydock, and Ezia Stowbody, president of 70 the Jone Dank

Ezra Stowbody was a troglodyte. He had come to Gopher Prairie in 1865. He was a distinguished bird of prey-swooping thin nose, turtle mouth, thick brows, port-wine cheeks, floss of white hair, contemptuous eyes He was not happy in the social changes of thirty years Three decades ago, Dr Westlake, Julius Flickerbaugh the lawyer, Merriman Peedy the Congregational pastor and himself had been the arbiters. That was as it should be, the fine arts-medicine, law, religion, and finance-recog- 80 nized as aristocratic, four Yankees democratically chatting with but ruling the Ohioans and Illini and Swedes and Germans who had ventured to follow them But Westlake was old, almost retired, Julius Flickerbaugh had lost much of his practice to livelier attorneys, Reverend (not The Reverend) Peedy was dead, and nobody was impressed in this rotten age of automobiles by the "spanking grays" which Ezra still drove. The town was as heterogeneous as Chicago Norwegians and Germans owned stores. The social leaders were common mer- 90 chants Selling nails was considered as sacred as banking These upstarts-the Clarks, the Haydocks-had no dignity. They were sound and conservative in politics, but they talked about motor cars and pump-guns and heaven only knew what new-fangled fads. Mr. Stowbody felt out of place with them But his brick house with the mansard roof was still the largest residence in town, and he held his position as squire by occasionally appearing among the younger men and reminding them by a wintry eye that without the banker none of them could carry on their vulgar business

As Carol defied decency by sitting down with the men, Mr Stowbody was piping to Mr Dawson, "Say, Luke, when was't Biggins first settled in Winnebago Township? Wa'n't it in 1879?"

"Why no 'twa'n't'" Mr. Dawson was indignant "He come out from Vermont in 1867—no, wait, in 1868, it must have been—and took a claim on the Rum River, quite a ways above Anoka"

"He did not!" roared Mr Stowbody "He settled first in Blue Earth County, him and his father!"

("Whether this old duck Biggins had an English setter or a Llewellyn They've been arguing it all evening!")

Dave Dyer interrupted to give tidings, "D' tell you that Clara Biggins was in town couple days ago? She bought a hot-water bottle—expensive one, too—two dollars and thirty cents!"

"Yaaaaaah!" snarled Mr Stowbody "Course She's 30 just like her grandad was Never save a cent Two dollars and twenty—thirty, was it?—two dollars and thirty cents for a hot-water bottle! Brick wrapped up in a flannel petticoat just as good, anyway!"

"How's Ella's tonsils, Mr Stowbody?" yawned Chet Dashaway

While Mr Stowbody gave a somatic and psychic study of them, Carol reflected, "Are they really so terribly interested in Ella's tonsils, or even in Ella's esophagus? I wonder if I could get them away from personalities? Let's risk damnation and try."

"There hasn't been much labor trouble around here, has there, Mr Stowbody?" she asked innocently.

"No, ma'am, thank God, we've been free from that, except maybe with hired girls and farm-hands Trouble enough with these foreign farmers, if you don't watch these Swedes they turn socialist or populist or some fool thing on you in a minute. Of course, if they have loans you can make 'em listen to reason I just have 'em come into the bank for a talk, and tell 'em a few things. I don't mind their being demostrats, so much, but I won't stand having socialists around. But thank God, we ain't got the labor trouble they have in these cities. Even Jack Elder here gets along pretty well, in the planing-mill, don't you, Jack?

"Yep Sure Don't need so many skilled workmen in my place, and it's a lot of these cranky, wage-hogging, half-baked skilled mechanics that start trouble—reading a lot of this anarchist literature and union papers and all"

"Do you approve of union labor?" Carol inquired \circ of Mr $\,$ Elder

"Me? I should say not! It's like this: I don't mind dealing with my men if they think they've got any grievances—though Lord knows what's come over workmen, nowadays—don't appreciate a good job. But still, if they come to me honestly, as man to man, I'll talk things over with them But I'm not going to have any outsider, any of these walking delegates, or whatever fancy names they call themselves now—bunch of rich grafters, living on the ignorant workmen! Not going to have any of those fellows butting in and telling me how to run my business!"

Mr Elder was growing more excited, more belligerent and patriotic. "I stand for freedom and constitutional rights. If any man don't like my shop, he can get up and git. Same way, if I don't like him, he gits. And that's all there is to it. I simply can't understand all these complications and hoop-te-doodles and government reports and wage-scales and God knows what all that these fellows are balling up the labor situation with, when it's all perfectly simple. They like what I pay em, or they get out. That's all there is to it.

"What do you think of profit-sharing?" Carol ventured.

Mr Elder thundered his answer, while the others nodded, solemnly and in tune, like a shop-window of flexible toys, comic mandarins and judges and ducks and clowns, set quivering by a breeze from the open door.

"All this profit-sharing and welfare work and insurance and old-age pension is simply poppycock Enfeebles a workman's independence—and wastes a lot of honest profit. The half-baked thinker that isn't dry behind the ears yet, and these suffragettes and God knows what all buttinskis there are that are trying to tell a business man how to run his business, and some of these college professors are just about as bad, the whole kit and bilin' of 'em are nothing in God's world but socialism in disguise' And it's my bounden duty is a producer to resist every attack on the integrity of American industry to the last ditch Yes—SIR'"

Dave Dyer added, "Sure! You bet! What they ought to do is simply to hang every one of these agrators, and that would settle the whole thing right off Don't you think so, doc?"

'You bet," agreed Kennicott

The conversation was at last relieved of the plague of Carol's intrusions and they settled down to the question of whether the justice of the peace had sent that hobo drunk to jail for ten days or twelve. It was a matter not readily determined. Then Dave Dyer communicated his carefree adventures on the gipsy trail

"Yep I get good time out of the flivver 'Bout a week ago I motored down to New Wurttemberg That's forty-three—— No, let's see: It's seventeen miles to Belldale, and 'bout six and three-quarters, call it seven, to Torgenquist, and it's a good nineteen miles from there to New Wurttemberg—seventeen and seven and nineteen, that makes, uh, let me see seventeen and seven 's twenty-four, plus nineteen, well say plus twenty, that makes forty-four, well anyway, say about forty-three or -four miles from here to New Wurttemberg We got started about seven-fifteen, prob'ly seven-twenty, because I had to stop and fill the radiator, and we ran ilong, just keeping up a good steady gait——"

Mr Dyer did finally, for reasons and purposes admitted and justified, attain to New Wurttemberg

Once—only once—the presence of the alien Carol was recognized. Chet Dashaway leaned over and said asthmatically, "Say, uh, have you been reading this serial "Two Out' in Tingling Tales? Corking yarn' Gosh, the fellow that wrote it certainly can sling base-ball slang!"

The others tried to look literary. Harry Haydock offered, "Juanita is a great hand for reading high-class stuff, like 'Mid the Magnolias' by this Sara Hetwiggin Butts, and 'Riders of Ranch Reckless.' Books. But me," he glanced about importantly, as one convinced that no other hero had ever been in so strange a plight, "I'm so darn busy I don't have much time to read."

"I never read anything I can't check against," said 50 Sam Clark

Thus ended the literary portion of the conversation, and for seven minutes Jackson Elder outlined reasons for believing that the pike-fishing was better on the west shore of Lake Minniemashie than on the east—though it was indeed quite true that on the east shore Nat Hicks had caught a pike altogether admirable

The talk went on It did go on! Their voices were monotonous, thick, emphatic They were harshly pompous, like men in the smoking-compartments of Pullman 60 cars. They did not bore Carol. They frightened her. She panted, "They will be cordial to me, because my man belongs to their tribe. God help me if I were an outsider!"

Smiling as changelessly as an ivory figurine she sat quiescent, avoiding thought, glancing about the living-room and hall, noting their betrayal of unimaginative commercial prosperity. Kennicott said, "Dandy interior, eh? My idea of how a place ought to be furnished Modern." She looked polite, and observed the oiled 70 floors, hard-wood staircase, unused fireplace with tiles which resembled brown linoleum, cut-glass vases standing upon doilies, and the barred, shut, forbidding unit bookcases that were half filled with swashbuckler novels and unread-looking sets of Dickens, Kipling, O. Henry, and Elbert Hubbard.

She perceived that even personalities were failing to hold the party. The room filled with hesitancy as with a fog. People cleared their throats, tried to choke down yawns. The men shot their cuffs and the women so stuck their combs more firmly into their back hair.

Then a rattle, a daring hope in every eye, the swinging of a door, the smell of strong coffee, Dave Dyer's mewing voice in a triumphant, "The eats!" They began to chatter. They had something to do. They could escape from themselves. They fell upon the food—chicken sandwiches, maple cake, drug-store ice cream. Even when the food was gone they remained cheerful. They could go home, any time now, and go to bed!

They went, with a flutter of coats, chiffon scarfs, and good-bys.

Carol and Kennicott walked home.

"Did you like them?" he asked.

"They were terribly sweet to me"

"Uh, Carrie—— You ought to be more careful about shocking folks Talking about gold stockings, and about showing your ankles to schoolteachers and all!" More mildly "You gave 'em a good time, but I'd watch out for that, 'f I were you Juanita Haydock is such a damn cat I wouldn't give her a chance to criticize me"

"My poor effort to lift up the party! Was I wrong to try to amuse them?"

"No! No! Honey, I didn't mean—— You were the only up-and-coming person in the bunch I just mean—— Don't get onto legs and all that immoral stuff Pretty conservative crowd."

She was silent, raw with the shameful thought that the attentive circle might have been criticizing her, laughing at her

"Don't, please don't worry!" he pleaded.

Silence.

"Gosh, I'm sorry I spoke about it I just meant—But they were crazy about you Sam said to me, "That little lady of yours is the slickest thing that ever came to this town,' he said, and Ma Dawson—I didn't hardly know whether she'd like you or not, she's such a dried-up old bird, but she said. 'Your bride is so quick and bright, I declare, she just wakes me up'"

Carol liked praise, the flavor and fatness of it, but she was so energetically being sorry for herself that 30 she could not taste this commendation.

"Please' Come on' Cheer up!" His lips said it, his anxious shoulder said it, his arm about her said it, is they halted on the obscure porch of their house.

"Do you care if they think I'm flighty, Will?"

"Me? Why, I wouldn't care if the whole world thought you were this or that or anything else. You're my—well, you're my soul!"

He was an undefined mass, as solid-seeming as rock. She found his sleeve, pinched it, cried, "I'm glad! 10 It's sweet to be wanted! You must tolerate my frivolousness You're all I have!"

He lifted her, carried her into the house, and with her arms about his neck she forgot Main Street.

[The persons whom Carol finds most "interesting as she settles into her new home are the eccentrics of Gopher

Prairie Vida Sherwin, a high-school teacher who (the reader discovers later) had hoped to marry Will herself, Raymie Wutherspoon, the slightly effeminate manager of the Bon Ton Store; and the young lawyer, Guy Pollock, like Wutherspoon a bachelor. All share to some degree her rebelliousness. Gradually she learns of the narrowness of small-town life: the prying curiosity of neighbors, the humiliation of wives who have to ask their husbands for money for household expenses, the unvarying pattern of social affairs. In an attempt to break the monotony, Carol gives a housewarming with a number of "ice-breaking" games, but the next week the Dashaways give a party without such "novelties."]

She had, she meditated, passed through the novelty of seeing the town and meeting people, of skating and sliding and hunting. Bea was competent, there was no household labor except sewing and darning and gossipy assistance to Bea in bed-making. She couldn't satisfy her ingenuity in planning meals. At Dahl & Oleson's Meat Market you didn't give orders—you wofully inquired whether there was anything today besides steak and pork and ham. The cuts of beet were not cuts. They were hacks. Lamb chops were as exotic as sharks' fins. The meat-dealers shipped their best to the city, with its higher prices.

In all the shops there was the same lack of choice She could not find a glass-headed picture-nail in town she did not hunt for the sort of veiling she wanted—she took what she could get, and only at Howland & Gould's was there such a luxury as canned asparagus Routine care was all she could devote to the house Only by such fussing as the Widow Bogart's could she make it fill her time

She could not have outside employment. To the village doctor's wife it was taboo

She was a woman with a working brain and no work. There were only three things which she could do Have children, start her career of reforming; or be come so definitely a part of the town that she would be fulfilled by the activities of church and study-club and bridge-parties.

Children, yes, she wanted them, but--- She was not quite ready She had been embarrassed by Kennicotts frankness, but she agreed with him that in the issane condition of civilization, which made the rearing of citizens more costly and perilous than any other crime, it was inadvisable to have children till he had made more money. She was sorry—— Perhaps he had made all the mystery of love a mechanical cautiousness but—— She fled from the thought with a dubious, "Some day"

Her "reforms," her impulses toward beauty in raw Main Street, they had become indistinct. But she would set them going now. She would! She swore it with soft fist beating the edges of the radiator. And at the end of all her yows she had no notion as to when and where the crusade was to begin

Become an authentic part of the town? She began to think with unpleasant lucidity. She reflected that she did not know whether the people liked her. She had gone to the women at afternoon-coffees, to the merchants in their stores, with so many outpouring comments and whimsies that she hadn't given them a chance to betray their opinions of her. The men smiled—but did they like hei? She was lively among the women—but was she one of them? She could not recall many times when she had been admitted to the whispering of scandal which is the secret chamber of Gopher Prairie conversation.

She was poisoned with doubt, as she drooped up to bed

Next day, through her shopping, her mind sat back and observed Dave Dyer and Sam Clark were as cordial as she had been fancying, but wasn't there an impersonal abruptness in the 'H' are yuh?' of Chet Dashaway? Howland the grocer was curt. Was that merely his usual manner?

"It's infuriating to have to pay attention to what people think In St Paul I didn't care But here I'm spied on They're watching me I mustn't let it make me self-conscious," she coaxed herself—overstimulated by the drug of thought, and offensively on the defensive

A thaw which stripped the snow from the sidewalks, a ringing iron night when the lakes could be heard booming, a clear roistering morning. In tam o'shanter and tweed skirt Carol felt herself a college junior going out to play hockey. She wanted to whoop, her legs ached to run. On the way home from shopping she yielded, as a pup would have yielded. She galloped down a block and as she jumped from a curb across a welter of slush, she pave a student "Yippee!"

She saw that in a window three old women were so gasping. Their triple giare was paralyzing. Across the street, at another window, the curtain had secretively moved. She stopped, walked on sedately, changed from the girl Carol into Mrs. Dr. Kennicott

She never again felt quite young enough and defiant enough and free enough to run and halloo in the public streets, and it was as a Nice Married Woman that she attended the next weekly bridge of the Jolly Seventeen

I۷

The Jolly Seventeen (the membership of which ranged 60 from fourteen to twenty-six) was the social cornice of Gopher Prairie. It was the country club, the diplomatic set, the St. Cecilia, the Ritz oval room, the Club de Vingt. To belong to it was to be "in." Though its membership partly coincided with that of the Thanatopsis study club, the Jolly Seventeen as a separate entity guffawed at the Thanatopsis, and considered it middle-class and even "highbrow".

Most of the Jolly Seventeen were young married women, with their husbands as associate members. Once 70 a week they had a women's afternoon-bridge, once a month the husbands joined them for supper and evening-bridge, twice a year they had dances at IOOF Hall. Then the town exploded. Only at the annual balls of the Firemen and of the Eastern Star was there such prodigality of chiffon scarfs and tangoing and heart-burnings, and these rival institutions were not select—hired girls attended the Firemen's Ball, with section-hands and laborers. Ella Slowbody had once gone to a Jolly Seventeen Soirée in the village hack, 80 hitherto confined to chief mourners at funerals; and Harry Haydock and Dr. Terry Gould always appeared in the town's only specimen of evening clothes.

The afternoon-bridge of the Jolly Seventeen which followed Carol's lonely doubting was held at Juanita Haydock's new concrete bungalow, with its door of polished oak and beveled plate-glass, jar of ferns in the plastered hall, and in the living-room, a fumed oak Morris chair, sixteen color-prints, and a square varnished table with a mat made of cigar-ribbons on which was one Illustrated Gift Edition and one pack of cards in a burnt-leather case

Carol stepped into a sirocco of furnace heat. They were already playing. Despite her flabby resolves she had not yet learned bridge. She was winningly apolo10 getic about it to Juanita, and ashamed that she should have to go on being apologetic.

Mrs Dave Dyer, a sallow woman with a thin prettiness, devoted to experiments in religious cults, illnesses, and scandal-bearing, shook her finger at Carol and trilled, "You're a naughty one' I don't believe you appreciate the honor, when you got into the Jolly Seventeen so easy!"

Mrs Chet Dashaway nudged her neighbor at the second table. But Carol kept up the appealing bridal manner so far as possible. She twittered, "You're perfectly right. I'm a lazy thing. I'll make Will start teaching me this very evening." Her supplication had all the sound of birdies in the nest, and Easter churchbells, and frosted Christmas cards. Internally she snarled, "That ought to be saccharine enough." She sat in the smallest rocking-chair, a model of Victorian modesty. But she saw or she imagined that the women who had gurgled at her so welcomingly when she had first come to Gopher Prairie were nodding at her brusquely.

During the pause after the first game she petitioned Mrs Jackson Elder, "Don't you think we ought to get up another bob-sled party soon?"

"It's so cold when you get dumped in the snow," said Mrs Elder, indifferently

"I hate snow down my neck," volunteered Mrs Dave Dyer, with an unpleasant look at Carol and, turning her back, she bubbled at Rita Simons, "Dearie, won't you run in this evening? I've got the loveliest new Butterick pattern I want to show you"

Carol crept back to her chair. In the fervor of discussing the game they ignored her. She was not used to being a wallflower. She struggled to keep from oversensitiveness, from becoming unpopular by the sure method of believing that she was unpopular; but she hadn't much reserve of patience, and at the end of the second game, when Ella Stowbody sniffily asked her, "Are you going to send to Minneapolis for your dress for the next soirée—heard you were," Carol said "Don't know yet" with unnecessary sharpness.

She was relieved by the admiration with which the state of the pumps, but she resented Mrs. Howland's tart demand, "Don't you find that new couch of yours is too broad to be practical?" She nodded, then shook her head, and touchily left Mrs. Howland to get out of it any meaning she desired Immediately she wanted to make peace. She was close to simpering in the sweetness with which she addressed Mrs. Howland. "I think that is the prettiest display of beef-tea your husband has in his store."

"Oh yes, Gopher Prairie isn't so much behind the times," gibed Mrs Howland Some one giggled

Their rebuffs made her haughty, her haughtiness irritated them to franker rebuffs, they were working up to a state of painfully righteous war when they were saved by the coming of food

Though Juanita Haydock was highly advanced in the matters of finger-bowls, doilies, and bath-mats, her "refreshments" were typical of all the afternoon-coffees Juanita's best friends, Mrs. Dyer and Mrs. Dashaway 7 passed large dinner plates, each with a spoon, a fork and a coffee cup without saucer They apologized and discussed the afternoon's game as they passed through the thicket of women's feet. Then they distributed hot buttered rolls, coffee poured from an enamel-ware pot, stuffed olives, potato salad, and angel's-food cake. There was, even in the most strictly conforming Gopher Prairie circles, a certain option as to collations The olives need not be stuffed Doughnuts were in some houses well thought of as a substitute for the hot stbuttered rolls. But there was in all the town no heretic save Carol who omitted angel's-food

They are enormously Carol had a suspicion that the thriftier housewives made the afternoon treat do for evening supper

She tried to get back into the current She edged over to Mrs McGanum Chunky, amiable, young Mrs McGanum, with her breast and arms of a milkmaid, and her loud delayed laugh which burst startlingly from a sober face, was the daughter of old Dr Westlake, and the wife of Westlake's partner. Dr McGanum Kennicott asserted that Westlake and McGanum and their contaminated families were tricky, but Carol had found them gracious. She asked for friendliness by crying to Mrs. McGanum, "How is the baby's throat now?" and she was attentive while Mrs. McGanum rocked and knitted and placidly described symptoms.

Vida Sherwin came in after school, with Miss Ethel Villets, the town librarian. Miss Sherwin's optimistic presence gave Carol more confidence. She talked. She informed the circle, "I drove almost down to Wahkeenvan with Will, a few days ago. Isn't the country lovely! And I do admire the Scandinavian farmers down there so their big red barns and silos and milking-machines and everything. Do you all know that lonely Lutheran church, with the tin-covered spire, that stands out alone on a hill? It's so bleak, somehow it seems so brave. I do think the Scandinavians are the hardiest and best people——"

"Oh, do you think so?" protested Mrs Jackson Elder. My husband says the Svenskas that work in the planing-mill are perfectly terrible—so silent and cranky, and so selfish, the way they keep demanding raises. If they had their way they'd simply ruin the business."

"Yes, and they're simply ghastly hired girls!" wailed Mrs Dave Dyer. "I swear, I work myself to skin and bone trying to please my hired girls—when I can get them! I do everything in the world for them. They can have their gentleman friends call on them in the kitchen any time, and they get just the same to eat as we do, if there's any left over, and I practically never jump on them."

Juanita Haydock rattled, "They're ungrateful, all that class of people. I do think the domestic problem is simply becoming awful. I don't know what the country's coming to, with these Scandahoofian clodhoppers demanding every cent you can save, and so ignorant and impertinent, and on my word, demanding bath-tubs and everything—as if they weren't mighty good and lucky at home if they got a bath in the wash-tub."

They were off, riding hard. Carol thought of Bea and waylaid them

"But isn't it possibly the fault of the mistresses if the maids are ungrateful? For generations we've given them the leavings of food, and holes to live in. I don't want to boast, but I must say I don't have much trouble with Bea. She's so friendly. The Scandinavians are sturdy and honest—"

Mrs. Dave Dyer snapped, "Honest? Do you call it honest to hold us up for every cent of pay they can get? I can't say that I've had any of them steal anything (though you might call it stealing to eat so so much that a roast of beef hardly lasts three days), but just the same I don't intend to let them think they can put anything over on me! I always make them pack and unpack their trunks down-stairs, right under my eyes and then I know they aren't being tempted to dishonesty by any slackness on my part!"

"How much do the maids get here?" Carol ventured. Mrs B J Gougerling, wife of the banker, stated in a shocked manner, "Any place from three-fifty to five-fifty a week! I know positively that Mrs. Clark, after swearing that she wouldn't weaken and encourage them in their outrageous demands, went and paid five-fifty—think of it! practically a dollar a day for unskilled work and, of course, her food and room and a chance to do her own washing right in with the rest of the wash. How much do you pay, Mrs. Kennicott?"

"Yes! How much do you pay?" insisted half a dozen.
"W-why, I pay six a week," she feebly confessed
They gasped Juanita protested, "Don't you think 70 it's hard on the rest of us when you pay so much?"
Juanita's demand was re-inforced by the universal glower.

Carol was angry "I don't care! A maid has one of the hardest jobs on earth. She works from ten to eighteen hours a day. She has to wash slimy dishes and dirty clothes. She tends the children and runs to the door with wet chapped hands and——"

Mrs Dave Dyer broke into Carol's peroration with a furious, "That's all very well, but believe me, I do those things myself when I'm without a maid—and 80 that's a good share of the time for a person that isn't willing to yield and pay exorbitant wages!"

Carol was retorting, "But a maid does it for strangers, and all she gets out of it is the pay——"

Their eyes were hostile Four of them were talking at once Vida Sherwin's dictatorial voice cut through, took control of the revolution:

"Tut, tut, tut, tut! What angry passions—and what an idiotic discussion! All of you getting too serious Stop it! Carol Kennicott, you're probably right, but 90 you're too much ahead of the times Juanita, quit looking so belligerent. What is this, a card party or a hen fight? Carol, you stop admiring yourself as the Joan of Arc of the hired girls, or I'll spank you. You come over here and talk libraries with Ethel Villets. Boooooo! If there's any more pecking, I'll take charge of the hen roost myself!"

They all laughed artificially, and Carol obediently "talked libraries."

A small-town bungalow, the wives of a village doctor and a village dry-goods merchant, a provincial teacher, a colloquial brawl over paying a servant a dollar more a week. Yet this insignificance echoed cellar-plots and cabinet meetings and labor conferences in Persia and Prussia, Rome and Boston, and the orators who deemed themselves international leaders were but the raised voices of a billion Juanitas denouncing a million Carols, with a hundred thousand Vida Sherwins trying to shoo away the storm

Carol felt guilty She devoted herself to admiring the spinsterish Miss Villets—and immediately comnutted another offense against the laws of decency

"We haven't seen you at the library yet, Miss Villets reproved.

Tree wanted to run in so much but I've been getting settled and——— I'll probably come in so often you'll get tired of me! I hear you have such a nice library."

"There are many who like it We have two thousand more books than Wakamin,"

"Isn't that fine. I'm sure you are largely responsible. I've had some experience, in St. Paul."

"So I have been informed. Not that I entirely approve of library methods in these large cities. So careless, letting tramps and all sorts of dirty persons practically sleep in the reading-rooms."

"I know, but the poor souls—— Well, I'm sure you will agree with me in one thing. The chief task of a librarian is to get people to read."

"You feel so? My feeling, Mrs Kennicott, and I am merely quoting the librarian of a very large college, is that the first duty of the concerentions librarian is to preserve the books

"Oh! Carol repented her "Oh Miss Villets stiffened, and attacked

"It may be all very well in cities, where they have unlimited funds, to let nasty children ruin books and just deliberately tear them up, and fresh young men take more books out than they are entitled to by the regulations, but I'm never going to permit it in this library!"

"What if some children are destructive? They learn to read Books are cheaper than minds."

"Nothing is cheaper than the minds of some of these children that come in and bother me simply because their mothers don't keep them home where they belong Some librarians may choose to be so wishy-washy and turn their libraries into nursing-homes and kindergartens, but as long as I'm in charge, the Gopher Prairie library is going to be quiet and decent, and the books well kept!"

Carol saw that the others were listening, waiting for her to be objectionable. She flinched before their dislike. She hastened to smile in agreement with Miss Villets, to glance publicly at her wrist-watch, to warble that it was "so late—have to hurry home—husband—such nice party—maybe you were right about maids, prejudiced because Bea so nice—such perfectly divine angel's-food, Mrs. Haydock must give me the recipe—good-by, such happy party—."

She walked home She reflected, "It was my fault I was touchy And I opposed them so much Only——I can't I can't be one of them if I must damn all the maids toiling in filthy kitchens, all the ragged hungry children. And these women are to be my arbiters the rest of my life!"

She ignored Bea's call from the kitchen, she ran up-stairs to the unfrequented guest-room, she wept in terror, her body a pale arc as she knelt beside a cumbrous black-walnut bed, beside a putty mattress covered with a red quilt, in a shuttered and airless room

CHAPTER VIII

Ħ

Four days after the Jolly Seventeen debâcle Vida Sherwin called and casually blew Carol's world to pieces

"May I come in and gossip a while?' she said, with such excess of bright innocence that Carol was uneasy Vida took off her furs with a bounce, she sait down as though it were a gymnasium exercise, she flung out

"Feel disgracefully good, this weather! Raymond Wutherspoon says if he had my energy he'd be a grand opera singer. I always think this climate is the finest in the world, and my friends are the dearest people in the world, and my work is the most essential thing in the world. Probably I fool myself. But I know one thing for certain: You're the pluckiest little idiot in the world."

"And so you are about to flay me alive." Carol was cheerful about it.

'Am I? Perhaps. I've been wondering—I know that the third party to a squabble is often the most to blame the one who runs between A and B having a beautiful time telling each of them what the other has said But I want you to take a big part in vitalizing Gopher Prairie and so—— Such a very unique opportunity and—— Am I silly?"

"I know what you mean. I was too abrupt at the Jolly Seventeen"

"It isn't that Matter of fact, I'm glad you told them some wholesome truths about servants (Though perhaps you were just a bit tactless) It's bigger than that I wonder if you understand that in a secluded community a like this every newcomer is on test? People cordial to her but watching her all the time. I remember when I Latin teacher came here from Wellesley, they resented her broad A. Were sure it was affected Of course they have discussed you——"

"Have they talked about me much?"

"My dear'"

"I always feel as though I walked around in a cloud, looking out at others but not being seen. I feel so inconspicuous and so normal—so normal that there's nothing about me to discuss. I can't realize that Mr and Mrs. Haydock must gossip about me." Carol was working up a small passion of distaste. "And I don't like it. It makes me crawly to think of their daring to talk over all I do and say. Pawing me over! I resent it. I hate—..."

"Wait, child! Perhaps they resent some things in you I want you to try and be impersonal. They'd paw over anybody who came in new Didn't you, with pewcomers in College?"

40 "Yes"

"Well then! Will you be impersonal? I'm paying you the compliment of supposing that you can be. I want you to be big enough to help me make this town worth while."

"I'll be as impersonal as cold boiled potatoes (Not that I shall ever be able to help you make the town worth while ') What do they say about me Really. I want to know."

"Of course the illiterate ones resent your references to anything farther away than Minneapolis They're 50 suspicious—that's it, suspicious And some think you dress too well

"Oh, they do, do they! Shall I dress in gunny-sacking to suit them?"

"Please! Are you going to be a baby?"

"Ill be good," sulkily

"You certainly will, or I won't tell you one single thing. You must understand this 1 m not asking you to change yourself. Just want you to know what they think. You must do that, no matter how absurd 60 their prejudices are if you're going to handle them. Is it your ambition to make this a better town, or isn't it?"

"I don't know whether it is or not!"

"Why—why—— Tut, tut, now, of course it is! Why, I depend on you You're a born reformer"

"I am not-not any more!"

"Of course you are"

"Oh, if I really could help---- So they think I'm affected?"

"My lamb, they do! Now don't say they're nervy After all, Gopher Prairie standards are as reasonable to Gopher Prairie as Lake Shore Drive standards are to Chicago. And there's more Gopher Prairies than there are Chicagos. Or Londons. And——111 tell you the whole story. They think you're showing off when you say 'American' instead of Ammurican'. They think you're too frivolous. Life's so serious to them that they can't imagine any kind of laughter except. Juanta's snortling. Ethel Villets was sure you were sepatronizing her when——"

"Oh, I was not!"

"—you talked about encouraging reading, and Mrs Elder thought you were patronizing when you said she had such a pretty little car. She thinks it's an enormous car! And some of the merchants say you're too flip when you talk to them in the store and——"

Poor me, when I was trying to be friendly!"

"——every housewife in town is doubtful about we your being so chummy with your Bea. All right to be kind, but they say you act as though she were your cousin (Wait now' There's plenty more) And they think you were eccentric in furnishing this room—they think the broad couch and that Japanese dingus are absurd. (Wait! I know they're silly.) And I guess I've heard a dozen criticize you because you don't go to church oftener and——"

"I can't stand it—I can't bear to realize that they've been saying all these things while I've been going about so happily and liking them I wonder if you 10 ought to have told me? It will make me self-conscious"

"I wonder the same thing Only answer I can get is the old saw about knowledge being power And some day you'll see how absorbing it is to have power, even here; to control the town—— Oh, I'm a crank. But I do like to see things moving."

"It hurts It makes these people seem so beastly and treacherous, when I've been perfectly natural with them But let's have it all What did they say 20 about my Chinese housewarming party?"

"Why, uh----"

"Go on Or I'll make up worse things than anything you can tell me."

"They did enjoy it. But I guess some of them felt you were showing off—pretending that your husband is richer than he is"

"I can't—— Their meanness of mind is beyond any horrors I could imagine. They really thought that I—— And you want to 'reform' people like that when dynamite is so cheap? Who dared to say that? The rich or the poor?"

"Fairly well assorted."

"Can't they at least understand me well enough to see that though I might be affected and culturine, at least I simply couldn't commit that other kind of vulgarity? If they must know, you may tell them, with my compliments, that Will makes about four thousand a year, and the party cost half of what they probably thought it did. Chinese things are not very expensive, and I made my own costume—"

"Stop it! Stop beating me! I know all that. What they meant was, they felt you were starting dangerous competition by giving a party such as most people here can't afford. Four thousand is a pretty big income for this town"

"I never thought of starting competition. Will you believe that it was in all love and friendliness that I tried to give them the gayest party I could? It was foolish, it was childrsh and noisy. But I did mean it so well."

"I know, of course And it certainly is unfair of them to make fun of your having that Chinese food—chow men, was it?—and to laugh about your wearing those pretty trousers——"

Carol sprang up, whimpering, "Oh, they didn't do that! They didn't poke fun at my feast, that I ordered so carefully for them! And my little Chinese costume that I was so happy making—I made it secretly to surprise them. And they've been ridiculing it, all this while!"

She was huddled on the couch

Vida was stroking her hair, muttering, "I should n't----"

Shrouded in shame, Carol did not know when Vida slipped away. The clock's bell, at half past five, aroused her "I must get hold of myself before Will comes I hope he never knows what a fool his wife is Frozen, sneering, horrible hearts."

Like a very small, very lonely girl she trudged upstairs, slow step by step, her feet dragging, her hand on the rail. It was not her husband to whom she wanted to run for protection—it was her father, her smiling understanding father, dead these twelve years

[Carol is now aware of her precarious position in Gopher Prairie Wanting to be tolerated, to be liked, she never theless cannot give up hope that in some way the town can be made more lovely. She dreams for a time that the Thanatopsis, to which the wives of all the substantial men belong, can be turned to the problem of civic improve ment But the women are quite satisfied with things as they are; their husbands are even more so. A venture into amateur dramatics is almost equally disappointing, as are later efforts to enliven the town library and the Chautauqua. Frustration and boredom drive Carol to a flirtation with Guy Pollock, but when he criticizes the "commercial hatred" of physicians she turns back to Will. and for a time dramatizes herself as the country doctors wife For two years after the birth of her son, Hugh, she is content; then the reform spirit stirs her once more Meanwhile Vida Sherwin has married Raymie Wutherspoon.]

The greatest mystery about a human being is not his reaction to sex or praise, but the manner in which he contrives to put in twenty-four hours a day. It is this which puzzles the longshoreman about the clerk, the Londoner about the bushman. It was this which puzzled Carol in regard to the married Vida. Carol herself had the baby, a larger house to care for, all the telephone calls for Kennicott when he was away, and she read everything, while Vida was satisfied with newspaper is headlines.

But after detached brown years in boarding-houses, Vida was hungry for housework, for the most pottering detail of it. She had no maid, nor wanted one. She cooked, baked, swept, washed supper-cloths, with the triumph of a chemist in a new laboratory. To her the hearth was veritably the altar. When she went shopping she hugged the cans of soup, and she bought a mop or a side of bacon as though she were preparing for a reception. She knelt beside a bean sprout and crooned, 2007. Traised this with my own hands—I brought this new life into the world."

"I love her for being so happy," Carol brooded I ought to be that way I worship the baby, but the housework—— Oh, I suppose I'm fortunate; so much better off than farm-women on a new clearing, or people in a slum"

It has not yet been recorded that any human being has gained a very large or permanent contentment from meditation upon the fact that he is better off than others

In Carol's own twenty-four hours a day she got up, dressed the baby, had breakfast, talked to Oscarina about the day's shopping, put the baby on the porch to play, went to the butcher's to choose between steak and pork chops, bathed the baby, nailed up a shelf, had dinner, put the baby to bed for a nap, paid the iteman, read for an hour, took the baby out for a walk, called on Vida, had supper, put the baby to bed, darned socks, listened to Kennicott's yawning comment on what a fool Dr. McGanum was to try to use that theap X-ray outfit of his on an epithelioma, repaired a frock, drowsily heard Kennicott stoke the furnace, tried to read a page of Thorstein Veblen—and the day was gone.

Except when Hugh was vigorously naughty, or whiney, or laughing, or saying "I like my chair" with thrilling maturity, she was always enfeebled by loneliness. She no longer felt superior about that misfortune. She would gladly have been converted to Vida's satisfaction in Gopher Prairie and mopping the floor.

П

Carol drove through an astonishing number of books so from the public library and from city shops. Kennicott was at first uncomfortable over her disconcerting habit of buying them. A book was a book, and if you had several thousand of them right here in the library, free, why the dickens should you spend your good money? After worrying about it for two or three years, he decided that this was one of the Funny Ideas which she had caught as a librarian and from which she would never entirely recover.

The authors whom she read were most of them 60 frightfully annoyed by the Vida Sherwins. They were young American sociologists, young English realists, Russian horrorists, Anatole France, Rolland, Nexo, Wells, Shaw, Key, Edgar Lee Masters, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Henry Mencken, and all the other subversive philosophers and artists whom women were consulting everywhere, in batik-curtained studios in New York, in Kansas farmhouses, San Francisco drawing-rooms, Alabama schools for Negroes. From them she got the same confused desire which the million 70 other women felt, the same determination to be class-conscious without discovering the class of which she was to be conscious.

Certainly her reading precipitated her observations of Main Street, of Gopher Prairie and of the several adjacent Gopher Prairies which she had seen on drives with Kennicott. In her fluid thought certain convictions appeared, jaggedly, a fragment of an impression at a time, while she was going to sle.p, or manicuring her nails, or waiting for Kennicott.

These convictions she presented to Vida Sherwin—Vida Wutherspoon—beside a radiator, over a bowl of not very good walnuts and pecans from Uncle Whittier's grocery, on an evening when both Kennicott and Raymie had gone out of town with the other officers of the Ancient and Affiliated Order of Spartans, to inaugurate a new chapter at Wakamin Vida had come to the house for the night. She helped in putting Hugh to bed, sputtering the while about his soft skin. Then they talked till midnight.

What Carol said that evening, what she was passionately thinking, was also emerging in the minds of women in ten thousand Gopher Prairies. Her formulations were not pat solutions but visions of a tragic futility. She did not utter them so compactly that they to can be given in her words, they were roughened with "Well, you see" and "if you get what I mean" and "I don't know that I'm making myself clear." But they were definite enough, and indignant enough

Ш

In reading popular stories and seeing plays, asserted Carol, she had found only two traditions of the American small town. The first tradition, repeated in scores of magazines every month, is that the American village remains the one sure abode of friendship, honesty, and clean sweet marriageable girls. Therefore all men who succeed in painting in Paris or in finance in New York at last become weary of smart women, return to their native towns, assert that cities are vicious, marry their childhood sweethearts and, presumably, joyously abide in those towns until death

The other tradition is that the significant features of all villages are whiskers, iron dogs upon lawns, gold bricks, checkers, jars of gilded cat-tails, and shrewd comic old men who are known as "hicks" and who ejaculate "Waal I swan". This altogether admirable tradition rules the vaudeville stage, facetious illustrators, and syndicated newspaper humor, but out of actual life it passed forty years ago. Carol's small town thinks not in hoss-swapping but in cheap motor cars, telephones, ready-made clothes, silos, alfalfa, kodaks, phonographs, leather-upholstered. Morris chairs, bridge-prizes, oilstocks, motion-pictures, land-deals, unread sets of Mark Twain, and a chaste version of national politics.

With such a small-town life a Kennicott or a Champ Perry is content, but there are also hundreds of thou-40 sands, particularly women and young men, who are not at all content. The more intelligent young people (and the fortunate widows!) flee to the cities with agility and, despite the fictional tradition, resolutely stay there, seldom returning even for holidays. The most protesting patriots of the towns leave them in old age, if they can afford it, and go to live in California or in the cities.

The reason, Carol insisted, is not a whiskered rusticity It is nothing so amusing!

It is an unimaginatively standardized background, a sluggishness of speech and manners, a rigid ruling of the spirit by the desire to appear respectable. It is contentment—the contentment of the quiet dead, who are scornful of the living for their restless walking. It is negation canonized as the one positive virtue. It is the prohibition of happiness. It is slavery self-sought and self-defended. It is dullness made. God

A savorless people, gulping tasteless food, and sitting afterward, coatless and thoughtless, in rocking-chairs prickly with inane decorations, listening to mechanical emusic, saying mechanical things about the excellence of Ford automobiles, and viewing themselves as the greatest race in the world

She had inquired as to the effect of this dominating dullness upon foreigners. She remembered the feeble exotic quality to be found in the first-generation Scandinavians, she recalled the Norwegian Fair at the Lutheran Church, to which Bea had taken her. There, in the hondestne, the replica of a Norse farm kitchen, pale women in scarlet jackets embroidered with gold thread and colored beads, in black skirts with a line of blue, green-striped aprons, and ridged caps very pretty to set off a fresh face, had served rommegrod og lefte—sweet cakes and sour milk pudding spiced with cinnamon. For the first time in Gopher Prairie Carol had found novelty. She had reveled in the mild foreignness of it

But she saw these Scandinavian women zealously exchanging their spiced puddings and red jackets for fried pork chops and congealed white blouses, trading the ancient Christmas hymns of the fjords for "She's My Jazzland Cutie," being Americanized into uniformity, and in less than a generation losing in the grayness whatever pleasant new customs they might have added to the life of the town. Their sons finished the process. In ready-made clothes and ready-made high-school phrases they sank into propriety, and the sound American customs had absorbed without one trace of pollution another alien invasion.

And along with these foreigners, she felt herself being ironed into glossy mediocrity, and she rebelled, in fear. The respectability of the Gopher Prairies, said Carol, s reinforced by vows of poverty and chastity in the matter of knowledge. Except for half a dozen in each town the citizens are proud of that achievement of ignorance which it is so easy to come by To be "intellectual" or "artistic" or, in their own word, to be highbrow," is to be priggish and of dubious virtue.

Large experiments in politics and in co-operative distribution, ventures requiring knowledge, courage, and imagination, do originate in the West and Middlewest, but they are not of the towns, they are of the farmers If these heresies are supported by the townsmen it is only by occasional teachers, doctors, lawyers, the labor unions, and workmen like Miles Bjornstam, who are punished by being mocked as "cranks," as "half-baked parlor socialists." The editor and the rector preach at them The cloud of serene ignorance submerges them in unhappiness and futility.

Here Vida observed, 'Yes—well—— Do you know, I've always thought that Ray would have made a wonderful rector. He has what I call an essentially religious soul My! He'd have read the service beautifully! I suppose it's too late now, but as I tell him, he can also serve the world by selling shoes and—— I wonder if we oughtn't to have family-prayers?"

٧I

Doubtless all small towns, in all countries, in all ages, Carol admitted, have a tendency to be not only dull but mean, bitter, infested with curiosity. In France or Tibet quite as much as in Wyoming or Indiana these timidities are inherent in isolation.

But a village in a country which is taking pains to become altogether standardized and pure, which aspires to succeed Victorian England as the chief mediocrity of the world, is no longer merely provincial, no longer downy and restful in its leaf-shadowed ignorance. It is a force seeking to dominate the earth, to drain the hills and sea of color, to set Dante at boosting Gopher Prairie, and to dress the high gods in Klassy Kollege Klothes. Sure of itself, it bullies other civilizations, as a traveling salesman in a brown derby conquers the wisdom of China and tacks advertisements of cigarettes over arches for centuries dedicate to the sayings of Confucius.

Such a society functions admirably in the large production of cheap automobiles, dollar watches, and safety so razors. But it is not satisfied until the entire world also admits that the end and joyous purpose of living is to tide in flivvers, to make advertising-pictures of dollar watches, and in the twilight to sit talking not of love and courage but of the convenience of safety razors.

And such a society, such a nation, is determined by the Gopher Prairies. The greatest manufacturer is but a busier Sam Clark, and all the rotund senators and presidents are village lawyers and bankers grown nine 60 feet tall

Though a Gopher Prairie regards itself as a part of the Great World, compares itself to Rome and Vienna, it will not acquire the scientific spirit, the international mind, which would make it great. It picks at information which will visibly procure money or social distinction. Its conception of a community ideal is not the grand manner, the noble aspiration, the fine aristocratic pride, but cheap labor for the kitchen and rapid increase in the price of land. It 10 plays at cards on greasy oil-cloth in a shanty, and does not know that prophets are walking and talking on the terrace.

If all the provincials were as kindly as Champ Perry and Sam Clark there would be no reason for desiring the town to seek great traditions. It is the Harry Haydocks, the Dave Dyers, the Jackson Elders, small busy men crushingly powerful in their common purpose, viewing themselves as men of the world but keeping themselves men of the cash-register and the comic film, 80 who make the town a sterile oligarchy

VII

She had sought to be definite in analyzing the surface ugliness of the Gopher Prairies She asserted that it is a matter of universal similarity, of flimsiness of construction, so that the towns resemble frontier camps, of neglect of natural advantages, so that the hills are covered with brush, the lakes shut off by railroads, and the creeks lined with dumping-grounds, of depressing sobriety of color, rectangularity of buildings, and excessive breadth and straightness of the gashed streets, so that there is no escape from gales and from sight of the grim sweep of land, nor any windings to coax to the lotterer along, while the breadth which would be majestic in an avenue of palaces makes the low shabby shops creeping down the typical Main Street the more mean by comparison

The universal similarity—that is the physical expression of the philosophy of dull safety. Nine-tenths of the American towns are so alike that it is the completest boredom to wander from one to another Always west of Pittsburg, and often, east of it, there is the same lumber yard, the same railroad station the same 20 Ford garage, the same creamery, the same box-like houses and two-story shops. The new, more conscious houses are alike in their very attempts at diversity. the same bungalows, the same square houses of stucco or tapestry brick. The shops show the same standardized, nationally advertised wares, the newspapers of sections three thousand miles apart have the same "syndicated features", the boy in Arkansas displays just such a flamboyant ready-made suit as is found on just such a boy in Delaware, both of them iterate 30 the same slang phrases from the same sporting-pages, and if one of them is in college and the other is a barber, no one may surmise which is which

If Kennicott were snatched from Gopher Prairie and instantly conveyed to a town leagues away, he would not realize it. He would go down apparently the same Main Street (almost certainly it would be called Main Street); in the same drug store he would see the same young man serving the same ice-cream soda to the same young woman with the same magazines 40 and phonograph records under her arm. Not till he had climbed to his office and found another sign on the door, another Dr Kennicott inside, would be understand that something curious had presumably happened

Finally, behind all her comments, Carol saw the fact that the prairie towns no more exist to serve the farmers who are their reason of existence than do the great capitals, they exist to fatten on the farmers, to provide for the townsmen large motors and social preferment and, unlike the capitals, they do not give to the district in return for usury a stately and permanent center 5. but only this ragged camp. It is a "parasitic Greek civilization"-minus the civilization

"There we are then," said Carol. "The remedy? Is there any? Criticism, perhaps, for the beginning of the beginning Oh, there's nothing that attacks the Tribal God Mediocrity that doesn't help a little and probably there's nothing that helps very much Perhaps some day the farmers will build and own their market-towns (Think of the club they could have') But I'm afraid I haven't any 'reform program' Not any more! The trouble is spiritual, and no League or Party can enact a preference for gardens rather than dumping-grounds . There's my confession Well?" "In other words, all you want is perfection?" said Vida

"Yes! Why nor?"

"How you hate this place! How can you expect to do anything with it if you haven't any sympathy?"

"But I have! And affection Or else I wouldn't fume so I've learned that Gopher Prairie isn't just an eruption on the prairie, as I thought first, but as large as New York. In New York I wouldn't know more than forty or fifty people, and I know that many here Go on' Say what you're thinking"

"Well, my dear, if I did take all your notions seriously, it would be pretty discouraging. Imagine how a person would feel, after working hard for years and helping to build up a nice town, to have you airily flit in and simply say 'Rotten!' Think that's fair'

"Why not? It must be just as discouraging for the Gopher Prairieite to see Venice and make comparisons

"It would not! I imagine gondolas are kind of nice to ride in, but we've got better bath-rooms! But-My dear, you're not the only person in this town who has done some thinking for herself, although (pardon my rudeness) I'm afraid you think so. I'll admit we lack some things. Maybe our theater isn't as good as shows in Paris All right! I don't want to see any foreign culture suddenly forced on us-whether it's street-planning or table-manners or crazy communistic ideas"

Vida sketched what she termed "practical things that will make a happier and prettier town, but that do belong to our life, that actually are being done' Of the Thanatopsis Club she spoke, of the rest-room, the fight against mosquitos, the campaign for more gardens and shade-trees and sewers—matters not fantastic and nebulous and distant, but immediate and sure Carol's answer was fantastic and nebulous enough

"Yes . . . Yes . . . I know They're good But if I could put through all those reforms at once, I d still want startling, exotic things. Life is comfortible and clean enough here already. And so secure. What it needs is to be less secure, more eager. The civic improvements which I'd like the Thanatopsis to advocate are Strindberg plays, and classic dancers—exquisite legs beneath tulle—and (I can see him so clearly!) a thick black-bearded, cynical Frenchman who would sit about and drink and sing opera and tell bawdy stories and laugh at our proprieties and quote Rabelais and not be ashamed to kiss my hand!"

"Huh! Not sure about the rest of it but I guess that's what you and all the other discontented young women really want some stranger kissing your hand!" At Carol's gasp, the old squirrel-like Vida daited out and cried, "Oh, my dear, don't take that too seriously I just meant—"

'I know You just meant it Go on Be good for my soul Isn't it funny here we all are—me trying to be good for Gopher Prairie's soul, and Gopher Prairie trying to be good for my soul. What are my other sins?"

"You sneer so easily I'm sorry, but I do think there's something essentially cheap in your attitude Especially about religion

"If you must know, you're not a sound reformer at all. You're an impossibilist. And you give up too easily. You give up on the new city hall, the antify campaign, club papers, the library-board, the dramatic seasociation—just because we didn't graduate into Ibsen the very first thing. You want perfection all at once. Do you know what the finest thing you've done is—aside from bringing. Hugh into the world? It was the help you give Dr. Will during baby-welfare week. You didn't demand that each baby be a philosopher and artist before you weighed him, as you do with the rest of us.

"And now I'm afraid perhaps I'll hurr you We're going to have a new schoolbuilding in this town—in 60 just a few years—and we'll have it without one bit of help or interest from you'

"Professor Mott and I and some others have been dinging away at the moneyed men for years. We didn't call on you because you would never stand the pound-pound pounding year after year without one bit of encouragement. And we've won! I've got the promise of everybody who counts that just as soon as war-conditions permit, they'll vote the bonds for the schoolhouse. And we'll have a wonderful building—70 lovely brown brick with big windows, and agricultural and manual-training departments. When we get it, that'll be my answer to all your theories!

"I'm glad And I'm ashamed I haven't had any part in getting it But—— Please don't think I'm unsympathetic if I ask one question. Will the teachers in the hygienic new building go on informing the children that Persia is a yellow spot on the map, and Casar the title of a book of grammatical puzzles?"

VIII

Vida was indignant, Carol was apologetic, they talked 80 for another hour the eternal Mary and Martha—an immoralist Mary and a reformist Martha. It was Vida who conquered

The fact that she had been left out of the campaign for the new schoolbuilding disconcerted Carol She laid her dreams of perfection aside When Vida asked her to take charge of a group of Camp Fire Girls, she obeyed and had definite pleasure out of the Indian dances and ritual and costumes. She went more regu-

I trly to the Thanatopsis. With Vida as lieutenant and unofficial commander she campaigned for a village nurse to attend poor families, raised the fund herself, saw to it that the nurse was young and strong and amiable and intelligent

Yet all the while she beheld the burly cynical Frenchman and the diaphanous dancers as clearly as the child sees its air-born playmates, she relished the Camp Fire Girls not because, in Vida's words, "this Scout training will help so much to make them Good Wives," but because she hoped that the Sioux dances would bring subversive color into their dinginess

She helped Ella Stowbody to set out plants in the tiny triangular park at the railroad station, she squatted in the dirt, with a small curved trowel and the most decorous of gardening gauntlets, she talked to Ella about the public-spiritedness of fuchsias and cannas, and she felt that she was scrubbing a temple deserted by the gods and empty even of incense and the sound of chanting Passengers looking from trains saw her as a village woman of fading prettiness, incorruptible virtue, and no abnormalities, the baggageman heard her say. "Oh yes, I do think it will be a good example for the children", and all the while she saw herself running garlanded through the streets of Babylon

Planting led her to botanizing. She never got much farther than recognizing the tiger lily and the wild rose, but she rediscovered Hugh "What does the buttercup say, mummy)" he cried, his hand full of straggly grasses, his cheek gilded with pollen. She knelt to embrace him, she affirmed that he made life more than full, she was altogether reconciled.

But she awoke at night to hovering death. She crept away from the hump of bedding that was Kennicott, tiptoed into the bathroom and, by the mirror in the door of the medicine-cabinet, examined her pallid face Wasn't she growing visibly older in ratio as Vidal grew plumper and younger? Wasn't her nose sharper?

Wasn't her neck granulated? She stared and choked She was only thirty. But the five years since her marriage—had they not gone by as hastily and stupidly as though she had been under ether, would time not slink past till death? She pounded her fist on the cool enameled rim of the bathtub and raged mutely against the indifferent gods:

"I don't care' I won't endure it! They lie so—Vida and Will and Aunt Bessie—they tell me I ought to be satisfied with Hugh and a good home and planting seven nasturtiums in a station garden! I am I! When I die the world will be annihilated, as far as I'm concerned I am I! I'm not content to leave the sea and the ivory towers to others. I want them for me! Damn Vida! Damn all of them! Do they think they can make me believe that a display of potatoes at Howland & Gould's is enough beauty and strangeness?"

[It is now 1917 and the United States is at war. Carol grows more and more away from Will, who cannot understand her concern about "highbrow stuff". When Gopher Prairie unites to persecute a youthful tailor, Erik Valborg, Carol defends him, gives him her friendship, comes perilously close to an affair with him. Will, so the reader understands, succumbs to the wiles of the neurotic Maud. Dyer. In an attempt to save herself and her marriage, although she does not know about Maud, Carol asks Will to take her to California. When she returns she finds that she is still at odds with Gopher Prairie.]

Kennicott was not so inhumanly patient that he could continue to forgive Carol's heresies, to woo her as he had on the venture to California. She tried to be inconspicuous, but she was betrayed by her failure to glow over the boosting. Kennicott believed in it, demanded that she say patriotic things about the White Way and the new factory. He snorted, "By golly, I've done all I could and now I expect you to play the game. Here you been complaining for years about us being so poky, and now when Blausser comes along and does stir up excitement and beautify the town like you've always wanted somebody to, why, you say he's a roughneck, and you won't jump on the band-wagon."

Once, when Kennicott announced at noon-dinner "What do you know about this! They say there's a chance we may get another factory—cream-separator works!' he added, "You might try to look interested even if you ain't!" The baby was frightened by the Jovian roar, ran wailing to hide his face in Carol's lap, and Kennicott had to make himself humble and court both mother and child The dim injustice of not being understood even by his son left him irritable He felt injured.

An event which did not directly touch them brought down his wrath

In the early autumn, news came from Wakamin that the sheriff had forbidden an organizer for the National Nonpartisan League to speak anywhere in the county. The organizer had defied the sheriff, and announced that in a few days he would address a farmers' political meeting. That night, the news ran, a mob of a bundred business men led by the sheriff—the tame village street and the smug village faces ruddled by the light of bobing lanterns, the mob flowing between the squatty rows of shops—had taken the organizer from his hotel, ridden him on a fence-rail, put him on a freight train, and warned him not to return

The story was threshed out in Dave Dyer's drug store, with Sam Clark, Kennicott, and Carol present

'That's the way to treat those fellows—only they ought to have lynched him'" declared Sam, and Kennicott and Dave Dyer joined in a proud "You bet!"

Carol walked out hastily, Kennicott observing her

Through supper-time she knew that he was bubbling and would soon boil over. When the baby was abed and they sat composedly in canvas chairs on the porch, he experimented, "I had a hunch you thought Sam was kind of hard on that fellow they kicked out of Wakamin"

"Wasn't Sam rather needlessly heroic?"

"All these organizers, yes and a whole lot of the German and Squarehead farmers themselves, they're seditious as the devil—disloyal, non-patriotic, pro-German pacifists, that's what they are!"

"Did this organizer say anything pro-German":

"Not on your life! They didn't give him a chance!" His laugh was stagey

"So the whole thing was illegal—and led by the sheriff! Precisely how do you expect these aliens to cobey your law if the officer of the law teaches them to break it? Is it a new kind of logic?"

"Maybe it wasn't exactly regular, but what's the odds? They knew this fellow would try to stir up trouble. Whenever it comes right down to a question of defending Americanism and our constitutional rights, it's justifiable to set aside ordinary procedure."

"What editorial did he get that from?" she wondered, as she protested "See here, my beloved, why can't you Tories declare war honestly? You don't oppose this organizer because you think he's seditious but because 50 you're afraid that the farmers he is organizing will deprive you townsmen of the money you make out of mortgages and wheat and shops. Of course, since we're at war with Germany, anything that any one of us doesn't like is pro-German,' whether it's business competition or bad music. If we were fighting England, you'd call the radicals 'pro-English' When this war is over I suppose you'll be calling them 'red anarchists' What an eternal art it is - such a glittery delightful art ---finding hard names for our opponents! How we 60 do sanctify our efforts to keep them from getting the holy dollars we want for ourselves! The churches have always done it and the political orators-and I suppose I do it when I call Mrs Bogart a 'Puritan' and Mr Stowbody a 'capitalist' But you business men are going to beat all the rest of us at it, with your simplehearted, energetic, pompous---"

She got so far only because Kennicott was slow in shaking off respect for her. Now he bayed

"That'll be about all from you! I've stood for your 70 sneering at this town, and saying how ugly and dull it is I've stood for your refusing to appreciate good fellows like Sam. I've even stood for your ridiculing our Watch Gopher Prairie Grow campaign. But one thing I'm not going to stand. I'm not going to stand my own wife being seditious. You can camouflage all you want to, but you know darn well that these radicals, as you call 'em are opposed to the war, and let me tell you right here and now, and you and all these long-haired men and short-haired women can beef all 80 you want to, but we're going to take these fellows, and if they ain't patriotic, we're going to make them be patriotic And-Lord knows I never though: I'd have to say this to my own wife-but if you go defending these fellows then the same thing applies to you! Next thing, I suppose you'll be yapping about free speech Free speech! There's too much free speech and free gas and free beer and free love and all the rest of your damned mouthy freedom, and if I had my way I'd make you folks live up to the established 90 rules of decency even if I had to take you---"

"Will" She was not timorous now "Am I pro-German if I fail to throb to Honest Jim Blausser, too? Let's have my whole duty as a wife!"

He was grumbling, "The whole thing's right in line with the criticism you've always been making. Might have known you'd oppose any decent constructive work for the town or for——"

"You're right All I've done has been in line I don't belong to Gopher Prairie. That isn't meant as a condemnation of Gopher Prairie, and it may be a condemnation of me. All right! I don't care! I don't belong here, and I'm going. I'm not asking permission any more. I'm simply going."

He grunted "Do you mind telling me, if it isn't too much trouble, how long you're going for?"

"I don't know Perhaps for a year Perhaps for a life-time"

"I see Well, of course, I'll be tickled to death to sell out my practise and go anywhere you say Would you like to have me go with you to Paris and study 20 art, maybe, and wear velveteen pants and a woman's bonnet, and live on spaghetti?"

"No, I think we can save you that trouble You don't quite understand I am going—I really am—and alone! I've got to find out what my work is——"

"Work? Work? Sure! That's the whole trouble with you! You haven't got enough work to do If you had five kids and no hired girl, and had to help with the chores and separate the cream like these farmers' wives, then you wouldn't be so discontented."

130 "I know That's what most men—and women—like you would say That's how they would explain all I am and all I want. And I shouldn't argue with them These business men, from their crushing libors of sitting in an office seven hours a day, would calmly recommend that I have a dozen children. As it happens, I've done that sort of thing. There we been a good many times when we hadn't a maid, and I did all the housework, and cared for Hugh, and went to Red Cross, and did it all very efficiently. I'm a good 40 cook and a good sweeper, and you don't dare say I'm not!"

"N-no, you're----"

"But was I more happy when I was drudging? I was not. I was just bedraggled and unhappy It's work—but not my work I could run an office or a library, or nurse and teach children But solitary dish-washing isn't enough to satisfy me—or many other women We're going to chuck it. We're going to wash em by machinery, and come out and play with you men in the offices and clubs and politics you've cleverijkept for yourselves! Oh, we're hopeless, we dissatisfied women! Then why do you want to have us about the place, to fret you? So it's for your sake that I'm going!

"Of course a little thing like Hugh makes no difference!"

Yes, all the difference That's why I'm going to take him with me

"Suppose I refuse?"

"You won't!"

Forlornly, "Uh—— Carrie, what the devil is it you want, anyway³"

"Oh, conversation! No, it's much more than that I think it's a greatness of life—a refusal to be content with even the healthiest mud."

"Don't you know that nobody ever solved a problem by running away from it?"

Perhaps Only I choose to make my own definition of 'running away' I don't call—— Do you realize how big a world there is beyond this Gopher Prairie where you'd keep me all my life? It may be that some day I'll come back, but not till I can bring something more than I have now And even if I am cowardly and run away—all right, call it cowardly, call me anything you want to! I've been ruled too long by fear of being called things I'm going away to be quiet and think I'm—I'm going! I have a right to my own life."

"So have I to mine!"

"Well?"

"I have a right to my life—and you're it, you're it my life! You've made yourself so I'm damned if I'll agree to all your freak notions, but I will say I've got to depend on you Never thought of that complication, did you, in this off to Bohemia, and express yourself, and free love, and live your own life stuff!

"You have a right to me if you can keep me Can you?"

He moved uneasily

For a month they discussed it. They hurt each other very much, and sometimes they were close to weep- o.

ing, and invariably he used banal phrases about her duties and she used phrases quite as banal about freedom, and through it all, her discovery that she really could get away from Main Street was as sweet as the discovery of love. Kennicott never consented definitely At most he agreed to a public theory that she was going to take a short trip and see what the East was like in wartime."

She set out for Washington in October—just before the war ended

She had determined on Washington because it was less intimidating than the obvious New York because she hoped to find streets in which Hugh could play and because in the stress of war-work, with its demand for thousands of temporary clerks, she could be initiated into the world of offices

Hugh was to go with her, despite the wails and rather extensive comments of Aunt Bessie

She wondered if she might not encounter Erik in the East, but it was a chance thought, soon forgotten

111

The last thing she saw on the station platform was Kennicott, faithfully waving his hand, his face so full of uncomprehending loneliness that he could not smile but only twitch up his lips. She waved to him as long as she could, and when he was lost she wanted to leap from the vestibule and run back to him. She thought of a hundred tendernesses she had neglected.

She had her freedom, and it was empty. The moment was not the highest of her life, but the lowest and most desolate, which was altogether excellent, for instead of slipping downward she began to climb

She sighed, "I couldn't do this if it weren't for Will's kindness, his giving me money. But a second after "I wonder how many women would always stay home if they had the money?"

Hugh complained, "Notice me, mummy!" He was beside her on the red plush seat of the day-coach, a boy of three and a half "I'm tired of playing train Let's play something else Let's go see Auntie Bogart."

"Oh, no! Do you really like Mrs Bogart?"

'Yes. She gives me cookies and she tells me about the Dear Lord You never tell me about the Dear Lord. Why don't you tell me about the Dear Lord? Auntie Bogart says I'm going to be a preacher. Can I be a preacher? Can I preach about the Dear Lord?"

"Oh, please wait till my generation has stopped rebelling before yours starts in!"

"What's a generation?"

"It's a ray in the illumination of the spirit"

"That's foolish" He was a serious and literal per-son, and rather humoriess. She kissed his frown, and marveled

I am running away from my husband, after liking a Swedish ne'er-do-well and expressing immoral opinions, just as in a romantic story. And my own son reproves me because I haven't given him religious instruction. But the story doesn't go right. I'm neither groaning nor being dramatically saved. I keep on running away, and I enjoy it. I'm mad with joy over it. Gopher Prairie is lost back there in the dust and stubble, so and I look forward——"

She continued it to Hugh "Darling, do you know what mother and you are going to find beyond the blue horizon rim?"

"What'" flatly

"We're going to find elephants with golden howdahs from which peep young maharanees with necklaces of rubies, and a dawn sea colored like the breast of a dove, and a white and green house filled with books and silver tea-sets"

"And cookies?"

"Cookies? Oh, most decidedly cookies We've had enough of bread and porridge We'd get sick on too many cookies, but ever so much sicker on no cookies at all."

'That's foolish"

"It is, O male Kennicott!"

Huh!" said Kennicott II, and went to sleep on her shoulder

IV

The theory of the Dauntless regarding Carol's absence

Mrs Will Kennicott and son Hugh left on No 24 on Saturday last for a stay of some months in Minneapolis, Chicago, New York, and Washington Mrs Kennicott confided to Ye Scribe that she will be connected with one of the multifactious war activities now centering in the Nation's Capital for a brief period before returning. Her countless friends who appreciate her splendid labors with the local Red Cross realize how valuable she will be to any war board with which she chooses to become connected. Gopher Prairie thus adds another shining star to its service flag, and without wishing to knock any neighboring communities, we would like to know any town of anywheres near our size in the state that has such a sterling war record Another reason why you'd better Watch Gopher Prairie Grow

10

Mr and Mrs David Dyer, Mrs Dyer's sister, Mrs Jennie Dayborn of Jackrabbit, and Dr. Will Kennicott drove to Minniemashie on Tucsday for a delightful picnic

[Carol lives for nearly two years in Washington, working in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance Will comes to see her and Hugh after thirteen months, takes her on a trip through the South, and asks her to return to Gopher Prairie At length, pregnant with her second child, she goes back]

CHAPTER XXXIX

She wondered all the way home what her sensations would be. She wondered about it so much that she had every sensation she had intagined. She was excited by each familiar porch, each hearty "Well, well" and flattered to be, for a day, the most important news of the community. She bustled about, making calls Juanita Haydock bubbled over their Washington encounter, and took Carol to her social bosom. This ancient opponent seemed likely to be her most intimate friend, for Vida Sherwin, though she was cordial, stood back and watched for imported heresies.

In the evening Carol went to the mill The mystical 30 Om-Om-Om of the dynamos in the electric-light plant behind the mill was louder in the darkness Outside sat the night watchman, Champ Perry He held up his stringy hands and squeaked, "We've all missed you terrible"

Who in Washington would miss her?

Who in Washington could be depended upon like

Guy Pollock? When she saw him on the street, smiling as always, he seemed an eternal thing, a part of her own self.

After a week she decided that she was neither glad enor sorry to be back. She entered each day with the matter-of-fact attitude with which she had gone to her office in Washington. It was her task, there would be mechanical details and meaningless talk, what of it?

The only problem which she had approached with emotion proved insignificant. She had, on the train worked herself up to such devotion that she was willing to give up her own room, to try to share all of her life with Kennicott.

He mumbled, ten minutes after she had entered at the house, "Say, I've kept your room for you like it was I've kind of come round to your way of thinking Don't see why folks need to get on each other's nerves just because they're friendly Darned if I haven't got so I like a little privacy and mulling things over by inyself."

She had left a city which sat up nights to talk of universal transition; of European revolution, guild socialism, free verse. She had fancied that all the world was changing

She found that it was not

In Gopher Prairie the only ardent new topics were prohibition, the place in Minneapolis where you could get whisky at thirteen dollars a quart, recipes for homemade beer, the "high cost of living." the presidential election, Clark's new car, and not very novel foibles of Cy Bogart Their problems were exactly what they had been two years ago, what they had been twenty years ago, and what they would be for twenty years to come With the world a possible volcano, the husbandmen were plowing at the base of the mountain A volcano does occasionally drop a river of lava on even the best of agriculturists, to their astonishment and considerable injury, but their cousins inherit the farms and a year or two later go back to the plowing

She was unable to rhapsodize much over the seven new bungalows and the two garages which Kennicott had made to seem so important. Her intensest thought about them was, "Oh yes, they're all right I suppose." The change which she did heed was the erection of a the schoolbuilding, with its cheerful brick walls, broad.

windows, gymnasium, classrooms for agriculture and cooking It indicated Vida's triumph, and it stirred her to activity—any activity. She went to Vida with a jaunty, "I think I shall work for you And I'll begin at the bottom"

She did She relieved the attendant at the rest-room tot an hour a day. Her only innovation was painting the pine table a black and orange rather shocking to the Thanatopsis She talked to the farmwives and soothed their babies and was happy.

Thinking of them she did not think of the ugliness of Main Street as she hurried along it to the chatter of the Jolly Seventeen

She wore her eye-glasses on the street now She was beginning to ask Kennicott and Juanita if she didn't look young, much younger than thirty-three The eye-glasses pinched her nose She considered spectacles They would make her seem older, and hopelessly settled No' She would not wear spectacles yet But she tried on a pair at Kennicott's office. They really were much more comfortable.

Ш

Dr Westlake, Sam Clark, Nat Hicks, and Del Snafflin were talking in Del's barber shop.

"Well, I see Kennicott's wife is taking a whirl at the rest-room, now," said Dr Westlake He emphasized the "now"

Del interrupted the shaving of Sam and, with his brush dripping lather, he observed jocularly

"What'll she be up to next? They say she used to claim this burg wasn't swell enough for a city girl like her, and would we please tax ourselves about thirty-seven point nine and fix it all up pretty, with tidies on the hydrants and statoos on the lawns——"

Sam irritably blew the lather from his lips, with milky small bubbles, and snorted, "Be a good thing for most of us roughnecks if we did have a smart woman to tell us how to fix up the town Just as much to her kicking as there was to Jim Blausser's gassing about factories. And you can bet Mrs. Kennicott is smart, 40 even if she is skittish. Glad to see her back."

Dr Westlake hastened to play safe "So was I! So was I! So was I! She's got a nice way about her, and she knows a good deal about books—or fiction anyway. Of course she's like all the rest of these women—not solidly founded—not scholarly—doesn't know anything about political economy—falls for every new idea that some windjamming crank puts out. But she's a nice woman. She'll probably fix up the rest-room, and the rest-room is a fine thing, brings a lot of business to town. And now that Mrs Kennicott's been away, maybe she's got over some of her fool ideas. Maybe she realizes that folks simply laugh at her when she tries to tell us how to run everything."

"Sure She'll take a tumble to herselt, said Nat Hicks, sucking in his lips judicially "As far as I'm concerned, I'll say she's as nice a looking skirt as there is in town. But yow!" His tone electrified them "Guess she'll miss that Swede Valborg that used to work for me! They was a pair! Talking poetry and moonshine! If they could of got away with it, they'd of been so 60 darn lovey-dovey——"

Sam Clark in errupted, "Rats, they never even thought about miking love. Just talking books and all that junk. I tell you, Carrie Kennicott's a smart woman, and these smart educated women all get funny ideas, but they get over 'em after they've had three or four kids. You'll see her settled down one of these days, and teaching Sunday School and helping at sociables and behaving herself, and not trying to butt into business and politics. Sure!"

After only fifteen minutes of conference on her stockings, her son, her separate bedroom, her music, her ancient interest in Guy Pollock, her probable salary in Washington, and every remark which she was known to have made since her return, the supreme council decided that they would permit Carol Kennicott to live, and they passed on to a consideration of Nat Hicks's New One about the traveling salesman and the old maid

For some reason which was totally mysterious to Carol, 80 Maud Dyer seemed to resent her return. At the Jolly Seventeen Maud giggled nervously, "Well, I suppose you found war-work a good excuse to stay away and have a swell time. Juanita! Don't you think we ought to make Carrie tell us about the officers she met in Washington?"

They rustled and stared Carol looked at them Their curiosity seemed natural and unimportant

"Oh yes, yes indeed, have to do that some day," she yawned

She no longer took Aunt Bessie Smail seriously enough to struggle for independence. She saw that Aunt Bessie did not mean to intrude, that she wanted to do things for all the Kennicotts Thus Carol hit upon the tragedy of old age, which is not that it is less vigorous than youth, but that it is not needed by youth, that its love and prosy sageness, so important a few years ago, so gladly offered now, are rejected with laughter. She divined that when Aunt Bessie came in with a jar of wild-grape jelly she was waiting in hope of being asked for the recipe. After that she could be irritated but she could not be depressed by Aunt Bessie's simoom of questioning.

She wasn't depressed even when she heard Mrs Bogart observe, "Now we've got prohibition it seems to me that the next problem of the country ain't so much abolishing cigarettes as it is to make folks ob20 serve the Sabbath and arrest these law-breakers that play baseball and go to the movies and all on the Lord's Day"

Only one thing bruised Carol's vanity Few people asked her about Washington They who had most admiringly begged Percy Bresnahan for his opinions were least interested in her facts. She laughed at herself when she saw that she had expected to be at once a heretic and a returned hero, she was very reasonable and merry about it, and it hurt just as much as so ever

٧

Her baby, born in August, was a girl Carol could not decide whether she was to become a feminist leader or marry a scientist oi both, but did settle on Vassar and a tricolette suit with a small black hat for her Freshman year

٧

Hugh was loquacious at breakfast. He desired to give his impressions of owls and F Street.

"Don't make so much noise. You talk too much," growled Kennicott

Carol flared "Don't speak to him that way! Why don't you listen to him? He has some very interesting things to tell."

"What's the idea? Mean to say you expect me to spend all my time listening to his chatter?"

"Why not?"

"For one thing, he's got to learn a little discipline. Time for him to start getting educated."

"I've learned much more discipline, I've had much more education, from him than he has from me"

"What's this? Some new-fangled idea of raising kids s. you got in Washington?"

"Perhaps. Did you ever realize that children are people?"

"That's all right. I'm not going to have him monopolizing the conversation."

"No, of course. We have our rights, too. But I'm going to bring him up as a human being. He has just as many thoughts as we have, and I want him to develop them, not take Gopher Prairie's version of them. That's my biggest work now—keeping myself. 4 keeping you, from 'educating' him."

"Well, let's not scrap about it. But I'm not going to have him spoiled"

Kennicott had forgotten it in ten minutes, and she forgot it—this time

VII

The Kennicotts and the Sam Clarks had driven north to a duck-pass between two lakes, on an autumn day of blue and copper

Kennicott had given her a light twenty-gauge shotgun. She had a first lesson in shooting, in keeping het of eyes open, not wincing, understanding that the bead at the end of the barrel really had something to do with pointing the gun. She was radiant, she almost believed Sam when he insisted that it was she who had shot the mallard at which they had fired together.

She sat on the bank of the reedy lake and found rest in Mrs Clark's drawling comments on nothing. The brown dusk was still. Behind them were dark marshes. The plowed acres smelled fresh. The lake was garnet and silver. The voices of the men, waiting for the last ε flight, were clear in the cool air.

"Mark left!" sang Kennicott, in a long-drawn call
Three ducks were swooping down in a swift line
The guns banged, and a duck fluttered. The men pushed their light boat out on the burnished lake, disappeared beyond the reeds. Their cheerful voices and the slow splash and clank of oars came back to Carol from the dimness. In the sky a fiery plain sloped down to a serene harbor. It dissolved; the lake was white marble, and Kennicott was crying, 'Well, old lady, how about hiking out for home? Supper taste pretty good. eh/

"I'll sit back with Ethel," she said, at the car.

It was the first time she had called Mrs Clark by her given name, the first time she had willingly sat back, a woman of Main Street

"I'm hungry. It's good to be hungry," she reflected, as they drove away

She looked across the silent fields to the west. She was conscious of an unbroken sweep of land to the Rockies, to Alaska, a dominion which will rise to unexampled greatness when other empires have grown senile. Before that time, she knew, a hundred generations of Carols will aspire and go down in tragedy devoid of palls and solemn chanting, the humdrum inevitable tragedy of struggle against inertia.

"Let's all go to the movies tomorrow night. Awfully exciting film," said Ethel Clark

"Well, I was going to read a new book but----- All 22 right, let's go," said Carol

VIII

"They're too much for me," Carol sighed to Kennicott 'I've been thinking about getting up an annual Community Day, when the whole town would forget feuds and go out and have sporis and a picnic and a dance But Bert Tybee (why did you ever elect him mayor?)—he's kidnapped my idea. He wants the Community Day, but he wants to have some politician 'give an address' That's just the stilted sort of thing I've tried to avoid He asked Vida, and of course she agreed with him'

Kennicott considered the matter while he wound the clock and they tramped up-stairs

"Yes, it would jar you to have Bert butting in," he said amiably "Are you going to do much fussing over this Community stunt? Don't you ever get tired of fretting and stewing and experimenting?"

"I haven't even started Look!" She led him to the nursery door, pointed at the fuzzy brown head of her daughter "Do you see that object on the pillow? Do you know what it is? It's a bomb to blow up smugness If you Tories were wise, you wouldn't arrest anarchists, you'd arrest all these children while they're asleep in their cribs. Think what that baby will see and meddle with before she dies in the year 2000! She may see an industrial union of the whole world, she may see aeroplanes going to Mars."

"Yump, probably be changes all right," yawned Kennicott.

She sat on the edge of his bed while he hunted through his bureau for a collar which ought to be there and persistently wasn't

"I'll go on, always And I am happy But this Community Day makes me see how thoroughly I'm beaten"

She patted his pillows turned down his sheets, as she reflected

"But I have won in this I've never excused my failures by sneering at my aspirations, by pretending to have gone beyond them. I do not admit that Main so Street is as beautiful as it should be! I do not admit that Gopher Prairie is greater or more generous than Europe! I do not admit that dish-washing is enough to satisfy all women! I may not have fought the good fight, but I have kept the faith."

"Sure You bet you have," said Kennicott "Well, good night Sort of feels to me like it might snow tomorrow. Have to be thinking about putting up the storm-windows pretty soon. Say, did you notice whether the girl put that screwdriver back."

Edwin Arlington Robinson

1869 · 1935

In the second decade of the twentieth century, a poetic renaissance burst upon America Poetry fairly boomed, as never before or since in our history. The following names and titles were some of the highlights of the period Amy Lowell, Sword Blades and Poppy Seeds (1914), Robert Frost, North of Boston (1914), Vachel Lindsay, The Congo and Other Poems (1914). Edgar Lee Masters, Spoon River Anthology (1915), Carl Sandburg, Chicago Poems (1916), and Edna St Vincent Millay, Renascence (1917) An important organ of the movement was Poetry: A Magazine of Verse, edited in Chicago by Harriet Monroe The poetic renaissance flourished for about ten years, by the early twenties, these writers had said about all that they had to say World War I, moreover, interrupted the movement and produced a spiritual climate which required a different kind of poetry. The appearance of Eliot's Waste Land in 1922 marked the beginning of a new phase

Edwin Arlington Robinson is associated in popular memory with the renaissance. His Man Against the Sky (1916) was hailed along with the works of the new poets. Yet Robinson was not really one of the new poets, he had been publishing poetry for twenty years before he achieved recognition, which was a byproduct of the renaissance proper. But if Robinson preceded the new poets, his belated fame, which they helped him to achieve, more than kept pace with theirs. In the twenties, he was generally regarded as America's greatest living poet, and was awarded the Pulitzer Prize three times—in 1922 for Collected Poems, in 1925 for The Man Who Died Turce, and in 1928 for Tristram.

Robinson was born in the village of Head Tide Maine, and spent his youth in nearby Gardiner, the "Tilbury Town" of his poems. After finishing the high-school course in Gardiner, he entered Harvard but left after two years, returning to Gardiner to devote himself to the writing of poetry. In 1897 he moved to New York, where he lived for the rest of his life, except for summers spent, after 1911, at the MacDowell Colony near Peterborough, New Hampshire He went to Europe once, but never traveled in the United States beyond New England and New York City Unmarried and shy he lived quietly and inexpensively, he had little money, but, like another New Englander, Henry Thoreau, he could be rich by making his wants few. He published over twenty volumes of poetry, some of the more notable of which are The Children of the Night (1897), Captain Craig (1902) The Town down the River (1910), The Man Against the Sky (1916), Merlin (1917), Lancelot (1920) Dionysus in Doubt (1925), Tristram (1927), and Matthias at the Door (1931) Though written in conventional nineteenth-century forms, Robinson's poetry is "modern" in diction and temper. He may have been influenced by Robert Browning's dramatic monologue and analysis of men and women, but his view of life is nearer Thomas Hardy's than any other earlier poet's His poetry is sober, reflective, pessimistic, and now and then obscure Robinson's development was, roughly, in two phases Before 1916 he excelled in "Tilbury" portraits which were sharply etched and indigenous to New England In the second phase Robinson became medieval and philosophical. He retold the Arthurian stories in Morlin, Lancelot, and Tristram, and gave free rein, in these poems and in others, to philosophical disquisition. At their best, the philosophical parts have dignity and strength; at their worst, they are wordy and vague Although his fame dates from the second phase, critical opinion today, ironically enough, seems to prefer the early portraits of Tilbury Town.

The Man Against the Sky suggests Robinson's qualities as a philosophical poet. The Man Against the Sky, Robinson's Everyman, is a figure of doubtful heroism. His course is ambiguous. But his road—whatever it may have been—was a dark one and led only to apparent failure or, at best, to an equivocal success. This being so, "Why live?" the poet asks. The answer is a little uncertain there is, he says, "an orient Word that will not be erased." This "orient Word" makes life significant even though its meaning is but dimly understood. The poet seems to counsel a kind of despairing courage to seek out the meaning.

Other poems suggest similar moods and attitudes. In "Flammonde," 'we've each a darkening hill to climb." Miniver Cheevy "scratched his head and kept on thinking" In "Credo," the poet could not find his way, though he felt "the coming glory of the Light."

Despite his large use of Arthurian materials, Robinson is in the native New England tradition. He reflects that tradition, though, in the process of decay. The accent is still Puritan, but no longer vigorous and triumphant

Cliff Klingenhagen

Cliff Klingenhagen had me in to dine With him one day, and after soup and meat, And all the other things there were to eat, Cliff took two glasses and filled one with winc And one with wormwood. Then, without a sign For me to choose at all, he took the draught Of bitterness himself, and lightly quaffed It off, and said the other one was mine

And when I asked him what the deuce he meant By doing that, he only looked at me And smiled, and said it was a way of his And though I know the fellow, I have spent Long time a-wondering when I shall be As happy as Cliff Klingenhagen is And he was always quietly arrayed,
And he was always human when he talked,
But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
'Good-morning,' and he glittered when he walked.

And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—And admirably schooled in every grace. In fine, we thought that he was everything. To make us wish that we were in his place.

So on we worked, and waited for the light, And went without the meat, and cursed the bread, And Richard Cory, one calm summer night, Went home and put a bullet through his head

Richard Cory

Whenever Richard Cory went down town, We people on the pavement looked at him. He was a gentleman from sole to crown, Clean favored, and imperially slim. I cannot find my way there is no star In all the shrouded heavens anywhere, And there is not a whisper in the air Of any living voice but one so far That I can hear it only as a bar Of lost, imperial music, played when fair And angel fingers wove, and unaware, Dead leaves to garlands where no roses are

No, there is not a glimmer, nor a call.

For one that welcomes, welcomes when he fears,

The black and awful chaos of the night,

For through it all—above, beyond it all—

I know the far-sent message of the years,

I feel the coming glory of the Light

Now in a thought, now in a shadowed word, Now in a voice that thrills eternity.

Ever there comes an onward phrase to me Of some transcendent music I have heard. No piteous thing by soft hands dulcimered. No trumpet crash of blood-sick victory. But a glad strain of some vast harmony That no brief mortal touch has ever stirred There is no music in the world like this No character wherewith to set it down. No kind of instrument to make it sing No kind of instrument? Ah, yes, there is, And after time and place are overthrown. God's touch will keep its one chord quivering

Miniver Cheevy

Although it reads like a sature on nuneteenth-century medievalism—shades of Mark Twain's Connecticut Yankee!—this poem actually foreshadows the poets deep interest in the Arthurian stories. If Miniver Cheevy could have written Merlin and Tristram, perhaps he would not have required the solace of alcohol

Miniver Cheevy, child of scorn,
Grew lean while he assailed the seasons,
He wept that he was ever born,
And he had reasons

Miniver loved the days of old

When swords were bright and steeds were prancing,

The vision of a warrior bold Would set him dancing

Miniver sighed for what was not,
And dreamed, and rested from his labors,
He dreamed of Thebes and Camelot,
And Priam's neighbors

Miniver mourned the ripe renown

That made so many a name so fragrant,
He mourned Romance, now on the town,
And Art, a vagrant

Miniver loved the Medici,
Albeit he had never seen one,
He would have sinned incessantly
Could he have been one

Miniver cursed the commonplace
And eyed a khaki suit with loathing,
He missed the mediaeval grace
Of iron clothing

Miniver scorned the gold he sought,

But sore annoyed was he without it,

Miniver thought, and thought, and thought,

And thought about it

Miniver Cheevy, born too late, Scratched his head and kept on thinking. Miniver coughed, and called it fate, And kept on drinking

Flammonde

"Flammonde" illustrates Robinson's fascinated interest in psychological enigmas what satanic kink in the mind of Flammonde prevented him from being the grand success that he might otherwise have been?

The man Flammonde, from God knows where, With firm address and foreign air,

Miniver Cheevy' from The Town Down the River by Edwin Arlington Robinson published by Charles Scribner's Sons, copyright, 1910, by Charles Scribner's Sons and 1938 by Ruth Niveson, used by permission of the publishers With news of nations in his talk
And something royal in his walk,
With glint of iron in his eyes,
But never doubt, nor yet surprise,
Appeared, and stayed, and held his head
As one by kings accredited

Erect with his alert repose
About him, and about his clothes,
He pictured all tradition hears
Of what we owe to fifty years
His cleansing heritage of taste
Paraded neither want nor waste.
And what he needed for his fee
To live, he borrowed graciously

He never told us what he was
Or what mischance, or other cause
Had banished him from better days
To play the Prince of Castaways
Meanwhile he played surpassing well
A part, for most, unplayable
In fine, one pauses, half afraid
To say for certain that he played

For that, one may as well forego
Conviction as to yes or no.
Nor can I say just how intense
Would then have been the difference
To several, who, having striven
In vain to get what he was given
Would see the stranger taken on
By friends not easy to be won

Moreover, many a malcontent
He soothed and found munificent
His courtesy beguiled and foiled
Suspicion that his years were soiled
His mien distinguished any crowd.
His credit strengthened when he bowed
And women, young and old, were fond
Of looking at the man Flammonde

There was a woman in our town On whom the fashion was to frown But while our talk renewed the tinge Of a long-faded scarlet fringe,
The man Flammonde saw none of that,
And what he saw we wondered at—
That none of us, in her distress,
Could hide or find our littleness

There was a boy that all agreed Had shut within him the rare seed Of learning. We could understand, But none of us could lift a hand. The man Flammonde appraised the youth, And told a few of us the truth, And thereby, for a little gold, A flowered future was circled.

There were two citizens who fought For years and years, and over nought. They made life awkward for their friends. And shortened their own dividends The man Flammonde said what was wrong Should be made right, nor was it long Before they were again in line, And had each other in to dine

And these I mention are but four
Of many out of many more
So much for them But what of him—
So firm in every look and limb?
What small satanic sort of kink
Was in his brain? What broken link
Withheld him from the destinics
That came so near to being his?

What was he, when we came to sift His meaning, and to note the drift Of incommunicable ways That make us ponder while we praise? Why was it that his charm revealed Somehow the surface of a shield? What was it that we never caught? What was he, and what was he not?

How much it was of him we met We cannot ever know, nor yet Shall all he gave us quite atone For what was his, and his alone;

Nor need we now since he knew best, Nourish an ethical unrest. Rarely at once will nature give The power to be Flammonde and live.

We cannot know how much we learn From those who never will return, Until a flash of unforeseen Remembrance falls on what has been We've each a darkening hill to climb; And this is why, from time to time In Tilbury Town, we looked beyond Horizons for the man Flammonde.

Mr. Flood's Party

"Mr Flood's Party" is another of Robinson's masterful Tilbury Town portraits, clearly conceived and sharply etched. The "party" consists of only one person, since Mr. Flood's contemporaries have long been dead, and the younger generation of Tilbury are unfriendly to him. Mr. Flood is thus reduced to the misfortune of drinking alone. In a special sense, the poem suggests the loneliness of rural New England, but in a larger sense, the loneliness of old age anywhere.

The reference to Roland seems quaintly incongruous in a New England setting. There is little resemblance between Mr. Flood and the famous knight of medieval romance except that each fought a losing battle alone and went down in defeat at last.

Old Eben Flood, climbing alone one night Over the hill between the town below And the forsaken upland hermitage That held as much as he should ever know On earth again of home, paused warily. The road was his with not a native near, And Eben, having leisure, said aloud, For no man else in Tilbury Town to hear.

'Well, Mr. Flood, we have the harvest moon Again, and we may not have many more;

The bird is on the wing, the poet says,
And you and I have said it here before.
Drink to the bird.' He raised up to the light
The jug that he had gone so far to fill,
And answered huskily: 'Well, Mr. Flood,
Since you propose it, I believe I will.'

Alone, as if enduring to the end
A valuant armor of scarred hopes outworn,
He stood there in the middle of the road
Like Roland's ghost winding a silent horn.
Below him, in the town among the trees,
Where friends of other days had honored him,
A phantom salutation of the dead
Rang thinly till old Eben's eyes were dim.

Then, as a mother lays her sleeping child
Down tenderly, fearing it may awake,
He set the jug down slowly at his feet
With trembling care, knowing that most things break,
And only when assured that on firm earth
It stood, as the uncertain lives of men
Assuredly did not, he paced away,
And with his hand extended paused again

'Well, Mr. Flood, we have not met like this In a long time, and many a change has come To both of us, I fear, since last it was We had a drop together. Welcome home!' Convivially returning with himself, Again he raised the jug up to the light; And with an acquiescent quaver said: 'Well, Mr Flood, if you insist, I might,

Only a very little, Mr. Flood—
For auld lang syne. No more, sir; that will do.'
So, for the time, apparently it did,
And Eben evidently thought so too,
For soon amid the silver loneliness
Of night he lifted up his voice and sang,
Secure, with only two moons listening,
Until the whole harmonious landscape rang—

²⁰ Roland's ghost, an allusion to the hero of the famous French romance of the eleventh century, the Chanson de Roland. The reference obliquely reflects Robinson's absorbing interest in the European Middle Ages

For auld lang syne.' The weary throat gave out, The last word wavered, and the song was done. He raised again the jug regretfully And shook his head, and was again alone. There was not much that was ahead of him,
And there was nothing in the town below—
Where strangers would have shut the many doors
That many friends had opened long ago

Robert Frost

1875 •

Despite the fact that his natal place was San Francisco, California, Robert Frost's forebears for nine generations had been New Englanders and most of his life, from 1885 to the present, has been lived in New England Frost's father died in San Francisco when the boy was ten, and the widow went East to Lawrence Massachusetts, with her children to live with their grandfather Frost attended school in Lawrence, and did such good work that, at graduation, he was high-school valedictorian. In the autumn of 1892 Frost entered Dartmouth, but, finding college life unattractive, he shortly withdrew During the next few years, he worked in a mill for a time, took a tramping trip through the South, did some teaching, some newspaper work, and married Elinor White, who in high school had been his only rival for class vale 'ictorian In 1897, he tried college again, this time Harvard, where he enjoyed the study of Latin, Greek, and philosophy At the end of two years, however, he again left college, and moved to a farm near Derry, New Hampshire, which had been given to him by his grandfather Because farming, during a period of eleven years, proved pretty unprofitable, Frost turned to teaching at nearby Pinkerton Academy (1905-1911) and then at New Hampshire State Normal (1911-1912)

Panel (I to r) Frost's farmhouse, Franconia, New Hampshire • Robert Frost at 55 • Something there is that doesn't love a wall

Meanwhile, he had made a rather discouraging start as a poet He had from early boyhood been an enthusiastic reader and writer of poetry. In his teens he had begun to publish a few of his poems in magazines His poetry, however, did not seem very attractive to most buyers in twenty years, he earned about two hundred dollars, in all, from his verses. In 1911, at thirty-six, he decided to sell his farm and to spend a few years in concentrated poetic work, to determine once and for all whether he could succeed in literature Attracted by the relatively low cost of living in England, he went there, with his family, in 1912 By 1913 he managed to find a British publisher for his first book of verse, A Boy's Will This, as well as his second book, North of Boston (1914), was very favorably received by English readers and critics

When, in 1915, Frost returned to America, he learned that his two books, upon re-publication in this country, had won appreciation of a sort to make him rub his eyes. Regardless, he resumed his old vocations of farming-in New Hampshire and Vermont-and of teaching, but now he gave more time to composition During the years since 1915, he has taught with distinction at Amherst College, the University of Michigan, the University of Vermont, and Bread Loaf School of English at Middlebury College He has published several books of verse, notably Mountain Interval (1916), New Hampshire (1924), West-Running Brook (1928), A Further Range (1936), A Witness Tree (1942), Come In (1943), Masque of Reason (1945), and three issues of Selected Poems (1923, 1931, 1934) Twice, in 1924 and 1931, he has received the Pulitzer Award for American poetry

The poetry of Frost has been influenced, of course, by various authors whom he admires Virgil, the Latin poet of the Georgics and the Ecloques, has left his imprint. Frost's work is in the tradition, too, of New England predecessors such as Emerson, Thoreau, and Emily Dickinson Yet, for the most part, bookish influences seem less important than those of the poet's inheritance and environment. The scenery, the char. acters, the habits of life in his section north of Boston are the stuff of much of the verse. The rocky farms, the lush woodlands, the old houses, and the stone fences of Yankeeland are in his poems. So are the rugged folk of the section—their hard lives devoted to tilling thin soil, their quirks, their ironic humor, their emotional crises Writing of such people, often in monologues and dialogues, the poet subtly translates into rhythms the intonations, as well as expressions, which are pure New England And much of the verse is read best when the reader uses the tight-lipped way of talking characteristic of farm folk in New Hampshire and Vermont. Frost himself, a stalwart, rough-hewn figure of a man with the weathered face of a farmer, so reads them to perfection

Although, at first reading or hearing, the poems may seem to be lucidly simple, after better acquaintance they turn out to be, in many instances, rich in hidden meanings Some words which Emily Dickinson applied to herself apply to Frost, like her, he "thinks New Englandly." There is a certain reticence, a teasing indirectness, in his way of telling his thought. Generally he avoids personal involvement by dramatizing "Everything written," he has said, "is as good as it is dramatic" Often he merely presents an incident or scene, and leaves to the reader the search for any implied significance, and even when he states a moral (as in "Mending Wall") frequently a more general meaning is implied "If I must be classified as a poet," he once said, half jestingly, half earnestly, "I might be called a Synecdochist, for I prefer the synecdoche in poetry-that figure of speech in which we use a part for the whole" Furthermore, it appears that he avoids explicit formulations partly, at least, because he does not want to commit himself to any solution which runs the danger of being simple-minded Life, he sees, is full of apparent paradoxes. It is tragic and hilariously comic, beautiful and ugly, chaotic and unified, and he refuses to take an extreme "either-or" position. Therefore, as Mark Van Doren has said (American Scholar, 1936), "Mr Frost's place is and always has been singularly central He has nothing to do with the extremes where most of our shouting has been heard. . . . There is an ignoble way of avoiding exthough it may be to define, is the only way worth considering. It consists in occupying or touching both extremes at once, and inhabiting all the space between It consists in being capable of excess while actually achieving more than excess achieves. It consists in finding the golden mean which, far from signifying that the extremes have been avoided, signifies that they have been enclosed and contained." A careful study of the poetry of Robert Frost will show that, for all his appearance of rustic simplicity, he has more of significance to say than many of the contemporaneous poets among whom he holds a high position

Mowing

A one-sentence interpretation of this poem by its author is. "The youth takes up life simply with the small tasks" Wrote T K Whipple, in Spokesmen "Robert Frost's is preeminently a farmer's poetry. His familiarity with nature and with objects is not, for all his deservedly famous observation, that of the observer or spectator, but that of the man who has worked with them and used them His acquaintance with them is more intimate and more intuitive than that of the onlooker. A grindstone to him is not a quaint object with rustic associations, but something which has made him groun and sweat, a scythe does not remind him of Theocritus but of the feel of the instrument as he swung it" In "Mowing," the poet is concerned with suggesting to the reader his "intimate and intuitive acquaintance" with a swinging scythe—his sensing of significance in an ordinary task. The verse form, since it is a sonnet with its own individual rhymescheme, and since its iambic rhythms are adjusted to those of a conversational tone, represents the modified modernism of the author's versification

There was never a sound beside the wood but one And that was my long scythe whispering to the ground. What was it it whispered? I knew not well myself, Perhaps it was something about the heat of the sun, Something, perhaps, about the lack of sound—And that was why it whispered and did not speak It was no dream of the gift of idle hours, Or easy gold at the hand of fay or elf:

Anything more than the truth would have seemed too weak

To the earnest love that laid the swale in rows,
Not without feeble-pointed spikes of flowers
(Pale orchises), and scared a bright green snake
The fact is the sweetest dream that labor knows
My long scythe whispered and left the hay to make

The Demiurge's Laugh

A "demiurge," according to Greek mythology, was a subordinate god who created or fashioned the world Frost has said that "The Demiurge's Laugh" is "about science". Hence "the Demon" whom the poet pursued may have been some false god worshiped by science as a creator, perhaps creative evolution as a final explanation of all history and progress. Thinking he was on the trail of this scientific fable, the poet heard a sound "behind him instead of before"—a mocking sound which made him realize that his belief that he was progressing toward understanding was fallacious. Abashed by this realization, he abandoned the search. Such an interpretation of the poem (others are possibl.) at least is consistent with the author's lifelong habit of rejecting oversimplified solutions and faiths.

It was far in the sameness of the wood,

I was running with joy on the Demon's trail,

Though I knew what I hunted was no true god.

It was just as the light was beginning to fail

It was just as the light was beginning to fai That I suddenly heard—all I needed to hear It has lasted me many and many a year

The sound was behind me instead of before,

A sleepy sound, but mocking half, As of one who utterly couldn't care.

The Demon arose from his wallow to laugh, 10 Brushing the dirt from his eye as he went, And well I knew what the Demon meant

I shall not forget how his laugh rang out
I felt as a fool to have been so caught,
And checked my steps to make pretence

It was something among the leaves I sought (Though doubtful whether he stayed to sec) Thereafter I sat me against a tree

Mending Wall

Characteristic details often repeated in the New England landscape are stone fences, laboriously kept in neat repair by their owners. In this poem, which tells of the springtime ritual of mending such a wall, two kinds of Yankees-or of men-are dramatically contrasted. The "I" of the poem is unconventional in his thinking and impish in his discourse, his neighbor is a person who doggedly takes for granted that anything which his father has thought and said must be a final fact. The narrator opens with some of his reflections about the way nature seems to battle, in its mysterious way, against a wall He then tells of an annual arrangement he has with his neighbor to repair winter damages--"to set the wall between us once again." There is irony, of course, in the fact that those who live near to one another thus cooperate to set themselves apart, an irony which is heightened by the fact that this particular wall has no real purpose In the brief argument which follows, the narrator teases his neighbor about this situation, but the neighbor repeats, with unction, an old adage which he has thoughtlessly accepted. Some will take this poem to be a little character etching; others, perhaps, will take it to be a parable about the way tradition works against nature to keep men or even nations apart. Frost merely tells the story. Writes G. R. Elliott, in The Nation, 1919. "Good fences make good neighbors; but also, on the other hand, 'Something there is that doesn't love a wall." This two-sided text... is the underlying theme of the poet's whole work. Does it not also represent, in minicular, the great paradox which now confronts human society? "Walls' are indispensable, we find, and yet our progress toward human brotherhood seems sadly cramped by 'walls.' That this paradox is soluble in the spirit of true neighborliness, but that the solution of it is laborious and exciting, is what one is made to feel keenly in reading Mr. Frost's poetry."

Something there is that doesn't love a wall. That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it, And spills the upper boulders in the sun, And makes gaps even two can pass abreast The work of hunters is another thing I have come after them and made repair Where they have left not one stone on a stone, But they would have the rabbit out of hiding, To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean, No one has seen them made or heard them made. But at spring mending-time we find them there I let my neighbour know beyond the hill, And on a day we meet to walk the line And set the wall between us once again. We keep the wall between us as we go To each the boulders that have fallen to each And some are loaves and some so nearly balls We have to use a spell to make them balance. 'Stay where you are until our backs are turned' We wear our fingers rough with handling them Oh, just another kind of out-door game, One on a side. It comes to little more There where it is we do not need the wall He is all pine and I am apple orchard My apple trees will never get across And eat the cones under his pines, I tell him He only says, 'Good fences make good neighbours.' Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder If I could put a notion in his head:

It has do they make good neighbours? Isn't it Where there are cows? But here there are no cows Before I built a wall I'd ask to know What I was walling in or walling out. And to whom I was like to give offence Something there is that doesn't love a wall, That wants it down' I could say 'Elves' to him. But it's not elves exactly, and I'd rather He said it for himself. I see him there Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed He moves in darkness as it seems to me. Not of woods only and the shade of trees He will not go behind his father's saying. And he likes having thought of it so well He says again, 'Good fences make good neighbours' 1914

The Death of the Hired Man

The Death of the Hired Man, like "Mending Wall, dramatically presents a group of contrasting characters, but here there are three instead of two Aside from some brief descriptive and narrative passages, it is a dialogue, and the conversation typifies Robert Frost's skill in making verse sound like talk and in delineating the folk of his region The temperament and history of the hired man, Silas, are shown indirectly by the discussion about him, and his return and death are important incidents. Silas is a lazy, sponging rogue who, on many occasions, has wandered away only to return and take advantage of the kindness of his employers, Mary and Warren These employers reveal their characters as they converse about the latest return of this pathetic but rather ingratiating creature In the discussion which follows, the wife deftly wins the farmer over to her point of view When Warren goes to speak with Silas, he makes an ironic discovery

Mary sat musing on the lamp-flame at the table Waiting for Warren When she heard his step. She ran on tip-toe down the darkened passage To meet him in the doorway with the news

And put him on his guard 'Silas is back.'
She pushed him outward with her through the door
And shut it after her 'Be kind,' she said.
She took the market things from Warren's arms
And set them on the porch, then drew him down
To sit beside her on the wooden steps 10

When was I ever anything but kind to him? But I'll not have the fellow back,' he said I told him so last haying, didn't I' "If he left then,' I said, "that ended it" What good is he? Who else will harbour him At his age for the little he can do? What help he is there's no depending on Off he goes always when I need him most "He thinks he ought to earn a little pay, Enough at least to buy tobacco with, 20 So he won't have to beg and be beholden" 'All right," I say, "I can't afford to pay Any fixed wages, though I wish I could Someone else can" "Then someone else will have to" I shouldn't mind his bettering himself If that was what it was You can be certain. When he begins like that, there's someone at him Trying to coax him off with pocket-money,-In having time, when any help is scarce In winter he comes back to us. I'm donc'

'Sh! not so loud he'll hear you,' Mary said

I want him to he'll have to soon or late'

He's worn out He's asleep beside the stove When I came up from Rowe's I found him here, Huddled against the barn-door fast asleep, A miserable sight, and frightening, too—You needn't smile—I didn't recognise him—I wasn't looking for him—and he's changed Wait till you see

'Where did you say he'd been?' 40

He didn't say. I dragged him to the house, And gave him tea and tried to make him smoke I tried to make him talk about his travels Nothing would do he just kept nodding off What did he say? Did he say anything?

'But little

'Anything' Mary, confess He said he'd come to ditch the meadow for me.'

'Warren!'

'But did he? I just want to know' 50

'Of course he did. What would you have him say? Surely you wouldn't grudge the poor old man Some humble way to save his self-respect He added, if you really care to know, He meant to clear the upper pasture, too That sounds like something you have heard before? Warren, I wish you could have heard the way He jumbled everything I stopped to look Two or three times—he made me feel so queer— To see if he was talking in his sleep He ran on Harold Wilson-you remember-The boy you had in haying four years since He's finished school, and teaching in his college. Silas declares you'll have to get him back He says they two will make a team for work Between them they will lay this farm as smooth! The way he mixed that in with other things He thinks young Wilson a likely lad, though daft On education—you know how they fought All through July under the blazing sun, Silas up on the cart to build the load, Harold along beside to pitch it on

'Yes, I took care to keep well out of earshot'

'Well, those days trouble Silas like a dream
You wouldn't think they would How some things linger!
Harold's young college boy's assurance piqued him.
After so many years he still keeps finding
Good arguments he sees he might have used.
I sympathise I know just how it feels
To think of the right thing to say too late Harold's associated in his mind with Latin.
He asked me what I thought of Harold's saying
He studied Latin like the violin

Because he liked it—that an argument!

He said he couldn't make the boy believe

He could find water with a hazel prong—

Which showed how much good school had ever done him

He wanted to go over that. But most of all

He thinks if he could have another chance

To teach him how to build a load of hay—'

'I know, that's Silas' one accomplishment He bundles every forkful in its place, And tags and numbers it for future reference, So he can find and easily dislodge it. In the unloading Silas does that well. He takes it out in bunches like big birds' nests You never see him standing on the hay. He's trying to lift, straining to lift himself.

'He thinks if he could teach him that, he'd be Some good perhaps to someone in the world He hates to see a boy the fool of books Poor Silas, so concerned for other folk, And nothing to look backward to with pride, And nothing to look forward to with hope, So now and never any different.'

Part of a moon was falling down the west,
Dragging the whole sky with it to the hills
Its light poured softly in her lap. She saw it
And spread her apron to it. She put out her hand
Among the harp-like morning-glory strings,
Taut with the dew from garden bed to eaves,
As if she played unheard some tenderness
That wrought on him beside her in the night.
'Warren,' she said, 'he has come home to die
You needn't be afraid he'll leave you this time'

'Home,' he mocked gently

Yes, what else but home?

It all depends on what you mean by home

Of course he's nothing to us, any more

Than was the hound that came a stranger to us

Out of the woods, worn out upon the trail.

'Home is the place where, when you have to go there. They have to take you in.'

'I should have called it Something you somehow haven't to deserve'

Warren leaned out and took a step or two,

Picked up a little stick, and brought it back

And broke it in his hand and tossed it by.

Silas has better claim on us you think

Than on his brother? Thirteen little miles

As the road winds would bring him to his door

Silas has walked that far no doubt to-day

Why didn't he go there? His brother's rich,

A somebody—director in the bank'

'He never told us that.'

'We know it though.'

I think his brother ought to help, of course
I'll see to that if there is need. He ought of right
To take him in, and might be willing to—
He may be better than appearances
But have some pity on Silas. Do you think
If he had any pride in claiming kin
Or anything he looked for from his brother,
He'd keep so still about him all this time?'

'I wonder what's between them.

'I can tell you

Silas is what he is—we wouldn't mind him— But just the kind that kinsfolk can't abide He never did a thing so very bad He don't know why he isn't quite as good

As anybody Worthless though he is,
He won't be made ashamed to please his brother'

'I can't think Si ever hurt anyone'

'No, but he hurt my heart the way he lay

And rolled his old head on that sharp-edged chairback

He wouldn't let me put him on the lounge
You must go in and see what you can do
I made the bed up for him there to-night
You'll be surprised at him—how much he's broken
His working days are done, I'm sure of it.'

'I'd not be in a hurry to say that'

'I haven't been. Go, look, see for yourself. But, Warren, please remember how it is: He's come to help you ditch the meadow. He has a plan. You mustn't laugh at him. He may not speak of it, and then he may I'll sit and see if that small sailing cloud Will hit or miss the moon.'

It hit the moon.

Then there were three there, making a dim row, 160 The moon, the little silver cloud, and she

Warren returned—too soon, it seemed to her, Slipped to her side, caught up her hand and waited

'Warren?' she questioned

'Dead,' was all he answered

The Hill Wife

In Fire and Ice, an illuminating study of Robert Frost, Professor Thompson writes these helpful comments. "An implied dramatic narrative is fashioned from five very short lyrics in 'The Hill Wife' . . . It stands out by implication as a miniature lyric drama in five scenes. The first scene, of twelve lines only, sets the stage for tragedy, and establishes the theme of fear-in-loneliness. The Hill Wife tries to tell her husband that something must be wrong The second scene is with them to be so sad and lonely even shorter than the first. In it a chorus voice describes the fear of the empty house when the Hill Wife returns In the third scene, the Hill with her husband at night . Wife describes her fear caused by the way a passing tramp smiled strangely and unfathomably at her before he walked into the woods with the bread she had given him Fear of yet another kind shows itself in the fourth scene Briefly the chorus voice tells how the Hill Wife is troubled by the persistent scrape of a pine branch which fumbles against her bedroom window with 'tireless but ineffectual hands.' The fifth scene, entitled 'The Impulse,' contains climax and denouement. The chorus voice tells how the Hill Wife followed her silent husband in field and wood, hoping that his nearness might relieve her fear of loneliness. Once, when she strayed off so far that she scarcely heard when he shouted to her, she hid herself instead of answering him. The conclusion [comprising the last two stanzas] is terse enough. In 'The Hill Wife' the psychological analysis is developed entirely through implication, and hinges on the growing failure of the man to sympathize with the woman's accumulated psychosis."

LONELINESS

Her Word

One ought not to have to care

So much as you and I

Care when the birds come round the house

To seem to say good-bye,

Or care so much when they come back
With whatever it is they sing,
The truth being we are as much
Too glad for the one thing

As we are too sad for the other here— With birds that fill their breasts But with each other and themselves And their built or driven nests

HOUSE FEAR

Always—I tell you this they learned—Always at night when they returned
To the lonely house from far away
To lamps unlighted and fire gone gray,
They learned to rattle the lock and key
To give whatever might chance to be
Warning and time to be off in flight:
And preferring the out- to the in-door night,
They learned to leave the house-door wide
Until they had lit the lamp inside.

I didn't like the way he went away.

That smile! It never came of being gay.

Still he smiled—did you see him?—I was sure!

Perhaps because we gave him only bread

And the wretch knew from that that we were poor

Perhaps because he let us give instead

Of seizing from us as he might have seized

Perhaps he mocked at us for being wed,

Or being very young (and he was pleased

To have a vision of us old and dead)

I wonder how far down the road he's got

He's watching from the woods as like as not.

THE OFT-REPEATED DREAM

She had no saying dark enough
For the dark pine that kept Forever trying the window-latch
Of the room where they slept.

The tireless but ineffectual hands
That with every futile pass
Made the great tree seem as a little bird
Before the mystery of glass!

It never had been inside the room, And only one of the two Was afraid in an oft-repeated dream Of what the tree might do

THE IMPULSE

50

40

It was too lonely for her there,
And too wild,
And since there were but two of them,
And no child,

And work was little in the house,
She was free,
And followed where he furrowed field,
Or felled tree

She rested on a log and tossed The fresh chips, With a song only to herself On her lips

And once she went to break a bough Of black alder.

She strayed so far she scarcely heard When he called her—

And didn't answer—didn't speak—
Or return
She stood, and then she ran and hid
In the fern

He never found her, though he looked Everywhere,

And he asked at her mother's house Was she there

Sudden and swift and light as that
The ties gave,
And he learned of finalities
Besides the grave

Birches

A man, upon seeing bent birches, recalls how, as a boy, he had swung upon such trees. Then, by means of an analogy, he contrasts the swinging of a boy, toward Heaven and back to earth, with death.

When I see birches bend to left and right
Across the lines of straighter darker trees,
I like to think some boy's been swinging them
But swinging doesn't bend them down to stay
Ice-storms do that Often you must have seen them
Loaded with ice a sunny winter morning
After a rain They click upon themselves
As the breeze rises, and turn many-colored
As the stir cracks and crazes their cnamel
Soon the sun's warmth makes them shed crystal shells
Shattering and avalanching on the snow-crust—

Such heaps of broken glass to sweep away You'd think the inner dome of heaven had fallen. They are dragged to the withered bracken by the load, And they seem not to break, though once they are bowed So low for long, they never right themselves: You may see their trunks arching in the woods Years afterwards, trailing their leaves on the ground Like girls on hands and knees that throw their hair Before them over their heads to div in the sun But I was going to say when Truth broke in With all her matter-of-fact about the icc-storm I should prefer to have some boy bend them As he went out and in to fetch the cows-Some boy too far from town to learn baseball, Whose only play was what he found himself Summer or winter, and could play alone One by one he subdued his father's trees By riding them down over and over again Until he took the stiffness out of them, 30 And not one but hung limp, not one was left For him to conquer He learned all there was To learn about not launching out too soon And so not carrying the tree away Clear to the ground He always kept his poise To the top branches, climbing carefully With the same pains you use to fill a cup Up to the brim, and even above the brim Then he flung outward, feet first, with a swish, Kicking his way down through the air to the ground 40 So was I once myself a swinger of birches And so I dream of going back to be It's when I'm weary of considerations, And life is too much like a pathless wood Where your face burns and tickles with the cobwebs Broken across it, and one eye is weeping From a twig's having lashed across it open I'd like to get away from earth awhile And then come back to it and begin over. May no fate willfully misunderstand me And half grant what I wish and snatch me away Not to return Earth's the right place for love. I don't know where it's likely to go better I'd like to go by climbing a birch tree, And climb black branches up a snow-white trunk Toward heaven, till the tree could bear no more,

But dipped its top and set me down again. That would be good both going and coming back One could do worse than be a swinger of birches.

Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening

The speaker in this brief monologue is a farmer who has stopped his sleigh for a time to admire the snow falling over the night-darkened woods. His horse, puzzled by the pause, takes the same attitude toward it which would be taken by anyone with a worldly scheme of valuesthe stop serves no material purpose, so why make it? In time, the traveler himself recalls worldly demands—remembers that he has "promises to keep" and a schedule to follow It is, perhaps, a simple story of a momentary halt to admire beauty, in the business of living Or perhaps—if one wants to follow some of the unobtrusive suggestions—it is a picture of a man who, in the midst of life, has a brief and dim comprehension of the inevitable sleep which is death

Whose woods these are I think I know His house is in the village though, He will not see me stopping here To watch his woods fill up with snow

My little horse must think it queer To stop without a farmhouse near Between the woods and frozen lake The darkest evening of the year

He gives his harness bells a shake To ask if there is some mistake The only other sound's the sweep Of easy wind and downy flake

The woods are lovely, dark and deep. But I have promises to keep, And miles to go before I sleep, And miles to go before I sleep.

Two Tramps in Mud-Time

In splitting wood, a man may find a physical and emotional pleasure similar to the one Frost describes in this poem and in "Mowing" Suppose, though, that someone who has a financial need for work asks for the ax or the scythe? This question is posed by "Two Tramps in Mud-Time" Cleanth Brooks notices that the opening stanzas "establish the character of the speaker so that the aeneralization . . . is dramatically justified " He criticizes Frost, however, because here the generalization "is made finally in the mode of prose rather than in-terms of symbol" The criticism might not be valid if, as some may hold, the solution is not Frost's own, or if the solution—like the moral of "Mending Wall"—has emotional and logical implications above and beyond those explicitly stated

Out of the mud two strangers came And caught me splitting wood in the yard And one of them put me off my aim By hailing cheerily "Hit them hard!" I knew pretty well why he dropped behind And let the other go on a way I knew pretty well what he had in mind He wanted to take my job for pay

Good blocks of beech it was I split, As large around as the chopping-block, And every piece I squarely hit Fell splinterless as a cloven rock The blows that a life of self-control Spares to strike for the common good That day, giving a loose to my soul, I spent on the unimportant wood

The sun was warm but the wind was chill You know how it is with an April day When the sun is out and the wind is still, You're one month on in the middle of May But if you so much as dare to speak, A cloud comes over the sunlit arch. A wind comes off a frozen peak, And you're two months back in the middle of March

A bluebird comes tenderly up to alight And fronts the wind to unruffle a plume, His song so pitched as not to excite A single flower as yet to bloom It is snowing a flake and he half knew Winter was only playing possum Except in color he isn't blue, But he wouldn't advise a thing to blossom.

The water for which we may have to look In summertime with a witching-wand. In every wheelrut's now a brook, in every print of a hoof a pond Be glad of water, but don't forget The lurking frost in the earth beneath That will steal forth after the sun is set And show on the water its crystal teeth

The time when most I loved my task
These two must make me love it more
By coming with what they came to ask
You'd think I never had felt before
The weight of an ax head poised aloft,
The grip on earth of outspread feet,
The life of muscles rocking soft
And smooth and moist in vernal heat

Out of the woods two hulking tramps
(From sleeping God knows where last night
But not long since in the lumber camps)
They thought all chopping was theirs of right
Men of the woods and lumber-jacks,
They judged me by their appropriate tool
Except as a fellow handled an ax,
They had no way of knowing a fool

30

Nothing on either side was said
They knew they had but to stay their stay
And all their logic would fill my head
As that I had no right to play
With what was another man's work for gain
My right might be love but theirs was need
And where the two exist in twain
Theirs was the better right — agreed

But yield who will to their separation, My object in life is to unite My avocation and my vocation As my two eyes make one in sight Only where love and need are one, And the work is play for mortal stakes, Is the deed ever really done

For Heaven and the future's sakes

Vachel Lindsay

1879 · 1931

Better, perhaps, than any recent poet, Vachel Lindsay represented some of the important attitudes of the great Middle West—its agrarianism, its democracy, and its evangelism. Born and reared in Springfield, Illinois, he spent his youth in a city which is the capital of the largely rural state of Illinois. Andrew Jackson, Walt Whitman, and Lincoln were his political idols. From childhood, he was a member of the intensely evangelical Campbellite religious sect. And each of these influences, as well as his work in art, did much to determine the nature of Lindsay's poetry.

Both of Lindsay's parents were Kentuckians whose thinking had been molded by that of the agrarian South. Each summer, the boy visited his grandparents' farm in Indiana, where he heard the talk of pioneers and farmers The ideal oratory of his childhood was that of the pulpit, the political stump, and the Fourth of July platform

Study in the Springfield public schools was followed by work in Hiram College in Ohio Later he lived in Chicago, studying in the Art Institute (1900-1903) and eking out his meager allowance by working at various part-time jobs He also studied in the New York School of Art (1904-1905), "drawing architecture, drawing sculpture, trying to draw the Venus of Milo, and imitating the Japanese Prints and Beardsley, and trying to draw like Blake and all such masters."

Lindsay's art work and his thinking next led him into some ventures which seem strange but were definitely in character. Impelled by his faith in art and literature as regenerating forces in American life, he went on tramping trips (1906, 1908, 1912) to various parts of the country, and he made still other tours as a lecturer for the YMCA and the Anti-Saloon League. In his travels, he was a sort of lay evangelist, attempting to convert his countrymen to a way of living in which art was important. Some of his experiences were recounted in a volume called Adventures. While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty (1914).

Self-portrait of Vachel Lindsay.

It was during a walking trip from Illinois to New Mexico in 1912 that he composed the poem "General William Booth Enters into Heaven," which, because of the novelty of its material and its form, was to win Lindsay's first national acclaim when it was published in Poetry, the newly founded magazine General William Booth Enters into Heaven and Other Poems was published in 1913, The Congo and Other Poems, in 1914, The Chinese Nightingale and Other Poems, in 1917, The Golden Whales of California and Other Rhymes, in 1920

Shortly after his first success, Lindsay became a favorite of the lecture platform, one who traveled to every corner of the country. His success, to some extent, was the result of his invention of what he called "the higher vaudeville," devised to convert indifferent audiences to the beauties of poetry. This consisted, as he said, or "elaborate reading" reading that comes to the edge of a chant without having the literary meaning crowded by the chant." Some idea of his reading is suggested by marginal notations on a number of his poems, but the best way to learn how he sounded is to listen to records of some of his recitations. His flexible voice and his handling of rhythms gave his poetry unique appeal.

The poems thus presented were typical of the man in several ways. They showed the student of art in their techniques, their images. In the rhythms of country oratory, they set forth myths and folklore. They were frequently the product of the robust imaginative humor of the common man. They preached Lindsay's deeply held convictions—his ethical and religious ideals and the tenets of his political faith. Finally, they mirrored emotions which ranged from bounding exuberance to sadness—emotions which he experienced in alternating moods.

In the end Lindsay wearied of his platform appearances, since he felt that the theatrical quality of his reading obscured not only his message but also his lyrical artistry. His later books of poetry—Going-to-the-Sun (1923), Going-to-the-Stais and The Candle in the Cabin (1926), and Every Soul Is a Circus (1929)—which were more lyrical in nature, did not succeed as his earlier works had Supporting his wife and their two children was almost impossible on his small income Always subject to occasional fits of melancholia, in his last years he gave way more and more frequently to a feeling of depression. He died by his own hand in 1931

Proclamations

At the conclusion of his tramping trip of 1912, Lindsay issued a series of proclamations, which were published first in a national magazine, Form and Fireside, and later at the conclusion of Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty. The following two selections touch upon tenets which were to be developed in his piose and poetry during the rest of his career. The first offers rural ways of living and thinking as a substitute for the woeful existence offered by cities. The second urges a reconciliation of "Religion, Equality, and Beauty."

A PROCLAMATION OF BALM IN GILEAD

Go to the fields, O city laborers, till your wounds are healed Forget the streetcars, the skyscrapers, the slums, the Marseillaise song

We proclaim to the broken-hearted, still able to labor, the glories of the ploughed land. The harvests are wonderful. And there is a spiritual harvest appearing. A great agricultural flowering of art and song is destined soon to appear. Where corn and wheat are growing, men are singing the psalms of David, not the Marseillaise.

You to whom the universe has become a blast-furnace, a coke-oven, a cinder-strewn freight-yard, to whom the history of all ages is a tragedy with the climax now, to whom our democracy and our flag are but playthings of the hypocrite,—turn to the soil, turn to the earth, your mother, and she will comfort you Rest, be it ever so little, from your black broodings. Think with the farmer once more, as your fathers did. Revere with the farmer our centuries-old civilization, however little it meets the city's trouble. Revere the rural customs that have their roots in the immemorial benefits of nature.

With the farmer look again upon the Constitution as something brought by Providence, prepared for by the ages. Go to church, the cross-roads church, and say the Lord's Prayer again. Help them with their temperance crusade. It is a deeper matter than you think. Listen to the laughter of the farmer's children. Know that not all the earth is a-weeping. Know that so long as there is black soil deep on the prairie, so long as grass will grow on it, we have a vast green haven

The roots of some of our trees are still in the earth. 30 Our mountains need not to be moved from their places Wherever there is tillable land, there is a budding and blooming of old-tashioned Americanism, which the tarmer is making splendid for us against the better day

There is perpetual balm in Gilead, and many city workmen shill turn to it and be healed. This by faith, and a study of the signs, we proclaim!

PROCLAMATION

Of the Coming of Religion, Equality and Beauty

In our new day, so soon upon us, for the first time in the history of Democracy, art and the church shall be hand in hand and equally at our service. Neither craftsman-40 ship nor prayer shall be purely aristocratic any more, nor at war with each other, nor at war with the State. The priest, the statesman and the singer shall discern one another's work more perfectly and give thanks to God.

Even now our best churches are blossoming in beauty. Our best political life, whatever the howlers may say, is tending toward equality, beauty and holiness

Political speech will cease to turn only upon the price of grain, but begin considering the price of cross-roads fountains and people's palaces. Our religious life will no 50 longer trouble itself with the squabbles of orthodoxy. It will give us the outdoor choral procession, the ceremony of dedicating the wheat-field or the new-built private house to God That politician who would benefit the people will not consider all the world wrapped up in the defence or destruction of a tariff schedule. He will serve the public as did Pericles, with the world's greatest dramas He will rebuild the local Acropolis He will make his particular Athens rule by wisdom and philosophy, not trade alone. Our crowds shall be audiences, 60 not hurrying mobs, dancers, not brawlers, observers, not restless curiosity-seekers. Our mobs shall become assemblies and our assemblies religious, devout in a subtle sense, equal in privilege and courtesy, delicate of spirit, a perfectly rounded democracy

All this shall come through the services of three kinds of men in wise cooperation the priests, the statesmen and the artists. Our priests shall be religious men like

St. Francis, or John Wesley, or General Booth, or Cardinal Newman They shall be many types, but supreme of their type

Our statesmen shall find their exemplars and their inspiration in Washington, Jefferson and Lincoln, as all good Americans devoutly desire

But even these cannot ripen the land without the work of men as versatile as William Morris or Leonardo Our artists shall fuse the work of these other workers, and give expression to the whole cry and the whole weeping and rejoicing of the land. We shall have Shelleys with a heart for religion. Ruskins with a comprehension of equality.

Religion, equality and beauty! By these America shall come into a glory that shall justify the yearning of the sages for her perfection, and the prophecies of the poets when she was born in the throes of Valley Forge

This by faith and a study of the signs, we proclaim'

8 William Morris (1834-1896) was not only an English author but also an artisan and a designer * 8 Leonardo, Leonardo da Vinci (1452-1510), in addition to being an artist, was also an architer air an engineer * 11 Shelley, Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822), British poet, was an otherst and hence, in Lindsay's opinion, irreligious * 12 Ruskin See note, p. 815. Ruskin had views of democracy with which Lindsay did not agree.

General William Booth Enters into Heaven

This poem is a fanciful memorial of General William Booth (1829-1912), the English founder of the Salvation Army Like many of Lindsay's poems, it is notable for its rhythm Here the beat is determined by the music of the Salvation Army band the first line, and other lines in the poem, echo the "boom-boom-Boom-Boom" of a drum, and the refrain, "Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?" is a line from a favorite song of the evangelists whom Booth led Notable, too, is the imagery Lindsay here shows why he urged that his poems be judged "for lifetime and even hereditary thoughts and memories of painting." Like the old medieval plays which localized Biblical scenes in terms of the experiences of the audience. this poem shows Heaven in the guise of a county seat in a little Midwestern town Around the courthouse square, Booth leads the band of bedraggled sinners whom his army has saved, and like a local mayor welcoming a visiting celebrity. Jesus comes from the courthouse to welcome Booth. The English evangelist doubtless appealed to the poet because of the democratic faith which both championed The author's evangelism is displayed in the picturing of the regeneration of the motley marchers and in the repeated refrain which, at the end, is addressed directly to the reader.

(To be sung to the tune of "The Blood of the Lamb" with indicated instruments)

(Bass drum beaten loudly.)

Booth led boldly with his big bass drum,

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb²)

The saints smiled gravely, and they said.

"He's come"

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb²)
Walking lepers followed, rank on rank,
Lurching bravos from the ditches dank,
Drabs from the alleyways and drug-fiends pale—
Minds still passion-ridden, soul-powers frail¹
Vermin-eaten saints with moldy breath
Unwashed legions with the ways of death—

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

(Bantos.)

Every slum had sent its half-a-score
The round world over — (Booth had groaned for more)
Every banner that the wide world flies
Bloomed with glory and transcendent dyes
Big-voiced lasses made their banjos bang!
Tranced, fanatical, they shrieked and sang,—

"Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?"
Hallelujah! It was queer to see
Bull-necked convicts with that land make free!
Loons with trumpets blowed a blare, blare, blare—
On, on, upward thro' the golden air!

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

The Eagle That Is Forgotten

But drum slower and softer.)
Booth died blind, and still by faith he trod,
Eves still dazzled by the ways of God.
Booth led boldly, and he looked the chiefEagle countenance in sharp relief,
Beard a-flying, air of high command ('nabated in that holy land

(Sweet flute music.)

11

Jesus came from out the Courthouse door
Stretched His hands above the passing poor
Booth saw not, but led his queer ones there
Round and 'round the mighty Courthouse square
Yet in an instant all that blear review
Marched on spotless, clad in raiment new
The lame were straightened, withered limbs uncurled,
And blind eyes opened on a new sweet world

Bass drum louder.)

Drabs and vixens in a flash made whole! Gone was the weasel-head, the snout, the jowl! Sages and sibyls now, and athletes clean, Rulers of empires, and of forests green!

Grand chorus of all instruments Tambourines to the foreground.)

The hosts were sandaled and their wings were fire!

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

But their noise played havoc with the angel-choir

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

Oh, shout Salvation! it was good to see

Kings and Princes by the Lamb set free

The banjos rattled and the tambourines

Jing-jing-jingled in the hands of Queens!

Reverently sung, no instruments)

And when Booth halted by the curb for prayer

He saw his Master thro' the flag-filled air

Christ came gently with a robe and crown

For Booth the soldier, while the throng knelt down

He saw King Jesus They were face to face,

And he knelt a-weeping in that holy place

Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

John Altgeld, governor of Illinois during Lindsay's youth, won the poet's respect by championing the liberal cause Altgeld's ideas on the penal system and taxation, his pardoning of anarchists, and his protest against the breaking of strikes by federal troops caused him to be abused as a "radical" by many newspapers. Lindsay was sympathetic to the liberal agrarian movement symbolized by Altgeld

The Congo

A Study of the Negro Race (Being a memorial to Ray Eldred. a Disciple missionary of the Congo River)

Perhaps the most famous of Lindsay's poems, "The Congo" fully exploits rhythm and tone-coloring for its purpose The marginal suggestions make clear how the reading of the poem may not only give it variety but also emphasize shifts in mood comparable to those in Dryden's odes, which Lindsay greatly admired

The three sections of the poem, since they treat three aspects of Negro character-savagery, high spirits, religiousness—justify the subtitle. But the parts of the poem are complexly related and integrated. For one thing, each section begins with a modern scene, and then, following a refrain (II. 12-13, 37-38), shifts to the Congo of the African jungles, where similar but more primitive or fantastic scenes are enacted. Thus the shift is from the drunken bellicosity of Negroes in a saloon to the savage deeds of Negroes in Africa, then from the juba dance in a aambling hall to a gaudy and fantastic cakewalk per formed in "a Nearo fairyland" by "a minstrel river The third section, "The Hope of Their Religion," not included here, shifts from a Negro revival meeting to a regenerated "Congo Paradise" The Mumbo-Jumbo refrain, recurrent throughout, is made to represent the sayagery of the race, at first triumphant, then laughed to scorn by the high-spirited dancers, and finally (in Section III) utterly defeated by the hope of religion

I THEIR BASIC SAVAGERY

Fat black bucks in a wine-barrel room. Barrel-house kings, with feet unstable. Sagged and reeled and pounded on the table. Pounded on the table. Beat an empty barrel with the handle of a broom Hard as they were able. Boom, boom, BOOM, With a silk umbrella and the handle of a broom. Boomlay, boomlay, BOOM THEN I had religion, THEN I had a vision I could not turn from their revel in derision

THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK. CUTTING THROUGH THE FOREST WITH A GOLDEN TRACK Then along that riverbank

A thousand miles

Tattooed cannibals danced in files.

Then I heard the boom of the blood-lust song And a thigh-bone beating on a tin-pan gong

And "BLOOD" screamed the whistles and the fifes of the warriors,

"BLOOD" screamed the skull-faced, lean witch-doctors.

"Whirl ye the deadly voo-doo rattle,

Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight (In Springfield, Illinois)

Professor T. K. Whipple sees in this poem an example of what he calls Lindsay's "myth-making faculty. The myths in the poet's works, he notes, "partake of the nature of visions" such as "the figure of Lincoln walking through the streets of Springfield in the darkness. Such phantasms have an epic scope, legendary, fabulous, racial. All Lindsay's best work has this folk-quality. No one equals him in ability to discern symbols of national significance underlying the national life. Always at his best he has this intimate relationship with the American scene, like other American writers, he profits by staying close to the soil.

It is portentous, and a thing of state
That here at midnight, in our little town
A mourning figure walks, and will not rest,
Near the old courthouse pacing up and down,

Or by his homestead, or in shadowed yards He lingers where his children used to play, Or through the market, on the well-worn stones He stalks until the dawn-stars burn away

A bronzed, lank man! His suit of ancient black, A famous high top-hat and plain worn shawl Make him the quaint great figure that men love, The prairie-lawyer, master of us all

He cannot sleep upon his hillside now
He is among us — as in times before!
And we who toss and lie awake for long
Breathe deep, and start, to see him pass the door

His head is bowed He thinks on men and kings Yea, when the sick world cries, how can he sleep? Too many peasants fight, they know not why, Too many homesteads in black terror weep.

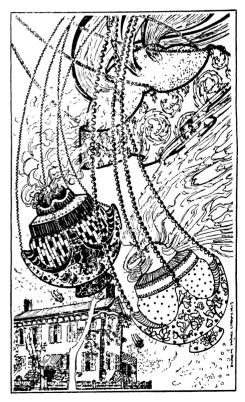

The sins of all the war-lords burn his heart He sees the dreadnaughts scouring every main. He carries on his shawl-wrapped shoulders now The bitterness, the folly and the pain

He cannot rest until a spirit-dawn Shall come,—the shining hope of Furope free The league of sober folk, the Workers Earth, Bringing long peace to Cornland, Alp and Sea

It breaks his heart that kings must murder still, That all his hours of travail here for men Seem yet in vain. And who will bring white peace That he may sleep upon his hill again?

The Flower-Fed Buffaloes

The flower-fed buffaloes of the spring In the days of long ago,
Ranged where the locomotives sing
And the prairie flowers lie low —
The tossing, blooming, perfumed grass
Is swept away by the wheat

Wheels and wheels and wheels spin by In the spring that still is sweet But the flower-fed buffaloes of the spring Left us, long ago.

They gore no more, they bellow no more, They trundle around the hills no more:—With the Blackfeet, lying low With the Pawnees, lying low, Lying low.

Robinson Jeffers

1887 •

Why write about men and women if they are ignoble and inadequate creatures is a question which more than one reader has asked of Robinson Jeffers, the most blackly pessimistic of contemporary American poets. One answer might be that we might as well solace ourselves with conversation; another is that which might have been given by Swift or Voltaire mean and contemptible as humanity is, there are some individuals whose strength and dignity may be admired even in failure and whose tragic transcience even a misanthrope can pity. Yet it is useless to deny the nihilism of Jeffers, who obviously believes that human beings are so bad that their destruction, which he regards as inevitable, can hardly be deplored. His God is power, impersonal and inhuman, and His finest attribute is that He is utterly unlike man.

This conclusion did not come to Jeffers all at once He arrived at it only in his thirties, after an unusually thorough exploration of literature and of science and the shattering disillusion of World War I He was born in Pittsburgh in 1887, to an elderly father who was a classical scholar and a theologian At the age of five he was reading Greek, at fifteen, after two years in European boarding schools, he had some mastery of Italian, French, and German, together with a love of mountains and of poetry After a year at the University of Western Pennsylvania (now Pittsburgh), he entered Occidental College as a junior (his family having moved to California) and in 1905, aged eighteen, he took his BA degree Precocious, shy, but blessed with a rugged physique and a love for the outdoor life, he would probably have found any of the workaday vocations difficult He added a further complication to his life by falling in love with a woman who was already married, Mrs Una Call Kester, a fellow graduate student at the University of Southern California He married her eventually, after she had won a divorce, but that was not until 1913, and in the interval there were many tribulations Graduate work in English gave way to preparation for medicine, medical school to a determination to write, although it was accompanied by enrollment in courses in forestry, zoology, and law in the University of Washington Finally, in 1912, he attained the independence of a small income from the legacy of a distant relative, and late in the following year he was married A plan to live abroad was spoiled by the outbreak of war in Europe, and late in 1914 Jeffers and his wife settled at Carmel-by-the-Sea, on the Monterey peninsula There they have lived ever since, and there Jeffers built a house with his own hands and found the materials for most of his distinctive poetry. He has made the "feel" of the Carmel coast familiar to many readers who have never seen the Pacific Ocean

Reputation came belatedly, after remarkable changes in style and in philosophy There is foreshadowing of unorthodoxy and metrical experimentation in Flagons and Apples (1912) and Californians (1916), but the former is the record of disappointment in love and the latter, written in the first serenity of his marriage, a well-nigh cheerful book. He has not cared to reprint any of the poems which appeared in either of them

The war made personalities insignificant; maturity and the temper of the twenties played their part, Tamar and Other Poems (1924) was at once recognized as the work of a poet who had something to say and who had found a fresh way of saying it Republished in 1925, with additions, this book, with its free rhythms and striking metaphors, its brutal and unforgettable narratives, its subtle symbolism and its gloomy world-view, gave Jeffers the audience which he has held ever since It was followed by The Women at Point Sur (1927), Cawdor (1928), Dear Judas (1929), Thurso's Landing (1932), Give Your Heart to the Hawky (1933), Solstice (1935), Such Counsels You Gate to Me (1937), Be Angry at the Sun (1941), and a free adaptation of Europides' play Medea (1946), to name only the most important volumes

Jeffers has often been compared with Eugene O'Neill, and it is true that they share a temperamental melancholy which critics like to call Celtic, as well as a great debt to the themes and methods of Greek tragedy. Jeffers, however, is more clearly the product of an age which by Freudian psychology, biochemistry, and nuclear physics has destroyed most of the basic assumptions of the past He cannot be explained in a few sentences or paragraphs, for no American poet has faced more squarely the insoluble problems. Where does modern man stand now, nearing the middle of the twentieth century? and What has man to look forward to? Jeffers has not, most of us hope, given the final answers, but few of us find it easy to refute him. He is not precisely a materialist, for matter, too, is but a symbol for his remote and mysterious moving power, but landscapes and seascapes mean more to him than human beings, and the background of existence has little discernible meaning. He is now about to enter his sixth decade of living, but it would seem doubtful that the spectacle of the atomic era, which has shocked many less intellectual persons these last years, will mellow his opinions. The appalling prospect of man's destiny is no news to Robinson Jeffers

Roan Stallion

In the Foreword to Selected Poetry Jeffers has said that he remembers clearly the moment of conception of this poem, alone of all his poems Having finished "The Tower of Tragedy," he was seeking a contemporary subject, "because I repented of using a Greek story when there were so many new ones at hand" While Jeffers was sitting on a rock to look at the sunset after quarrying granite, there came into his mind the memory of an abandoned cabin in the hills, of which it was said that the owner had been killed by a stallion "Immediately, for persons of the drama, came the Indian woman and her white husband, real persons whom I had often seen driving-through our village in a ramshackle buggy. The episode of the woman swimming her horse through a storm-swollen ford at night came also, it was part of her actual history. . . So that when I stood up and began to handle stones again, the poem had already made itself in my mind " Jeffers has also indicated that the poem owes something to a statue of a horse in Turin, of which the legend went that it was the tribute of a woman, it owes something also to the myth of Leda, the woman whom Jove, in the form of a swan, wooed and won

Whatever its origins, the story is typical of its author in its violence, in its contrast of the tawdriness of the human characters and the grandeur of mountain and storm setting, in the boldness of its figures of speech (Jeffers is more "poetic" in his metaphors than in his rhythms), in the Freud-like fusion of sexual and religious emotion, and, not least of all, in the interpolated denial of man's oneness with God (II 164-174) Oscar Cargill has suggested, in Intellectual America, that the poem is sensational rather than truly tragic, because it is psychologically impossible to pity the stallion. One may also question whether such a primitive type of woman would see angels with hawks' heads or even subconsciously intermingle the Christ story with paganism. Jeffers, as always, is concerned with ideas rather than with human beings

The dog barked, then the woman stood in the doorway and hearing iron strike stone down the steep road

Covered her head with a black shawl and entered the light rain, she stood at the turn of the road

- Touching things gently with the supple bend of the unclothed body, was pleasant. She found a box,
- Filled it with sweet dry barley and took it down to the old corral. The little mare sighed deeply
- At the rail in the wet darkness, and California returning between two redwoods up to the house
- Heard the happy jaws grinding the grain Johnny could mind the pigs and chickens. Christine called to her. 40
- When she entered the house, but slept again under her hand. She laid the wet night-dress on a chair-back
- And stole into the bedroom to get her clothes. A plank creaked, and he wakened. She stood motionless
- Hearing him stil in the bed. When he was quiet she stooped after her shoes, and he said softly,
- "What are you doing? Come back to bed." "It's late, I'm going to Monterey. I must hitch up.
- "You come to bed first I been away three days I give you money, I take back the money
- And what you do in town then?" She sighed sharply and came to the bed
 - He reaching his hands from it
- Felt the cool curve and firmness of her flank, and half rising caught her by the long wet hair
- She endured, and to hasten the act she feigned desire, she had not for long, except in dream, felt it
- Yesterday's drunkenness made him sluggish and exacting, she saw, turning her head sadly, 50
- The windows were bright gray with dawn, he embraced her still, stopping to talk about the stallion
- At length she was permitted to put on her clothes Clear daylight over the steep hills,
- Gray-shining cloud over the tops of the redwoods, the winter stream sang loud, the wheels of the buggy
- Slipped in deep slime, ground on washed stones at the road-edge. Down the hill the wrinkled river smothered the ford
- You must keep to the bed of stones she knew the way by willow and alder the buckskin halted mid-stream,
- Shuddering, the water her own color washing up to the traces, but California, drawing up
- Her feet out of the whirl onto the seat of the buggy swung the whip over the yellow water
- And drove to the road.

All morning the clouds were racing northward like a river. At noon they thickened.

When California faced the southwind home from Monterey it was heavy with level rainfall

She looked seaward from the foot of the valley, red rays cried sunset from a trumpet of streaming

Cloud over Lobos, the southwest occident of the solstice Twilight came soon, but the tired mare

Feared the road more than the whip Mile after mile of slow gray twilight

Then, quite suddenly, darkness

"Christine will be asleep. It is Christmas Eve. The ford. That hour of daylight wasted this morning!"

She could see nothing, she let the reins lie on the dashboard and knew at length by the cramp of the wheels

And the pitch down, they had reached it Noise of wheels on stones, plashing of hooves in water, a world

Of sounds, no sight, the gentle thunder of water, the mare snorting, dipping her head, one knew

To look for footing, 16 the blackness, under the stream. The hushing and creaking of the sea-wind

In the passion of invisible willows

The mare stood still, the woman shouted to her, spared whip.

For a false leap would lose the track of the ford. She stood "The baby's things," thought California,

"Under the seat the water will come over the floor", and rising in the midst of the water

She tilted the seat, fetched up the doll, the painted wooden chickens, the woolly bear, the book

Of many pictures, the box of sweets—she brought them all from under the seat and stored them, trembling.

Under her clothes, about the breasts, under the arms, the corners of the cardboard boxes

Cut into the soft flesh, but with a piece of rope for a girdle and wound about the shoulders

All was made fast. The mare stood still as if asleep in the midst of the water. Then California

Reached out a hand over the stream and fingered her rump, the solid wet convexity of it

Shook like the beat of a great heart "What are you waiting for?" But the feel of the animal surface 60

Had wakened a dream, obscured real danger with a dream of danger "What for? for the water-stallion

To break out of the stream, that is what the rump strains for, him to come up flinging foam sidewise, Fore-hooves in air, crush me and the rig and curl over h_{LS} woman." She flung out with the whip then,

The mare plunged forward The buggy drifted sidelong was she off ground? Swimming? No. by the splashes

The driver, a mere prehensile instinct, clung to the sideirons of the seat and felt the force

But not the coldness of the water, curling over her knees, breaking up to the waist

Over her body. They'd turned The mare had turned up stream and was wallowing back into shoal water

Then California dropped her forehead to her knees, having seen nothing, feeling a danger,

And felt the brute weight of a branch of alder, the pendulous light leaves brush her bent neck

Like a child's fingers. The mare burst out of water and stopped on the slope to the ford. The woman climbed down

Between the wheels and went to her head "Poor Dora," she called her by her name, 'there, Dora Quiedy

And led her around, there was room to turn on the margin, the head to the gentle thunder of the water

She crawled on hands and knees, felt for the ruts, and shifted the wheels into them "You can see, Dora

I can't But this time you'll go through it 'She climbed into the seat and shouted angrily The mare

Stopped, her two forefeet in the water. She touched with the whip. The mare plodded ahead and halted

Then California thought of prayer "Dear little Jesus Dear baby Jesus born to-night, your head was shining

Like silver candles I've got a baby too, only a girl You had light wherever you walked

Dear baby Jesus give me light" Light streamed rose, gold, rich purple, hiding the ford like a curtain

The gentle thunder of water was a noise of wingfeathers, the fans of paradise lifting softly

The child afloat on radiance had a baby face, but the angels had birds' heads, hawks' heads

Bending over the baby, weaving a web of wings about him He held in the small fat hand

A little snake with golden eyes, and California could see clearly on the under radiance

The mare's pricked ears a sharp black fork against the shining light-fall But it dropped, the light of heaven Frightened poor Dora She backed; swung up the water, And nearly oversetting the buggy turned and scrambled backward, the iron wheel-tires rang on boulders

- Then California weeping climbed between the wheels.

 Her wet clothes and the toys packed under
- Dragged her down with their weight, she stripped off cloak and dress and laid the baby's things in the buggy,
- Brought Johnny's whiskey out from under the seat, wrapped all in the dress, bottles and toys and tied them
- Into a bundle that would sling over her back Sl unharnessed the mare, hurting her fingers
- Against the swollen straps and the wer buckles. She tied the pack over her shoulders, the cords
- Crossing her breasts, and mounted. She drew up her shift about her waist and knotted it naked thighs
- Clutching the sides of the mare, bare flesh to the wet withers, and caught the mane with her right hand,
- The looped-up bridle-reins in the other "Dora, the baby gives you light" The blinding radiance
- Hovered the ford 'Sweet baby Jesus give us light' Cataracts of light and Latin singing
- Fell through the willows, the mare snorted and reared the roar and thunder of the invisible water.
- The night shaking open like a flag, shot with the flashes, the baby face hovering, the water
- Beating over her shoes and stockings up to the bare thighs, and over them, like a beast
- Lapping her belly the wriggle and pitch of the mare swimming the drift, the sucking water, the blinding
- Light above and behind with not a gleam before in the throat of darkness the shock of the fore-
- Striking bottom, the struggle and surging lift of the haunches She felt the water streaming off her
- From the shoulders down, heard the great strain and sob of the mare's breathing heard the horseshous grind on gravel
- When California came home the dog at the door snuffed at her without barking, Christine and Johnny
- Both were asleep, she did not sleep for hours but kindled fire and knelt patiently over it,
- Shaping and drying the dear-bought gifts for Christmas morning
- She hated (she thought) the proud-necked stallion He'd lean the big twin masses of his breast on the rail, his red-brown eyes flash the white crescents,

- She admired him then, she hated him for his uselessness, serving nothing
- But Johnny's vanity Horses were too cheap to breed She thought, if he could range in freedom,
- Shaking the red-roan mane for a flag on the bare hills.

A man

- brought up a mare in April
- Then California though she wanted to watch, stayed with Christine indoors. When the child fretted
- The mother told her once more about the miracle of the ford, her prayers to the little Jesus
- The Christmas Eve when she was bringing the gifts home, the appearance, the lights, the Latin singing
- The thunder of wing-feathers and water, the shining child, the cataracts of splendor down the darkness
- "A little baby," Christine asked, "the God is a baby?"

 The child of God. That was his birthday."
- His mother was named Mary we pray to her too God came to her He was not the child of a man
- Like you or me. God was his father she was the stallion's wife—what did I say—God's wife.
- She said with a cry, lifting Christine aside, pacing the planks of the floor. "She is called more blessed
- Than any woman She was so good, she was more loved "
 "Did God live near her house? He lives 140
- Up high, over the stars, he ranges on the bare blue hill of the sky." In her mind a picture
- Flashed, of the red-roan mane shaken out for a flag on the bare hills, and she said quickly, He's more
- Like a great man holding the sun in his hand. Her mind giving her words the lie, 'But no one
- Knows only the shining and the power. The power, the terror, the burning fire covered her over.
- "Was she burnt up, mother?" "She was so good and lovely, she was the mother of the little Iesus
- If you are good nothing will hurt you What did she think?" "She loved she was not afraid of the hooves—
- Hands that had made the hills and sun and moon, and the sea and the great redwoods, the terrible strength,
- She gave herself without thinking" 'You only saw the baby, mother?" "Yes, and the angels about him,
- The great wild shining over the black river." Three times she had walked to the door, three times returned,

And now the hand that had thrice hung on the knob, full of prevented action, twisted the cloth

Of the child's dress that she had been mending. "Oh, oh, I've torn it" She struck at the child and then embraced her Fiercely, the small blond sickly body.

Johnny came in, his face reddened as if he had stood

Near fire, his eyes triumphing "Finished," he said, and looked with malice at Christine "I go Down valley with Jim Carrier, owes me five dollar, fifteen I charge him, he brought ten in his pocket.

Has grapes on the ranch, maybe I take a barrel red wine instead of money Be back to-morrow

To-morrow night I tell you—Eh, Jim," he laughed over his shoulder, "I say to-morrow evening

I show her how the red fellow act, the big fellow When I come home." She answered nothing, but stood

In front of the door, holding the little hand of her daughter, in the path of sun between the redwoods,

While Johnny tied the buckskin mare behind Carrier's buggy, and bringing saddle and bridle tossed them

Under the seat Jim Carrier's mare, the bay, stood with drooped head and started slowly, the men

Laughing and shouting at her, their voices could be heard down the steep road, after the noise

Of the iron-hooped wheels died from the stone Then one might hear the hush of the wind in the tall redwoods,

The tinkle of the April brook, deep in its hollow.

Humanity is the start of the race, I say

Humanity is the mould to break away from, the crust to break through, the coal to break into fire.

The atom to be split

Tragedy that breaks man's face and a white fire flies out of it, vision that fools him

Out of his limits, desire that fools him out of his limits, unnatural crime, inhuman science

Slit eyes in the mask, wild loves that leap over the walls of nature, the wild fence-vaulter science,

Useless intelligence of far stars, dim knowledge of the spinning demons that make an atom

These break, these pierce, these deify, praising their

God shrilly with fierce voices: not in man's shape He approves the praise, he that walks lightning-naked on the Pacific, that laces the suns with planets,

The heart of the atom with electrons. what is humanity in this cosmos? For him, the last

Least taint of a trace in the dregs of the solution, for itself, the mould to break away from, the coal To break into fire, the atom to be split.

After the child slept, after the leopard-footed evening

Had glided oceanward, California turned the lamp to $_{\rm 1tS}$ least flame and glided from the house.

She moved sighing, like a loose fire, backward and forward on the smooth ground by the door.

She heard the night-wind that draws down the valley like the draught in a flue under clear weather 180

Whisper and toss in the tall redwoods, she heard the tinkle of the April brook deep in its hollow.

Cooled by the night the odors that the horses had left behind were in her nostrils; the night

Whitened up the bare hill, a drift of coyotes by the river cried bitterly against moonrise,

Then California ran to the old corral, the empty one where they kept the buckskin mare,

And leaned, and bruised her breasts on the rail, feeling the sky whiten When the moon stood over the hill

She stole to the house. The child breathed quietly. Herself to sleep? She had seen Christ in the night at Christmas

The hills were shining open to the enormous night of the April moon empty and empty,

The vast round backs of the bare hills? If one should ride up high might not the Father himself

Be seen brooding His night, cross-legged, chin in hand, squatting on the last dome? More likely

Leaping the hills, shaking the red-roan mane for a flag on the bare hills. She blew out the lamp 190

Every fiber of flesh trembled with faintness when she came to the door; strength lacked, to wander

Afoot into the shining of the hill, high enough, high enough . . the hateful face of a man had taken

The strength that might have served her, the corral was empty The dog followed her, she caught him by the collar,

Dragged him in fierce silence back to the door of the house, latched him inside.

It was like daylight

- Our-doors and she hastened without faltering down the footpath, through the dark fringe of twisted oakbrush.
- To the open place in a bay of the hill The dark strength of the stallion had heard her coming, she heard him
- Blow the shining air out of his nostrils, she saw him in the white lake of moonlight
- Move like a lion along the timbers of the fence, shaking the nightfall
- Of the great mane, his fragrance came to her, she leaned on the fence:
- He drew away from it, the hooves making soft thunder in the trodden soil
- Wild love had trodden it, his wrestling with the stranger, the shame of the day
- Had stamped it into mire and powder when the heavy fetlocks
- Strained the soft flanks. "Oh, if I could bear you!
- If I had the strength O great God that came down to Mary, gently you came But I will ride him
- Up into the hill, if he throws me, if he tramples me, is it not my desire
- To endure death?' She climbed the fence, pressing her body against the rail, shaking like fever,
- And dropped inside to the soft ground He neither threatened her with his teeth nor fled from her coming,
- And lifting her hand gently to the upflung head she caught the strap of the headstall,
- That hung under the quivering chin She unlooped the halter from the high stiength of the neck
- And the arch the storm-cloud mane hung with live darkness He stood, she crushed her breasts
- On the hard shoulder, an arm over the withers, the other under the mass of his throat, and murmuring
- Like a mountain dove, "If I could bear you" No way, no help, a gulf in nature She murmured, "Come,
- We will run on the hill O beautiful O beautiful," and led him
- To the gate and flung the bars on the ground He threw his head downward
- To snuff at the bars, and while he stood, she catching mane and withers with all sudden contracture

- And strength of her lithe body, leaped, clung hard, and was mounted He had been ridden before; he did not Fight the weight but ran like a stone falling:
- Broke down the slope into the moon-glass of the stream. and flattened to his neck
- She felt the branches of a buck-eye tree fly over her, saw the wall of the oak-scrub
- End her world but he turned there, the matted branches Scraped her right knee, the great slant shoulders
- Laboring the hill-slope, up, up, the clear hill Desire had died in her
- At the first rush, the falling like death, but now it revived, She feeling between her thighs the labor of the great engine, the running muscles, the hard swiftness,
- She riding the savage and exultant strength of the world Having topped the thicket he turned castward,
- Running less wildly, and now at length he felt the halter when she drew on it, she guided him upward,
- He stopped and grazed on the great arch and pride of the hill, the silent calvary. A dwerfish oakwood
- Climbed the other slope out of the dark of the unknown canyon beyond, the last wind-beaten bush of it
- Crawled up to the height, and California slipping from her mount tethered him to it. She stood then, Shaking Enormous films of moonlight
- Trailed down from the height Spice, anxious whiteness, vastness Distant beyond conception the shining
- Lay light like a haze along the ledge and doubtful world's end Little vapors gleaming, and little
- Darknesses on the far chart underfoot symbolized wood and valley, but the air was the element, the moon-Saturate arcs and spires of the air
 - Here is solitude, here on the calvary, nothing conscious
- But the possible God and the cropped grass, no witness, no eye but that misformed one, the moon's past fullness
- Two figures on the shining hill, woman and stallion, she kneeling to him, brokenly adoring
- He cropping the grass, shifting his hooves, or lifting the long head to gaze over the world,
- Tranquil and powerful She prayed aloud, "O God, I am not good enough, O fear, O strength, I am draggled. 240

- Johnny and other men have had me, and O clean power! Here am I,' she said, falling before him,
- And crawled to his hooves She lay a long while, as if asleep, in reach of the fore-hooves, weeping He avoided
- Her head and the prone body. He backed at first, but later plucked the grass that grew by her shoulder
- The small dark head under his nostrils a small round stone that smelt human black hair growing from it
- The skull shut the light in it it was not possible for any eyes
- To know what throbbed and shone under the sutures of the skull, or a shell full of lightning
- Had scared the roan strength, and he'd have broken tether, screaming, and run for the valley

The atom bounds-breaking,

- Nucleus to sun, electrons to planets, with recognition
- Not praying, self-equaling the whole to the whole, the microcosm 250
- Not entering not accepting entrance, more equally, more utterly, more incredibly conjugate
- With the other extreme and greatness, passionately perceptive of identity

The fire threw up figures

- And symbols meanwhile, racial myths formed and dissolved in it, the phantom rulers of humanity
- That without being are yet more real than what they are born of, and without shape shape that which makes them
- The nerves and the flesh go by shadowlike, the limbs and the lives shadowlike, these shadows remain, these shadows
- To whom temples, to whom churches, to whom labors and wars, visions and dreams are dedicate
- Out of the fire in the small round stone that black moss covered, a crucified man writhed up in anguish.
- A woman covered by a huge beast in whose mane the stars were netted, sun and moon were his eye-balls.
- Smiled under the unendurable violation, her throat swollen with the storm and blood-flecks gleaming 260
- On the stretched lips, a woman—no, a dark water, split by jets of lightning, and after a season
- What floated up out of the furrowed water, a boat, a fish, a fire-globe?

It had wings, the creature,

- And flew against the fountain of lightning, fell burnt out of the cloud back to the bottomless water . . .
- Figures and symbols, castlings of the fire, played in her brain, but the white fire was the essence,
- The burning in the small round shell of bone that black hair covered, that lay by the hooves on the hilltop
- She rose at length, she unknotted the halter, she walked and led the stallion, two figures, woman and stallion,
- Came down the silent emptiness of the dome of the hill, under the cataract of the moonlight
- The next night there was moon through cloud Johnny had returned half drunk toward evening, and California
- Who had known him for years with neither love nor loathing to-night hating him had let the child Christine
- Play in the light of the lamp for hours after her bedtime, who fell asleep at length on the floor
- Beside the dog, then Johnny "Put her to bed" She gathered the child against her breasts, she laid her
- In the next room, and covered her with a blanket The window was white, the moon had risen The mother
- Lay down by the child, but after a moment Johnny stood in the doorway "Come drink". He had brought home
- Two jugs of wine slung from the saddle, part payment for the stallion's service, a pitcher of it - Was on the table, and California sadly came and emptied her glass. Whiskey, she thought,
- Would have erased him till to-morrow, the thin $\ensuremath{\text{red}}$ wine .
- "We have a good evening. he laughed, pouring it.
 "One glass yet then I show you what the red fellow did"
 She moving toward the house-door his eyes
- Followed her, the glass filled and the red juice ran over the table When it struck the floor-planks 280
- He heard and looked "Who stuck the pig?" he muttered stupidly, "here's blood, here's blood," and trailed his fingers
- In the red lake under the lamplight While he was looking down the door creaked, she had slipped outdoors,

- And he, his mouth curving like a faun's imagined the chase under the solemn redwoods, the panting
- And unresistant victim caught in a dark corner He emptied the glass and went outdoors
- Into the dappled lanes of moonlight No sound but the April brook's "Hey Bruno," he called "find her
- Bruno, go find her" The dog after a little understood and quested, the man following
- When California crouching by an oak-bush above the house heard them come near she darted
- To the open slope and ran down hill. The dog barked at her heels, pleased with the game and Johnny
- Followed in silence She ran down to the new corral, she saw the stallion
- Move like a lion along the timbers of the fence, the dark arched neck shaking the nightfall
- Of the great mane, she threw herself prone and writhed under the bars, his hooves backing away from her
- Made muffled thunder in the soft soil. She stood in the midst of the corral, panting, but Johnny
- Paused at the fence The dog ran under it, and seeing the stallion move, the woman standing quiet,
- Danced after the beast with white-toothed feints and dashes. When Johnny saw the formidable dark strength
- Recoil from the dog, he climbed up over the fence
- The child Christine waked when her mother left her And lay half dreaming, in the half-waking dream she saw the ocean come up out of the west
- And cover the world, she looked up through clear water at the tops of the redwoods She heard the
- And the house empty, her heart shook her body, sitting up on the bed, and she heard the dog
- And crept toward light, where it gleamed under the crack of the door. She opened the door the room was empty,
- The table-top was a red lake under the lamplight The color of it was terrible to her,
- She had seen the red juice drip from a coyote's muzzle her father had shot one day in the hills
- And carried him home over the saddi- she looked at the rifle on the wall-rack it was not moved
- She ran to the door, the dog was barking and the moon was shining she knew wine by the odor

- But the color frightened her, the empty house frightened her, she followed down hill in the white lane of moonlight
- The friendly noise of the dog. She saw in the big horse's corral, on the level shoulder of the hill.
- Black on white, the dark strength of the beast, the dancing fury of the dog, and the two others
- One fled, one followed, the big one charged, rearing, one fell under his fore-hooves. She heard her mother
- Scream without thought she ran to the house, she dragged a chair past the red pool and climbed to the rifle,
- Got it down from the wall and lugged it somehow through the door and down the hillside, under the hard weight
- Sobbing Her mother stood by the rails of the corral, she gave it to her. On the far side
- The dog flashed at the plunging stallion, in the midst of the space the man, slow-moving, like a hurt worm
- Crawling, dragged his body by inches toward the fenceline. Then California, resting the rifle
- On the top rail, without doubting, without hesitance
- Aimed for the leaping body of the dog, and when it stood fired It snapped, rolled over, lay quiet
- O mother, you've hit Bruno!" "I couldn't see the sights in the moonlight," she answered quietly. She stood
- And watched, resting the rifle-butt on the ground. The stallion wheeled, freed from his torment, the man
- Lurched up to his knees, wailing a thin and bitter bird's cry, and the roan thunder
- Struck, hooves left nothing alive but teeth tore up the reinnant "O mother, shoot, shoot!" Yet California
- Stood carefully watching, till the beast having fed all his fury stretched neck to utmost, head high, 320
- And wrinkled back the upper lip from the teeth, yawning obscene disgust over—not a man—
- A smear on the moon-lake earth—then California moved by some obscure human fidelity
- Lifted the rifle Each separate nerve-cell of her brain flaming the stars fell from their places
- Crying in her mind she fired three times before the haunches crumpled sidewise, the forelegs stiffening,
- And the beautiful strength settled to earth she turned then on her little daughter the mask of a woman
- Who has killed God. The night-wind veering, the smell of the split wine drifted down hill from the house

Carl Sandburg

1878 •

Back in the later years of the nineteenth century, a large number of recently arrived Swedish immigrants were working in Galesburg, Illinois, and several of them had the common Swedish name, Johnson. To avoid confusion, August Johnson, a blacksmith with a railway construction gang, changed his name to Sandburg. Thus when August's son, born in Galesburg in 1878, became well-known, he was famous not as Carl Johnson but as Carl Sandburg. Probably Sandburg would have been pleased to have a more ordinary name than he has. For as a writer, he conceived of his work as the articulation of the experiences, the thoughts, and the dreams of ordinary men and women

When he was thirteen, Carl Sandburg left school to drive a milkwagon. Later he was a porter in a Galesburg barber shop, and then a worker in a brickyard. In the years before the Spanish-American War began, he traveled a good deal (mostly on the underside of boxcars) stopping off in Kansas, say, to work in the wheatfields or in Denver or Omaha to wash dishes in a hotel. It was during his eight-month enlistment for the Spanish-American War that he was persuaded by an alumnus of Lombard College at Galesburg that he ought to go to college

After working his way through Lombard, he became a traveling salesman of stereopticon slides, and he was engaged in this work when, in 1904, a former professor arranged for the publication of his first book, a little pamphlet called In Reckless Ecstasy. Sandburg later was to be glad that this collection of rather imitative poems had not had a wide sale, but he never renounced the passages in it which foreshadowed all his future work. "I glory." one such passage went, "in this world of men and women, torn with troubles and lost in sorrow, yet living on to love and laugh and play through it all. My eyes range with pleasure over flowers, prairies, woods, grass, and running water, and the sea, and the sky and the clouds."

A few years after his first book appeared, Sandburg became a journalist in Milwaukee, working as labor reporter on Socialist Victor Berger's Milwaukee Leader For a time, he was secretary to Milwaukee's Socialist mayor, Emil Seidel. In Milwaukee in 1908, he married Lillian Steichen, who, like him, was interested in the fortunes of laborers In 1912 he and his wife drifted to Chicago, where he worked for several publications, notably the Daily News.

When Poetry was started in Chicago, Sandburg was one of its early contributors, and in 1916 his first book of poems to be put out by a nationally known publisher appeared Chicago Poems was followed by Cornhuskers (1918), Smoke and Steel (1920), Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1922), Good Morning, America (1928), and The People, Yes (1936)

Meanwhile, Sandburg had become well known as a singer of ballads. In various parts of the country, he had appeared on platforms to sing the folk songs collected on his travels—songs of cowboys, hobos, and workmen, and spirituals learned from their Negro makers. In time, some of the songs he sang, accompanying himself on a guitar, were recorded. In time, too, the folk songs he had collected were published in The American Songbag (1927), a book admired by the scholar and the general reader alike.

When Sandburg eventually turned to the writing of history, he produced a biography of Lincoln The Prairie Years (1926) carried Lincoln's story down to the time Lincoln left for the White House and The War Years (1940) told of Lincoln as President.

The poetry, the ballad collecting, and the biography are all of a piece Frequently Sandburg has quoted with admiration the saying of one of Kipling's characters—"I will be the word of the people. Mine will be the bleeding mouth from which the gag is snatched. I will say everything "As Sandburg has conceived of his task, it has been to voice the thoughts and feelings of the common folk, and he believes that he expresses them in his poems, in his folk songs, and in the biography of the American people's greatest hero.

His poetry is expressive of his times in both its form and its subject matter. It is free verse of the sort becoming fashionable when he started to write. His diction is the American language, the richness of which was being discovered in Sandburg's young manhood. He, like others, was bewildered by the shift of America from the agrarian way of living to the industrial way. He, like others, was resentful of the injustices and the hypocrisies of a transitional period. Finally he, like others, found a hope and a belief which he could affirm. For him, these grew, naturally enough, from what he had seen and learned of the people.—The People, Yes.

Chicago

"What Sandburg likes in Chicago," note Carl and Mark Van Doren, "is its newness and hopefulness, which a different poet might call its rawness and callowness. . . . Above all he admires the superb insolence of the untamed capital . . Sandburg is equally insolent. He too discards the past and its patterns, he too reaches out and grasps whatever seems to him full of life and molds it to his own uses; he too speaks his own language, though it comes to him from the streets rather than from the dictionaries. To the extent that Chicago is the metropolis of the present and the future, Sandburg is the poet of these eras."

When "Chicago" appeared in Poetry in 1914, it was the subject of a great deal of controversy. Its unconventional rhythms, diction, and imagery seemed to some to depart deliberately from those of conventional poetry. Nevertheless, the poem has something more than a casual structure. The opening lines offer a series of descriptions summarized in the fifth line, "City of the Big Shoulders"—a suggestion of the city's power. Lines 6-8 show the grim aspects, but line 9 marks a turn, and the defense of the city begins with other details about strength. In lines 19-23, climactically, this strength is shown overcoming the sorrow and sordidness earlier described, and in the final line the words of the opening lines are repeated, this time linked with the pride and the laughter of Chicago.

Hog Butcher for the World
Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat,
Player with Railroads and the Nation's Freight Handler,
Stormy, husky, brawling,
City of the Big Shoulders

They tell me you are wicked and I believe them, for I have seen your painted women under the gas lamps luring the farm boys

And they tell me you are crooked and I answer Yes, it is true I have seen the gunman kill and go free to kill again

And they tell me you are brutal and my reply is. On the taces of women and children I have seen the marks of wanton hunger

And having answered so 1 turn once more to those who sneer at this my city, and 1 give them back the sneer and say to them

Come and show me another city with lifted head singing so proud to be alive and coarse and strong and cunning

Flinging magnetic curses amid the toil of piling job on job, here is a tall bold slugger set vivid against the little soft cities.

Fierce as a dog with tongue lapping for action, cunning as a savage pitted against the wilderness,

Bareheaded, Shoveling, Wrecking,

Planning,

Building, breaking, rebuilding,

Under the smoke, dust all over his mouth, laughing \mathbf{w}_{ith} white teeth,

Under the terrible burden of destiny laughing as a young man laughs

Laughing even as an ignorant fighter laughs who has never lost a battle,

Bragging and laughing that under his wrist is the pulse and under his ribs the heart of the people.

Laughing!

Laughing the stormy, husky, brawling laughter of Youth half-naked, sweating, proud to be Hog Butcher Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat, Player with Railroads and Freight Handler to the Nation

To a Contemporary Bunkshooter

In this fierce poem, Sandburg angrily contrasts the preach ments of the theatrical revivalist of the day with the teachings of Christ The author's sympathy with the underprivileged makes him contemptuous of sermonizing under the guise of religion which serves the purpose of their exploiters by urging people to suffer wrongs with a humble spirit. His conception of Jesus is of a quiet man who gave his life as a sacrifice for humble sufferers—a very different sort from the encourager of exploitation pictured by the athletic preacher here apostrophized.

You come along ... tearing your shirt — yelling about Jesus

Where do you get that stuff?

What do you know about Jesus?

Jesus had a way of talking soft and outside of a few bankers and higher-ups among the con men of Jeru salem everybody liked to have this Jesus around because he never made any fake passes and everything he said went and he helped the sick and gave the people hope.

- You come along squirting words at us, shaking your fist and call us all dam fools so fierce the froth slobbers over your lips . . . always blabbing we're all going to hell straight off and you know all about it.
- I ve read Jesus' words I know what he said. You don't throw any scare into me I've got your number I know how much you know about Jesus
- He never came near clean people or dirty people but they felt cleaner because he came along. It was your crowd of bankers and business men and lawyers hired the sluggers and murderers who put Jesus out of the aunning.
- I say the same bunch backing you nailed the nails into the hands of this Jesus of Nazareth. He had lined up against him the same crooks and strong-arm men now lined up with you paying your way.
- This Jesus was good to look at, smelled good, listened good. He threw out something fresh and beautiful from the skin of his body and the touch of his hands wherever he passed along.
- You slimy bunkshooter, you put a smut on every human blossom in reach of your rotten breath belching about hell-fire and hiccupping about this Man who lived a clean life in Galilee
- When are you going to quit making the carpenters build emergency hospitals for women and girls driven crazy with wrecked nerves from your gibberish about Jesus'— I put it to you again Where do you get that stuft! What do you know about Jesus?
- Go ahead and bust all the chairs you want to Smash a whole wagon-load of furniture at every performance. Turn sixty somersaults and stand on your nutty head. If it wasn't for the way you scare the women and kids I'd feel sorry for you and pass the hat
- I like to watch a good four-flusher work, but not when he starts people puking and calling for the doc-
- I like a man that's got nerve and can pull off a great original performance, but you — you're only a bughouse pedlar of second-hand gospel — you're only shoving out a phoney imitation of the goods this Jesus wanted free as air and sunlight.

- You tell people living in shanties Jesus is going to fix it up all right with them by giving them mansions in the skies after they're dead and the worms have eaten 'em.
- You tell $6 a week department store girls all they need is Jesus, you take a steel trust wop, dead without having lived, grey and shrunken at forty years of ige, and you tell him to look at Jesus on the cross and he'll be all right
- You tell poor people they don't need any more money on pay day and even if it's fierce to be out of a job.

 Jesus II fix that up all right, all right all they gotta do is take Jesus the way you say
- I'm telling you Jesus wouldn't stand for the stuff you're handing out Jesus played it different. The bankers and lawyers of Jerusalem got their sluggers and murderers to go after Jesus just because Jesus wouldn't play their game. He didn't sit in with the big thieves.
- I don't want a lot of gab from a bunkshooter in my religion.
- I won't take my religion from any man who never works except with his mouth and never cherishes any memory except the face of the woman on the American silver dollar
- I ask you to come through and show me where you're pouring out the blood of your life
- I've been to this suburb of Jerusalem they call Golgotha, where they nailed Him, and I know if the story is straight it was real blood ran from His hands and the nail-holes and it was real blood spurted in red drops where the spear of the Roman soldier rammed in between the ribs of this Jesus of Nazareth

The Harbor

"Poems," Sandburg has said, "are the results of moods I don't approach a subject in the same mood every day." A comparison between the picture of Chicago given here and that presented in "Chicago" shows how the poet's mood determines what details he will present Here, instead of being lusty and gay, the city is cramped and tragic. The confinement of its walls and the bafflement of its inhabitants are set off against the lack of restraint and the freedom of the open sky. In one mood, at any rate, Sandburg saw the city as something evil and frustrating something opposed to the goodness of unspoiled nature

Passing through huddled and ugly walls By doorways where women Looked from their hunger-deep eyes, Haunted with shadows of hunger-hands, Out from the huddled and ugly walls, I came sudden, at the city's edge, On a blue burst of lake. Long lake waves breaking under the sun On a spray-flung curve of shore, And a fluttering storm of gulls, Masses of great gray wings And flying white bellies Veering and wheeling free in the open

I forget Everything but Death comes to me and makes me work and give up what I have And I forget Sometimes I growl, shake myself and spatter a few red forget The best of me is sucked out and wasted drops for history to remember Then - I forget

When I, the People, learn to remember, when I, the People, use the lessons of yesterday and no longer forget who robbed me last year, who played me for a fool,-- then there will be no speaker in all the world say the name "The People," with any fleck of a sneer in his voice or any far-oft smile of deri-

The mob — the crowd — the mass — will arrive then 1916

Prairie

"Ostensibly," writes Harry Hansen, "he [Sandburg] was of the city, but the great wide prairie was close at hand, he was to grow up with the music of the wind through its corn fields in his ears, like the young Lincoln he was to tread the furrows of rich, black loam and feel the soft arass of the meadow lands under his bare feet " This song expresses his kinship, his affection

More than the preceding poems in this text, this poem shows Sandburg's considerable indebtedness to Whitman Not only are the phrasings and rhythms similar, but the mood is Whitmanesque Perhaps this is because Sandburg here is praising the vast American landscape, the joy of work, and the brotherhood of man. There is a difference, however, which is rather hard to define Perhaps the most important fact is that Sandburg worked a great deal in the fields before he wrote about them, and his experience gave his poem somewhat more particularity than a typical poem by Whitman about farming

I Am the People, the Mob

This poem comes as near as anything Sandburg has written to expressing one of the poet's most important beliefs. Here is a positive statement of his remedy for the evils he sees in the world of his day—a realization, on the part of the people, of their needs and their own power to supply them

I am the people — the mob — the crowd — the mass Do you know that all the great work of the world is done through me?

I am the workingman, the inventor, the maker of the world's food and clothes.

I am the audience that witnesses history. The Napoleons come from me and the Lincolns

They die And then I send forth more Napoleons and Lincolns

I am the seed ground I am a prairie that will stand for much plowing Terrible storms pass over me. I

I was born on the prairie and the milk of its wheat, the red of its clover, the eyes of its women, gave me a song and a slogan.

Here the water went down, the icebergs slid with gravel, the gaps and the valleys hissed, and the black loam came, and the yellow sandy loam.

Here between the sheds of the Rocky Mountains and the Appalachians, here now a morning star fixes a fire sign over the timber claims and cow pastures, the corn belt, the cotton belt, the cattle ranches

Here the gray geese go five hundred miles and back with a wind under their wings honking the cry for a new home.

Here I know I will hanker after nothing so much as one more sunrise or a sky moon of fire doubled to a river

The prairie sings to me in the forenoon and I know in the night I rest easy in the prairie arms, on the prairie heart

After the sunburn of the day handling a pitchfork at a hayrack, after the eggs and biscuit and coffee, the pearl-gray haystacks in the gloaming are cool prayers to the harvest hands.

In the city among the walls the overland passenger train is choked and the pistons his and the wheels curse On the Prairie the overland flits on phantom wheels and the sky and the soil between them muffle the pistons and cheer the wheels

I am here when the cities are gone
I am here before the cities come
I nourished the lonely men on horses
I will keep the laughing men who ride iron
I am dust of men

The running water babbled to the deer, the cottontail, the gopher

You came in wagons, making streets and schools, Kin of the ax and rifle, kin of the plow and horse Singing Yankee Doodle, Old Dan Tucker, Turkey in the Straw. You in the coonskin cap at a log house door hearing a lone wolf howl.

You at a sod house door reading the blizzards and chinooks let loose from Medicine Hat.

I am dust of your dust, as I am brother and mother To the copper faces, the worker in flint and clay, The singing women and their sons a thousand years ago Marching single file the timber and the plain

I hold the dust of these amid changing stars

I last while old wars are fought, while peace broods mother-like

While new wars arise and the fresh killings of young

I fed the boys who went to France in great dark days Appomattox is a beautiful word to me and so is Valley Forge and the Marne and Verdun,

I who have seen the red births and the red deaths
Of sons and daughters, I take peace or war, I say nothing and wait

Have you seen a red sunset drip over one of my cornfields, the shore of night stars, the wave lines of dawn up a wheat valley?

Have you heard my threshing crews yelling in the chaff of a strawpile and the running wheat of the wagonboards, my cornhuskers, my harvest hands hauling crops, singing dreams of women, worlds, horizons?

Rivers cut a path on flat lands

The mountains stand up

The salt oceans press in

And push on the coast lines

The sun, the wind, bring rain

And I know what the rainbow writes across the east or west in a half-circle

A love-letter pledge to come again

Towns on the Soo Line.
Towns on the Big Muddy,
Laugh at each other for cubs
And rease as children

٦,

Omaha and Kansas City, Minneapolis and St. Paul, sisters in a house together, throwing slang, growing up. Towns in the Ozarks, Dakota wheat towns, Wichita, Peoria, Buffalo, sisters throwing slang, growing up.

Out of prairie-brown grass crossed with a streamer of wigwam smoke—out of a smoke pillar, a blue promise—out of wild ducks woven in greens and purples—

Here I saw a city rise and say to the peoples round world Listen, I am strong, I know what I want

Out of log houses and stumps—canoes stripped from tree-sides—flatboats coaxed with an ax from the timber claims—in the years when the red and the white men met—the houses and streets rose

A thousand red men cried and went away to new places for corn and women a million white men came and put up skyscrapers, threw out rails and wires, feelers to the salt sea now the smokestacks bite the skyline with stub teeth

In an early year the call of a wild duck woven in greens and purples now the riveter's chatter, the police patrol, the song-whistle of the steamboat

To a man across a thousand years I ofter a handshake. I say to him Brother, make the story short, for the stretch of a thousand years is short

What brothers these in the dark?
What eaves of skyscrapers against a smoke moon?

These chimneys shaking on the lumber shanties
When the coal boats plow by on the river —
The hunched shoulders of the grain elevators —
The flame sprokets of the sheet steel mills
And the men in the rolling mills with their shirts off Playing their flesh arms against the twisting wrists of steel

what brothers these in the dark of a thousand years?

I am the prairie, mother of men, waiting.

They are mine, the threshing crews eating beefsteak, the farmboys driving steers to the railroad cattle pens.

They are mine, the crowds of people at a Fourth of July basket picnic, listening to a lawyer read the Declaration of Independence, watching the pinwheels and Roman candles at night, the young men and women two by two hunting the bypaths and kissing bridges.

They are mine, the horses looking over a fence in the frost of late October saying good-morning to the horses hauling wagons of rutabaga to market

The phantom of an old workhorse taking the steel point of a plow across a forty-acre field in spring, hitched to a harrow in summer, hitched to a wagon among cornshocks in fall,

These phantoms come into the talk and wonder of people on the front porch of a farmhouse late summer nights

A. E. F.

In 1920, when this poem was written, many authors were expressing, as Sandburg does here, their belief that World War I had been futile. The reverie-like quietness of this poem makes it rather more impressive than some of the more strident announcements of the same idea So, too. does the contrast of the final slangy clause with the different kind of language in the earlier lines. The slangy advice to the spider, coming in a climactic phrase at the conclusion, forcefully summarizes the poet's ironic feeling about the war

There will be a rusty gun on the wall, sweetheart, The rifle grooves curling with flakes of rust

A spider will make a silver string nest in the darkest, warmest corner of it

The trigger and the range-finder, they too will be rusty And no hands will polish the gun, and it will hang on the wall.

Forefingers and thumbs will point absently and casually

It will be spoken among half-forgotten, wished-to-beforgotten things

They will tell the spider Go on, you're doing good work 1920

From

The People, Yes

In his fifty-ninth year, Sandburg published a book-long poem made up pretty largely of the sayings and tales of the people—"stories and psalms nobody would laugh at," but which represent the unending quest of the masses for happiness and truth. Sandburg thus developed in detail a theme which he had stated in a brief poem, "I Am the People, the Mob," in 1916.

The following are two excerpts from The People, Yes. The first collects some of the yarns produced by the folk of America, many of them exaggerations of a sort long popular in American comic humor The second tells of one of the great American folk heroes, Paul Bunyan, the creation of the loggers, whose biography has been presented notably by Esther Shephard in Paul Bunyan. Both represent the modern tendency to embody folklore in literature.

THEY HAVE YARNS

They have yarns

Of a skyscraper so tall they had to put hinges On the two top stories so to let the moon go by, Of one corn crop in Missouri when the roots Went so deep and drew off so much water The Mississippi riverbed that year was dry, Of pancakes so thin they only had one side,

- Of "a fog so thick we shingled the barn and six feet out on the fog,"
- Of Pecos Pete straddling a cyclone in Texas and riding it to the west coast where "it rained out under him."
- Of the man who drove a swarm of bees across the Rocky Mountains and the Desert "and didn't lose a bee."
- Of a mountain railroad curve where the engineer in his cab can touch the caboose and spit in the conductor's eye,
- Of the boy who climbed a cornstalk growing so fast he would have starved to death if they hadn't shot biscuits up to him,
- Of the old man's whiskers "When the wind was with him his whiskers arrived a day before he did,"
- Of the hen laying a square egg and cackling "Ouch!" and of hens laying eggs with the dates printed on them,
- Of the ship captain's shadow it froze to the deck one cold winter night,
- Of mutineers on that same ship put to chipping rust with rubber hammers,
- Of the sheep counter who was fast and accurate "I just count their feet and divide by four,"
- Of the man so tall he must climb a ladder to shave himself.
- Of the runt so teeny-weeny it takes two men and a boy to see him,
- Of mosquitoes one can kill a dog, two of them a man, 26

- Of a cyclone that sucked cookstoves out of the kitchen, up the chimney flue, and on to the next town,
- Of the same cyclone picking up wagon-tracks in Nebraska and dropping them over in the Dakotas,
- Of the hook-and-eye snake unlocking itself into forty pieces, each piece two inches long, then in nine seconds flat snapping itself together again,
- Of the watch swallowed by the cow when they butchered her a year later the watch was running and and the correct time.
- Of horned snakes, hoop snakes that roll themselves where they want to go and rattlesnakes carrying bells instead of rattles on their tails,
- Of the herd of cattle in California getting lost in a giant redwood tree that had hollowed out.
- Of the man who killed a snake by putting its tail in its mouth so it swallowed itself,
- Of railroad trains whizzing along so fast they reach the station before the whistle,

2 skyscraper so tall. The structure so tall that hinges are needed to protect the moon and the sun turns up frequently in American folklore Captain Stormalong, hero of New England tall tales, built a mast with such an arrangement, according to Charles Edward Brown's Old Stormalong Yarns Paul Bunyan built an oil rig with a similar arrangement, according to John Lee Brooks Paul Bunyan, Oil Man' in Follow de Drinkin' Gou'd . 9 Pecos Pete, or Pecos Bill (the name usually given him in Texas windies), thus busted a cyclone See Edward O Reilly, The Saga of Pecos Bill, Century, October 1923 • 10 swarm of bees. The boast about heiding the swarm of bees occurs in the play Lightnin' (1918) by Winchell Smith and Frank Bacon • 12 the boy ... cornstalk This story is told of Paul Bunyan's handy man, Swede Charlie, in Ida Turney's The Scissorpills" in Paul Bunyan Marches On . 15 ship captain's shadow In Mark Twain's Following the Equator, Chap 26, the ship's mate had this difficulty with his shadow on an arctic voyage . 20 mosquitoes. Sandhu y may be recalling the mosquitoes described by a steamboat mate, Mr. H., in Chap. 34 of Mark Twain's Life on the Mississippi It so, he errs in his statistics. Says Twain of Mr. He said that two of them could whip a dog, and that four of . 'butcher him'' Mr Sandburg them could hold a man down appears to be exaggerating somewhat • 25 horned snakes Sand burg may have confused these with horn snakes, "which are described in H E Taliaferro's Fisher's River Scenes and Characters This snake, as described by Uncle Davy, an eyewitness, was ten feet long. had a head as big as a saucer, and had a stinger in his tail which was six inches long and sharp as a needle " "This snake," said Uncle Davy, he cotched the eend uv his tail in his mouth, he did, and come rollin' down the mounting . . jist like a hoop ' The enake landed, by chance, so that his stinger caught in a tree, and soon the tree was dead as a herrin , all the leaves was wilted like a fire had gone through its branches." This happened in North Carolina

- Of pigs so thin the farmer had to tie knots in their tails to keep them from crawling through the cracks in their pens,
- Of Paul Bunyan's big blue ox, Babe, measuring between the eyes forty-two ax-handles and a plug of Star tobacco exactly,
- Of John Henry's hammer and the curve of its swing and his singing of it as "a rainbow round my shoulder"

"Do tell!" "I want to know!" "You don't say so!" "For the land's sake!" "Gosh all fish-hooks!" "Tell me some more I don't believe a word you say but I love to listen to your sweet harmonica to your chin-music Your fish stories hang together when they're just a pack of lies you ought to have a leather medal you ought to have a statue carved of butter, you deserve a large bouquet of turnips"

"Yessir," the traveler drawled,
"Away out there in the petrified forest everything goes on the same as usual
The petrified birds sit in their petrified nests and hatch their petrified young from petrified eggs"

- A high pressure salesman jumped off the Brooklyn Bridge and was saved by a policeman. But it didn't take him long to sell the idea to the policeman. So together they jumped off the bridge.
- One of the oil men in heaven started a rumor of a gusher down in hell. All the other oil men left in a hurry for hell. As he gets to thinking about the rumor he had started he says to himself there might be something in it after all. So he leaves for hell in a hurry

"The number 42 will win this raffle, that's my number."

And when he won they asked him whether he guessed the number or had a system. He said he had a system, "I took up the old family album and there on page 7 was my grandfather and grandmother both on page 7. I said to myself this is easy for 7 times 7 is the number that will win and 7 times 7 is 42"

Once a shipwrecked sailor caught hold of a stateroom door and floated for hours till friendly hands from out of the darkness threw him a rope. And he called across the night, "What country is this?" and hearing voices answer. 'New Jersey," he took a fresh hold on the floating stateroom door and called back half-wearily, "I guess I'll float a little farther."

- An Ohio man bundled up the tin roof of a summer kitchen and sent it to a motor car maker with a complaint of his car not giving service. In three weeks a new car arrived for him and a letter. 'We regret delay in shipment but your car was received in a very bad order."
- A Dakota cousin of this Ohio man sent six years of tin can accumulations to the same works, asking them to overhaul his car. Two weeks later came a rebuilt car, five old tin cans, and a letter "We are also forwarding you five parts not necessary in our new model"
- Thus fantasies heard at filling stations in the midwest Another relates to a Missouri mule who took aim with his heels at an automobile rattling by. The car turned a somersault, lit next a fence, ran right along through a cornfield till it came to a gate, moved onto the road and went on its way as though nothing had happened. The mule heehawed with desolation, 'What's the use?"

Another tells of a farmer and his family stalled on a railroad crossing, how they jumped out in time to see ³⁰ blue ox, Babe, a wonderful animal, very helpful on logging operations. Babe could pull great sleds of logs, could pull lumber with his tail, and make himself useful in many other ways. 31 John Henry, folk hero of the Negroes, was a great steel-driven He died in a steel-driving contest with a machine. When the Masonic Temple in Chicago was the tallest building in the United States west of New York, rwo men who would cheat the eyes out of you if you gave 'em a chance, took an Iowa farmer to the top of the building and asked him, "How is this for high?" They told him that for $25 they would go down in the basement and turn the building around on its turn-table for him while he stood on the roof and saw how this seventh wonder of the world worked. He handed them $25. They went He waited. They never came back.

This is told in Chicago as a folk tale, the same as the legend of Mrs O'Leary's cow kicking over the barn lamp that started the Chicago fire, when the Georgia visitor, Robert Toombs, telegraphed an Atlanta crony, 'Chicago is on fire, the whole city burning down, God be praised!"

Nor is the prize sleeper Rip Van Winkle and his scolding wife forgotten, nor the headless horseman scooting through Sleepy Hollow

Nor the sunken treasure-ships in coves and harbors, the hideouts of gold and silver sought by Coronado, nor the Flying Dutchman rounding the Cape doomed to nevermore pound his ear nor ever again take a snooze for himself

Nor the sailor's caretaker Mother Carey seeing to it that every seafaring man in the afterworld has a seabird to bring him news of ships and women, an albatross for the admiral, a gull for the deckhand

Nor the sailor with a sweetheart in every port of the world, nor the ships that set out with flying colors and all the promises you could ask the ships never heard of again.

Nor Jim Liverpool, the riverman who could jump across any river and back without touching land he was that quick on his feet.

Nor Mike Fink along the Ohio and the Mississippi, half wild horse and half cock-eyed alligator, the rest of him snags and snapping turtle—I can out-run, out-jump, out-shoot, out-brag, out-drink and out-fight, rough and tumble, no holts barred, any man on both sides of the river from Pittsburgh to New Orleans and back again to St Louis. My trigger finger itches and I want to go redhot. War, famine and bloodshed puts flesh on my bones, and hardship's my daily bread."

Nor the man so lean he threw no shadow six rattlesnakes struck at him at one time and every one missed him.

WHO MADE PAUL BUNYAN?

Who made Paul Bunyan, who gave him birth as a myth, who joked him into life as the Master Lumberjack, who fashioned him forth as an apparition easing the hours of men amid axes and trees, saws and lumber? The people, the bookless people, they made Paul and had him alive long before he got into the books for those who read. He grew up in shanties, around the hot stoves of winter, among socks and mittens drying, in the smell of tobacco smoke and the roar of laughter mocking the outside weather. And some of Paul came overseas in wooden bunks below decks in sailing vessels. And some of Paul is old as the hills, young as the alphabet.

The Pacific Ocean froze over in the winter of the Blue Snow and Paul Bunyan had long teams of oxen hauling regular white snow over from China. This was the winter Paul gave a party to the Seven Axmen Paul fixed a granite floor sunk two hundred feet deep for them to dance on. Still, it tipped and tilted as the dance went on. And because the Seven Axmen refused to take off their hob-nailed boots, the sparks from the nails of their dancing feet lit up the place so that Paul didn't light the kerosene lamps. No women being on the Big Onion river at that time the Seven Axinen had to dance with each other the one left over in each set taking Paul as a pariner. The commotion of the dancing that night brought on an earthquake and the Big Onion river moved over three counties to the east ⁶⁴ hideouts silver See J Frank Dobie, Coronado's Children, for some of these legends = 68 Mike Fink (1770? 1823) was a boastful and broth ranger, keelboatman, and trapper. The remarks quoted are one of his boasts. See Walter Blair and F. J. Meine, Mike Fink.

One year when it rained from St. Patrick's Day till the Fourth of July, Paul Bunyan got disgusted because his celebration of the Fourth was spoiled. He dived into Lake Superior and swam to where a solid pillar of water was coming down. He dived under this pillar, swam up into it and climbed with powerful swimming strokes, was gone about an hour, came splashing down, and as the rain stopped, he explained, "I turned the dam thing off." This is told in the Big North Woods and on the Great Lakes, with many particulars.

Two mosquitoes lighted on one of Paul Bunyan's oxen, killed it, ate it, cleaned the bones, and sat on a grub shanty picking their teeth as Paul came along Paul sent to Australia for two special bumble bees to kill these mosquitoes But the bees and the mosquitoes intermarried, their children had stingers on both ends. And things kept getting worse till Paul brought a big boatload of sorghum up from Louisiana and while all the bee-mosquitoes were eating at the sweet sorghum he floated them down to the Gulf of Mexico. They got so fat that it was easy to drown them all between New Orleans and Galveston.

Paul logged on the Little Gimlet in Oregon one winter.

The cook stove at that camp covered an acre of ground. They fastened the side of a hog on each snowshoe and four men used to skate on the griddle while the cook flipped the pancakes. The eating table was three miles long, elevators carried the cakes to the ends of the table where boys on bicycles rode back and forth on a path down the center of the table dropping the cakes where called for.

Benny, the Little Blue Ox of Paul Bunyan, grew two feet every time Paul looked at him, when a young-ster The barn was gone one morning and they found it on Benny's back, he grew out of it in a night One night he kept pawing and bellowing for more pancakes, till there were two hundred men at the cook shanty stove trying to keep him fed About breakfast time Benny broke loose, tore down the cook shanty, ate all the pancakes piled up for the loggers' breakfast. And after that Benny made his mistake, he ate the red hot stove; and that finished him. This is only one of the hot stove stories told in the North Woods

Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years

When Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years, Sandburg's first biographical work, appeared in 1926, some critics mentioned that they were surprised to find that a poet could write history so well. But there was no need for surprise, for the biography was very much of a piece with Sandburg's earlier writings. The background of the book was that of the author who had sung, "O prairie mother, I am one of your boys", and much of it was a re-creation of a way of living that was common to Lincoln and his biographer. Of course, a great deal of research had been necessary, but it had been a sort of study particularly likely to appeal to Sandburg. Much of it had been concerned with the prairie folk of Lincoln's day—their ways of working, their religious beliefs, their songs, their superstitions, their yarns and jests, their proverbs. Other research had uncovered details about the man who, more than any other, seemed to Sandburg representative of the finest qualities of common Americans

The book, therefore, was in a sense a poem about Lincoln and the America in which he had his roots. And as in other poems, Sandburg selected, marshaled, and voiced his facts to give them emotional impact. The following passage, though it says relatively little about Lincoln's prairie background, shows how the author turned mundane facts into rather stirring prose poetry.

LINCOLN AT THIRTY-SEVEN

The thirty-seven-year-old son of Thomas Lincoln and Nancy Hanks Lincoln had changed with a changing western world His feet had worn deerskin moccasins as a boy; they were put into rawhide boots when he was full-grown; now he had them in dressed calf leather. His head-cover was a coonskin cap when he was a boy, and all men and boys wore the raccoon tail as a high head-piece, floating down the Mississippi to New Orleans he wore a black felt hat from an eastern factory and it held the post-office mail of New Salem, now he was a prominent politician and lawyer wearing a tall, stiff, silk hat known as a "stovepipe," also called a "plug hat"

In this "stovepipe" hat he carried letters, newspaper clippings, deeds, mortgages, checks, receipts. Once he apologized to a client for not replying to a letter, he had bought a new hat and in cleaning out the old hat he missed this particular letter. The silk stovepipe hat was nearly a foot high, with a brim only an inch or so in width, it was a high, lean, longish hat and it made Lincoln look higher, leaner, more longish.

As he had gone along farther in law practice and politics, he had taken more care of his looks. His first partner. John T Stuart, was one of the handsomest figures and best-dressed men in Springfield, and Lincoln had to take Stuart's place once in a courthouse near Springfield, handling a case for a client, when Lincoln introduced himself as the man sent by Stuart to take Stuart's place, the client, an Englishman accustomed to wigs and gowns in a courtroom, refused to take Lincoln as his lawyer, snorted with disgust, and hired another lawyer.

And though Lincoln had begun wearing broadcloth and white shirts with a white collar and black silk cravat, and a suggestion of sideburns coming down three-fourths the length of his ears, he was still known as one of the carelessly dressed men of Springfield, along with Stephen Logan, who wore unbleached cotton shirts and had sat two years as a circuit-court judge wearing an unbleached cotton shirt with no cravat or stock.

The loose bones of Lincoln were hard to keep neat, trousers go baggy at the knees of a story-teller who has the habit, at the end of a story, where the main laugh comes in, of putting his arms around his knees raising his knees to his chin, and rocking to and fro Those who spoke of his looks often mentioned his trousers creeping to the ankles and higher, his rumpled hair, his wrinkled vest. When he wasn't away making speeches, electioneering or practicing law on the circuit, he cut kindling wood, tended to the cordwood for the stoves in the house, milked the cow, gave her a few forks of hay and changed her straw bedding every day.

He analyzed the tariff, the national banks, the public so lands, and the annexation of Texas, while pailing a cow. One evening he went to where his cow was pastured with other cows, and as he told it: "I found the calves all together and away from the cows, and I didn't know my calf well enough to distinguish her from the others Still, I picked out one that I thought was mine. Presently that identical calf went and sucked my cow, and then I knew it was mine."

He looked like a farmer, it was often said, he seemed to have come from prairies and barns rather than city so streets and barber shops, and in his own way he admitted and acknowledged it, he told voters from the stump that it was only a few years since he had worn buckskin breeches and they shrank in the rain and crept to his knees leaving the skin blue and bare. The very words that came off his lips in tangled important discussions among lawyers had a wilderness air and a log-cabin smack. The way he pronounced the word "idea" was more like "idee," the word "really" more like a drawled Kentucky "ra-a-ly."

As he strode or shambled into a gathering of men, he 70 stood out as a special figure for men to look at, it was a little as though he had come farther on harder roads and therefore had longer legs for the traveling, and a little as though he had been where life is stripped to its naked facts and it would be useless for him to try to put on certain pretenses of civilization. He may have figured out for himself about how far he could go and find it easy and healthy and comfortable for him to be in speech and looks the Indiana cornhusker and the Mississippi River flatboatman. The manners of a gentleman 80 and a scholar dropped off him sometimes like a cloak, and his speech was that of a farmer who works his own farm, or a lawyer who pails a cow morning and evening and might refer to it incidentally in polite company or in a public address. He was not embarrassed, and nobody else was embarrassed, when at the Bowling Green funeral he had stood up and, instead of delivering a formal funeral address on the character of the deceased, had shaken with grief and put a handkerchief to his face and wept tears, and motioned to the body-bearers to take his dead 90 friend away. There was a natural grace to it, funerals should be so conducted, a man who loves a dead man should stand up and try to speak and find himself overwhelmed with grief so that instead of speaking he smothers his face in a handkerchief and weeps. This was the eloquence of naked fact beyond which there is no eloquence.

At the death of a great friend he could weep without shame, lone and inevitable, at a petty campaign lie alluding to his aristocratic relatives visiting him, he could laugh and say that only one had made a visit and he was arrested for stealing a jew's-harp. He could be immensely solemn, tenderly grave, quizzically humorous, and flatly comic. As he strode or shambled into a gathering of men, he stood out as a special figure to look at, some of the range of his teeling, the gamut of the solemn and comic, was registered in the angles of his body, in the sweeping lengths of extra long arms and legs, in the panther slouch of running and throwing muscles, in the wiry, rawbone frame that seemed to have been at home once handling an ax in tall timber, with the silent silhouette of an eagle watching.

Standing, Lincoln loomed tall with his six feet, four 20 inches of height, sitting in a chair he looked no taller than other men, except that his knees rose higher than the level of the seat of the chair Seated on a low chair or bench he seemed to be crouching. The shoulders were stooped and rounded, the head bent forward and turned downward, shirt-collars were a loose fit, an Adam's apple stood out on a scrawny neck, his voice was a tenor that carried song-tunes poorly but had clear and appealing modulations in his speeches, in rare moments of excitement it rose to a startling and unforgettable falsetto tone 30 that carried every syllable with unmistakable meaning. In the stoop of his shoulders and the forward bend of his head there was a grace and familiarity so that it was easy for shorter people to look up into his face and talk with him

The mouth and eyes, and the factal muscles running back from the mouth and eyes, masked a thousand shades of meaning. In hours of melancholy, when poisons of dejection dragged him, the underlip and its muscles drooped, his friends felt either that he then was a sick and man with a disorder of bile and secretions or else that his thoughts roamed in faither and darker caverns than ordinary men ventured into. Ordinarily there was a fresh, gracious calm, it was a grave, sad calm, perhaps gloomy, but strong with foundations resting on substrata of granite, a mouth shaped with depths of hope that its fixed resolves would be kept and held. And between this solemn mouth of Lincoln and at the other end of the gamut, his comic mouth, there was the play of a thousand shades of meaning. Besides being tragedian, he was comedian Across the mask of his dark gravity could come a light-ray of the quizzical, the puzzled This could spread into the beginning of a smile and then spread farther into wrinkles and wreaths of laughter that lit the whole face into a glow, and it was of the quality of his highest laughter that it traveled through his whole frame, currents of it vitalizing his toes

A fine chiseling of lines on the upper lip seemed to be some continuation of the bridge of the nose, forming a feature that ended in a dimple at the point of the chin The nose was large, if it had been a trifle larger he would have been called big-nosed, it was a nose for breathing deep sustained breaths of air, a strong shapely nose, granitic with resolve and patience. Two deepening wrinkles started from the sides of the right and left nostrils and ran down the outer rims of the upper lip, farther out on the two cheeks were deepening wrinkles that had been long crude dimples when he was a boy, hours of toil, pain, and laughter were deepening these wrinkles From the sides of the nose, angular cheek-bones branched right and left toward the large ears, forming a base for 7 magnificently constructed eye-sockets. Bushy black eyebrows shaded the sockets where the eyeballs rested with gray transformers of action, thought, laughter Shaded into the gray of his eyes was a tinting of hazel. In his eyes as nowhere else was registered the shifting light of his moods, their language ran from rapid twinkles of darting hazel that won the hearts of children on to a fixed baffling gray that the shrewdest lawyers and politicians could not read, to find there an intention he wanted to hide

The thatch of coarse hair on the head was black when seen from a distance, but close up it had a brownish, rough, sandy tint. He had been known to comb it, parting it far on the right side, and slicking it down so that it looked groomed by a somewhat particular man, but most of the time it was loose and rumpled. The comb might have parted it either on the far right or on the far left side, he wasn't particular.

Throughout his life as a grown man he was holding to the hacked-out slants of body that his father had in mind in the younger days when his frame stretched upward in a rapid, uneven growth, and his father said he looked like he needed a carpenter's plane put to him. In those days they had called him "Long Shanks", and as a grown man his long shanks were a dominant feature of his physical presence. Yet it was true that men and women as varied as Stephen T. Logan and Hannah Armstrong felt about him something elusive, glancing elfin off and beyond all that was told by the guint, rambling lines of his physical structure. The eves the laughter, the play of words, a scrutinizing, drawling poise, curves that came and went with the tricks of sun-showers and rainbows - he gave out echoes and values. A cherishing of true testimonies ran out from his face and form. All he could do for Bowling Green was to weep, the words had not been made that could tell what he wanted to say in that hour As the day came near for his marriage to the brilliant, fashionable daughter of a Kentucky bank president, he held odds even by writing an old friend -- also of hacked-out and slanted structure - the plain old dependable, silent, truth-telling John Hanks who could not write his own name. I hope you will come over, be sure to be on deck by early candlelight. The lizard story might be a rehearsal of a comic pantomime with two players having a line each to speak, and still further it might be a portentous allegory in democratic and religious behavior and words

When he had bought his house at Eighth and Jackson streets from Rev. Charles Dresser there was a mortgage of $900 on it. And in the deed of title from Dresser to Lincoln this $900 mortgage wasn't mentioned. He trusted

Dresser took a chance on losing $900, just the personal assurance of the preacher who had married him. And the money was later paid in full

It was natural that Abraham Lincoln was many things to many people, some believed him a cunning, designing lawyer and politician who coldly figured all his moves in advance—some believed him a sad, odd, awkward man trying to find a niche in lite where his backed-out frame could have peace and comfort, some believed him a superb human struggler with solemn and comic echoes and values far off and beyond the leashes and bones that held him to earth and law and politics.

In his own mind he did not divide people into good 40 people and bad people. As he walked from his own home close to the cornfields near the city limits of Springfield and met people on his way to the courthouse and the post office, and as he watched the two-legged figures on their many errands or, forgetting their errands, moving around the public square, he saw good mixed in the bad and bad mixed in the good.

In his own mind he mide the note. "The true rule in determining to embrace or reject anything, is not whether it have any evil in it, but whether it have more of evil 50 than of good. There are few things wholly evil or wholly good. Almost everything is an inseparable compound of the two so that our best judgment of the preponderance between them is continually demanded.

Thomas Stearns Eliot

1888 •

Born in St. Louis where his grandfather had founded Washington University, and educated at Harvard, where he was influenced by George Santayana and Irving Babbitt, Thomas Stearns Eliot has resided in England since 1914 and since 1927 has been a British subject. He was last in America in 1932-1933, when, as Charles

Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry, he lectured at Harvard During the nineteen twenties and early nineteen thirties, Eliot was more influential than any other poet or critic writing in English His The Waste Land (1922) set the style for a whole generation of younger poets. His essays—especially "The Metaphysical Poets"

(1921), "Andrew Marvell" (1921), and "John Dryden" (1922)—altered the current of literary criticism. At a time when the influence of the nineteenth century was still dominant. Eliot brushed that century aside, a little contemptuously, and sought standards in an earlier tradition, particularly that of the seventeenth century. He raised the question in 1921 whether the virtue of the seventeenth-century English poets "was not something permanently valuable, which subsequently disappeared. but ought not to have disappeared" His affirmative answer, elaborated in his essays and demonstrated in his poetry, wrought a revolution in critical taste Eliot contrasted, for example, the "mistiness" and "vagueness" of William Morris (1834-1896) with the "bright, hard precision" of Marvell (1621-1678). Good poetry must have "wit"-"a tough reasonableness beneath the slight lyric grace" "When a poet's mind is perfectly equipped for its work," he declared, "it is constantly amalgamating disparate experience"—a description which gave a favorable turn to Dr. Johnson's famous objection that the metaphysical poets voked together by violence the most heterogeneous ideas. If the metaphysical method failed, the failure, Eliot insisted, was not in the heterogeneousness of the ideas but in the imperfect voking or amalgamation. Owing largely to Eliot's original influence, the "metaphysical" became a mark of excellence. and English and American poets were reappraised in the light of this new standard. Many idols were shattered Tennyson and even Keats suffered John Donne became the pattern of the perfect poet, almost everyone could quote Marvell's 'To His Coy Mistress', Gerard Manley Hopkins and Emily Dickinson—nineteenth-century poets who wrote "metaphysical" poetry-were raised to a new eminence. In the essays of Eliot and others (notably John Crowc Ransom, Allen Tate, Cleanth Brooks, R. P. Blackmur, and Yvor Winters), the metaphysical revolution produced a body of criticism which is remarkable for its close analysis of the relation of structure and style to content

Eliot's influence waned somewhat after 1930. His fa. mous announcement that he had become "an Anglo. Catholic in religion, a classicist in literature, and a royalist in politics" presented difficulties to many of his admirers in two of the three categories named in politics and in religion. The religious, if not the political, development, however, seemed natural enough in Eliot's case The return to the seventeenth century (and to Dante, implied a deep religious interest. The world described in the early poems ("Prufrock," 1917, "Gerontion," 1920 and The Waste Land, 1922, for example) was obviously a world paralyzed by the loss of religious faith The decay of Protestantism, Eliot believed, was the mossignificant and the most tragic fact in modern history. The religious argument of Ash-Wednesday (1930), therefore, was a logical step in his development. The "Word of St John was "lost" the poem attempted to answer the question, "Where shall the Word be found?" The argument was continued in Four Quartets (1943) in the chaos of the modern world, we have only "hints and guesses"—"the rest is prayer, observance, discipline thought and action"

But Eliot ultimately transcends political and religious questions and literary theories, for he is preeminently a poet. In poetry, he has striven for, and achieved, the utmost condensation. His aim, he has said, is "to write poetry which should be essentially poetry, with nothing 'poetic' about it, poetry standing naked in its bare bones."

The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock

Written while Eliot was still an undergraduate at Harvard, "The Love Song of J Alfred Prufrock" has attained the rank of an American classic Prufrock is a modern Hamlet, that is, a Hamlet without the capacity for heroic action. The poem is a consummate portrait of the modern intellectual who is inhibited and bewildered by his intellectualism (For an extraordinarily acute analysis, see Brooks and Warren, Understanding Poetry, pp 589-596)

S'10 credesse che mu risposta fosse A persona che mai tornasse al mondo, Questa fiamma staria senza piu scosse. Ma perciocche giammai di questo fondo Non torno vivo alcun, s'i odo il vero. Senza tema d'infamia ti rispondo.

Let us go then, you and I, When the evening is spread out against the sky Like a patient etherized upon a table. Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets, The muttering retreats Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels And sawdust restaurants with ovster-shells Streets that follow like a tedious argument Of insidious intent To lead you to an overwhelming question . . 10 Oh, do not ask, 'What is it?' Let us go and make our visit

In the room the women come and go Talking of Michelangelo

The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes, The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the windowpanes

Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains, Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys, Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap. And seeing that it was a soft October night, Curled once about the house, and fell asleep

And indeed there will be time For the yellow smoke that slides along the street, Rubbing its back upon the window-panes, There will be time, there will be time To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet, There will be time to murder and create, And time for all the works and days of hands That lift and drop a question on your plate, 30 Time for you and time for me, And time vet for a hundred indecisions, And for a hundred visions and revisions, Before the taking of a toast and tea

And indeed there will be time

To wonder 'Do I dare?' and 'Do I dare?' Time to turn back and descend the stair. With a bald spot in the middle of my hair-40 (They will say How his hair is growing thin!') My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin, My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin--

(They will say 'But how his arms and legs are thin!') Do I dare Disturb the universe?

In a minute there is time

For decisions and revisions which a ininute will reverse

For I have known them all already known them all -Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons, I have measured out my life with coffee spoons, I know the voices dying with a dying fall Beneath the music from a turther room So how should I presume?

And I have known the eyes already, known them all-The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase, And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin, When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall, Then how should I begin To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways? And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all -Arms that are braceleted and white and bare (But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!) Is it perfume from a dress

That makes me so digress?

Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl And should I then presume?

And how should I begin?

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets 70 And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? I should have been a pair of ragged claws Scuttling across the floors of silent seas

[,] rispondo If I could believe that my answer might be to a person who should ever return into the world, this flame would stand without more quiverings, but inasmuch as, if I hear the truth, never from this depth did any living man return, without fear of infamy Lanswer thee (from Dante's Inferno," Canto XXVII, II 61-66)

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully! Smoothed by long fingers,

Asleep tired or it malingers. Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me Should I, after tea and cakes and ices. Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis? But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed, Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,

I am no prophet - and here's no great matter, I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker. And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker

And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all, After the cups, the marmalade, the tea, Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me, Would it have been worth while. To have bitten off the matter with a smile. To have squeezed the universe into a ball To roll it toward some overwhelming question, To say. 'I am Lazarus, come from the dead, Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all'-If one, settling a pillow by her head, Should say 'That is not what I meant at all. That is not it, at all.'

And would it have been worth it after all. Would it have been worth while. After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets.

After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor-And this, and so much more?-It is impossible to say just what I mean! But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen Would it have been worth while

If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl. And turning toward the window, should say

That is not it at all

Almost, at times, the Fool.

That is not what I meant, at all'

No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be; Am an attendant lord, one that will do To swell a progress, start a scene or two, Advise the prince, no doubt, an easy tool, Deferential, glad to be of use, Politic, cautious, and meticulous, Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse: At times, indeed almost ridiculous -

I grow old . . . I grow old . 120 I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach? I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach

I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each

I do not think that they will sing to me.

I have seen them riding seaward on the waves Combing the white hair of the waves blown back When the wind blows the water white and black.

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown 130 Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

Matthiessen's comment is helpful. "Eliot once remarked that all he consciously set out to create in 'Sweeney among the Nightingales' was a sense of foreboding Yet the very exactitude with which he has built up his impression by means of the close details of his night-town scene, as well as by the way he underlines his effect through a reference both in the epigraph and in the final stanza to another scene of foreboding that ended in the murder of Agamemnon, inevitably causes his delineation to take on wider implications. The sharp contrast that seems at first simply to be mocking a debased present as it juxtaposes Sweeney with the hero of antiquity, ends in establishing also an undercurrent of moving drama: for a sympathetic feeling for Sweeney is set up by the realization that he is a man as well as Agamemnon, and that his plotted death is therefore likewise a human tragedy"

Gerontion

Broadly speaking, "Gerontion" repeats the general situation of "Prufrock," but Gerontion is a more tragic figure he had more brilliant capacities than Prufrock and his disintegration is more complete. The poem is a masterly embodiment of the metaphysical method described by Eliot in his essay on "The Metaphysical Poets" as "a development by rapid association of thought which requires considerable agility on the part of the reader." Matthiessen comments as follows on the method "The transitions are sudden, but, in terms of the context, unmistakable There could hardly be a more effective way of stressing the intimate connection between the mysteries of religion and sex than by linking together the Christian story with the upsurging energies of spring. Yet it is also 'depraved' May, and suddenly we are aware that it is not simply the Holy Communion that is being eaten and drunk 'among whispers' that last phrase also relates to the empty, slightly sinister cosmopolitan world in which Gerontion's life has been betrayed, his passion and ardour have been divided and lost "

Ash-Wednesday

Ash-Wednesday is one of the most important religious poems which have been written in English during the present century Although Eliot's religious position is specifically Anglo-Catholic, the poem has a broad validity for all religious experience

The poem describes the progress of the soul from de spair to hope, from unbelief to belief. The hopelessness in the early stanzas seems as profound as that expressed in The Waste Land, and more apathetic. "Because I do not hope," the poet says—and "I no longer strive to strive."

But by means and in ways which defy scientific description, the upward movement of the soul begins in Section 3, where the poet employs the symbol of an ascending stair. At the second and at the third turning of the stair, the soul pauses to look back upon the "twisted shapes" below—its former unhappy states. At length, the soul attains the goal happily epitomized in the phrase from Dante, "Our peace in His will!" The poem concludes with a prayer to the "Blessed sister, holy mother. In developing and expressing his thought, Eliot has drawn upon the Bible, Dante, and the liturales of the Roman and Enalish Churches.

Like much modern poetry of the intellectual school, Ash-Wednesday is a difficult poem, even to the sympathetic reader, and gives up its meaning slowly. The student may derive some aid from F. O. Matthiessen's The Achievement of T. S. Eliot and Theodore Morrison's "Ash Wednesday. A. Religious History," New England Quarterly, XI, June 1938.

Because I do not hope to turn again
Because I do not hope
Because I do not hope to turn
Desiring this man's gift and that man's scope
I no longer strive to strive towards such things
(Why should the agèd eagle stretch its wings*)
Why should I mourn
The vanished power of the usual reign*

Because I do not hope to know again The infirm glory of the positive hour Because I do not think Because I know I shall not know The one veritable transitory power Because I cannot drink

There, where trees flower, and springs flow, for there is nothing again

Because I know that time is always time

And place is always and only place

And what is actual is actual only for one time

And only for one place
I rejoice that things are as they are and
I renounce the blessed face

And renounce the voice

Because I cannot hope to turn again

Consequently I rejoice, having to construct something

Upon which to rejoice

And pray to God to have mercy upon us

And I pray that I may forget

These matters that with myself I too much discuss

Too much explain

Because I do not hope to turn again

Let these words answer

For what is done, not to be done again

May the judgment not be too heavy upon us

Because these wings are no longer wings to fly But merely vans to beat the air The air which is now thoroughly small and dry Smaller and dryer than the will Teach us to care and not to care Teach us to sit still

Pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death

Pray for us now and at the hour of our death

Lady, three white leopards sat under a juniper-tree In the cool of the day, having fed to satiety On my legs my heart my liver and that which had been contained

In the hollow round of my skull And God said Shall these bones live? shall these Bones live? And that which had been contained
In the bones (which were already dry) said chirping
Because of the goodness of this Lady
And because of her loveliness, and because

She honours the Virgin in meditation,
We shine with brightness. And I who am here dissembled
Proffer my deeds to oblivion, and my love
To the posterity of the desert and the fruit of the gourd
It is this which recovers

My guts the strings of my eyes and the indigestible portions

Which the leopards reject. The Lady is withdrawn
In a white gown, to contemplation, in a white gown
Let the whiteness of bones atone to forgetfulness
There is no life in them As I am forgotten
And would be forgotten, so I would forget
Thus devoted, concentrated in purpose And God said
Prophesy to the wind, to the wind only for only
The wind will listen And the bones sang chirping
With the burden of the grasshopper, saying

3 At the first turning of the second stair I turned and saw below The same shape twisted on the banister Under the vapour in the fetid air Struggling with the devil of the stairs who wears 100 The deceitful face of hope and of despair

At the second turning of the second stair I left them twisting, turning below, There were no more faces and the stair was dark, Damp jagged, like an old man's mouth drivelling, beyond repair.

Or the toothed gullet of an agèd shark

At the first turning of the third stair Was a slotted window bellied like the fig's fruit And beyond the hawthorn blossom and a pasture scene The broadbacked figure drest in blue and green Enchanted the maytime with an antique flute Blown hair is sweet, brown hair over the mouth blown, Lilac and prown hair.

Distraction, music of the flute, stops and steps of the mind over the third stair.

Fading, fading, strength beyond hope and despair Climbing the third stair

Word is unspoken, unheard;
Still is the unspoken word, the Word unheard,
The Word without a Word, the Word within
The world and for the world,
And the light shone in darkness and Against the Word the unstilled world still whirled
About the centre of the silent Word

O my people, what have I done unto thee.

Where shall the word be found, where will the word
Resound. Not here, there is not enough silence
Not on the sea or on the islands, not
On the mainland, in the desert or the rain land,
For those who walk in darkness
Both in the day time and in the night time
The right time and the right place are not here
No place of grace for those who avoid the face
No time to rejoice for those who walk among noise and deny the voice

Will the veiled sister pray for Those who walk in darkness, who chose thee and oppose thee.

Those who are torn on the horn between season and season, time and time, between 170

Hour and hour, word and word, power and power, those who wait

In darkness? Will the veiled sister pray For children at the gate Who will not go away and cannot pray: Pray for those who chose and oppose

O my people, what have I done unto thee.

Will the veiled sister between the slender
Yew trees pray for those who offend her
And are terrified and cannot surrender
And affirm before the world and deny between the rocks

In the last desert between the last blue rocks
The desert in the garden the garden in the desert
Of drouth, spitting from the mouth the withered appleseed.

O my people.

Although I do not hope to turn again Although I do not hope Although I do not hope to turn

Wavering between the profit and the loss
In this brief transit where the dreams cross
The dreamcrossed twilight between birth and dying 190
(Bless me father) though I do not wish to wish these things

From the wide window towards the granite shore The white sails still fly seaward, seaward flying Unbroken wings

And the lost heart stiffens and rejoices
In the lost lilac and the lost sea voices
And the weak spirit quickens to rebel
For the bent golden-rod and the lost sea smell
Quickens to recover
The cry of quail and the whirling plover
And the blind eye creates
The empty forms between the ivory gates
And smell renews the salt savour of the sandy earth

This is the time of tension between dying and birth. The place of solitude where three dreams cross. Between blue rocks. But when the voices shaken from the yew tree drift away. Let the other yew be shaken and reply.

Blessèd sister, holy mother, spirit of the fountain, spirit of the garden,

Suffer us not to mock ourselves with falsehood
Teach us to care and not to care
Teach us to sit still Even among these rocks,
Our peace in His will
And even among these rocks
Sister, mother
And spirit of the river, spirit of the sea,
Suffer me not to be separated

And let my cry come unto Thee.

In the 1920's, Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tennessee, was the center of a fruitful and significant literary movement. Headed by John Crowe Ransom, a graduate of Vanderbilt in the class of 1909 and a member of the English department there after 1914, the Nashville group consisted for the most part of men who, as Ransom's students, had caught the sharp contagion of his influence. The chief writers, besides Ransom himself, were Donald Davidson, Allen Tate, Andrew Nelson Lytle, and Robert Penn Warren. The bibliography appended to this sketch will suggest the range of their achievements.

There appear to have been three stages of development The group began as poets 'The Fugitives' -- as they styled themselves - wrote intellectual poetry which may be regarded as a part of the general reaction of the twenties against the nineteenth century Though continuing to write poetry, the group turned, in 1930, to Southern economic and social questions Ill Take My Stand argued for a return to agrarianism and vigorously combated the "progressive" assumption that the true welfare of the South could be best served by an accelerated program of industrialization. The book provoked for its authors the somewhat misleading label of "neo-Confederates" After 1930 the group became less unified in literary output, if not in spirit. The fugitives and agrarians of former years turned to the novel, and, to an even greater extent, to literary criticism Many critical essays by members of the group appeared in The Southern Retien (1935-1941), edited by Warren and Brooks, The Kenyon Review (1938—), edited by Ransom, and The Sewanee Review edited by Tate after 1941, as well as The Linguis Quarterly Review and other journals. Although this criticism owed something to T. S. Ehot and L. A. Richards, the work of each man bore the stamp of his own originality.

If the poetry of the Nashville writers seems hardly different in kind from the main body of modern intellectual poetry and if the social-economic thesis of I'll I ile My Stand seems a beautiful but ineffectual dream the literary criticism exerted a wide influence. Through emphasis on the close examination of the structure and text or the individual poem. Understanding Poetry worked a minor revolution in reading and teaching. The great virtue of the inovement was that it redirected attention to the literature itself which was about to be submerged by historical matter, its dangers were a tendency to regard literature in viewo, to carry analysis to a point of overreinmenent, and to employ a terminology too abstruse for the general reader.

Allen Tate, who is selected to represent the Nashville group, was born in Kentucky. He attended Vanderbilt, where he was graduated in 1922. Although engaged almost continuously in writing, he has found time for other employments in the 1930's he was a member at different times of the English departments of Southwestern. University at Memphis, the North Carolina Woman's College at Greensboro and Princeton, in 1942-

1944, he held the chair of poetry in the Library of Congress; and in 1944 he became professor of English at the University of the South and editor of The Sewanee Review. Like most intellectual writers of our time, Tate and his Nashville associates are "reactionary" in the better sense of the word. They have sought to recover certain values of the past the Southern cultural tradition, the religious point of view, and an intellectual fiber best exemplified in the poets of seventeenth-century England. Tate's "Ode to the Confederate Dead" and "Narcissus as Narcissus" (p. 1113) afford a unique opportunity to study the work of a modern poet in the closest possible relation to the critical ideas which it embodies

Row after row with strict impunity
The headstones yield their names to the element,
The wind whirrs without recollection,
In the riven troughs the splayed leaves
Pile up, of nature the casual sacrament
To the seasonal eternity of death,
Then driven by the fierce scrutiny
Of heaven to their election in the vast breath,
They sough the rumor of mortality

Autumn is desolation in the plot
Of a thousand acres where these memories grow
From the inexhaustible bodies that are not
Dead, but feed the grass row after rich row
Think of the autumns that have come and gone!—
Ambitious November with the humors of the year,
With particular zeal for every slab.
Staining the uncomfortable angels that rot
On the slabs, a wing chipped here, an arm there
The brute curiosity of an angel's stare
Turns you, like them, to stone,
Transforms the heaving air
Till plunged to a heavier world below
You shift your sea-space blindly
Heaving, turning like the blind crab

Dazed by the wind, only the wind The leaves flying, plunge You know who have waited by the wall
The twilight certainty of an animal,
Those midnight restitutions of the blood
You know—the immitigable pines, the smoky frieze

30

Of the sky, the sudden call you know the rage, The cold pool left by the mounting flood, Of muted Zeno and Parmenides. You who have waited for the angry resolution Of those desires that should be yours tomorrow, You know the unimportant shrift of death And praise the vision

And praise the arrogant circumstance Of those who fall

Rank upon rank, hurried beyond decision — Here by the sagging gate, stopped by the wall

Seeing, seeing only the leaves Flying, plunge and expire

Turn your eyes to the immoderate past,
Turn to the inscrutable infantry rising
Demons out of the earth—they will not last.

Seals the malignant purity of the flood,
What shall we who count our days and bow
Our heads with a commemorial woe
In the ribboned coats of grim felicity,
What shall we say of the bones, unclean,
Whose verdurous anonymity will grow?
The ragged arms, the ragged heads and eyes
Lost in these acres of the insane green?
The gray lean spiders come, they come and go,
In a tangle of willows without light 70

The singular screech-owl's tight Invisible lyric seeds the mind With the furious murmur of their chivalry.

> We shall say only the leaves Flying, plunge and expire

We shall say only the leaves whispering
In the improbable mist of nightfall
That flies on multiple wing
Night is the beginning and the end
And in between the ends of distraction
Waits mute speculation, the patient curse
That stones the eyes, or like the jaguar leaps
For his own image in a jungle pool, his victim.

What shall we say who have knowledge Carried to the heart? Shall we take the act To the grave? Shall we, more hopeful, set up the grave In the house? The ravenous grave?

Leave now

The shut gate and the decomposing wall
The gentle serpent, green in the mulberry bush,
Riots with his tongue through the hush—
Sentinel of the grave who counts us all'

PRIMITIVISTS: Hemingway, O'Neill, Faulkner

Ernest Hemingway

1898 •

Ernest Hemingway's favorite American book is Huckleberry Finn. It may be that he likes this book partly because it tells of a boy's encounters with cruelty, partly because its author was the master of a style which, though like oral speech, was notable for its poetic overtones. At any rate, Hemingway's own stories and novels, which often show the reactions of the sensitive person to cruelty, are written in a simple style which poetically gives them meaning

Hemingway was born in Oak Park, Illinois, in 1898, the son of a doctor. He went through high school in the town of his birth, winning some fame in boxing and football, and then became a reporter on the Kanias City. Star. During World War I, he served on the Italian front In postwar days, as a newspaper correspondent, he was one of the expatilates who inhabited the Left Bank in Paris. He began to write fiction, and was "discovered" by the critics in the United States. He returned to his homeland to write, going abroad now and then for travel in Europe or for big game hunting in Africa. During the Spanish Revolution and World War II he was a correspondent.

Hemingway transmutes his own experiences in his writings. Those in his first book, In Om Time (1925), are based upon his boyhood vacations in Michigan Those in Men Without Women (1927), including the two printed here, treat prewar war and postwar experiences at home and abroad.

His first novel, The Sun Alio River (1926), depicts the war-disillusioned young people of the Left Bank His second, A Farewell to Aims (1929), has for its scene the Italy of World War I for its plot the story of the disillusionment of a young American in an ambulance unit. Thus, though Hemingway invented many scenes and details, he at least based his narratives upon significant happenings in his own life.

These early works and others established Hemingway as the fictional laureate of "the lost generation" His experiences had been typical of this generation—his youth in America, his service in World War I, his disillusionment and his stay in Paris. The pattern was completed when, during the Spanish Civil War while writing of the conflict for the North American Newspaper Alliance he discovered a more affirmative faith in democratic society and the duty and destiny of the individual

This faith was announced in a novel To Hate and Have Not (1937), and a play, The Fifth Column (1938) both of which were far below the standard set by his earlier works. Evidently, the problem of asserting his new beliefs in artistic form was a difficult one for him to solve. In the novel For Whom the Belt Tolks (1940) however, he successfully coped with the problem. The novel won the admiration not only of critics but also of a huge reading public. Like Hemingway, it appeared the people of the United States in this period had regained faith in an organized society—the sort of faith that the book attributed to its here. Robert Jordan, in the hours before his death.

During both his earlier and his later periods Hemingway as a writer is indebted not only to Mark Twain but also to Sherwood Anderson, Gertrude Stein, and Stephen Crane From Anderson and Miss Stein, whom he knew in Paris, he probably received suggestions for the apparently naive colloquial style which he has cultivated From them, too, he may have received instruction in emphasizing basic emotions which led Oscar Cargill to classify him, as well as these two teachers of his, as "Primi-

Panel (I to r) William Faulkner • Faulkner's home in Oxford, Mississippi • A Left Bank café in Paris • Italian soldiers • Ernest Hemingway tivists.' At any rate, whether his narratives depict Midwestern adolescents or Left Bank sophisticates, the relatively uncomplicated drives of passion, hate, hunger, fear, and courage are consistently central in them From Crane, by contrast, Hemingway perhaps learned something about handling symbolic or connotative details to give prose what he calls "a fourth or fifth dimension" A result is that, in this author's best narratives, there is a unique combination of strength—even at times brutality

-with poetic subtlety and depth of sympathy which appeals greatly to modern readers.

The Killers

The door of Henry's lunch-room opened and two men came in. They sat down at the counter

"What's yours?" George asked them

"I don't know," one of the men said 'What do you want to eat, Al?"

"I don't know," said Al. "I don't know what I want to eat."

Outside it was getting dark. The street-light came on outside the window. The two men at the counter read the menu. From the other end of the counter Nick. Adams watched them. He had been talking to George when they came in

"I'll have a roast pork tenderloin with apple sauce and mashed potatoes," the first man said

"It isn't ready yet"

"What the hell do you put it on the card for"

"That's the dinner," George explained "You can get that at six o'clock"

George looked at the clock on the wall behind the a counter.

"It's five o'clock."

"The clock says twenty minutes past five," the second man said.

"It's twenty minutes fast."

"Oh, to hell with the clock," the first man said 'What have you got to eat?"

"I can give you any kind of sandwiches," George said "You can have ham and eggs, bacon and eggs, liver and bacon, or a steak."

"Give me chicken croquettes with green peas and 30 cream sauce and mashed potatoes

"That's the dinner"

"Everything we want's the dinner, eh? That's the way you work it"

"I can give you ham and eggs, bacon and eggs liver—"

"T'll take ham and eggs," the man called Al said He wore a derby hat and a black overcoat buttoned across the chest. His face was small and white and he had tight lips. He wore a silk muffler and gloves.

Give me bacon and eggs," said the other man. He was about the same size as Al. Their faces were different, but they were dressed like twins. Both wore overcoats too tight for them. They sat leaning forward, their elbows on the counter.

"Got anything to drink?" Al asked

"Silver beer, bevo ginger-ale," George said

"I mean you got anything to drink?"

"Just those I said"

"This is a hot town," said the other "What do they so call it?"

"Summit."

"Ever hear of it?" Al asked his friend

"No," said the friend

"What do you do here nights?" Al asked

"They eat the dinner," his friend said. "They all come here and eat the big dinner."

From Men Without Women by Ernest Hemingway, published by Charles Scribner's Sons, copyright, 1927, by Charles Scribner's Sons, used by permission of the publishers "That's right," George said.

"So you think that's right?" Al asked George "Sure."

"You're a pretty bright boy, aren't you?"

"Sure," said George

"Well, you're not," said the other little man. "Is he, Al?"

"He's dumb," said Al He turned to Nick "What's your name?"

"Adams"

"Another bright boy," Al said. "Ain't he a bright boy, Max?"

"The town's full of bright boys," Max said

George put the two platters, one of ham and eggs, the other of bacon and eggs, on the counter He set down two side-dishes of fried potatoes and closed the wicket into the kitchen

"Which is yours?" he asked Al

"Don't you remember?"

"Ham and eggs"

20 "Just a bright boy," Max said He leaned forward and took the ham and eggs Both men ate with their gloves on George watched them eat

"What are you looking at?" Max looked at George "Nothing"

"The hell you were You were looking at me"

"Maybe the boy meant it for a joke, Max," Al said. George laughed

"You don't have to laugh," Max said to him "You don't have to laugh at all, see?"

"All right," said George

"So he thinks it's all right" Max turned to Al "He thinks it's all right. That's a good one"

"Oh, he's a thinker," Al said. They went on eating

"What's the bright boy's name down the counter?" Al asked Max

"Hey, bright boy," Max said to Nick "You go around on the other side of the counter with your boy friend"

"What's the idea?" Nick asked

"There isn't any idea"

"You better go around, bright boy," Al said Nick went around behind the counter

"What's the idea?" George asked

"None of your damn business," Al said "Who's out in the kitchen?"

"The nigger"

"What do you mean the nigger?"

"The nigger that cooks."

"Tell him to come in."

"What's the idea?"

"Tell him to come in"

"Where do you think you are?"

"We know damn well where we are," the man called Max said "Do we look silly?"

"You talk silly," Al said to him "What the hell do you argue with this kid for? Listen," he said to George "tell the nigger to come out here"

"What are you going to do to him?"

"Nothing Use your head, bright boy What would we do to a nigger?"

George opened the slit that opened back into the κ kitchen "Sam," he called "Come in here a minute"

The door to the kitchen opened and the nigger came in. "What was it?" he asked The two men at the counter took a look at him.

"All right, nigger You stand right there," Al said Sam, the nigger, standing in his apron, looked at the two men sitting at the counter "Yes, sir," he said Al got down from his stool

"I'm going back to the kitchen with the nigger and bright boy," he said "Go on back to the kitchen, nigger You go with him, bright boy" The little man walked after Nick and Sam, the cook, back into the kitchen The door shut after them The man called Max sat at the counter opposite George He didn't look at George but looked in the mirror that ran along back of the counter Henry's had been made over from a saloon into a lunch-counter

"Well, bright boy," Max said, looking into the mirror. "why don't you say something?"

"What's it all about?"

"Hey, Al," Max called, "bright boy wants to know what it's all about."

"Why don't you tell him?" Al's voice came from the kitchen

"What do you think it's all about?"

"I don't know"

"What do you think?"

Max looked into the mirror all the time he was talking

"I wouldn't say '

"Hey, Al, bright boy says he wouldn't say what he thinks it's all about"

I can hear you, all right," Al said from the kitchen He had propped open the slit that dishes passed through into the kitchen with a catsup bottle. "Listen, bright bot," he said from the kitchen to George. "Stand a little further along the bar You move a little to the left. Max." He was like a photographer arranging for a group picture.

Talk to me, bright boy," Max said. "What do you think's going to happen?'

George did not say anything

Till tell you," Max said "We're going to kill a Swede Do you know a big Swede named Ole Andreson?"

Yes"

He comes here to eat every night, don't he?"
'Sometimes he comes here."

He comes here at six o'clock, don't he?"

If he comes"

We know all that, bright boy," Max said 'Talk about something else Ever go to the movies?"

Once in a while"

You ought to go to the movies more The movies are tine for a bright boy like you"

What are you going to kill Ole Andreson for 'What did he ever do to you'"

He never had a chance to do anything to us He never even seen us"

And he's only going to see us once,' Al said from the kitchen

"What are you going to kill him for, then? George asked.

We're killing him for a friend Just to oblige a friend, bright boy"

"Shut up," said Al from the kitchen 'You talk too goddam much"

"Well, I got to keep bright boy amused Don't I, bright boy?"

"You talk too damn much," Al said. "The nigger and my bright boy are amused by themselves. I got them tied up like a couple of girl friends in the convent."

"I suppose you were in a convent?"

"You never know"

"You were in a kosher convent That's where you were."
George looked up at the clock

"If anybody comes in you tell them the cook is off, and if they keep after it, you tell them you'll go back and cook yourself. Do you get that, bright boy?"

"All right,' George said. "What you going to do with us afterward?"

"That'll depend," Max said "That's one of those things you never know at the time"

George looked up at the clock It was a quarter past six. The door from the street opened. A street-car motorman came in

"Hello, George," he said "Can I get supper?"

"Sam's gone out, George said He'll be back in about half an hour"

"I'd better go up the street," the motorman said George looked at the clock. It was twenty minutes past six

"That was nice, bright boy," Max said. "You're a 60 regular little gentleman."

'He knew I'd blow his head off. Al said from the kurchen

"No," said Max "It aint that Bright boy is nice He's a nice boy I like him

At six-fifty-five George said "He's not coming"

Two other people had been in the lunch-room. Once George had gone out to the kitchen and made a hamand-egg sandwich "to go" that a man wanted to take with him. Inside the kitchen he saw Al, his derby hat tipped 70 back, sitting on a stool beside the wicket with the muzzle of a sawed off shotgun resting on the ledge. Nick and the cook were back to back in the corner, a towel tied in each of their mouths. George had cooked the sandwich, wrapped it up in oiled paper, put it in a bag, brought it in, and the man had paid for it and gone out.

Bright boy can do everything." Max said. 'He can cook and everything. You'd make some girl a nice wife, bright boy."

'Yes'" George said Your friend, Ole Andreson, 80 isn't going to come"

We'll give him ten minutes," Max said

Max watched the mirror and the clock. The hands of the clock marked seven o clock, and then five minutes past seven

'Come on, Al," said Max 'We better go He's not coming"

"Better give him five minutes," Al said from the kitchen.

in the five minutes a man came in, and George ex- 90 plained that the cook was sick

"Why the hell don't you get another cook?" the man asked. "Aren't you running a lunch-counter?" He went out

"Come on, Al," Max said

"What about the two bright boys and the nigger?"

"They're all right."

"You think so?"

"Sure We're through with it"

"I don't like it," said Al "It's sloppy You talk too much"

"Oh, what the hell," said Max "We got to keep amused, haven't we?"

"You talk too much, all the same," Al said He came out from the kitchen The cut-off barrels of the shotgun made a slight bulge under the waist of his too tight-fitting overcoat He straightened his coat with his gloved hands

"So long, bright boy," he said to George "You got a lot of luck"

"That's the truth," Max said "You ought to play the o races, bright boy"

The two of them went out the door George watched them, through the window, pass under the arc-light and cross the street. In their tight overcoats and derby hats they looked like a vaudeville team. George went back through the swinging-door into the kitchen and untied Nick and the cook.

'I don't want any more of that," said Sam, the cook 'I don't want any more of that "

Nick stood up. He had never had a towel in his mouth $\ensuremath{\mathfrak{B}}$ before.

"Say," he said "What the hell?" He was trying to swagger it off

"They were going to kill Ole Andreson, George said "They were going to shoot him when he came in to eat."

"Ole Andreson?"

"Sure."

The cook felt the corners of his mouth with his thumbs

"They all gone?" he asked

"Yeah," said George "They re gone now"

"I don't like it," said the cook "I don't like any of it at all"

"Listen," George said to Nick. "You better go see Ole Andreson"

"All right

992 Hemingway

You better not have anything to do with it at all," Sam, the cook, said "You better stay way out of it"

'Don't go if you don't want to," George said

"Mixing up in this ain't going to get you anywhere," the cook said: "You stay out of it."

"I'll go see him," Nick said to George "Where does he live?"

The cook turned away

"Little boys always know what they want to do," he said

"He lives up at Hirsch's rooming-house," George said to Nick.

"I'll go up there"

Outside the arc-light shone through the bare branches a of a tree. Nick walked up the street beside the cartracks and turned at the next arc-light down a side-street. Three houses up the street was Hirsch's rooming-house. Nick walked up the two steps and pushed the bell. A woman came to the door.

"is Ole Andreson here?"

"Do you want to see him?"

"Yes, if he's in"

Nick followed the woman up a flight of stairs and back to the end of a corridor. She knocked on the door

"Who is it?"

"It's somebody to see you, Mr Andreson," the woman

"It's Nick Adams"

"Come in"

Nick opened the door and went into the room. Ok-Andreson was lying on the bed with all his clothes on He had been a heavyweight prizefighter and he was too long for the bed. He lay with his head on two pillows. 3 He did not look at Nick

"What was it?" he asked

"I was up at Henry's," Nick said, and two fellows came in and tied up me and the cook, and they said they were going to kill you."

It sounded silly when he said it. Ole Andreson said nothing

"They put us out in the kitchen, 'Nick went on "They were going to shoot you when you came to supper"

Ole Andreson looked at the wall and did not say $\ensuremath{\omega}$ anything

"George thought I better come and tell you about it."

"There isn't anything I can do about it," Ole Andreson I'il tell you what they were like."

I don't want to know what they were like," Ole Andreson said He looked at the wall. "Thanks for coming to tell me about it"

That's all right"

Nick looked at the big man lying on the bed

"Don't you want me to go and see the police?"

"No," Ole Andreson said "That wouldn't do any good"

"Isn't there something I could do?"

'No There isn't anything to do."

"Maybe it was just a bluff"

"No It ain't just a bluff"

Ole Andreson rolled over toward the wall

"The only thing is," he said, talking toward the wall, I just can't make up my mind to go out I been in here all day."

Couldn't you get out of town?"

No," Ole Andreson said "I'm through with all that running around"

He looked at the wall

"There ain't anything to do now"

"Couldn't you fix it up some way?"

"No I got in wrong" He talked in the same flat voice "There ain't anything to do After a while I'll make up my mind to go out"

"I better go back and see George," Nick said

"So long," said Ole Andreson He did not look roward Nick "Thanks for coming around"

Nick went out As he shut the door he saw Ole Andreson with all his clothes on, lying on the bed looking at the wall

"He's been in his room all day," the landlady said down-stairs "I guess he don't feel well. I said to him 'Mr Andreson, you ought to go out and take a walk on a nice fall day like this,' but he didn't feel like it."

"He doesn't want to go out"

"I'm sorry he don't feel well," the woman said "He's an awfully nice man He was in the ring, you know"

"I know it"

"You'd never know it except from the way his face is," the woman said. They stood talking just inside the street door. "He's just as gentle."

"Well, good-night, Mrs. Hirsch," Nick said

"I'm not Mrs Hirsch," the woman said "She owns the place I just look after it for her I m Mrs Bell."

"Well, good-night Mrs Bell,' Nick said

"Good-night," the woman said

Nick walked up the dark street to the corner under the arc-light, and then along the car-tracks to Henry's eating-house. George was inside, back of the counter

"Did you see Ole?

"Yes,' said Nick 'He's in his room and he won't go out

The cook opened the door from the kitchen when he heard Nick's voice

I don't even listen to it," he said and shut the door

"Did you tell him about it?" George asked

"Sure I told him but he knows what it's all about"

"What's he going to do?"

"Nothing"

"They'll kill him '

"I guess they will"

"He must have got mixed up in something in Chicago"

"I guess so, said Nick

"It's a hell of a thing"

"It's an awful thing,' Nick said

They did not say anything George reached down for 70 a towel and wiped the counter

"I wonder what he did?" Nick said

'Double-crossed somebody That's what they kill them for "

"I'm going to get out of this town," Nick said

'Yes," said George 'That's a good thing to do"

"I can't stand to think about him waiting in the room and knowing he's going to get it. It's too damned awful."

"Well," said George, 'you better not think about it "

In Another Country

In the fall the war was always there, but we did not go to it any more. It was cold in the fall in Milan and the dark came very early. Then the electric lights came on, and it was pleasant along the streets looking in the windows. There was much game hanging outside the shops, and the snow powdered in the fur of the foxes and the wind blew their tails. The deer hung stiff and heavy and empty, and small birds blew in the wind and the wind turned their feathers. It was a cold fall and the wind came down from the mountains.

We were all at the hospital every afternoon, and there were different ways of walking across the town through the dusk to the hospital Two of the ways were alongside canals, but they were long. Always, though, you crossed a bridge across a canal to enter the hospital. There was a choice of three bridges. On one of them a woman sold roasted chestnuts It was warm, standing in front of her charcoal fire, and the chestnuts were warm afterward in your pocket. The hospital was very old and 20 very beautiful, and you entered through a gate and walked across a courtyard and out a gate on the other side There were usually funerals starting from the courtyard. Beyond the old hospital were the new brick pavilions, and there we met every afternoon and were all very polite and interested in what was the matter, and sat in the machines that were to make so much difference.

The doctor came up to the machine where I was sitting and said "What did you like best to do before the war? Did you practice a sport?"

I said "Yes, football"

"Good," he said "You will be able to play football again better than ever."

My knee did not bend and the leg dropped straight from the knee to the ankle without a calf, and the machine was to bend the knee and make it move as in riding a tricycle. But it did not bend yet, and instead the machine lurched when it came to the bending part. The doctor said: "That will all pass. You are a fortunate young man. You will play football again like a champion."

In the next machine was a major who had a little hand like a baby's He winked at me when the doctor examined his hand, which was between two leather straps that bounced up and down and flapped the stiff fingers, and said. "And will I too play football, captain-doctor?" He had been a very great fencer, and before the war the greatest fencer in Italy

The doctor went to his office in the back room and brought a photograph which showed a hand that had been withered almost as small as the major's, before it had taken a machine course, and after was a little larger. The major held the photograph with his good hand and looked at it very carefully "A wound?" he asked

"An industrial accident," the doctor said

"Very interesting, very interesting," the major said, and handed it back to the doctor.

"You have confidence?"

"No," said the major.

There were three boys who came each day who were about the same age I was. They were all three from Milan, and one of them was to be a lawyer, and one was $_{60}$ to be a painter, and one had intended to be a soldier, and after we were finished with the machines, sometimes we walked back together to the Café Cova, which was next door to the Scala. We walked the short way through the communist quarter because we were four together. The people hated us because we were officers, and from a wine-shop some one called out, "A basso gli ufficiali" as we passed. Another boy who walked with us sometimes and made us five wore a black silk handkerchief across his face because he had no nose then and his face was to be rebuilt. He had gone out to the front from the military academy and been wounded within an hour after he had gone into the front line for the first time. They rebuilt his face, but he came from a very old family and they could never get the nose exactly right. He went to South America and worked in a bank. But this was a long time ago, and then we did not any of us know how it was going to be afterward. We only knew then that there was always the war, but that we were not going to it any more.

67 A basso . . . ufficiali! Down with the officers!

We all had the same medals, except the boy with the black silk bandage across his face, and he had not been at the front long enough to get any medals. The tall boy with a very pale face who was to be a lawyer had been a heutenant of Arditi and had three medals of the sort we each had only one of. He had lived a very long time with death and was a little detached. We were all a little de-10 tached, and there was nothing that held us together except that we met every afternoon at the hospital Although, as we walked to the Cova through the tough part of town, walking in the dark, with light and singing coming out of the wine-shops, and sometimes having to walk into the street when the men and women would crowd together on the sidewalk so that we would have had to jostle them to get by, we felt held together by there being something that had happened that they, the people who disliked us, did not understand

We ourselves all understood the Cova, where it was rich and warm and not too brightly lighted, and noisy and smoky at certain hours, and there were always girls at the tables and the illustrated papers on a rack on the wall. The girls at the Cova were very patriotic, and I found that the most patriotic people in Italy were the café girls—and I believe they are still patriotic

The boys at first were very polite about my medals and asked me what I had done to get them I showed them the papers, which were written in a very beautiful to language and full of fratellanza and abnegazione, but which really said, with the adjectives removed, that I had been given the medals because I was an American After that their manner changed a little toward me, although I was their friend against outsiders I was a friend, but I was never really one of them after they had read the citations, because it had been different with them and they had done very different things to get their medals I had been wounded, it was true, but we all knew that being wounded, after all, was really an accident. I was never 40 ashamed of the ribbons, though, and sometimes, after the cocktail hour, I would imagine myself having done all the things they had done to get their medals, but walking home at night through the empty streets with the cold wind and all the shops closed, trying to keep near the street lights, I knew that I would never have done such things, and I was very much afraid to die, and often lay in bed at night by myself, afraid to die and wondering how I would be when I went back to the front again.

The three with the medals were like hunting-hawks; and I was not a hawk, although I might seem a hawk to so those who have never hunted, they, the three, knew better and so we drifted apart. But I stayed good friends with the boy who had been wounded his first day at the front, because he would never know now how he would have turned out, so he could never be accepted either, and I liked him because I thought perhaps he would not have turned out to be a hawk either.

The major, who had been the great fencer, did not believe in bravery, and spent much time while we sat in the machines correcting my grammar. He had complimented 60 me on how I spoke Italian, and we talked together very easily. One day I had said that Italian seemed such an easy language to me that I could not take a great interest in it, everything was so easy to say. "Ah, yes," the major said. "Why, then, do you not take up the use of grammar?" So we took up the use of grammar, and soon Italian was such a different language that I was afraid to talk to him until I had the grammar straight in my mind.

The major came very regularly to the hospital 1 do not think he ever missed a day, although I am sure he did 70 not believe in the machines. There was a time when none of us believed in the machines, and one day the major said it was all nonsense. The machines were new then and it was we who were to prove them. It was an idiotic idea, he said, "a theory, like another." I had not learned my grammar, and he said I was a stupid impossible disgrace, and he was a fool to have bothered with me. He was a small man and he sat straight up in his chair with his right hand thrust into the machine and looked straight ahead at the wall while the straps thumped up 80 and down with his fingers in them.

"What will you do when the war is over if it is over?" he asked me 'Speak grammatically!"

"I will go to the States."

Are you married?"

'No, but I hope to be"

"The more of a fool you are," he said He seemed very angry. "A man must not marry"

"Why, Signor Maggiore?"

³⁰ fratellanza, brotherhood . 39 abnegazione, sacrifice

"Don't call me 'Signor Maggiore.' "

"Why must not a man marry?"

"He cannot marry He cannot marry," he said angrily.
"If he is to lose everything, he should not place himself in a position to lose that He should not place himself in a position to lose. He should find things he cannot lose."

He spoke very angrily and bitterly, and looked straight ahead while he talked

"But why should he necessarily lose it?"

"He'll lose it," the major said. He was looking at the wall. Then he looked down at the machine and jerked his little hand out from between the straps and slapped it hard against his thigh. "He'll lose it," he almost shouted "Don't argue with me!". Then he called to the attendant who ran the machines. "Come and turn this damned thing off."

He went back into the other room for the light treatment and the massage. Then I heard him ask the doctor if he might use his telephone and he shut the door. When he came back into the room, I was sitting in another machine. He was wearing his cape and had his cap on, and he came directly toward my machine and put his arm on my shoulder.

I am so sorry," he said, and patted me on the shoulder with his good hand. "I would not be rude. My wife has just died. You must forgive me."

"Oh—" I said, feeling sick for him "I am so sorry" He stood there biting his lower lip. It is very difficult," he said. "I cannot resign myself."

He looked straight past me and out through the win-3 dow. Then he began to cry. "I am utterly unable to resign myself," he said and choked. And then crying, his head up looking at nothing, carrying himself straight and soldierly, with tears on both his cheeks and biting his lips, he walked past the machines and out the door.

The doctor told me that the major's wife, who was very young and whom he had not married until he was definitely invalided out of the war, had died of pneumonia She had been sick only a few days. No one expected her to die. The major did not come to the hospital for three days Then he came at the usual hour, wearing a black band on the sleeve of his uniform. When he came back, there were large framed photographs around the wall, of all sorts of wounds before and after they had been cured by the machines In front of the machine the major used were three photographs of hands like his that were completely restored. I do not know where the doctor got them. I always understood we were the first $t\omega$ use the machines The photographs did not make much difference to the major because he only looked out of the window

1888 •

The 1920's and early 1930's were the greatest period in the history of the American drama; during those years, a dramatic revival was in full swing. In comedy there were—to select only a few of the more brilliant examples—Philip Barry's Paris Bound (1927) and Holsday (1929), S. N. Behrman's The Second Man (1927).

and Biography (1932), George Kelly's The Show-Off (1924) and Craig's Wife (1925). George S Kaufman's Beggar on Horseback (with Marc Connelly, 1924) and The Royal Family (with Edna Ferber, 1927), and Robert Sherwood's Road to Rome (1927) and Reunion in Vienna (1931). And in tragedy, there were the plays of Eugene O'Neill—by common consent the greatest dramatist whom America has yet produced Among O'Neill's more important works were Beyond the Horizon and The Emperor Jones (1920). Anna Christie (1921), The Hairy Ape (1922), Deure under the Elms (1924), The Great God Brown (1926). Strange Interlude (1928), and Mourning Becomes Electra (1931).

Drama declined after 1931 Since that date, to be sure, Maxwell Anderson has written creditable tragedies in verse (Winterset, 1935, High Tor, 1937, and others), and there have been younger writers of promise, such as Clifford Odets (Waiting for Lefty, 1935) and Lillian Hellman (The Children's Hour, 1935) But O'Neill maintained a twelve-year silence from 1934 until the fall of 1946, when The Iceman Cometh, an ambitious work upon which he was long engaged, was produced on Broadway Other dramatists have hardly fulfilled their early promise

Son of the famous actor James O'Neill, Eugene O'Neill was born in New York City After a varied experience which included not only academic study (at Princeton. 1906-1907, and at Harvard, 1914-1915) but also two years at sea, a tour in vaudeville, and a turn at newspaper reporting, he began his career as dramatist in 1916

His plays are interesting, first of all, for their bold experimentation. Restive under the restraints imposed by the theater, and never satisfied with an achieved form. O'Neill constantly experimented with new techniques. The Emperor Jones and The Hany Ape were experiments in monodrama—a type of play whose purpose is the exhibition of a single character. Desire under the Elms employed a novel stage set, showing by means of the cross section of a house simultaneous actions in the different rooms. The Great God Brown used masks to distinguish between the assumed and the real attitudes of the characters, and Strange Interlude used the aside for the same purpose Many plays (The Harry Ape among them) employed "expressionism"—a technique which sought to convey the meaning symbolically rather than by a literal realism. Even though the auditor sometimes questioned the success of these experiments, he always applauded their brilliance and originality. O'Neill's plays are interesting, in the second place, for their psychological insight. The author achieved his most powerful effects in studies of the disintegration of personality In The Emperor Jones the theme was the breakdown of a Negro's mentality under the stress of fear, in The Harry Ape a worker's loss of motivation when he could no longer feel that he "belonged", in Strange Interlude, the mental and moral disintegration of a woman whose fiancé had been killed in war. Although the Freudian psychology was too prominently displayed—a fact which may prove injurious to O'Neill's future reputationthere is no denying the originality and power of his best work

The Hairy Ape

A Comedy of Ancient and Modern Life in Eight Scenes

The Hairy Ape was first produced by the Provincetown Players at their theater, the Provincetown Playhouse, 183 Macdougal Street, New York City, March 9, 1922 Louis Wolheim took the part of "Yank"

The play is significant technically because of its strong emphasis upon a single character and its use of "expressionism" Although it is employed throughout, the expressionistic method—which at intervals substitutes a fantastic kind of symbolism for external realism—is prominent in Scene V, for example, where Yank lunges against the pedestrians on Fifth Avenue without producing any visible effect upon them The play is important also for its content. Although O'Neill, here as elsewhere, is concerned primarily with psychological processes, he presents in The Hairy Ape a psychological problem which is broadly social in its implications—the divorce, in the modern industrial world, of the worker from his work. It is a problem which came into being with the industrial revolution, which goes much deeper than hours and wages, and for which no solution has yet been found.

SCENE The firemen's forecastle of a transatlantic liner an hour after sailing from New York for the voyage across. Tiers of narrow, steel bunks, three deep, on all sides. An entrance in rear. Benches on the floor before the bunks. The room is crowded with men, shouting, cursing, laughing, singing—a confused, inchoate uproar swelling into sori of unity, a meaning—the bewildered, furious, baffled defiance of a beast in a cage. Nearly all the men are drunk. Many bottles are passed from hand to hand. All are dressed in dungaree pants, heavy ugly shoes. Some wear singlets, but the majority are stripped to the waist.

The treatment of this scene, or of any other scene in the play, should by no means be naturalistic. The effect sought after is a cramped space in the bowels of a ship, imprisoned by white steel. The lines of bunks, the uprights supporting them, cross each other like the steel framework of a cage The ceiling crushes down upon the men's heads They cannot stand upright This accentuates the natural stooping posture which shoveling coal and the resultant over-development of back and shoulder muscles have given them. The men themselves should resemble those pictures in which the appearance of Neanderthal Man is guessed at All are hairy-chested, with long arms of tremendous power, and low, receding brows above their small, fierce, resentful eyes. All the civilized white races are represented, but except for the slight differentiation in color of hair, skin, eyes, all these men are alıke

The curtain rises on a tumult of sound. Yank is seated in the foreground. He seems broader, fiercer, more truculent, more powerful, more sure of himself than the rest They respect his superior strength—the grudging respect of fear.

Then, too, he represents to them a self-expression, the very last word in what they are, their most highly developed actividual.

To-night on the for ard square

I'll bet on Dutchy

He packa da wallop, I tella vou'

Shut up, Wop!

No fightin', maties We're all chums, ain't we'

[A voice starts bawling a song.]

"Beer, beer, glorious beer!

Fill yourselves right up to here"

YANK. [For the first time seeming to take notice of the uproar about him, turns around threateningly—in a tone of contemptuous authority.] Choke off dat noise! Where d'yuh get dat beer stuff? Beer, hell! Beer's for goils—and Dutchmen Me for somep'n wit a kick to it! Gimme a drink, one of youse guys [Several bottles are eagerly offered. He takes a tremendous gulp at one of them; then, keeping the bottle in his hand, glares belligerently at the owner, who bastens to acquiesce in this 40 robbery by saying.] All righto, Yank. Keep it and have another. [YANK contemptiously turns his back on the crowd again. For a second there is an embarrassed silence. Then——]

VOICES We must be passing the Hook

She's beginning to roll to it

Six days in hell-and then Southampton

Py Yesus, I vish somepody take my first vatch for me!

Gittin' seasick, Square-head?

Drink up and forget it'

What's in your bottle?

Gin

Dot's nigger trink

Absinthe? It's doped You'll go off your chump, Froggy!

Cochon'

Whisky, that's the ticket!

Where's Paddy?

Going asleep

Sing us that whisky song, Paddy

[They all turn to an old, wizened Irishman who is dozing, very drunk, on the benches forward. His face is extremely monkey-like with all the sad, patient pathos of that animal in his small eyes.]

Singa da song, Caruso Pat'

He's gettin' old The drink is too much for him He's too drunk

PADDY [Blinking about him, starts to his feet resent-full), swaying, holding on to the edge of a bunk.] I'm never too drunk to sing "Tis only when I'm dead to the world I'd be wishful to sing at all [With a sort of sad contempt] "Whisky Johnny," ye want? A chanty, ye want? Now that's a queer wish from the ugly like of re you, God help you But no matther [He starts to sing m a thin, nasal, doleful tone.]

Oh, whisky is the life of man'

Whisky! O Johnny! [They all 10 on in on this.]

Oh, whisky is the life of man!

Whisky for my Johnny! [Again chorus.]

Oh, whisky drove my old man mad!

Whisky! O Johnny!

Oh, whisky drove my old man mad!

Whisky for my Johnny'

YANK. [Again turning around scornfully] Aw hell!

Nix on dat old sailing ship stuff! All dat bull's dead, see? And you're dead, too, yuh damned old Harp, on'y yuh don't know it Take it easy, see. Give us a rest. Nix on de loud noise [With a cynical grin.] Can't youse see I'm tryin' to t'ink?

All. [Repeating the word after him as one with the same cynical amused mockery.] Think! [The chorused word has a brazen metallic quality as if their throats were phonograph horns. It is followed by a general upsoar 10 of hard, barking laughter.]

voices. Don't be cracking your head wit ut, Yank

You gat headache, py yingo!

One thing about it-it rhymes with drink!

Ha, ha, ha!

Drink, don't think!

Drink, don't think!

Drink, don't think!

[A whole choins of voices has taken up this refrain, stamping on the floor, pounding on the benches with fitts.]

YANK [Taking a gulp from his bottle—goodnatured-ly.] Aw right Can de noise I got yuh de foist time.

[The uproar subsides A very drunken sentimental tenor begins to sing.]

"Far away in Canada,
Far across the sea,
There's a lass who fondly waits
Making a home for me——"

YANK [Fiercely contemptions] Shut up, yuh lousy boob! Where dyuh yet dat tripe? Home? Home, hell! I'll make a home for yuh! I'll knock yuh dead Home! T'hell wit home! Where d'yuh get dat tripe? Dis is home, see? What d'yuh want wit home? [Froudly] I runned away from mine when I was a kid. On'y too glad to beat it, dat was me Home was lickings for me, dat's all But yuh can bet your shoit no one ain't never licked me since! Wanter try it, any of youse? Huh! I guess not [In a more placated but still contemptions tone.] Goils waitin for yuh, huh? Aw, hell! Dat's all tripe Dey don't wait for no one Dey'd double-cross yuh for a nickel Dey're all tarts, get me? Treat 'em rough, dat's me To hell wit 'em Tarts, dat's what, de whole bunch of 'em LONG [Very drunk, jumps on a bench excitedly, gesto ticulating with a bottle in his hand.] Listen 'ere, Comrades' Yank 'ere is right 'E says this 'ere stinkin' ship is our 'ome. And 'e says as 'ome is 'ell And 'e's right' This is 'ell We lives in 'ell, Comrades—and right enough we'll die in it [Raging.] And who's ter blame, I arsks yer? We ain't. We wasn't born this rotten way All men is born free and ekal That's in the bleedin Bible, maties But what d'they care for the Bible—them lazy, bloated swine what travels first cabin? Them's the ones They dragged us down 'til we're on'y wage slaves in the bowels of a bloody ship, sweatin', burnin' up, eatin' coal dust! Hit's them's ter blame—the damned Capitalist clarss!

[There had been a gradual murmur of contemptuous resentment rising among the men until now he is interrupted by a storm of catcalls, bisses, boos, hard laughter]

VOICES. Turn it off!

Shut up!

Sit down!

Closa da face!

Tamn fool! [Etc.]

YANK. [Standing up and glaring at LONG] Sit down before I knock yuh down! [LONG makes haste to efface himself. YANK goes on contemptuously] De Bible, huh De Cap'tlist class, huh? Aw nix on dat Salvation Army-Socialist bull. Git a soapbox' Hire a hall' Come and be saved, huh? Jerk us to Jesus, huh? Aw g'wan! I've listened to lots of guys like you, see Yuh're all wrong Wanter know what I t'ink? Yuh ain't no good for no one Yuh're de bunk Yuh ain't got no noive, get me' Yuh're yellow, dat's what Yellow, dat's you Say' What's dem slobs in de foist cabin got to do wit us? We're better men dan dey are, ain't we? Sure! One of us guys could clean up de whole mob wit one mit Put one of 'em down here for one watch in de stokehole what'd happen? Dey'd carry him off on a stretcher. Dem boids don't amount to nothin' Dey're just baggage Who makes dis old tub run? Ain't it us guys? Well den. we belong, don't we? We belong and dey don't Dat's all [A loud chorus of approval. YANK goes on] As for dis bein' hell-aw, nuts! Yuh lost your noive. dat's what. Dis is a man's job, get me? It belongs It runs dis tub No stiffs need apply But yuh're a stiff, see Yuh're yellow, dat's you.

VOICES. [With a great hard pride in them.]
Righto!
A man's job!
Talk is cheap, Long.

He never could hold up his end
Divil take him!
Yank's right. We make it go.
Py Gott, Yank say right ting!
We don't need no one cryin over us
Makin' speeches
Throw him out!
Yellow!
Chuck him overboard!
I'll break his jaw for him!

[They crowd around LONG threateningly]

YANK. [Half good-natured again—contemptionsly] Aw, take it easy Leave him alone He ain't woith a punch Drink up Here's how, whoever owns dis [He takes a long studlow from his bottle All drink with him In a flash all is hilarious amiability again, back-slapping, loud talk, etc.]

PADDY [Who has been sitting in a blinking, melancholy daze-suddenly cries out in a voice full of old sorvou'] We belong to this, you're saying? We make the ship to go, you're saying? Yerra then, that Almighty God have pity on us! [His voice runs into the wail of a keen, he rocks back and forth on his bench. The men stare at him, startled and impressed in spite of themselses] Oh, to be back in the fine days of my youth, ochone' Oh, there was fine beautiful ships them daysclippers wid tall masts touching the sky-fine strong men in them-men that was sons of the sea as if 'twas the mother that bore them Oh, the clean skins of them, and the clear eyes, the straight backs and full chests of 3 them! Brave men they was, and bold men surely! We'd be sailing out, bound down round the Horn maybe We'd be making sail in the dawn, with a fair breeze, singing a chanty song wid no care to it And astern the land would be sinking low and dying out, but we'd give it no heed but a laugh, and never a look behind For the day that was, was enough, for we was free menand I'm thinking 'tis only slaves do be giving heed to the day that's gone or the day to come-until they're old like me [With a sort of religious exaltation.] Oh, e to be scudding south again wid the power of the Trade Wind driving her on steady through the nights and the days' Full sail on her' Nights and days' Nights when the foam of the wake would be flaming wid fire, when the sky'd be blazing and winking wid stars. Or the full of the moon maybe Then you'd see her driving through the gray night, her sails stretching aloft all silver and white, not a sound on the deck, the lot of us dreaming dreams, till you'd believe twas no real ship at all you was on but a ghost ship like the Flying Dutchman they say does be roaming the seas forevermore without 50 touching a port. And there was the days, too. A warm sun on the clean decks. Sun warming the blood of you, and wind over the miles of shiny given ocean like strong drink to your lungs. Work-aye, hard work-but who'd mind that at all? Sure, you worked under the sky and twas work wid skill and daring to it. And wid the day done, in the dog watch, smoking me pipe at ease, the lookout would be raising land maybe, and we'd see the mountains of South America wid the red fire of the setting sun painting their white tops and the clouds 60 floating by them! His tone of exaltation ceases. He goes on mournfully | Yerra, what's the use of talking? Tis a dead man's whisper $[To YANK recentfull \gamma]$ Twas them days men belonged to ships, not now 'Twas them days a ship was part of the sea and a man was part of a ship, and the sea joined all together and made it one [Scornfully] Is it one wid this you'd be, Yankblack smoke from the funnels smudging the sea, smudging the decks-the bloody engines pounding and throbbing and shaking-wid divil a sight of sun or a breath 20 of clean air-choking our lungs wid coal dust-breaking our backs and hearts in the hell of the stokchole--feeding the bloody furnace--feeding our lives along wid the coal, I'm thinking-caged in by steel from a sight of the sky like bloody apcs in the Zoo' [With a harsh laugh.] Ho-ho, divil mend you' Is it to belong to that you're wishing? Is it a flesh and blood wheel of the engines you'd be?

YANK [Who has been listening with a contemptuous tneer, harks out the answer] Sure ting! Dat's mc What 80 about 11?

PADDY [As if to himself—with great sorrow] Me time is past due. That a great wave wid sun in the heart of it may sweep me over the side sometime I'd be dreaming of the days that's gone!

YANK Aw, yuh crazy Mick! [He springs to his feet and advances on PADDY threateningly—then stops, fighting some queer struggle within himself—lets his hands

²² keen, a lamentation or dirge • 25 ochone, alos

fall to his sides-contemptuously.] Aw, take it easy Yuh're aw right at dat. Yuh're bugs, dat's all-nutty as a cuckoo. All dat tripe yuh been pullin'----Aw, dat's all right. On'y it's dead, get me? Yuh don't belong no more, see Yuh don't get de stuff Yuh're too old [Disgustedly.] But aw say, come up for air onct in a while, can't yuh? See what's happened since yuh croaked [He suddenly bursts forth vehemently, growing more and more excited | Say! Sure! Sure I meant 10 it! What de hell---- Say, lemme talk! Hey! Hey, you old Harp! Hey, youse guys! Say, listen to me-wait a moment-I gotter talk, see I belong and he don't He's dead but I'm livin'. Listen to me! Sure I'm part of de engines! Why de hell not! Dev move, don't dey? Dey're speed, ain't dey! Dey smash trou, don't dey? Twenty-five knots a hour! Dat's goin' some! Dat's new stuff! Dat belongs! But him, he's too old He gets dizzy Say, listen All dat crazy tripe about nights and days, all dat crazy tripe about stars and moons, all dat crazy tripe about 20 suns and winds, fresh air and de rest of it- Aw hell, dat's all a dope dream! Hittin' de pipe of de past, dat's what he's doin' He's old and don't belong no more But me, I'm young! I'm in de pink! I move wit it! It, get me' I mean de ting dat's de guts of all dis It ploughs trou all de tripe he's been sayin' It blows dat up! It knocks dat dead! It slams dat offen de face of de oith! It, get me! De engines and de coal and de smoke and all de rest of it! He can't breathe and swallow coal dust, but I kin, see? Dat's fresh air for me! Dat's food 30 for me¹ I'm new, get me² Hell in de stokehole² Sure! It takes a man to work in hell. Hell, sure, dat's my fav'rite climate. I eat it up! I git fat on it! It's me makes it hot! It's me makes it roar! It's me makes it move! Sure, on'y for me everyting stops. It all goes dead, get me? De noise and smoke and all de engines movin' de world. dey stop Dere ain't nothin' no more! Dat's what I'm sayın' Everyting else dat makes de woild move, somep'n makes it move It can't move witout somep'n else, see? Den yuh get down to me I'm at de bottom, get me! 40 Dere ain't nothin' foither I'm de end! I'm de start' I start somep'n and de world moves! It-dat's me!-de new dat's moiderin' de old! I'm de ting in coal dat makes it boin, I'm steam and oil for de engines, I'm de ting in noise dat makes yuh hear it; I'm smoke and express trains and steamers and factory whistles, I'm de ting in gold dat makes it money! And I'm what makes iron into steel! Steel, dat stands for de whole ting! And I'm steel-steel! I'm de muscles in steel, de punch behind it! [As he says this he pounds with his first against the steel bunks. All the men roused to a pitch of frenzied self-glorification by his speech, do likewise. There is a deafening metallic roat. through which YANK'S voice can be heard bellowing Slaves, hell! We run de whole works All de rich guys dat tink dev're somep'n, dev ain't nothin'! Dey don't belong But us guys, we're in de move, we're at de bottom, de whole ting is us! [PADDY from the start of YANK's speech has been taking one gulp after another from his bottle, at first frightenedly, as if he were afraid to listen, then desperately, as if to drown his senses, a but finally has achieved complete indifferent, even amused, drunkenness. YANK sees his lips moving. He quells the uproar with a shout.] Hey, youse guys, take it easy! Wait a moment! De nutty Harp is sayin' somep'n

PADDY. [Is heard now—throws his head back with a mocking burst of laughter.] Ho-ho-ho-ho-ho-

YANK. [Drawing back his fist, with a snarl.] Aw! Look out who yuh're givin' the bark!

PADDY. [Begins to sing the "Miller of Dee" with enormous good nature.]

"I care for nobody, no, not I, And nobody cares for me"

YANK. [Good-natured himself in a flath, interruption PADDY with a slap on the bare back like a report.] Dat's de stuff! Now yuh're gettin' wise to somep'n Care for nobody, dat's de dope! To hell wit 'em all! And nix on nobody else carin'. I kin care for myself, get me! [Eight bells sound, muffled, vibrating through the steel walls as if some enormous brazen gong were imbedded in the heart of the ship. All the men jump up mechanically, if through the door silently close upon each other's heels in what is very like a prisoners' lockstep. YANK slaps PADDY on the back.] Our watch, yid old Harp' [Mockingly.] Come on down in hell. Eat up de coal dust Drink in de heat It's it, see! Act like yuh liked it, yuh better—or croak yuhself PADDY. [With jovial defiance.] To the divil wid it! I'll not report this watch. Let thim log me and be damned I'm no slave the like of you. I'll be sittin' here at me ease, and drinking, and thinking, and dreaming dreams.

YANK [Contemptuously.] Tinkin' and dreamin'. what'll that get yuh? What's tinkin' got to do wit it?

We move, don't we? Speed, ain't it? Fog, dat's all you stand for But we drive trou dat, don't we? We split dat up and smash trou—twenty-five knots a hour! [Turns hit back on PADDY scornfully.] Aw, yuh make me sick! Yuh don't belong! [He strides out the door in rear. PADDY hums to himself, blinking drowsily.]

[Curtain]

SCENE II

SCENE Two days out. A section of the promenade deck Mildred Douglas and her aunt are discovered reclining in deck chairs. The former is a girl of twenty, slender, delicate, with a pale, pretty face marred by a self-conscious expression of disdainful superiority. She looks fretful, nervous, and discontented, bored by her own anemia. Her aunt is a pompous and proud—and fat—old lady. She is a type even to the point of a double chin and lorgnettes. She is dressed pretentiously, as if afraid her face alone would never indicate her position in life Mildred is dressed all in white.

The impression to be conveyed by this scene is one of the beautiful, vivid life of the sea all about—sunshine on the deck in a great flood, the fresh sea wind blowing across it. In the midst of this, these two incongruous, artificial figures, inert and disharmonious, the elder like a gray lump of dough touched up with rouge, the younger looking as if the vitality of her stock had been sapped before she was conceived, so that she is the expression not of its life energy but merely of the artificialities that energy had won for itself in the spending

MILDRED. [Looking up with affected dreaminess] How the black smoke swirls back against the sky! Is it not beautiful?

AUNT [Without looking up] I dislike smoke of any

MILDRED My great-grandmother smoked a pipe—a clay pipe.

AUNT. [Ruffling.] Vulgar

MILDRED. She was too distant a relative to be vulgar.

Time mellows pipes.

AUNT. [Pretending boredom but urritated] Did the sociology you took up at college teach you that—to play the ghoul on every possible occasion, excavating old bones? Why not let your great-grandmother rest in her grave? MILDRED. [Dreamsly.] With her pipe beside her-puffing in Paradise.

AUNT. [With spite.] Yes, you are a natural born ghoul. You are even getting to look like one, my dear

MILDRED. [In a passionless tone.] I detest you, Aunt [Looking at her critically.] Do you know what you remind me of? Of a cold pork pudding against a background of linoleum table loth in the kitchen of a—but the possibilities are wearisome [She closes her eyes.]

AUNT. [With a bitter laugh.] Merci for your candor 30 But since I am and must be your chaperon—in appearance, at least—let us patch up some sort of armed truce. For my part you are quite free to include any pose of eccentricity that beguiles you—as long as you observe the amenities—

MILDRED. [Drawling] The manities?

AUNT. [Going on at if the hadn't heard] After exhausting the morbid thrills of social service work on New York's East Side—how they must have hated you, by the way, the poor that you made so much poorer in at their own eyes'—you are now bent on making your slumming international Well, I hope Whitechapel will provide the needed nerve tonic. Do not ask me to chaperon you there, however. I told your father I would not. I loathe deformity. We will hire an aimy of detectives and you may investigate everything—they allow you to see.

MILDRED [Protesting with a trace of genuine earnestness] Please do not mock at my attempts to discover how the other half lives. Give me credit for some sort % of groping sincerity in that at least I would like to help them. I would like to be some use in the world Is it my fault I don't know how! I would like to be sincere, to touch life somewhere [With weary bitterness] But I'm afraid I have neither the vitality nor integrity. All that was burnt out in our stock before I was born. Grandfather's blast furnaces, flaming to the sky, melting steel, making millions-then father keeping those home fires burning, making more millionsand little me at the tail-end of it all. I'm a waste product 60 in the Bessemer piecess-like the millions. Or rather, I inherit the acquired trait of the by-product, wealth, but none of the energy, none of the strength of the steel

⁴² Whitechapel, a quarter of London just east of the city that made it. I am sired by gold and damned by it, as they say at the race track—damned in more ways than one [She laughs murthlessly.]

AUNT. [Unimpressed—supercisionsly.] You seem to be going in for sincerity to-day. It isn't becoming to you, really—except as an obvious pose. Be as artificial as you are, I advise. There's a sort of sincerity in that, you know. And, after all, you must confess you like that better

MILDRED. [Again affected and bored] Yes, I suppose 10 I do Pardon me for my outburst When a leopard complains of its spots, it must sound rather grotesque [In a mocking tone] Purr, little leopard Purr, scratch, tear, kill, gorge yourself and be happy—only stay in the jungle where your spots are camouflage. In a cage they make you conspicuous

AUNT I don't know what you are talking about MILDRED. It would be rude to talk about anything to you Let's just talk. [She looks at her wrist watch.]
Well, thank goodness, it's about time for them to come for me That ought to give me a new thrill, Aunt.

AUN1. [Affectedly troubled] You don't mean to say you're really going? The dirt—the heat must be frightful——

MILDRED. Grandfather started as a puddler. I should have inherited an immunity to heat that would make a salamander shiver. It will be fun to put it to the test AUNT. But don't you have to have the captain's—or someone's—permission to visit the stokehole?

MILDRED. [With a triumphant smile.] I have it—both 30 his and the chief engineer's Oh, they didn't want to at first, in spite of my social service credentials. They didn't seem a bit anxious that I should investigate how the other half lives and works on a ship So I had to tell them that my father, the president of Nazareth Steel, chairman of the board of directors of this line, had told me it would be all right

AUNT. He didn't

MILDRED. How naive age makes one! But I said he did, Aunt I even said he had given me a letter to them—which I had lost And they were afraid to take the chance that I might be lying [Excuedly] So it's ho! for the stokehole The second engineer is to escort me [Looking at her watch again] It's time. And here he comes, I think

[The SECOND ENGINEER enters. He is a husky, fine-looking man of thirty-five or so. He stops before the two and tips his cap, visibly embarrassed and ill-at-ease] SECOND ENGINEER. Miss Douglas?

MILDRED. Yes. [Throwing off her rugs and getting to her feet.] Are we all ready to start?

SECOND ENGINEER. In just a second, ma'am $1\mbox{'m}$ $\mbox{waiting}$ for the Fourth $\mbox{ He's coming along}$ MILDRED. [With a scornful smile] You don't care to shoulder this responsibility alone, is that it?

SECOND ENGINEER. [Forcing a smile] Two are better than one. [Disturbed by her eyes, glances out to sea-blurts out.] A fine day we're having

MILDRED. Is 1t?

SECOND ENGINEER. A nice warm breeze-

MILDRED. It feels cold to me

SECOND ENGINEER. But it's hot enough in the sun— MILDRED. Not hot enough for me I don't like Nature I was never athletic

SECOND ENGINEER. [Forcing a smile] Well, you'll find it hot enough where you're going

MILDRED. Do you mean hell?

SECOND ENGINEER. [Flabbergasted, decides to lawgh] Ho-ho! No, I mean the stokehole

 $\begin{tabular}{ll} \textbf{MILDRED.} & \textbf{My grandfather was a puddler} & \textbf{He played} \\ \textbf{with boiling steel} \end{tabular}$

SECOND ENGINEER. [All at sea—uneasily.] Is that so? Hum, you'll excuse me, ma'am, but are you intending to wear that dress?

MILDRED. Why not?

SECOND ENGINEER. You'll likely rub against oil and dirt. It can't be helped.

MILDRED. It doesn't matter I have lots of white dresses SECOND ENGINEER. I have an old coat you might throw over——

MILDRED. I have fifty dresses like this I will throw this one into the sea when I come back. That ought to wash it clean, don't you think?

SECOND ENGINEER. [Doggedly] There's ladders to climb down that are none too clean—and dark alleyways——

MILDRED. I will wear this very dress and none other SECOND ENGINEER. No offense meant It's none of my business I was only warning you——

MILDRED. Warning? That sounds thrilling

SECOND ENGINEER. [Looking down the deck—with a sigh of relief.] There's the Fourth now. He's waiting for us If you'll come—

MILDRED. Go on I'll follow you. [He goes. MILDRED turns a mocking smile on her aunt.] An oaf—but a hardsome, virile oaf.

AUNT [Scornfully.] Poser!

MILDRED. Take care He said there were dark alley-

AUNT. [In the same tone] Poser!

MILDRED [Biting her lips angrils] You are right But would that my millions were not so anemically chaste! AUNT. Yes, for a fresh pose I have no doubt you would drag the name of Douglas in the gutter!

MILDRED From which it sprang Goodby. Aunt Don't pray too hard that I may fall into the fiery turnace

AUNT. Poser'

MILDRED [Viciously.] Old hag! [She slaps her aunt insultingly across the face and walks off, laughing gayly.]

AUNT. [Screams after her.] I said poser!

[Curtain]

SCENE III

SCENE The stokehole In the rear, the dimly-outlined bulks of the furnaces and boilers. High overhead one hanging electric bulb sheds just enough light through the murky air laden with coal dust to pile up masses of shadows everywhere A line of men, stripped to the waist, is before the furnace doors. They bend over, looking neither to right nor left, handling their shovels as if they were part of their bodies, with a strange, awkward, swinging rhythm. They use the shovels to throw open the furnace doors. Then from these fiery round holes in the black a flood of terrific light and heat pours full upon the men who are outlined in silhouette in the crouching, inhuman attitudes of chained gorillas. The men shovel with a rhythmic motion, swinging as on a pivot from the coal which lies in heaps on the floor behind to hurl it into the flaming mouths before them There is a tumult of noisethe brazen clang of the furnace doors as they are flung open or slammed shut, the grating, teeth-gritting grind of steel against steel, of crunching coal. This clash of sounds stuns one's ears with its rending dissonance But there is order in it, rhythm, a mechanical regulated recurrence, a tempo And rising above all, making the air hum with the quiver of liberated energy, the roar of leaping flames in the furnaces, the monotonous throbbing beat of the engines

As the curtain rises, the furnace doors are shut. The men are taking a breathing spell. One or two are arranging the coal behind them, pulling it into more accessible heaps. The others can be dimly made out leaning on their shovels in relaxed attitudes of exhaustion.

PADDY [From somewhere in the line—plaintively.] Yerra, will this divils own watch nivir end? Me back is broke. I'm destroyed entirely

NANK [From the center of the line—with exuberant coin] Aw, vuh make me sick! Lie down and croak, why don't vuh? Always beefin, dats you! Say, dis is a cinch! Dis was made for me! Its my meat, get me! [A whithe is blown—a thin, shill note from somewhere overhead in the darkness YANK circle without resentment.] Dere's de damn engineer ciackin' de whip He tinks we're loafin

PADDY [Vindictively] God stiffen him!

YANK [In an exultant tone of command] Come on, 30 youse guys' Git into de game! She's gittin hungry! Pile some grub in her. Trow it into her belly! Come on now, all of youse! Open her up!

[At this last all the men, who have followed his movements of getting into position, throw open their furnace doors with a deafening clang. The fiery light floods over their shoulders as they bend round for the coal. Rivides of sooty sweat have traced maps on their backs. The enlarged muscles form bunches of high light and shadow.]

YANK. [Chanting a count as be shovels uithout seeming effort] Onc—two—tree——[His coice issing exultantly in the joy of battle] Dat's de stuff! Let her have it! All togedder now! Sling it into her! Let her ride! Shoot de piece now! Call de toin on her! Drive her into it! Feel her move! Watch her smoke! Speed, dat's her middle name! Give her coal, youse guys! Coal, dat's 40 her booze! Drink it up, baby! Let's see yuh sprint! Dig in and gain a lap! Dere she go-o-es [This last in the chanting formula of the gallery gods at the six-day bike race. He slams his furnace door shit. The others do likewise with as much unison as then weaved bodies will permit. The effect is of one fiery eye after another being blotted out with a series of accompanying bangt.]

PADDY [Groaning] Me back is broke I'm bate out—bate——

[There is a pause Then the inexciable whitle sounds again from the dim regions above the electric light.

There is a growl of cursing rage from all sides.

YANK. [Shaking his fist upward—contemptuously.] Take it easy dere, you! Who d'yuh tinks runnin' dis game, me or you? When I git ready, we move Not before! When I git ready, get me!

VOICES. [Approvingly.] That's the stuff!

Yank tal him, py golly!

Yank ain't afeerd

Goot poy, Yank!

Give him hell!

Tell 'im 'e's a bloody swine!

Bloody slave-driver!

YANK. [Contemptuously] He ain't got no noive He's yellow, get me? All de engineers is yellow. Dey got streaks a mile wide Aw, to hell wit him! Let's move, youse guys We had a rest Come on, she needs it! Give her pep! It ain't for him Him and his whistle, dey don't belong But we belong, see! We gotter feed de baby! Come on! [He turns and flings his furnace door open They all follow his lead. At this instant the SECOND 20 and FOURTH ENGINEERS enter from the darkness on the left with MILDRED between them. She starts, turns pales, her pose is crumbling, she shivers with fright in spite of the blazing heat, but forces herself to leave the ENGINEERS and take a few steps nearer the men She is right behind YANK. All this happens quickly while the men have their backs turned.]

YANK. Come on, youse guys! [He is turning to get coal when the whistle sounds again in a peremptory, irintating note. This drives YANK into a sudden fury. 30 While the other men have turned full around and stopped dumfounded by the spectacle of MILDRED standing there in her white dress, YANK does not turn far enough to see her. Besides, his head is thrown back, he blinks upward through the murk trying to find the owner of the whistle, he brandishes his shovel murderously over his head in one hand, pounding on his chest, gorilla-like, with the other, shouting] Toin off dat whistle! Come down outa dere, yuh yellow, brass-buttoned, Belfast bum, yuh! Come down and I'll knock yer brains out! 40 Yuh lousy, stinkin', yellow mut of a Catholic-moiderin' bastard! Come down and I'll moider yuh! Pullin' dat whistle on me, huh? I'll show yuh! I'll crash yer skull in! I'll drive yer teet' down yer troat! I'll slam yer nose trou de back of yer head! I'll cut yer guts out for a nickel, yuh lousy boob, yuh dirty, crummy, muck-earin son of a--- [Suddenly he becomes conscious of all the other men staring at something directly behind his back He whirls defensively with a snarling, murderous groul. crouching to spring, his lips drawn back over his teeth his small eyes gleaming ferociously. He sees MILDRED like a white apparition in the full light from the open furnace doors. He glares into her eyes, turned to stone As for her, during his speech she has listened, paralized with horror, terror, her whole personality crushed, beaten in, collapsed, by the terrific impact of this unknown, abysmal brutality, naked and shameless. As she looks at his gorilla face, as his eyes bore into hers, she utters a low, choking cry and shrinks away from him, putting both hands up before her eyes to shut out the sight of his face, to protect her own. This startles YANK to a 1e- 60 action. His mouth falls open, his eyes grow bewildered.]

MILDRED. [About to faint—to the ENGINEERS, who now have her one by each arm—whimperingly.] Take me away! Oh, the filthy beast! [She faints. They can; her quickly back, disappearing in the darkness at the left, rear. An iron door clangs shut. Rage and bewildered fury rush back on YANK. He feels himself insulted in some unknown fashion in the very heart of his pride He roars.] God damn yuh! [And burls his shovel after them at the door which has just closed. It hits the steel whilehead with a clang and falls clattering on the steel floor. From overhead the whistle sounds again in a long, angry, insistent command.]

[Curtain.]

SCENE IV

SCENE The firemen's forecastle Yank's watch has just come off duty and had dinner. Their faces and bodies shine from a soap and water scrubbing but around their eyes, where a hasty dousing does not touch, the coal dust sticks like black make-up, giving them a queer, sinister expression. Yank has not washed either face or body He stands out in contrast to them, a blackened, brooding figure. He is seated forward on a bench in the exact attitude of Rodin's "The Thinker." The others, most of them smoking pipes, are staring at Yank half-apprehensively, as if fearing an outburst; half-amusedly, as if they saw a joke somewhere that tickled them.

VOICES. He ain't ate nothin'.

Py golly, a fallar gat to gat grub in him. Divil a lie.

Yank feeda da fire, no feeda da face.

Ha-ha.

He ain't even washed hisself

He's forgot

Hey, Yank, you forgot to wash

YANK. [Sullenly.] Forgot nothin'! To hell wit washin' VOICES. It'll stick to you

It'll get under your skin.

Give yer the bleedin' itch, that's wot

It makes spots on you-like a leopard.

Like a piebald nigger, you mean

Better wash up, Yank

You sleep better

Wash up, Yank

Wash up! Wash up!

YANK. [Resentfully] Aw say, youse guys Lemme alone Can't youse see I'm tryin' to tink?

22 ALL. [Repeating the word after him as one with synical mockery.] Think! [The word has a brazen, metallic quality as if their throats were phonograph horn. It is followed by a choins of hard, barking laughter.]

YANK. [Springing to his feet and glaring at them belligerently.] Yes, tink! Tink, dat's what I said What about it? [They are silent, puzzled by his sudden resentment at what used to be one of his jokes YANK sits down again in the same attitude of "The Thinker"]

VOICES. Leave him alone

He's got a grouch on

Why wouldn't he?

PADDY. [With a wink at the others] Sure I know what's the matther 'Tis aisy to see He's fallen in love, I'm telling you

ALL. [Repeating the word after him as one with cynical mockery.] Love! [The word has a brazen, metallic quality as if their throats were phonograph horns. It is followed by a chorus of hard, barking laughter.]

YANK. [With a contemptuous snort] Love, hell! Hate, & dat's what. I've fallen in hate, get me?

PADDY. [Philosophically.] 'Twould take a wise man to tell one from the other [With a bitter, ironical scorn, increasing as he goes on] But I'm telling you it's love that's in it. Sure what else but love for us poor bastes in the stokehole would be bringing a fine lady, dressed like a white quane, down a mile of ladders and steps to be havin' a look at us?

[A growl of anger goes up from all sides.]

LONG. [Jumping on a bench-hecticly.] Hinsultin' us! Hinsultin' us, the bloody cow! And them bloody engineers! What right 'as they got to be exhibitin' us 's if 50 we was bleedin' monkeys in a menagerie? Did we sign for hinsults to our dignity as 'onest workers? Is that in the ship's articles? You kin bloody well bet it ain't! But I knows why they done it I arsked a deck steward 'o she was and 'e told me 'Er old man's a bleedin' millionaire, a bloody Capitalist! 'E's got enuf bloody gold to sink this bleedin' ship! 'E makes arf the bloody steel in the world! 'E owns this bloody boat! And you and me. Comrades, we're 'is slaves! And the skipper and mates and engineers they're 'is slaves' And she's 'is 60 bloody daughter and we're all 'er slaves, too' And she gives 'er orders as 'ow she wants to see the bloody animals below decks and down they takes 'er'

[There is a roar of rage from all sides]

YANK [Blinking at him bewilderedly] Say! Wait a moment! Is all dat straight goods?

LONG. Straight as string! The bleedin' steward as waits on 'em, 'e told me about 'er. And what're we goin' ter do, I arsks yer? 'Ave we got ter swaller 'er hinsults like dogs? It ain't in the ship's articles. I tell yer we got a case. We kin go to law——

YANK. [With abysmal contempt] Hell! Law!

ALL. [Repeating the word after him as one with cynical mockery] Law! [The word has a brazen metallic quality as if their throats were phonograph horns. It is followed by a chorus of hard, barking laughter.]

LONG. [Feeling the ground slipping from under his feet—desperately] As voters and citizens we kin force the bloody governments—

YANK. [With abysmal contempt.] Hell! Governments!

ALL. [Repeating the word after him as one with cynical 80 mockery.] Governments! [The word has a brazen metallic quality as if their throats were ph nograph horns

It is followed by a chorus of hard, barking laughter]
LONG. [Hysterically] We're free and equal in the sight of God——

YANK, [With abysmal contempt.] Hell! God!

²⁸ The Thinker, the famous statue by Auguste Rodin (1840-1917), a French sculptor

ALL. [Repeating the word after him as one with cynical mockery.] God! [The word has a brazen metallic quality as if their throats were phonograph horns. It is followed by a chorus of hard, barking laughter.]

YANK. [Witheringly.] Aw, join de Salvation Army!
ALL. Sit down! Shut up! Damn fool! Sea-lawyer!
[LONG slinks back out of sight.]

PADDY. [Continuing the trend of his thoughts as if he had never been interrupted—bitterly.] And there she was standing behind us, and the Second pointing at 10 us like a man you'd hear in a circus would be saying. In this cage is a queerer kind of baboon than ever you'd find in darkest Africy. We roast them in their own sweat—and be damned if you won't hear some of thim saying they like it! [He glances scornfully at YANK]

YANK. [With a bewildered uncertain growl.] Aw!

PADDY. And there was Yank roarin' curses and turning round wid his shovel to brain her—and she looked at him, and him at her——

YANK. [Slowly] She was all white $\,$ I tought she was .0 a ghost Sure

PADDY. [With heavy, biting sarcasm] 'Twas love at first sight, divil a doubt of it! If you'd seen the endearin' look on her pale mug when she shriveled away with her hands over her eyes to shut out the sight of him! Sure. 'twas as if she'd seen a great hairy ape escaped from the Zoo!

YANK. [Stung—with a growl of rage] Aw!

PADDY. And the loving way Yank heaved his shovel at the skull of her, only she was out the door! [A grin breaking over his face.] Twas touching, I'm telling you! It put the touch of home, swate home in the stokehole [There is a roas of laughter from all.]

YANK. [Glaring at PADDY menacingly.] Aw, choke dat off, see!

PADDY. [Not beeding bim—to the others.] And her grabbin' at the Second's arm for protection [With a grotesque imitation of a woman's voice.] Kiss me, Engineer dear, for it's dark down here and me old man's in Wall Street making money! Hug me tight, darlin', for I'm afeerd in the dark and me mother's on deck makin' eyes at the skipper!

[Another roar of laughter.]

YANK. [Threateningly.] Say! What yuh tryin' to do, kid me, yuh old Harp?

PADDY. Divil a bit! Ain't I wishin' myself you'd brained her?

YANK. [Fiercely] III brain her! I'll brain her vet wait 'n' see! [Coming over to PADDY—slowly.] Sat is dat what she called me—a hairy ape?

PADDY. She looked it at you if she didn't say the word itself

YANK. [Grinning horribly] Hairy ape, huh? Sure! Dat's de way she looked at me, aw right Hairy ape' So dat's me, huh? [Bursting into rage—as if she were still in front of him.] Yuh skinny tart! Yuh whitefaced bum, yuh' I'll show yuh who's a ape' [Turning to the others, bewilderment seizing him again.] Say, youse guys I was bawlin' him out for pullin' de whistle on us You heard me And den I seen youse lookin' at somep'n and I tought he'd sneaked down to come up in back of me, and I hopped round to knock him dead wit de shovel And dere she was wit de light on her! Christ yuh coulda pushed me over with a finger! I was scared, get me? Sure! I tought she was a ghost, see She was all in white like dey wrap around stiffs You seen her Kin yuh blame me? She didn't belong, dats what And den when I come to and seen it was a real skoit and seen de way she was lookin' at me-like Paddy said-Christ, I was sore, get me? I don't stand for dat stuff from nobody And I flung de shovel-on v she'd beat it [Furiously] I wished it'd banged her' I wished it'd knocked her block off!

LONG And be 'anged for murder or 'lectrocuted' She ain't bleedin' well worth it

YANK I don't give a damn what' Id be square with her, wouldn't I? Tink I wanter let her put somep'n over on me? Tink I'm goin' to let her git away wit dat stuff? Yuh don't know me! No one ain't never put nothin over on me and got away wit it, see!—not dat kind of stuff—no guy and no skoit neither! I'll fix her! Maybe she'll come down again—

VOICE No chance, Yank You scared her out of a year's growth

Who de hell is she? Ain't she de same as me? Hairy ape huh? [With his old confident bravado] I'll show her I'm better'n her, if she on'y knew it I belong and she don't, see! I move and she's dead! Twenty-five knots a hour, dat's me! Dat carries her but I make dat. She's on'y baggage. Sure! [Again bewilderedly.] But, Christ she was funny lookin!! Did yuh pipe her hands? White and skinny. Yuh could see de bones trough 'em. And her mish, dat was dead white, too. And her eyes, dev was like dey'd seen a ghost Me, dat was! Sure! Hairy ane! Ghost, huh? Look at dat arm! [He extends his right arm, swelling out the great muscles.] I could took her wit dat, wit just my little finger even, and broke her in two [Again bewilderedly.] Say, who is dat skort, huh? What is she? What's she come from? Who made her? Who give her de noive to look at me like dat? Dis ting's got my goat right. I don't get her. She's new to me What does a skoit like her mean, huh? She don't belong, get me! I can't see her. [With growing anger.] But one ting I'm wise to, aw right, aw right! Youse all kin bet your shoits I'll get even wit her I'll show her if she tinks she--- She grinds de organ and I'm on de string, huh? I'll fix her! Let her come Jown again and I'll fling her in de furnace! She'll move den! She won't shiver at nothin', den! Speed, dat il be her! She'll belong den! [He grins horribly]

PADDY She'll never come She's had her belly-full, I'm telling you She'll be in bed now. I'm thinking, wid ten doctors and nurses feedin' her salts to clean the fear out of her

YANK [Enraged] Yuh tink I made her sick, too, do yuh? Just lookin' at me, huh? Hairy ape, huh? [In a frenzy of rage] I'll fix her! I'll tell her where to git off! She ll git down on her knees and take it back or I'll bust de face offen her! [Shaking one fist upu and and beating on his cheet with the other.] I'll find yuh! I'm comin', dyuh hear? I'll fix yuh, God damn yuh! [He makes a with for the door]

VOICES. Stop him!

He'll get shot!

He'll murder her

Trip him up!

Hold him!

He's gone crazy!

Gott, he's strong!

Hold him down'

Look out for a kick!

Pin his arms!

[They have all piled on him and, after a fierce struggle, by sheer weight of numbers have born, him to the floor sust inside the door]

PADDY [Who has remained detached.] Kape him down till he's cooled off. [Scornfully.] Yerra, Yank, vou're a great fool. Is it payin' attention at all you are to the like of that skinny sow widout one drop of rale blood in her?

YANK [Frenziedly, from the bottom of the heap.] She done me doit! She done me doit, didn't she? I'll git square wit her! I'll get her some way! Git offen me, youse guys! Lemme up! I'll show her who's a ape! [Curtain]

SCENE V

SCENE Three weeks later A corner of Fifth Avenue in the Fifties on a fine Sunday morning. A general atmosphere of clean, well-tidied, wide street, a flood of mellow, tempered sunshine, gentle, genteel breezes. In the rear, the show windows of two shops, a jewelry establishment on the corner, a furrier's next to it. Here the adornments of extreme wealth are tantalizinally displayed. The leweler's window is gaudy with alittering diamonds, emeralds, rubies, pearls, etc., fashioned in ornate tiaras, crowns. necklaces, collars, etc From each piece hangs an enormous tag from which a dollar sign and numerals in intermittent electric lights wink out the incredible prices The same in the furrier's Rich furs of all varieties hand there bathed in a downpour of artificial light. The general effect is of a background of magnificence cheapened and made grotesque by commercialism, a background in tawdry disharmony with the clear light and sunshine on the street itself

Up the side street Yank and Long come swaggering Long is dressed in shore clothes, wears a black Windsor tie, cloth cap Yank is in his dirty dungarees. A fireman's cap with black peak is cocked defiontly on the side of his head. He has not shaved for days and around his fierce, resentful eyes—as around those of Long to a lesser degree—the black smudge of coal dust still sticks like make-up. They hesitate and stand together at the corner, swaggering, looking about them with a forced, defiant contempt

LONG [Indicating it all with an oral rical gesture] 50 Well, 'ere we are Fif Avenoo This 'ere's their bleedin' private lane, as yer might say [Bitterly.] We're trespassers 'ere. Proletarians keep orf the grass'

YANK [Dully.] I don't see no grass, yuh boob [Staring at the sidewalk.] Clean, ain't it? Yuh could eat a fried egg offen it. The white wings got some job sweepin' dis up. [Looking up and down the avenue—surlily.] Where's all de white-collar stiffs yuh said was here—and de skoits—her kind?

LONG. In church, blarst 'em! Arskin' Jesus to give 'em more money.

YANK. Choich, huh? I useter go to choich onct—sure—when I was a kid Me old man and woman, dey made me Dey never went demselves, dough. Always got too big a head on Sunday mornin', dat was dem [With a grin.] Dey was scrappers for fair, bot of dem. On Satiday nights when dey bot got a skinful dey could put up a bout oughter been staged at de Garden. When dey got trough dere wasn't a chair or table wit a leg under it. Or else dey bot jumped on me for somep'n. Dat was where I loined to take punishment. [With a grin and a swagger.] I'm a chip offen de old block, get me?

LONG. Did yer old man follow the sea?

yank. Naw Worked along shore I runned away when me old lady croaked wit de tremens. I helped at truckin and in de market Den I shipped in de stokehole Sure Dat belongs De rest was nothin [Looking around him.] I ain't never seen dis before De Brooklyn waterfront, dat was where I was dragged up. [Taking a deep breath.] Dis ain't so bad at dat, huh?

LONG. Not bad? Well, we pays for it wiv our bloody sweat, if yer wants to know!

YANK. [With sudden angry disgust.] Aw, hell! I don't see no one, see—like her. All dis gives me a pain It don't belong Say, ain't dere a back room around so dis dump? Let's go shoot a ball. All dis is too clean and quiet and dolled-up, get me! It gives me a pain

LONG Wait and yer'll bloody well see-

YANK. I don't wait for no one I keep on de move Say, what yuh drag me up here for, anyway? Tryin' to kid me, yuh simp, yuh?

LONG. Yer wants to get back at 'er, don't yer? That's what yer been sayin' every bloomin' hour since she hinsulted yer

YANK. [Vehemently.] Sure ting I do! Didn't I sneak on de dock and wait for her by de gangplank? I was goin' to spit in her pale mug, see! Sure, right in her pop-eyes! Dat woulda made me even, see? But no chanct. Dere was a whole army of plain-clothes bulls around. Dey spotted me and gimme de bum's rush. I never seen her. But I'll git square wit her yet, you watch! [Furrously.] De lousy tart! She tinks she kin get away wit moider—but not wit me! I'll fix her! I'll tink of a way!

LONG. [As disgusted as be dares to be.] Ain't that why I brought yer up 'ere—to show yer? Yer been lookin' at this 'ere 'ole affair wrong Yer been actin' an' talkin' 's if it was all a bleedin' personal matter between yer and that bloody cow I wants to convince yer she was on'y a representative of 'er clarss I wants to awaken yer bloody clarss consciousness. Then yer'll see it's 'er clarss yer've got to fight, not 'er alone. There's a 'ole mob of 'em like 'er, Gawd blind 'em'

YANK. [Spitting on his hands—belligerently.] De more de merrier when I gits started Bring on de gang'

LONG. Yer'll see 'em in aff a mo', when that church lets out. [He turns and sees the window display in the two stores for the first time.] Blimey! Look at that will yer? [They both walk back and stand looking in the jeweler's. LONG flies into a fury.] Just look at this 'ere bloomin' mess! Just look at it! Look at the bleedin' prices on 'em—more'n our 'ole bloody stokehole makes in ten voyages sweatin' in 'ell' And they—'er and 'er bloody clarss—buys 'em for toys to dangle on 'em' One of these 'ere would buy scoff for a starvin' family for a year'

YANK. Aw, cut de sob stuff! T' hell wit de starvin' family! Yuh'll be passin' de hat to me next. [With nawe admiration.] Say, dem tings is pretty, huh? Bet yuh dey'd hock for a piece of change aw right. [Then turning away, bored.] But, aw hell, what good are dev? Let her have 'em Dey don't belong no more'n she does [With a gesture of sweeping the jewelers into oblivion] All dat don't count, get me?

nantly.] And I s'pose this 'ere don't count neither—skins of poor, 'armless animals slaughtered so as 'er and 'ers can keep their bleedin' noses warm!

YANK. [Who has been staring at something inside—with queer excitement.] Take a slant at dat! Give it de once-over! Monkey fur—two t'ousand bucks! [Bewilderedly.] Is dat straight goods—monkey fur? What de hell——?

LONG. [Bitterly.] It's straight enuf. [With grim. humor] They wouldn't bloody well pay that for a 'air' ape's skin—no, nor for the 'ole livin' ape with all 'is 'ead, and body, and soul thrown in!

YANK. [Clenching his fists, his face growing pale with rage as if the skin in the window were a personal misult.] Trowin' it up in my face! Christ! I'll fix her!

LONG. [Excitedly.] Church is out. 'Ere they come, the bleedin' swine. [After a glance at YANK's lowering face—uneasily.] Easy goes, Comrade. Keep yer bloomin' temper. Remember force defeats itself. It ain't our weapon. We must impress our demands through peaceful means—the votes of the on-marching proletarians of the bloody world!

YANK. [With abysmal contempt.] Votes, hell' Votes is a joke, see Votes for women! Let dem do it!

LONG. [Still more uneasily.] Calm, now Treat 'em wiv the proper contempt. Observe the bleedin' parasites but 'old yer 'orses YANK. [Angrily] Git away from me! Yuh're yellow, dat's what. Force, dat's me! De punch, dat's me every time, see!

[The crowd from church enter from the right, sauntering slowly and affectedly, their heads held stiffly up, looking neither to right nor left, talking in toneless simpering voices. The women are rouged, calcimined dyed, over-dressed to the nth degree The men are in Prime Alberts, high hats, spats, canes, etc. A procession of gandy marionettes, yet with something of the relentless horror of Frankensteins in their detached, mechanical unawareness.]

VOICES. Dear Doctor Caraphas' He is so sincere'
What was the sermon? I dozed off

About the radicals, my dear—and the false doctrines that are being preached

We must organize a hundred per cent American bazaar

And let everyone contribute one one-hundredth per cent of their income tax

What an original idea'

We can devote the proceeds to rehabilitating the veil of the temple.

But that has been done so many times

YANK. [Glaring from one to the other of them—with an insulting snort of scorn.] Huh' Huh'

[Without seeming to see him they make wide detours to avoid the spot where he stands in the middle of the sidewalk]

LONG. [Frightenedly.] Keep yer bloomin' mouth shut, I tells yer.

YANK. [Viciously.] G'wan! Tell it to Sweeney! [He swaggers away and deliberately lurches into a top-hatted gentleman, then glares at him pugnaciously] Say, who d'yuh tink yuh're bumpin? Tink yuh own de oith?

GENTLEMAN. [Coldly and affectedly.] 1 beg your pardon. [He has not leoked at YANK and passes on without a glance, leaving him bewildered]

LONG. [Rushing up and grabbing YANKS aim]
Ere! Come away! This wasn't what I meant. Yer'll ave the bloody coppers down on us

YANK [Satagely—giving him a push that sends him sprawling] G'wan'

LONG. [Picks himself up—hysterically] Ill pop orf then This ain't what I meant. And whatever 'appens, yer can't blame me. [He slinks off left]

YANK T' hell wit youse! [He approaches a lady sc -with a vicious grin and a smirking wink.] Hello, Kiddo How's every little ting? Got anyting on for to-night? I know an old boiler down to de docks we kin crawl into [The lady stalks by without a look, without a change of pace YANK turns to others-insultingly] Holy smokes, what a mug! Go hide yuhself before de horses shy at yuh. Gee, pipe de heine on dat one! Say, youse, yuh look like de stoin of a ferryboat Paint and powder! All dolled up to kill! Yuh look like stiffs laid out for de boneyard! Aw, g'wan, 60 de lot of youse! Yuh give me de eye-ache. Yuh don't belong, get me' Look at me, why don't youse dare? I belong, dat's me' [Pointing to a skyscraper across the street which is in process of construction—with bravado] See dat building goin' up dere? See de steel work? Steel, dat's me' Youse guys live on it and tink yuh re somep n But I'm in it, see! I'm de hoistin' engine dat makes it go up! I'm it-de inside and bottom of it! Sure! I'm steel and steam and smoke and de rest of it! It moves -speed- twenty-five stories up-and me at de top and 70 bottom-movin'! Youse simps don't move Yuh're on'y dolls I winds up to see 'm spin. Yuh're de garbage, get me—de leavins—de ashes we dump over de side! Now, what 'a' yuh gotta say' But as they seem neither to see not bear him he flies into a fury | Bums' Pigs' Tarts'

Frunkensteins The author means Frankenstein's monsters," from the monster created by Frankenstein in Mrs Shelley's novel of that name. "The blunder," says H. W. Fowler in Modern English Usage, is very common indeed, almost, but surely not quite, sanctioned by custom.

Bitches! [He turns in a rage on the men, bumping viciously into them but not jarring them the least bit. Rather it is he who recoils after each collision. He keeps growling.] Git off de oith! G'wan, yuh bum! Look where yuh're goin', can't yuh? Git outa here! Fight, why don't yuh? Put up yer mits! Don't be a dog! Fight or I'll knock yuh dead! [But, without seeming to see him, they all answer with mechanical affected politeness.] I beg your pardon [Then at a cry from one of the women, they all scurry to the furrier's window.]

THE WOMAN [Lestatically, with a gasp of delight.] Monkey fur! [The whole crowd of men and women chorus after her in the same tone of affected delight.] Monkey fur!

YANK [With a jerk of his head back on his shoulders, as if he had received a punch full in the face—raging.] I see yuh, all in white! I see yuh, yuh white-faced tart, yuh! Hairy ape, huh? I'll hairy ape yuh! [He bends down and grips at the street curbing as if to pluck it so out and hurl it Foiled in this, snarling with passion, he leaps to the lamp-post on the corner and tries to pull it up for a club. Just at that moment a bus is heard rumbling up. A fat, high-hatted, spatted genileman runs out from the side street. He calls out plaintively.] Bus! Bus! Stop there! [And runs full tilt into the bending, straining YANK, who is bowled off his balance.]

YANK. [Seeing a fight—with a roar of joy as he opings to his feet.] At last! Bus, huh? I'll bust yuh! [He lets drive a terrific swing, his fist landing full on 30 the fat gentleman's face. But the gentleman stands unmoved as if nothing had happened.]

GENTIEMAN I beg your pardon [Then stritably.] You have made me lose my bus [He claps his hands and begins to scream:] Officer! Officer!

[Many police whistles shrill out on the instant and a whole platoon of policemen rush in on YANK from all sides. He tries to fight but is clubbed to the pavement and fallen upon The crowd at the window have not moved or noticed this disturbance. The clanging gong of the patrol wagon approaches with a clamoring din.] [Curtain.]

SCENE VI

SCENE. Night of the following day. A row of cells in the prison on Blackwell's Island The cells extend back diagonally from right front to left rear. They do not stop, but disappear in the dark background as if they ran on, numberless, into infinity. One electric bulb from the low ceiling of the narrow corridor sheds its light through the heavy steel bars of the cell at the extreme front and reveals part of the interior. Yank can be seen within, crouched on the edge of his cot in the attitude of Rodin's "The Thinker." His face is spotted with black and blue bruises. A blood-stained bandage is wrapped around his head.

YANK. [Suddenly starting as if awakening from a dream, reaches out and shakes the bars—aloud to himself, wonderingly] Steel Dis is de Zoo, huh? [A burst of hard, barking laughter comes from the unseen occupants of the cells, runs back down the tier, and abruptly ceases]

VOICES. [Mockingly.] The Zoo? That's a new name for this coop—a damn good name!

Steel, eh² You said a mouthful This is the old iron house

Who is that boob talkin'?

He's the bloke they brung in out of his head The bulls had beat him up fierce

YANK. [Dully.] I musta been dreamin'. I tought I was in a cage at de Zoo—but de apes don't talk, do deyvoolces [With mocking laughter.] You're in a cage aw right

A coop!

A pen!

A sty!

A kennel [Hard laughter-a pause.]

Say, guy! Who are you? No, never mind lying What are you?

Yes, tell us your sad story. What's your game?

What did they jug yuh for?

YANK. [Dully.] I was a fireman—stokin' on de liners [Then with sudden rage, ratiling his cell bars.] I'm a hairy ape, get me? And I'll bust youse all in de jaw if yuh don't lay off kiddin' me

VOICES. Huh! You're a hard boiled duck, ain't you! When you spit, it bounces! [Laughter.]

Aw, can it. He's a regular guy Ain't you?

What did he say he was-a ape?

YANK. [Defiantly.] Sure ting! Ain't dat what youse all are—apes? [A silence. Then a furious rattling of bars from down the corridor.]

1012 O'Nesll

A VOICE. [Thick with rage.] I'll show yuh who's a ape, yuh bum!

VOICES. Ssshh! Nix! Can de noise!

Piano!

You'll have the guard down on us'

YANK. [Scornfully.] De guard? Yuh mean de keeper, don't yuh? [Angry exclamations from all the cells.]

VOICE. [Placatingly.] Aw don't pay no attention to him. He's off his nut from the beatin'-up he got Say, you guy! We're waitin' to hear what they landed you for—or ain't yuh tellin'?

YANK. Sure, I'll tell youse Sure! Why de hell not? On'y—youse won't get me Nobody gets me but me see? I started to tell de Judge and all he says was "Toity days to tink it over" Tink it over! Christ, dat's all I been doin' for weeks! [After a paure] I was tryin' to git even wit someone see?—someone dat done me doit VOICES [Cynically] De old stuff, I bet Your goil, hub?

Give yuh the double-cross, huh?

That's them every time'

Did yuh beat up de odder guy?

YANK. [Disgustedly:] Aw, yuh're all wrong! Sure dere was a skoit in it—but not what youse mean, not dat old tripe. Dis was a new kind of skoit. She was dolled up all in white—in de stokehole. I tought she was a ghost. Sure. [A pause.]

VOICES [Whispering] Gee, he's still nutty

Let him rave It's fun listenin'

YANK. [Unheeding-groping in his thoughts.] Her hands-dey was skinny and white like dey wasn't real but painted on somep'n. Dere was a million miles from me to her-twenty-five knots a hour She was like some dead ting de cat brung in Sure, dat's what She didn't belong She belonged in de window of a toy store, or on de top of a garbage can, see! Sure! [He breaks out angrely.] But would yuh believe it, she had de noive to do me doit. She lamped me like she was 40 seein' somep'n broke loose from de menagerie Christ, yuh'd oughter seen her eyes' [He rattles the bars of his cell furiously] But I'll get back at her yet, you watch! And if I can't find her I'll take it out on de gang she runs wit I'm wise to where dey hangs out now. I'll show her who belongs' I'll show her who's in de move and who ain't You watch my smoke!

VOICES [Serious and joking.] Dat's de talkin'!
Take her for all she's got'

What was this dame, anyway? Who was she, eh? YANK I dunno First cabin stiff. Her old man's a 50 millionaire, dey says—name of Douglas.

VOICES Douglas² That's the president of the Steel Trust. I bet

Sure I seen his mug in de papers

He's filthy with dough

VOICE Hey, teller take a up from me. If you want to get back at that dame, you better join the Wobblies You'll get some action then YANK Wobblies? What de hell's dat?

VOICE Ain't you ever heard of the I W W?

YANK Naw What is it?

VOICE: A gang of blokes—a tough gang. I been readin' about 'em to-day in the paper. The guard give me the Sunday Times. There's a long spiel about 'em. It's from a speech made in the Schate by a guy named. Senator Queen. [He is in the cell next to YANK's. There is a rustling of paper.] Wait'll I see if I got light enough and I'll read you. Listen. [He reads.] "There is a menace existing in this country to-day which threatens the vitals of our fair Republic—as foul a menace against the very rollite-blood of the American Eagle as was the foul conspiracy of Catiline against the eagles of ancient Rome!" VOICE. [Disguistedly.] Aw. hell! Tell him to salt de tail of dat eagle!

VOICE [Reading] "I refer to that devil's brew of rascals, jailbirds, murderers and cut-throats who libel all honest workinginen by calling themselves the Industrial Workers of the World, but in the light of their nefarious plots, I call them the Industrious Wreckers of the World!"

YANK [With vengeful satisfaction.] Wreckers, dat's de right dope! Dat belongs! Me for dcm!

VOICE Ssshh! [Reading] "This ficindish organization is a foul ulcer on the fair body of our Democracy——"

VOICE Democracy, hell! Give him the boid, fellers—the raspberry! [They do.]

VOICE Ssshh! [Reading.] "Like Cato I say to this Senate, the I W W. must be destroyed! For they repre-

ALL [With abysmal scorn.] Aw, hell!

voice Give that Queen Senator guy the bark! All togedder now—one—two—tree—— [A terrific chorus of barking and yapping]

GUARD [From a distance] Quiet there youse—or I'll git the hose [The noise subsides.]

Senator guy alone for a second. I'd loin him some trute!

VOICE. Ssshh! Here's where he gits down to cases on the Wobblies. [Reads:] "They plot with fire in one hand and dynamite in the other. They stop not before murder to gain their ends, nor at the outraging of defenseless womanhood. They would tear down society, put the lowest scum in the seats of the mighty, turn Almighty God's revealed plan for the world topsytury, and make of our sweet and lovely civilization a shambles, a desolation where man, God's misterpiece would soon degenerate back to the ape!"

VOICE. [To YANK] Hey, you guy There's your ape stuff again.

YANK. [With a growl of fury] I got him. So dey blow up tings, do dey? Dey turn tings round, do dey?

40 Hey, lend me dat paper, will yuh?

VOICE. Sure. Give it to him On'y keep it to yourself, see. We don't wanter listen to no more of that slop VOICE. Here you are. Hide it under your mattress YANK. [Reaching out.] Tanks. I can't read much but I kin manage [He sits, the paper in the hand at his vide, in the attitude of Rodin's "The Thinker"
A pause, Several mores from down the corridor. Suddenly YANK jumps to his feet with a furious groan as if some appalling thought had crashed on him-bewilderedly | Sure—her old man—president of de Steel Trust-makes half de steel in de world-steel-where I tought I belonged—drivin' trou-movin'-in datto make her-and cage me in for her to spit on! Christ' [He shakes the bars of his cell door till the whole tier trembles. Irritated, protesting exclamations from those awakened or trying to get to sleep.] He made disdis cage! Steel! It don't belong, dat's what! Cages, cells, locks, bolts, bars-dat's what it means!-holdin' me down wit him at de top! But I'll drive trou! File. dat melts it! Ill be fire-under de heap-fire dat never . goes out-hot as hell-breakin' out in de night-While he has been saying this last he has shaken his cell door to a clanging accompaniment. As he comes to the "breakin' out" he seizes one bar with both hands and, putting his two feet up against the others so that his position is parallel to the floor like a monkey's, he gives a great wiench backwards. The bar bends like a licorice stick under his tremendous strength. Just at this moment the PRISON GUARD rushes in, dragging a hose hehind him]

GUARD [Angril] I II loin youse bums to wake me up' [Sees YANK] Hello, it's you, huh? Got the D Ts, hey? Well, I'll cure 'em. I'll drown your snakes for yuh' [Noucing the bai.] Hell, look at dat bar bended! On'y a bug is strong enough for dat!

YANK. [Glaring at him] Or a hairy ape, yuh big yellow bum' Look out! Here I come! [He grabs another bar] GUARD [Scared now—yelling off left.] Toin de hose on, Ben!—full pressure! And call de others—and a strattjacket! [The curian is falling. As it hides YANK from view, there is a splattering smash as the stream of unter hits the steel of YANK's cell.]

SCENE VII

SCENE Nearly a month later An I W W. local near the waterfront, showing the interior of a front room on the ground floor, and the street outside Moonlight on the narrow street, buildings massed in black shadow. The interior of the room, which is general assembly room, office, and reading-room, resembles some dingy settlement boys' club. A desk and high stool are in one corner. A table with papers, stacks of pamphlets, chairs about it, is at center. The whole is decidedly cheap, banal, commonplace, and unmysterious as a room could well be The secretary is perched on the stool making entries in a large ledger. An eye shade casts his face into shadows Eight or ten men, longshoremen, iron workers, and the like, are grouped about the table. Two are playing checkers. One is writing a letter. Most of them are smoking pipes. A big signboard is on the wall at the rear, Industrial Workers of the World—Local No. 57.

[YANK comes down the street outside He is dressed as in Scene Five. He moves cautiously, mysteriously. He comes to a point opposite the door, tiptocs sofily up to it, listens, is improved by the silence within, knocks carefully, as if he were guessing at the password to som, secret rite. Listens, No answer Knocks again a bit londer No answer. Knocks impatiently, much londer.

SECRETARY. [Turning around on his stool | What the hell is that—someone knocking? [Shorts] Come in, why don't you? [All the men in the room look up. YANK opens the door slowly, gingerly, as if afraid of an ambush He looks around for secret doors, mystery, is taken aback by the commonplaceness of the room and the men in it, thinks he may base gotten in the wrong place, then sees the signboard on the wall and is reassured]

YANK [Blurts out] Hello

MEN. [Reserredly] Hello

YANK. [More easily] I tought I'd bumped into de wrong dump

SECRETARY [Scrutinizing him carefully] Maybe you have Are you a member*

YANK Naw, not yet Dat's what I come for—to join SECRETARY. That's easy What's your job—longshore? YANK. Naw. Fireman—stoker on de liners

SECRETARY. [With satisfaction] Welcome to our city Glad to know you people are waking up at last We haven't got many members in your line

YANK. Naw Dey're all dead to de world

SECRETARY. Well, you can help to wake 'em What's your name? I'll make out your card

YANK. [Confused.] Name? Lemme tink

SECRETARY. [Sharply.] Don't you know your own name?

YANK. Sure, but I been just Yank for so long—Bob, dat's it—Bob Smith.

SECRETARY. [Writing] Robert Smith [Fills out the 30 rest of card.] Here you are Cost you half a dollar

YANK Is dat all—four bits? Dat's easy. [Gwes the Secretary the money.]

SECRETARY. [Throwing it in drauer.] Thanks Well, make yourself at home. No introductions needed There's lirerature on the table. Take some of those pamphlets with you to distribute aboard ship. They may bring results. Sow the seed, only go about it right. Don't get caught and fired. We got plenty out of work. What we need its men who can hold their jobs—and work for us at the same time.

YANK Sure [But he still stands, embarrassed and hincass]

SECRETARY [Looking at ham--entropy]. What did you knock for? Think we had a coon in uniform to open doors?

YANK Naw I cought it was locked—and dat yuh'd wanter give me the once over trou a peep-hole or somep n to see if I was right

SECRETARY [Alert and visipicious but with an easy laugh.] Think we were running a crap game? That door is never locked. What put that in your nut?

YANK [With a knowing grin, continued that this is all camonflage, a part of the secrecy.] Dis burg is full of bulls, ain't it?

SECRETARY [Sharply] What have the cops got to do with us? We're breaking no laws

YANK [With a knowing wink] Sure Youse wouldn't for worlds. Sure I'm wise to dat

SECRETARY You seem to be wise to a lot of stuff none of us knows about

YANK [With another uink] Aw, dats aw right see [Then made a bit reventful by the inspiction glancer from all idea.] Aw, can it! Youse needn't put me trou de toid degree. Can't youse see I belong? Sure! I'm reglar. I'll stick, get me? I'll shoot de works for youse Dat's why I wanted to join in SECRETARY [Breezily, feeling him out] That's the right spirit. Only are you sure you understand what you've joined. It's all plain and above board, still, some guys get a wrong slant on us [Sharply] What's your 70 notion of the purpose of the I. W. W.?

YANK. Aw, I know all about 1t.

SFCRETARY. [Sarcastically] Well, give us some of your valuable information

YANK. [Cunningly] I know enough not to speak outa my toin [Then, resentfully again.] Aw, say! I'm reg'lar I'm wise to de game. I know yuh got to watch your step wit a stranger. For all youse know, I might be a plainclothes dick, or somep'n, dat's what yuh're tinkin', huh? Aw, forget it! I belong, see? Ask any guy down to de docks if I don't.

SECRETARY. Who said you didn't?

YANK. After I'm 'nitiated, I'll show yuh.

SECRETARY. [Astounded.] Initiated? There's no initiation.

YANK. [Disappointed.] Ain't there no password—no 10 grip nor nothin'?

SECRETARY. What'd you think this is—the Elks—or the Black Hand?

YANK. De Elks, hell! De Black Hand, dey're a lot of yellow backstickin' Ginees Naw Dis is a man's gang.

SECRETARY. You said it! That's why we stand on our two feet in the open. We got no secrets

YANK. [Surprised but admiringly.] Yuh mean to say yuh always run wide open—like dis?

secretary. Exactly

YANK Den yuh sure got your noive wit youse'

SECRETARY [Sharply] Just what was it made you want to join us? Come out with that straight

YANK Yuh call me? Well, I got noive, too! Here's my hand Yuh wanter blow tings up, don't yuh? Well, dat's me! I belong!

SECRETARY [With pretended carelessness] You mean change the unequal conditions of society by legitimate direct action—or with dynamite?

YANK. Dynamite! Blow it offen de oith—steel—all de cages—all de factories, steamers, buildings, jails—de Steel Trust and all dat makes it go.

SECRETARY So—that's your idea, eh? And did you have any special job in that line you wanted to propose to us? [He makes a sign to the men, who get up cautiously one by one and group behind YANK.]

YANK. [Boldly.] Sure, I'll come out wit it I'll show youse I'm one of de gang Dere's dat millionaire guy, Douglas—— 40 SECRETARY. President of the Steel Trust, you mean? Do you want to assassinate him?

YANK. Naw, dat don't get you nothin' I mean blow up de factory, de woiks, where he makes de steel. Dat's what I'm after—to blow up de steel, knock all de steel in de woild up to de moon Dat'll fix tings! [Eagerly, with a touch of bravado.] I'll do it by me lonesome! I'll show yuh! Tell me where his works is, how to git there, all de dope. Gimme de stuff, de old butter—and watch me do de rest! Watch de smoke and see it move! I don t give a damn if dey nab me—long as it's done! I'll soive life for it—and give 'em de laugh! [Half to bimself] And I'll write her a letter and tell her de hairy ape done it Dat'll square tings

SECRETARY. [Stepping away from YANK.] Very interesting [He gives a signal. The men, huskies all, throu themselves on YANK and before he knows it they have his legs and arms pinioned. But he is too flabbergasted to make a struggle, anyway. They feel him over for weapons.]

MAN No gat, no knife. Shall we give him $wh_{\alpha t\, 8}$, what and put the boots to him?

SECRETARY. No He isn't worth the trouble we'd get into He's too stupid [He comes closer and laught mockingly in YANK'S face.] Ho-ho! By God, this is the biggest joke they've put up on us yet Hey, you Joke' Who sent you—Burns or Pinkerton? No, by God, you're such a bonehead I'll bet you're in the Secret Service' Well, you dirty spy, you rotten agent provocator, you can go back and tell whatever skunk is paying you bloodmoney for betraying your brothers that he's wasting his coin You couldn't catch a cold. And tell him that all he'll ever get on us, or ever has got, is just his own sneaking plots that he's framed up to put us in jail We are what our manifesto says we are, neither more nor less- and we'll give him a copy of that any time he calls And as for you- [He glares scornfully at YANK, who is sunk in an oblivious stupor.] Oh, hell, what's the use of talking? You're a brainless ape

YANK. [Aronsed by the word to fierce but futile struggles.] What's dat, yuh Sheeny bum, yuh!

SECRETARY. Throw him out, boys [In spite of In struggles, this is done with gusto and éclat. Propelled by several parting kicks, YANK lands sprawling in the middle of the narrow cobbled street. With a growl he starts to get up and storm the closed door, but stops bewildered by the confusion in his brain, pathetically impotent. He sits there, brooding, in as near to the attitude of Rodin's "Thinker" as he can get in his position.]

¹² Black Hand, on Italian criminal society, originating about 1868, members of which formed the nucleus of a blackmailing society in the United States • 14 Ginees, derisive slang for Italians • 66 Burns or Pinkerton, detective agencies

YANK. [Bitterly.] So dem boids don't tink I belong, neider. Aw, to hell wit 'em' Dey're in de wrong pewde same old bull-soapboxes and Salvation Army-no guts! Cut out an hour offen de job a day and make me happy! Gimme a dollar more a day and make me happy! Tree square a day, and cauliflowers in de front yardekal rights-a woman and kids-a lousy vote-and I'm all fixed for Jesus, huh? Aw, hell! What does dat get yuh? Dis ting's in your inside, but it ain't your belly Feedin' your face-sinkers and coffee-dat don't touch it It's way down-at de bottom. Yuh can't grab it, and vuh can't stop it. It moves, and everything moves. It stops and de whole world stops Dat's me now-I don't tick, see?--I'm a busted Ingersoll, dat's what Steel was me. and I owned de world Now I ain't steel, and de world owns me Aw, hell! I can't see-it's all dark, get me? It's all wrong! [He turns a bitter mocking face up like an ape gibbering at the moon.] Say, youse up dere, Man in de Moon, vuh look so wise, gimme de answer, huh? Slip me a de inside dope, de information right from de stable where do I get off at, huh?

A POLICEMAN. [W'ho has come up the street in time to bear this last—with grim humor.] You'll get off at the station, you boob, if you don't get up out of that and keep movin'

YANK. [Looking up at him—with a hard, bitter laugh.] Sure' Lock me up' Put me in a cage' Dat's de on'y answer yuh know G'wan, lock me up'

POLICEMAN What you been doin'?

YANK. Enuf to gimme life for' I was born, see? Sure, dat's de charge Write it in de blotter I was born, get me' POLICEMAN. [Jocosely.] God pity your old woman' [Then matter-of-fact.] But I ve no time for kidding You're soused. I'd run you in but it's too long a walk to the station Come on now, get up, or I'll fan your ears with this club Beat it now! [He hauls YANK to his feet.] YANK. [In a vague mocking tone] Say, where do I

POLICEMAN. [Giving him a push—with a grin, indifferently.] Go to hell

go from here?

SCENE VIII

SCENE. Twilight of the next day The monkey house at the Zoo. One spot of clear gray light falls on the front of one cage so that the interior can be seen. The other cages are vague, shrouded in shadow from which chatterings pitched in a conversational tone can be heard. On the one cage a sign from which the word "Gorilla" stands out. The gigantic animal himself is seen squatting on his haunches on a bench in much the same attitude as Rodin's "Thinker" Yank enters from the left immediately a chorus of angry chattering and screeching breaks out The gorilla turns his eyes but makes no sound or move

YANK [With a hard, bitter laugh.] Welcome to your city, huh? Hail, hail, de gang's all here! [At the sound of his voice the chattering dies away into an attentive rlence. YANK walks up to the gorillas cage and, leaning over the railing, states in at its occupant, who stares back at him, silent and motionless. There is a pause of dead stillness. Then YANK begins to talk in a friendly confidential tone, half-mockingly, but with a deep undercurrent of sympathy] Say, yuh're some hard-lookin' guy, ain't yuh? I seen lots of tough nuts dat de gang called 50 gorillas, but yuh're de foist real one I ever seen. Some chest yuh got, and shoulders, and dem arms and mits! I bet yuh got a punch in eider fist dat'd knock 'em all silly' This with genuine admiration. The gorilla, as if he understood, stands upright, swelling out his chest and bounding on it with his fist YANK erins symbathetically] Sure, I get vuh. Yuh challenge de whole world, huh? Yuh got what I was sayin' even if yuh muffed de words [Then bitterness creeping in] And why wouldn't yuh get me? Ain't we both members of de same club-de 60 Harry Apes? [They stare at each other--a paine-- then YANK goes on slowly and bitterly] So vuhire what she seen when she looked at me, de white-faced tart! I was you to her, get me? On'y outa de cage—broke out-free to moider her, see? Sure! Dat's what she tought. She wasn't wise dat I was in a cage, too-worser'n yourssure-a damn sight-cause you got some chanct to bust loose-but me- [He grows confused.] Aw, hell' It's all wrong, ain't it' [A pause] I s'pose yuh wanter know what I'm doin here, huh? I been warmin' a bench 70 down to de Battery-ever since last night. Sure. I seen de sun come up Dat was pretty, too-all red and pink and green I was lookin' at de skyscrapers-steel-and all de ships comin' in, sailin' out, all over de oith-and dey was steel, too. De sun was warm, dey wasn't no clouds, and dere was a breeze blowin' Sure, it was great stuff. I got it aw right-what Paddy said about dat bein' de right dope-on'y I couldn't get in it, see? I couldn't belong in dat. It was over my head. And I kept tinkin'-and den I beat it up here to see what youse was like. And I waited till dev was all gone to git yuh alone Say, how d'yuh feel sittin' in dat pen all de time, havin' to stand for 'em comin' and starin' at yuh-de white-faced, skinny tarts and de boobs what marry 'em -makin' fun of yuh, laughin' at yuh, gittin' scared of 10 yuh-damn 'em! [He pounds on the rail with his fist. The gorilla rattles the bars of his cage and snarls. All the other monkeys set up an angry chattering in the darkness YANK goes on excitedly.] Sure! Dat's de way it hits me, too On'y yuh're lucky, see? Yuh don't belong wit 'em and yuh know it. But me, I belong wit 'em -but I don't, see? Dey don't belong wit me, dat's what. Get me? Tinkin' is hard-[He passes one hand across his forehead with a painful gesture. The gorilla growls impatiently. YANK goes on gropingly.] It's dis way, 20 what I'm drivin' at Youse can sit and dope dream in de past, green woods, de jungle and de rest of it Den yuh belong and dey don't Den yuh kin laugh at 'em, see? Yuh're de champ of de world But me-I ain't got no past to tink in, nor nothin' dat's comin', on'y what's now-and dat don't belong Sure, you're de best off! Yuh can't tink, can yuh? Yuh çan't talk neider. But I kin make a bluft at talkin' and tinkin'-a'most git away wit it—a'most!—and dat's where de joker comes in. [He laught.] I ain't on oith and I ain't in heaven, get me? 30 I'm in de middle tryin' to separate 'em, takin' all de woist punches from bot' of em Maybe dat's what dev call hell, huh? But you, yuh're at de bottom You belong' Sure! Yuh're de on'y one in de woild dat does, yuh lucky stiff! [The gorilla growls proudly] And dat's why dev gotter put yuh in a cage, see? [The gorilla roars angrily.] Sure! Yuh get me. It beats it when you try to tink it or talk it—it's way down—deep—behind you 'n' me we feel it Sure! Bot' members of dis club! [He laugh-then in a satage tone.] What de hell! 40 T' hell wit it! A little action, dat's our meat! Dat belongs' Knock 'em down and keep bustin' 'em till dey croaks yuh wit a gat-wit steel! Sure' Are yuh game? Dey've looked at youse, ain't dey-in a cage? Wanter gir even? Wanter wind up like a sport 'stead of croakin' slow in dere? [The gorilla roars an emphatic affirmative. YANK goes on with a sort of furious exaltation.] Sure!

Yuh're reg'lar! Yuh'll stick to de finish! Me 'n' vou huh?-bot' members of this club! We'll put up one last star bout dat'll knock 'em offen deir seats' Dev'll have to make de cages stronger after we're trou! [The ... gorilla is straining at his bars, growling, hopping from one foot to the other. YANK takes a jummy from under his coat and forces the lock on the cage door. He throws this open.] Pardon from de governor! Step out and shake hands! I'll take yuh for a walk down Fif' Avenoo We'll knock 'em offen de oith and croak wit de band playin' Come on Brother. [The gorilla scrambles gingerly out of his cage. Goes to YANK and stands looking at him. YANK keeps his mocking tone-holds out his hand] Shake-de secret grip of our order. [Some- sthing, the tone of mockery, perhaps, suddenly enrages the animal. With a spring he wraps his huge arms around YANK in a murderous hug. There is a crackling snap of crushed ribs—a gasping cry, still mocking, from YANK.] Hey, I didn't say kiss me! [The gorilla lets the crushed body slip to the floor; stands over it uncertainly. considering; then picks it up, throws it in the cage. shuts the door, and shuffles off menacingly into the darkness at left. A great uproar of frightened chattering and whimpering comes from the other cages. Then 7 YANK moves, groaning, opening his eyes, and there is silence. He mutters painfully.] Say-dey oughter match him-wit Zybszko. He got me, aw right. I'm trou Even him didn't tink I belonged. [Then, with sudden passionate despair.] Christ, where do I get off at? Where do I fit in? [Checking himself as suddenly.] Aw, what de hell' No squawkin', see! No quittin', get me! Croak wit your boots on! [He grabs hold of the bars of the cage and hauls himself painfully to his feet-looks around him bewilderedly-forces a mocking laugh] & In de cage, huh? [In the strident tones of a circus barker.] Ladies and gents, step forward and take a slant at de one and only-[His voice weakening.]-one and original-Hairy Ape from de wilds of- [He slips in a heap on the floor and dies. The monkeys set up a chattering, whimpering wail. And, perhaps, the Harry Ape at last belongs]

William Faulkner

1897 •

The fiction of William Faulkner has as many different planes of interest as that of any contemporary American writer. On one level much of it is sheer horror, a twentieth-century throwback to the Gothic romance. On another it is Hawthornesque for its exploration of the methods and effects of symbolism and allegory On still another it is a vast and intricate legend of the disintegration of the Old South, epiclike in conception and not unworthy of comparison with James Joyce's portrayal of Dublin in Ulysses To the student of technique it is notable for its bold experimentation with narrative point of view, while the reader with an eye for style finds it full of some of the lushest rhetoric of our time. All in all, Fault-ner's stories are almost incredibly subtle. They make such great demands of their readers that the surprising thing is that they have been as popular as they have Faulkner's work is almost all localized in the northern part of Mississippi. There he was born, in 1897, at New Albany, and there he has lived for most of his life in the neighboring county seat, Oxford, where the University of Mississippi is situated. The Faulkner (or Falkner) family has long been prominent in politics railroad building, and planting, one great-grandfather of William's was the author of a popular ante-bellum romance. The Winte Rose of Memphis. The Sartoris family, prominent in a number of Faulkner's novels appears to be in part a projection of his own clan.

Early in World War I, Faulkner, just out of high school, ran off to Canada to join the British air force. He was sent to England for training and saw about a year of service in France before he was wounded in a crash. Back in Mississippi, he was for a time a student in the university, he then worked at such odd jobs as clerking in the college postal station and house-painting. Finouragement for his writing apparently came from various friends, among them Phil Stone, an Oxford lawyer, Stark Young, then teaching at Amherst, and Sherwood Anderson, with whom he lived in New Orleans in 1922. All shared with Faulkner the fascination of the South with its biracial pattern of life and its extremes of illiteracy and cultivation.

Fautkner's first published work was a poem in The New Republic for August 6, 1919. In the middle twenties a number of poems and critical articles appeared in The Double Dealer, a New Orleans magazine, and in 1924 a thin sheaf of poems was collected as The Marble Faun Faulkner's reputation among those interested in new writers was built, however upon a series of five novels and some of his short stories. The novels were Soldier's Pay (1926), a story of the return of an aviator who had been presumed de. d. Mosquitoes (1927), which contains some discussion of writers and their aims Sastoris (1929), a key volume in the saga of the town of Jefferson in Yocknapatawpha County, the fictional counterpart of Oxford and its surrounding countryside; The Sound and the Fury (1929), a streamof-consciousness novel in which one of the central characters is an idiot, and As I Lay Dying (1930), a tour de force in the use of a multiple point of view. All are technically original, and it is not surprising that Faulkner's merits were quickly recognized.

He was not really well known, however, until the appearance of Sanctuary in 1931. A story of sexual perversion constructed like a detective story and denying anything approaching poetic justice, it established Faulkner as one of the leaders of the "cult of violence," and, thanks to its reprinting in an inexpensive edition, it remains his most widely read novel. Although Faulkner avowedly designed it as a "shocker," it is not uncharacteristic in method or matter, for it embeds in a carefully workedout pattern of objective indirectness some most stomachturning crimes and abnormalities. Since its appearance Faulkner has commanded a ready market for his short stories and has made his mark even in Hollywood, where his peculiar techniques have been adapted to certain motion pictures. Some of his work has been potboiling, but no other writer, with the possible exception of Erskine Caldwell, has provided such penetrating analyses of pathological specimens of degeneracy. Much of his work has been published in England as well as in the United States, and translated (one wonders how successfully) into French, Spanish, German, Norwegian, Czech, and Italian The important later books include five novels (Light in August, 1932, Pylon, 1935, Absalom, Absalom! 1936. The Wild Palms, 1939, and The Hamlet, 1940) and four volumes of short stories (These 13, 1931, Doctor Martino and Other Stories, 1934; The Unvanquished, 1938, and Go Down, Moses, 1942).

Readers vary widely in what they find in Faulkner's fiction-and, by the way, in what they look for-but few who are willing to give it patient attention will miss the ingenuity and freshness of its construction and the sincerity of its attempt to catch the essence of experience in a region at once desperately proud and desperately impoverished The undercurrents of life in Jefferson county seat and market town of a sharecropping region overwhelmingly Negro, are seldom pleasant to contemplace In the best of the Yocknapatawpha County series the Sartorises, representative of the old order in the South, are set off against the Snopeses, poor-white opportunists without the vestiges of moral responsibility which the Sartorises retain, despite the inbred decay of the society which produced them. It is hard in such a milieu to see what is honest and what is decent, and it is not Faulkner's intent to expound his personal position Yet there is a sense in which, for all his worrying of sexual relationships and inexplicable cruelty, he is a moralist Life, he seems to imply, ought to be better than it is

A Rose for Emily

This story first appeared in The Forum for July 1930, with illustrations by Weldon Bailey. It was collected in These 13 (1931) It belongs, as will appear, to the Sartoris cycle, and in a minor way reflects the conflict between the old and the new order which is central to so much of Faulkner's fiction. Told more directly than most of his stories, it shows his characteristic mastery of structure in the manner in which all details fit together, once the conclusion is reached. A careless reader is likely to miss the importance of the time sequence described at the beginning of the second section.

wn

When Miss Emily Grierson died, our whole town went to her funeral the men through a sort of respectful affection for a fallen monument, the women mostly out of curiosity to see the inside of her house, which no one save an old manservant—a combined gardener and cook —had seen in at least ten years.

It was a big, squarish frame house that had once been white, decorated with cupolas and spires and scrolled balconies in the heavily lightsome style of the seventies, set on what had once been our most select street. But garages and cotton gins had encroached and obliterated even the august names of that neighborhood, only Miss Emily's house was left, lifting its stubborn and coquettish decay above the cotton wagons and the gasoline pumps—an eyesore among eyesores. And now Miss Emily had gone to join the representatives of those august names where they lay in the cedar-bemused cemetery among the ranked and anonymous graves of Union and Confederate soldiers who fell at the battle of Jefferson.

Alive, Miss Emily had been a tradition, a duty, and a care, a sort of hereditary obligation upon the town, dating from that day in 1894 when Colonel Sartoris, the mayor—he who fathered the edict that no Negro woman should appear on the streets without an apron—remitted her taxes, the dispensation dating from the death of her father on into perpetuity. Not that Miss Emily would have accepted charity. Colonel Sartoris invented an involved tale to the effect that Miss Emily's father had loaned money to the town, which the town, as a matter of business, preferred this way of repaying. Only a man of Colonel Sartoris' generation and thought could have invented it, and only a woman could have believed it

When the next generation, with its more modern ideas, became mayors and aldermen, this arrangement created some little dissatisfaction. On the first of the year they mailed her a tax notice. February came, and there was no reply. They wrote her a formal letter, asking her to call at the sheriff's office at her convenience. A week later the mayor wrote her himself, offering to call or to send his car for her, and received in reply a note on paper of an archaic shape, in a thin flowing calligraphy in faded ink, to the effect that she no longer went out at all. The tax notice was also enclosed, without comment

They called a special meeting of the Board of Aldermen. A deputation waited upon her, knocked at the door through which no visitor had passed since she ceased giving china-painting lessons eight or ten years earlier. They were admitted by the old Negro into a dim hall from which a stairway mounted into still more shadow. It smelled of dust and disuse—a close, dank smell. The Negro led them into the parlor. It was furnished in heavy, leather-covered furniture. When the Negro opened the blinds of one window, they could see that the leather was cracked, and when they sat down, a faint dust rose so sluggishly about their thighs, spinning with slow motes in the single sun-ray. On a tarnished gilt easel before the fireplace stood a crayon portrait of Miss Emily's father.

They rose when she entered—a small, fat woman in black with a thin gold chain descending to her waist and vanishing into her belt, leaning on an ebony cane with a tarnished gold head. Her skeleton was small and spare; perhaps that was why what would have been merely plumpness in another was obesity in her. She looked 60 bloated, like a body long submerged in motionless water, and of that pallid hue. Her eyes, lost in the fatty ridges of her face, looked like two small pieces of coal pressed into a lump of dough as they moved from one face to another while the visitors stated their errand.

She did not ask them to sit. She just stood in the door and listened quietly until the spokesman came to a stumbling halt. Then they could hear the invisible watch ticking at the end of the gold chain.

Her voice was dry and cold "I have no taxes in Jef- 70 ferson Colonel Sartoris explained it to me Perhaps one of you can gain access to the city records and satisfy yourselves"

"But we have We are the city authorities Miss Emily Didn't you get a notice from the sheriff, signed by him?"

"I received a paper, yes," Miss Emily said Perhaps he considers himself the sheriff I have no taxes in Iefferson"

"But there is nothing on the books to show that, you see We must go by the—"

"See Colonci Sartoris I have no taxes in Jefferson."
"But, Miss Emily—"

"See Colonel Sartoris." (Colonel Sartoris had been dead almost ten years) "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Tobe!" The Negro appeared "Show these gentlemen out"

11

So she vanquished them, horse and foot, just as she had vanquished their fathers thirty years before about the smell. That was two years after her father's death and a short time after her sweetheart—the one we believed would marry her—had deserted her. After her father's death she went out very little, after her sweetheart went away, people hardly saw her at all. A few of the ladies had the temerity to call, but were not received, and the only sign of life about the place was the Negro man—a young man then—going in and out with a market basket.

"Just as if a man—any man—could keep a kitchen properly," the ladies said; so they were not surprised to when the smell developed. It was another link between the gross, teeming world and the high and mighty Griersons.

A neighbor, a woman, complained to the mayor, Judge Stevens, eighty years old.

"But what will you have me do about it, madam?" he said

"Why, send her word to stop it," the woman said "Isn't there a law?"

"I'm sure that won't be necessary," Judge Stevens said.
20 "It's probably just a snake or a rat that nigger of hers killed in the yard I'll speak to him about it."

The next day he received two more complaints, one from a man who came in diffident deprecation "We really must do something about it, Judge I'd be the last one in the world to bother Miss Emily, but we've got to do something" That night the Board of Aldermen met—three graybeards and one younger man, a member of the rising generation

"Its simple enough," he said. "Send her word to have so her place cleaned up Give her a certain time to do it in, and if she dont "

"Dammit, sir," Judge Stevens said, "will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?"

So the next night, after midnight, four men crossed Miss Emily's lawn and slunk about the house like burglars, sniffing along the base of the brickwork and at the cellar openings while one of them performed a regular sowing motion with his hand out of a sack slung from his shoulder. They broke open the cellar door and sprin-kled lime there, and in all the outbuildings. As they recrossed the lawn, a window that had been dark was lighted and Miss Emily sat in it, the light behind her, and her upright torso motionless as that of an idol. They crept quietly across the lawn and into the shadow of the locusts that lined the street. After a week or two the smell went away.

That was when people had begun to feel really sorry for her People in our town, remembering how old lady Wyatt, her great-aunt, had gone completely crazy at last, believed that the Griersons held themselves a little too high for what they really were. None of the young men were quite good enough to Miss Emily and such. We had long thought of them as a tableau; Miss Emily a slender figure in white in the background, her father a spraddled silhouette in the foreground, his back to her and clutching a horse-whip, the two of them framed by the back-flung front door. So when she got to be thirty and was still single, we were not pleased exactly, but vindicated, even with insanity in the family she wouldn't have turned down all of her chances if they had really a materialized.

When her father died, it got about that the house was all that was left to her, and in a way, people were glad At last they could pity Miss Emily Being left alone, and a pauper, she had become humanized Now she too would know the old thrill and the old despair of a penny more or less

The day after his death all the ladies prepared to call at the house and offer condolence and aid, as is our custom. Miss Emily met them at the door, dressed as usual and with no trace of grief on her face. She told them that her father was not dead. She did that for three days with the ministers calling on her, and the doctors, trying to persuade her to let them dispose of the body. Just as they were about to resort to law and force, she broke down, and they buried her father quickly.

We did not say she was crazy then We believed she had to do that We remembered all the young men her father had driven away, and we knew that with nothing left, she would have to cling to that which had robbed her, as people will.

She was sick for a long time. When we saw her again, her hair was cut short, making her look like a girl, with a vague resemblance to those angels in colored church windows—sort of tragic and serene

The town had just let the contracts for paving the sidewalks, and in the summer after her father's death they began the work. The construction company came with niggers and mules and machinery, and a foreman named Homer Barron, a Yankee—a big. dark, ready man, with a big voice and eyes lighter than his face. The little boys would follow in groups to hear him cuss the niggers, and the niggers singing in time to the rise and fall of picks. Pretty soon he knew everybody in town. Whenever you heard a lot of laughing anywhere about the square, Homer Barron would be in the center of the group Presently we began to see him and Miss Emily on Sunday afternoons driving in the yellow-wheeled buggy and the matched team of bays from the livery stable.

o At first we were glad that Miss Emily would have an interest, because the ladies all said. "Of course a Grierson would not think seriously of a Northerner, a day laborer" But there were still others, older people, who said that even grief could not cause a real lady to forget noblesse oblige—without calling it noblesse oblige. They just said, "Poor Emily. Her kinsfolk should come to her" She had some kin in Alabama, but years ago her father had fallen out with them over the estate of old lady Wyatt, the crazy woman, and there was no communication between the two families. They had not even been represented at the funeral

And as soon as the old people said, "Poor Emily," the whispering began "Do you suppose it's really so?" they said to one another "Of course it is What else could

This behind their hands rustling of craned silk and satin behind jalousies closed upon the sun of Sunday afternoon as the thin, swift clop-clop-clop of the matched team passed "Poor Emily"

She carried her head high enough—even when we believed that she was fallen. It was as if she demanded more than ever the recognition of her dignity as the last Grierson, as if it had wanted that touch of earthiness to reaffirm her imperviousness. Like when she bought the rat poison, the arsenic. That was over a year after they had begun to say 'Poor Emily," and while the two female cousins were visiting her.

"I want some poison," she said to the druggist. She was over thirty then, still a slight woman, though thinner than usual, with cold, haughty black eyes in a face the flesh of which was strained across the temples and about the eye-sockets as you imagine a lighthouse-keeper's face ought to look. "I want some poison," she said.

"Yes, Miss Emily What kind? For rats and such? I'd recom---"

"I want the best you have I don't care what kind'

The druggist named several. "They'll kill anything up to an elephant But what you want is—"

"Arsenic," Miss Emily said "Is that a good one?"
"Is . . . arsenic? Yes, maam But what you want—" 50
"I want arsenic."

The druggist looked down at her She looked back at him, erect, her face like a strained flag "Why, of course," the druggist said "If that's what you want. But the law requires you to tell what you are going to use it for."

Miss Emily just stared at him, her head tilted back in order to look him eye for eye, until he looked away and went and got the arsenic and wrapped it up. The Negro delivery boy brought her the package, the drug- or gist didn't come back. When she opened the package at home there was written on the box, under the skull and bones. "For rats"

IV

So the next day we all said, "She will kill herself", and we said it would be the best thing. When she had first begun to be seen with Homer Barron, we had said, "She will marry him." Then we said, "She will persuade him yet," because Homer himself had remarked—he liked men, and it was known that he drank with the younger men in the Elks' Club—that he was not a marrying man. Later we said, "Poor Emily" behind the jalousies as they passed on Sunday afternoon in the glittering buggy, Miss Emily with her head high and Homer Barron with his hat cocked and a cigar in his teeth, reins and whip in a yellow glove.

Then some of the ladies began to say that it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people. The men did not want to interfere, but at last the ladies forced the Baptist minister—Miss Emily's people were Episcopal—to call upon her. He would 80 never divulge what happened during that interview, but he refused to go back again. The next Sunday they again drove about the streets, and the following day the ministers wife wrote to Miss Fmily's relations in Alabama.

So she had blood-kin under her roof again and we sat back to watch developments. At first nothing happened. Then we were sure that they were to be married. We learned that Miss Emily had been to the jeweler's and ordered a man's toilet set in silver, with 100 the letters H. B. on each piece. Two days later we learned that she had bought a complete outfit of men's clothing, including a nightshirt, and we said, "They are married" We were really glad. We were glad because the two female cousins were even more Grierson than Miss Emily had ever been.

So we were not surprised when Homer Barron—the streets had been finished some time since—was gone. We were a little disappointed that there was not a 10 public blowing-off, but we believed that he had gone on to prepare for Miss Emily's coming, or to give her a chance to get rid of the cousins (By that time it was a cabal, and we were all Miss Emily's allies to help circumvent the cousins.) Sure enough, after another week they departed. And, as we had expected all along, within three days Homer Barron was back in town. A neighbor saw the Negro man admit him at the kitchen door at dusk one evening

And that was the last we saw of Homer Barron And 20 of Miss Emily for some time. The Negro man went in and out with the market basket, but the front door remained closed. Now and then we would see her at a window for a moment, as the men did that night when they sprinkled the lime, but for almost six months she did not appear on the streets. Then we knew that this was to be expected too; as if that quality of her father which had thwarted her woman's life so many times had been too virulent and too furious to die.

When we next saw Miss Emily, she had grown fat and her hair was turning gray. During the next few years it grew grayer and grayer until it attained an even pepper-and-salt iron-gray, when it ceased turning. Up to the day of her death at seventy-four it was still that vigorous iron-gray, like the hair of an active man.

From that time on her front door remained closed, save for a period of six or seven years, when she was about forty, during which she gave lessons in china-painting. She fitted up a studio in one of the downstairs rooms, where the daughters and granddaughters of Colonel Sartoris' contemporaries were sent to her with the same regularity and in the same spirit that they were sent to church on Sundays with a twenty-five cent piece for the collection plate. Meanwhile her taxes had been remitted.

Then the newer generation became the backbone and the spirit of the town, and the painting pupils grew up and fell away and did not send their children to her with boxes of color and tedious brushes and pictures cut from the ladies' magazines. The front door closed upon the last one and remained closed for good. When at the town got free postal delivery, Miss Emily alone refused to let them fasten the metal numbers above her door and attach a mailbox to it. She would not listen to them

Daily, monthly, yearly we watched the Negro grow grayer and more stooped, going in and out with the market basket. Each December we sent her a tax notice, which would be returned by the post office a week later, unclaimed. Now and then we would see her in one of the downstairs windows—she had evidently shut up the top floor of the house—like the carven torso of κ an idol in a niche, looking or not looking at us, we could never tell which. Thus she passed from generation to generation—dear, inescapable, impervious, tranquil, and perverse.

And so she died Fell ill in the house filled with dust and shadows, with only a doddering Negro man to wait on her. We did not even know she was sick; we had long since given up trying to get any information from the Negro He talked to no one, probably not even to her, for his voice had grown harsh and rusty, no as if from disuse.

She died in one of the downstairs rooms, in a heavy walnut bed with a curtain, her gray head propped on a pillow yellow and moldy with age and lack of sunlight

The Negro met the first of the ladies at the front door and let them in, with their hushed, sibilant voices and their quick, curious glances, and then he disappeared He walked right through the house and out the back and was not seen again.

The two female cousins came at once. They held a the funeral on the second day, with the town coming to look at Miss Emily beneath a mass of bought flowers with the crayon face of her father musing profoundly above the bier and the ladies sibilant and macabre, and the very old men—some in their brushed Confederate uniforms—on the porch and the lawn, talking of Miss Emily as if she had been a contemporary of theirs, believing that they had danced with her and courted her perhaps, confusing time with its mathematical progression, as the old do, to whom all the past is not a diminishing road but, instead, a huge meadow which no winter ever quite touches, divided from them now by the narrow bottle-neck of the most recent decade of years.

Already we knew that there was one room in that region above stairs which no one had seen in forty years, and which would have to be forced. They waited until Miss Emily was decently in the ground before they opened it.

The violence of breaking down the door seemed to fill this room with pervading dust. A thin, acrid pall as of the tomb seemed to lie everywhere upon this room decked and furnished as for a bridal upon the valence curtains of faded rose color, upon the rose-shaded lights, upon the dressing table, upon the delicate array of crystal and the man's toilet things backed with tarnished silver, silver so tarnished that the monogram was obscured. Among them lay a collar and tie as if they had just been removed, which, litted, left upon the surface a pale crescent in the dust. Upon a chair hung the suit, carefully folded, beneath it the two mute 20 shoes and the discarded socks

The man himself lay in the bed.

For a long while we just stood there, looking down at the profound and fleshless grin. The body had apparently once lain in the attitude of an embrace, but now the long sleep that outlasts love, that conquers even the grimace of love, had cuckolded him. What was left of him, rotted beneath what was left of the night-shirt, had become inextricable from the bed in which he lay, and upon him and upon the pillow beside him. If you had to the patient and biding dust.

Then we noticed that in the second pillow was the indentation of a head. One of us lifted something from it, and leaning forward, that faint and invisible dust dry and acrid in the nostrils, we saw a long strand of iron-gray hair.

NOVELISTS WITH SOCIAL THEMES: Cather, Dos Passos, Steinbeck, Wolfe

Willa Sibert Cather

1876 •

The secure position of Willa Cather among present-day American writers is the result of her allegiance to the belief that fiction is a form of art worth practicing with the utmost seriousness. To her it has not been merely a business, the providing of entertainment to a magazine-reading public, or a means to the improvement of society. Like Henry James and Sarah Orne Jewett, to whom she has acknowledged her indebtedness, she has always thought of storytelling in qualitative terms and her work has been a constant striving for perfection. In "The Novel Démeublé," first published in The New Republic for April 12, 1922, she has expounded her doctrine that literary art is primarily a matter of selection and simplification, the learning of when to subordinate detail to the desired effect. The effects which she has chiefly sought have been in the realm of subtleties of character and situation. She is akin to James in her aims, but has perhaps been more aware than he was of the importance of setting and of physical action, she is, in short, somewhat closer to tradition and has been more popular. Seldom if ever, however, has she compromised with her artistic conscience. It is easy to complain of her limited range and to question the ethical and social bases of her thinking, but no one is likely to deny her integrity.

Miss Cather was born in 1876 near Winchester, in the northern tip of Virginia From her ninth to her nineteenth year, she was a Nebraskan, growing up in what was then a pioneer rural community, settled largely by Norwegian and Bohemian immigrants. After some tutoring at home she went to high school at Red Cloud, and then to the University of Nebraska, where she was graduated in 1895. By that time she had acquired a deep interest in good music, an enthusiasm for the work of Henry James, and a desire to write, heightened by some experience with newspaper work and a few appearances in the college magazine. Only gradually did she find her power as a writer. Her first published stories and poems appeared in 1900. She had then worked for five years on the Pittsburgh Daily Leader. Her first book, April Twilights (1903), a volume of poems, came out while she was teaching English in Allegheny High School Her mood in these years was chiefly the familiar one of rebellion against the cultural bleakness of the small town and the small-town mind, later so fully exploited by Sinclair Lewis in Main Street and Babbitt. Her best-known short stories, "The Sculptor's Funeral," "A Wagner Matinée," and "Paul's Case," all collected in The Troll Garden (1905), utilize this mood In 1906 she moved to New York City to work on McClure's Magazine, of which she was managing editor from 1908 until 1911.

It seems likely that the most important event of Miss Cather's years as editor was her connection with Sarah Orne Jewett, who advised her late in 1908 to find time and quiet to perfect her work if she wished her gifts to mature. Following this advice, Miss Cather resigned her editorship to write a novel Alexander's Bridge (1912: previously serialized in McClure's as "Alexander's Masquerade") was imitative of Henry James in its London setting and mild ethical theme but it was followed a year later by O Pioneers' in which Miss Cather returned to the immigrant folk she had known as a child It and My Antonia (1918) must be ranked with the finest of Middlewestern novels for their unforgettable central characters and their rich detail of pioneer life in Nebraska. With them and ThSong of the Lark (1915), the story of a girl whose voice carried her from Colorado to the Metropolitan Opera Company, Miss Cather's reputation was firmly established It has never since been in danger.

The remainder of Miss Cather's work consists of two collections of short stories (Youth and the Bilght Medusa, 1920; and Obscure Destinies, 1932), one volume of critical and reminiscent essays (Not under Forty, 1936), and eight relatively short novels (Ore of Ours, 1922, which won the Pulitzer Prize; A Lott Lady, 1923, The Professor's House, 1925, My Mortal

Sometimes, in these troublous times, Miss Cather is more than a trifle sad that the simplicity of the old days is past

Neighbour Rosicky

In "Neighbour Rosicky," the longest of the three stories in Obscure Destinies (1932), Miss Cather returned to the immigrant folk who had been her neighbors in her girlhood in Nebraska, of whom she has also written in My Ántonia and O Pioneers! Her respect for the basic values of rural life-security and humaneness and family solidarity-will be evident to any reader. The story is in her mature style, marked by restraint and a careful subordination of detail to the achievement of a mood. Like most of her later work this story makes clear her belief that the good life is well worth the living and that it can be achieved most readily by simplification. 'Neighbour Rosicky' was written in New York in 1928 five years old, and you've always worked hard, and your heart's tired. You've got to be careful from now on, 10 and you can't do heavy work any more. You've got five boys at home to do it for you" The old farmer looked up at the Doctor with a gleam of amusement in his queer, triangular-shaped eyes. His eyes were large and lively, but the lids were caught up in the middle in a curious way, so that they formed a triangle. He did not look like a sick man. His brown face was creased but not wrinkled, he had a ruddy colour in his smooth-shaven checks and in his lips under his long brown moustache. His hair was thin and ragged 20 around his ears, but very little grey. His forehead, naturally high and crossed by deep parallel lines, now ran all the way up to his pointed crown. Rosicky's face had the habit of looking interested,-suggested a contented disposition and a reflective quality that was gay rather than grave. This gave him a certain detachment, the easy manner of an on-looker and observer

Well I guess you ain t got no pills for a bad heart, Doctor Ed. I guess the only thing is fur me to git me a new one"

Doctor Burleigh swung round in his desk-chair and frowned at the old farmer. "I think if I were you I'd take a little care of the old one, Rosicky"

When Doctor Burleigh told neighbour Rosicky he had a bad heart, Rosicky protested.

"So? No, I guess my heart was always pretty good. I got a little asthma, maybe Just a awful short breath when I was pitchin' hay last summer, dat's all "

Rosicky shrugged. "Maybe I don't know how. I expect you mean fur me not to drink my coffee no more."

"I wouldn't, in your place. But you'll do as you choose about that. I've never yet been able to separate a Bohemian from his coffee or his pipe. I've quit trying But the sure thing is you've got to cut out farm work. You can feed the stock and do chores about the barn, but you can't do anything in the fields that makes you short of breath."

"How about shelling corn?"

"Of course not!"

Rosicky considered with puckered brows

"I can't make my heart go no longer'n it wants to, can I, Doctor Ed?"

"I think it's good for five or six years yet, maybe more, if you'll take the strain off it. Sit around the house and help Mary If I had a good wife like yours, I'd want to stay around the house."

His patient chuckled "It ain't no place fur a man. I don't like no old man hanging round the kitchen too much An' my wife, she's a awful hard worker her own self."

"That's it, you can help her a little. My Lord, Rosicky, you are one of the few men I know who has a family he can get some comfort out of, happy dispositions, never quarrel among themselves, and they treat you right I want to see you live a few years and enjoy them."

"Oh, they're good kids, all right," Rosicky assented The Doctor wrote him a prescription and asked him how his oldest son, Rudolph, who had married in the spring, was getting on Rudolph had struck out for himself, on rented land "And how's Polly? I was afraid Mary mightn't like an American daughter-in-law, but it seems to be working out all right"

"Yes, she's a fine girl Dat widder woman bring her daughters up very nice Polly got lots of spunk, an' she got some style, too Da's nice, for young folks to have some style" Rosicky inclined his head gallantly His voice and his twinkly smile were an affectionate compliment to his daughter-in-law

"It looks like a storm, and you'd better be getting home before it comes In town in the car?" Doctor Burleigh rose.

"No, I'm in de wagon. When you got five boys, you ain't got much chance to ride round in de Ford. I ain't much for cars, noway."

"Well, it's a good road out to your place; but I don't want you bumping around in a wagon much And 5 never again on a hay-rake, remember!"

Rosicky placed the Doctor's fee delicately behind the desk-telephone, looking the other way, as if this were an absent-minded gesture. He put on his plush cap and his corduroy jacket with a sheepskin collar, and went out.

The Doctor picked up his stethoscope and frowned at it as if he were seriously annoyed with the instrument. He wished it had been telling tales about some other man's heart, some old man who didn't look the structure of the eye so knowingly, or hold out such a warm brown hand when he said good-bye. Doctor Burleigh had been a poor boy in the country before he went away to medical school, he had known Rosicky almost ever since he could remember, and he had a deep affection for Mrs. Rosicky

Only last winter he had had such a good breakfast at Rosicky's, and that when he needed it He had been out all night on a long, hard confinement case at Tom Marshall's,-a big rich farm where there was plenty of 7 stock and plenty of feed and a great deal of expensive farm machinery of the newest model, and no comfort whatever The woman had too many children and too much work, and she was no manager. When the baby was born at last, and handed over to the assisting neighbour woman, and the mother was properly artended to, Burleigh refused any breakfast in that slovenly house, and drove his buggy-the snow was too deep for a car-eight miles to Anton Rosicky's place He didn't know another farm-house where a man could get such a warm welcome, and such good strong coffee with rich cream No wonder the old chap didn't want to give up his coffee!

He had driven in just when the boys had come back from the barn and were washing up for breakfast. The long table, covered with a bright oilcloth, was set out with dishes waiting for them, and the warm kitchen was full of the smell of coffee and hot biscuit and sausage. Five big handsome boys, running from twenty to twelve, all with what Burleigh called natural good manners,— they hadn't a bit of the painful self-consciousness he himself had to struggle with when he was a lad. One ran to put his horse away, another helped him off with his fur coat and hung it up, and Josephine, the youngest child and the only daughter, quickly set another place under her mother's direction

With Mary, to feed creatures was the natural expression of affection,—her chickens, the calves, her big hungry boys. It was a rare pleasure to feed a young man whom she seldom saw and of whom she was as proud as if he belonged to her. Some country housekeepers would have stopped to spread a white cloth over the oilcloth, to change the thick cups and plates for their best china, and the wooden-handled knives for plated ones. But not Mary

"You must take us as you find us, Doctor Ed I'd be glad to put out my good things for you if you was expected, but I'm glad to get you any way at all"

He knew she was glad,—she threw back her head and spoke out as if she were announcing him to the whole prairie. Rosicky hadn't said anything at all, he merely smiled his twinkling smile, put some more coal on the fire, and went into his own room to pour the Doctor a little drink in a medicine glass. When they were all seated, he watched his wife's face from his end of the table and spoke to her in Czech. Then, with the instinct of politeness which seldom failed him, he turned to the Doctor and said slyly, "I was just tellin' her not to ask you no questions about Mrs. Marshall till you eat some breakfast. My wife, she's terrible fur to ask questions."

The boys laughed, and so did Mary She watched the doctor devour her biscuit and sausage, too much excited to eat anything herself. She drank her coffee and sat taking in everything about her visitor. She had known him when he was a poor country boy, and was boastfully proud of his success, always saying: "What do people go to Omaha for, to see a doctor, when we got the best one in the State right here?" If Mary liked people at all, she felt physical pleasure in the sight of them, personal exultation in any good fortune that came to them Burleigh didn't know many women like that, but he knew she was like that

When his hunger was satisfied, he did, of course, have to tell them about Mrs Marshall, and he noticed what a friendly interest the boys took in the matter.

Rudolph, the oldest one (he was still living at home then), said: "The last time I was over there, she was lifting them big heavy milk-cans, and I knew she ought not to be doing it."

"Yes, Rudolph told me about that when he come home, and I said it wasn't right," Mary put in warmly. 50 "It was all right for me to do them things up to the last, for I was terrible strong, but that woman's weakly And do you think she'll be able to nurse it. Ed?" She sometimes forgot to give him the title she was so proud of "And to think of your being up all night and then not able to get a decent breakfist! I don't know what's the matter with such people."

"Why, mother," said one of the boys, "if Doctor Ed had got breakfast there, we wouldn't have him here So you ought to be glad."

He knows I'm glad to have him, John, any time But I'm sorry for that poor woman, how bad she'll feel the Doctor had to go away in the cold without his breakfast."

"I wish I'd been in practice when these were getting born." The doctor looked down the row of close-clipped heads. "I missed some good breakfasts by not being."

The boys began to laugh at their mother because she flushed so red, but she stood her ground and threw up her head. "I don't care, you wouldn't have got away 70 from this house without breakfast. No doctor ever did I'd have had something ready fixed that Anton could warm up for you."

The boys laughed harder than ever, and exclaimed at her "I'll bet you would!" "She would, that!"

"Father, did you get breakfast for the doctor when we were born?"

"Yes, and he used to bring me my breakfast, too, mighty nice. I was always awful hungry!" Mary admitted with a guilty laugh

While the boys were getting the Doctor's horse, he went to the window to examine the house plants "What do you do to your geraniums to keep them blooming all winter, Mary' I never pass this house that from the road I don't see your windows full of flowers"

She snapped off a dark red one, and a ruffled new green leaf, and put them in his buttonhole "There, that looks better You look too solemn for a young man, Ed Why don't you git married? I'm worried about you so Settin' at breakfast, I looked at you real hard, and I seen you've got some grev hairs already"

"Oh, yes! They're coming. Maybe they'd come faster if I married."

"Don't talk so. You'll ruin your health eating at the hotel. I could send your wife a nice loaf of nut bread, if you only had one. I don't like to see a young man getting grey. I'll tell you something, Ed; you make some strong black tea and keep it handy in a bowl, and every morning just brush it into your hair, an' it'll keep the grey from showin' much That's the way I do!" Sometimes the Doctor heard the gossipers in the drugstore wondering why Rosicky didn't get on faster. He was industrious, and so were his boys, but they were rather free and easy, weren't pushers, and they didn't always show good judgment. They were comfortable, they were out of debt, but they didn't get much ahead Maybe, Doctor Burleigh reflected, people as generous and warmhearted and affectionate as the Rosickys never got ahead much, maybe you could not enjoy your life and put it into the bank, too.

When Rosicky left Doctor Burleigh's office, he went into the farm-implement store to light his pipe and put on his glasses and read over the list Mary had given him. Then he went into the general merchandise place next door and stood about until the pretty girl with the plucked eyebrows, who always waited on him, was free. Those eyebrows, two thin India-ink strokes, amused him, because he remembered how they used to be Rosicky always prolonged his shopping by a little joking, the girl knew the old fellow admired her, and she so liked to chaff with him.

"Seems to me about every other week you buy ticking, Mr. Rosicky, and always the best quality," she remarked as she measured off the heavy bolt with red stripes

"You see, my wife is always makin' goose-fedder pillows, an de' thin stuff don't hold in dem little downfedders."

"You must have lots of pillows at your house"

"Sure. She makes quilts of dem, too We sleeps easy.

Now she's makin' a fedder quilt for my son's wife
You know Polly, that married my Rudolph How much my bill. Miss Pearl?"

"Eight eighty-five"

"Chust make it nine, and put in some candy fur de women."

"As usual. I never did see a man buy so much candy for his wife First thing you know, she'll be getting too fat."

"I'd like dat. I ain't much fur all dem slim women like what de style is now"

"That's one for me, I suppose, Mr Bohunk!" Pearl sniffed and elevated her India-ink strokes

When Rosicky went out to his wagon, it was beginning to snow,—the first snow of the season, and he was glad to see it. He rattled out of town and along the highway through a wonderfully rich stretch of country the finest farms in the county. He admired this High Prairie, as it was called, and always liked to drive through it. His own place lay in a rougher territory, where there was some clay in the soil and it was not so productive. When he bought his land, he hadn't the money to buy on High Prairie, so he told his boys when they grumbled, that if their land hadn't some clay in it, they wouldn't own it at all. All the same, he enjoyed looking at these fine farms, as he enjoyed looking at a prize bull

After he had gone eight miles, he came to the grave-yard, which lay just at the edge of his own hay-land. There he stopped his horses and sat still on his wagon seat, looking about at the snowfall. Over yonder on the hill he could see his own house, crouching low, with the clump of orchard behind and the windmill before and all down the gentle hill-slope the rows of pale gold cornstalks stood out against the white field. The snow was falling over the cornfield and the pasture and the hay-land, steadily, with very little wind,—a nice dry snow. The graveyard had only a light wire fence about it and was all overgrown with long red grass. The fine snow, settling into this red grass and upon the few little evergreens and the headstones, looked very pretty.

It was a nice graveyard, Rosicky reflected, sort of snug and homelike, not cramped or mournful,—a big sweep all round it. A man could lie down in the long grass and see the complete arch of the sky over him hear the wagons go by, in summer the mowing-machine rattled right up to the wire fence. And it was so near home. Over there across the cornstalks his own roof and windmill looked so good to him that he promised himself to mind the Doctor and take care of himself.

He was awful fond of his place, he admitted He wasn't anxious to leave it. And it was a comfort to think that he would never have to go farther than the edge of his own hayfield. The snow, falling over his barnyard and the graveyard, scemed to draw things together like. And they were all old neighbours in the graveyard, most of them friends, there was nothing to feel awkward or embarrassed about. Embarrassment was the most disagreeable feeling Rosicky knew. He didn't often have it,—only with certain people whom he didn't understand at all.

Well, it was a nice snowstorm, a fine sight to see the snow falling so quietly and graciously over so much open country. On his cap and shoulders, on the horses' backs and manes, light, delicate, mysterious it fell, and with it a dry cool fragrance was released into the air. It means rest for vegetation and men and beasts, for the ground itself, a season of long nights for sleep, leisurely breakfasts, peace by the fire. This and much comore went through Rosicky's mind, but he merely told himself that winter was coming, clucked to his horses, and drove on

When he reached home. John, the youngest boy, ran out to put away his team for him, and he met Mary coming up from the outside cellar with her apron full of carrots. They went into the house together. On the table, covered with oilcloth figured with clusters of blue grapes, a place was set, and he smelled hot coffee-cake of some kind. Anton never lunched in town, he thought that extravagant and anyhow he didn't like the food. So Mary always had something ready for him when he got home.

After he was settled in his chair, stirring his coffee in a big cup, Mary took out of the oven a pan of kolache stuffed with apricots, examined them anxiously to see whether they had got too dry, put them beside his plate, and then sat down opposite him

Rosicky asked her in Czech if she wasn't going to have any coffee

She replied in English, as being somehow the right language for transacting business "Now what did Doctor Ed say, Anton? You tell me just what"

"He said I was to tell you some compliments, but I forgot 'em" Rosicky's eyes twinkled.

"About you, I mean What did he say about your asthma?"

'He says I am t got no asthma." Rosicky took one of the little rolls in his broad brown fingers. The thickened nail of his right thumb told the story of his past.

"Well, what is the matter? And don't try to put me so off"

"He don't say nothing much, only I'm a little older, and my heart ain't so good like it used to be."

Mary started and brushed her hair back from her temples with both hands as if she were a little out of hei mind. From the way she glared, she might have been in a rage with him.

"He says there's something the matter with your heart? Doctor Ed says so?"

"Now don't yell at me like I was a hog in de garden, so Mary. You know I always did like to hear a woman talk soft. He didn't say anything de matter wid my heart, only it ain't so young like it used to be an' he tell me not to pitch hay or ren de corn-sheller."

Mary wanted to jump up, but she sat still. She admired the way he never under any circumstances raised his voice or spoke roughly. He was city-bred, and she was country-bred, she often said she wanted her boys to have their baba's nice ways.

"You never have no pain there, do you? It's your no breathing and your stomach that's been wrong I wouldn't believe nobody but Doctor Ed about it. I guess I'll go see him myself. Didn't he give you no advice?

"Chust to take it easy like an' stay round de house dis winter. I guess you got some carpenter work for me to do. I kin make some new shelves for you, and I want dis long time to build a closet in de boys' room and make dem two little fellers keep dere clo'es hung up."

Rosicky drank his coffee from time to time, while he considered. His moustache was of the soft long to variety and came down over his mouth like the teeth of a buggy-rake over a bundle of hay. Each time he put down his cup, he ran his blue handkerchief over his lips. When he took a drink of water, he managed very neatly with the back of his hand.

Mary sat watching him intently, trying to find any change in his face. It is hard to see anyone who has become like your own body to you. Yes, his hair had got thin, and his high forehead had deep lines running from left to right. But his neck, always clean- so shaved except in the busiest seasons, was not loose or baggy. It was burned a dark reddish brown, and there were deep creases in it, but it looked firm and full of blood. His cheeks had a good colour. On either side of his mouth there was a half-moon down the length of his cheek, not wrinkles, but two lines that had come there from his habitual expression. He was shorter and broader than when she married him, his back had grown broad and curved, a good deal like the shell of an old turtle, and his arms and legs were short.

He was fifteen years older than Mary, but she had 10 hardly ever thought about it before. He was her man, and the kind of man she liked. She was rough, and he was gentle,-city-bred, as she always said. They had been shipmates on a rough voyage and had stood by each other in trying times. Life had gone well with them because, at bottom, they had the same ideas about life They agreed, without discussion, as to what was most important and what was secondary. They didn't often exchange opinions, even in Czech,-it was as if they had thought the same thought together A good 20 deal had to be sacrificed and thrown overboard in a hard life like theirs, and they had never disagreed as to the things that could go It had been a hard life, and a soft life, too There wasn't anything brutal in the short, broad-backed man with the three-cornered eyes and the forehead that went on to the top of his skull. He was a city man, a gentle man, and though he had married a rough farm girl, he had never touched her without gentleness

They had been at one accord not to hurry through 130 life, not to be always skimping and saving. They saw their neighbours buy more land and feed more stock than they did, without discontent. Once when the creamery agent came to the Rosickys to persuade them to sell him their cream, he told them how much money the Fasslers, their nearest neighbours, had made on their cream last year.

"Yes," said Mary, "and look at them Fassler children! Pale, pinched little things, they look like skimmed milk. I had rather put some colour into my children's faces than put money into the bank."

The agent shrugged and turned to Anton "I guess we'll do like she says," said Rosicky.

Mary very soon got into town to see Doctor Ed, and then she had a talk with her boys and set a guard over Rosicky Even John, the youngest, had his father on his mind. If Rosicky went to throw hay down from the loft, one of the boys ran up the ladder and took the fork from him. He sometimes complained that though he was getting to be an old man, he wasn't an old woman yet

That winter he stayed in the house in the afternoons and carpentered, or sat in the chair between the window full of plants and the wooden bench where the two pails of drinking-water stood. This spot was called "Father's corner," though it was not a corner at all. He had a shelf there, where he kept his Bohemian papers and his pipes and tobacco, and his shears and needles and thread and tailor's thimble. Having been a tailor in his youth, he couldn't bear to see a woman patching at his clothes, or at the boys'. He liked tailoring, and always patched all the overalls and jackets and work shirts. Occasionally he made over a pair of pants one of the older boys had outgrown, for the little fellow.

While he sewed, he let his mind run back over his life. He had a good deal to remember, really, life in three countries. The only part of his youth he didn't like to remember was the two years he had spent in London, in Cheapside, working for a German tailor who was wretchedly poor. Those days, when he was nearly always hungry, when his clothes were dropping off him for dirt, and the sound of a strange language kept him in continual bewilderment, had left a sore spot in his mind that wouldn't bear touching.

He was twenty when he landed at Castle Garden in New York, and he had a protector who got him work in a tailor shop in Vesey Street, down near the Washington Market He looked upon that part of his life as very happy. He became a good workman, he was industrious, and his wages were increased from time to time He minded his own business and envied nobody's good fortune. He went to night school and learned to a read English He often did overtime work and was well paid for it, but somehow he never saved anything He couldn't refuse a loan to a friend, and he was self-indulgent. He liked a good dinner, and a little went for beer, a little for tobacco, a good deal went to the girls He often stood through an opera on Saturday nights; he could get standing-room for a dollar Those were the great days of opera in New York, and it gave a fellow something to think about for the rest of the week Rosicky had a quick ear, and a childish love of all % the stage splendour; the scenery, the costumes, the ballet He usually went with a chum, and after the performance they had beer and maybe some oysters somewhere. It was a fine life, for the first five years or so it satisfied him completely. He was never hungry or cold or dirty, and everything amused him a fire, a dog fight, a parade, a storm, a ferry ride He thought New York the finest, richest, friendliest city in the

Moreover, he had what he called a happy home life Very near the tailor shop was a small furniture-factory, where an old Austrian, Loeffler, employed a few skilled men and made unusual furniture, most of it to order. for the rich German housewives uptown. The top floor of Loeffler's five-story factory was a loft, where he kept his choice lumber and stored the odd pieces of furniture left on his hands. One of the young workmen he employed was a Czech, and he and Rosicky became fast friends They persuaded Loeffler to let them have a sleeping-room in one corner of the loft. They bought good beds and bedding and had their pick of the fur-2 niture kept up there The loft was low-pitched, but light and airy, full of windows, and good-smelling by reason of the fine lumber put up there to season Old Loeffler used to go down to the docks and buy wood from South America and the East from the sea captains The young men were as foolish about their house as a bridal pair Zichec, the young cabinet-maker, devised every sort of convenience, and Rosicky kept their clothes in order. At night and on Sundays, when the quiver of machinery underneath was still, it was the quietest so place in the world, and on summer nights all the sea winds blew in Zichec often practiced on his flute in the evening. They were both fond of music and went to the opera together Rosicky thought he wanted to live like that forever

But as the years passed, all alike, he began to get a little restless. When spring came round, he would begin to feel fretted, and he got to drinking. He was likely to drink too much of a Saturday night. On Sunday he was languid and heavy, getting over his spree On 40 Monday he plunged into work again So he never had time to figure out what ailed him, though he knew something did When the grass turned green in Park Place, and the lilac hedge at the back of Trinity churchyard put out its blossoms, he was tormented by a longing to run away. That was why he drank too much; to get a temporary illusion of freedom and wide horizons

Rosicky, the old Rosicky, could remember as if it were yesterday the day when the young Rosicky found out what was the matter with him. It was on a Fourth of July afternoon, and he was sitting in Park Place in 50 the sun The lower part of New York was empty. Wall Street, Liberty Street, Broadway, all empty. So much stone and asphalt with nothing going on, so many empty windows. The emptiness was intense, like the stillness in a great factory when the machinery stops and the belts and bands cease running. It was too great a change, it took all the strength out of one. Those blank buildings, without the stream of life pouring through them, were like empty jails. It struck young Rosicky that this was the trouble with big cities, they built you 60 in from the earth itself, cemented you away from any contact with the ground. You lived in an unnatural world, like the fish in an aquarium, who were probably much more comfortable than they ever were in the sea

On that very day he began to think seriously about the articles he had read in the Bohemian papers, describing prosperous Czech farming communities in the West He believed he would like to go out there as a farmhand, it was hardly possible that he could ever have land of his own. His people had always been workmen, 70 his father and grandfather had worked in shops. His mother's parents had lived in the country, but they rented their farm and had a hard time to get along Nobody in his family had ever owned any land,-that belonged to a different station of life altogether. Anton's mother died when he was little, and he was sent into the country to her parents. He stayed with them until he was twelve, and formed those ties with the earth and the farm animals and growing things which are never made at all unless they are made early. After his grand- 8' father died, he went back to live with his father and stepmother, but she was very hard on him, and his father helped him to get passage to London

After that Fourth of July day in Park Place, the desire to return to the country never left him. To work on another man's farm would be all he asked, to see the sun rise and set and to plant things and watch them grow He was a very simple man. He was like a tree that has not many roots, but one tap-root that goes down deep. He subscribed for a Bohemian paper printed in 90 Chicago, then for one printed in Omaha. His mind got farther and farther west. He began to save a little money to buy his liberty. When he was thirty-five, there was a great meeting in New York of Bohemian athletic societies, and Rosicky left the tailor shop and went home with the Omaha delegates to try his fortune in another part of the world.

Perhaps the fact that his own youth was well over before he began to have a family was one reason why Rosicky was so fond of his boys. He had almost a grandfather's indulgence for them. He had never had to worry about any of them—except, just now, a little about Rudolph

On Saturday night the boys always piled into the Ford, took little Josephine, and went to town to the moving-picture show. One Saturday morning they were talking at the breakfast table about starting early that evening, so that they would have an hour or so to see the Christmas things in the stores before the show began Rosicky looked down the table

"I hope you boys am't disappointed, but I want you to let me have de car tonight. Maybe some of you can go in with de neighbours."

Their faces fell. They worked hard all week, and they were still like children. A new jack-knife or a box of candy pleased the older ones as much as the little fellow.

"If you and Mother are going to town," Frank said, "maybe you could take a couple of us along with you, anyway".

"No. I want to take de car down to Rudolph's, and let him an' Polly go in to de show. She don't git into town enough, an' I'm afraid she's gittin' lonesome, 30 an' he can't afford no car yet."

That settled it The boys were a good deal dashed Their father took another piece of apple-cake and went on "Maybe next Saturday night de two little fellers can go along wid dem"

"Oh, is Rudolph going to have the car every Saturday $night^{2}$ "

Rosicky did not reply at once, then he began to speak seriously "Listen, boys, Polly ain't lookin' so good I don't like to see nobody lookin' sad It comes hard fur a town girl to be a farmer's wife I don't want no trouble to start in Rudolph's family When it starts, it ain't so easy to stop An American girl don't git used to our ways all at once I like to tell Polly she and Rudolph can have the car every Saturday night till after New Year's, if it's all right with you boys"

"Sure it's all right, Papa," Mary cut in. "And it's good you thought about that. Town girls is used to more than country girls. I lay awake nights, scared she'll make Rudolph discontented with the farm."

The boys put as good a face on it as they could. They surely looked forward to their Saturday nights in town That evening Rosicky drove the car the half-mile down the road to Rudolph's new, bare little house

Polly was in a short-sleeved gingham dress, clearing away the supper dishes She was a trim, slim little thing, with blue eyes and shingled yellow hair, and her eyebrows were reduced to a mere brush-stroke like Miss Pearl's.

"Good-evening, Mr. Rosicky. Rudolph's at the barn I guess." She never called him father, or Marv mother She was sensitive about having married a foreigner She never in the world would have done it if Rudolph hadn't been such a handsome, persuasive fellow and such a gallant lover. He had graduated in her class in the high school in town, and their friendship began in the ninth grade.

Rosicky went in, though he wasn't exactly asked "My boys ain't goin' to town to-night, an' I brought de car over fur you two to go in to de picture show

Polly, carrying dishes to the sink, looked over her shoulder at him "Thank you. But I'm late with my work tonight, and pretty tired Maybe Rudolph would like to go in with you"

"Oh, I don't go to de shows! I'm too old-fashtoned You won't feel so tired after you ride in de air a ways It's a nice clear night, an' it ain't cold You go an' fix yourself up. Polly. an' I'll wash de dishes an' leave everything nice fur you"

Polly blushed and tossed her bob "I couldn't let you do that, Mr Rosicky I wouldn't think of it"

Rosicky said nothing. He found a bib apron on a nail behind the kitchen door. He slipped it over his head and then took Polly by her two elbows and pushed her gently toward the door of her own room. "I washed up de kitchen many times for my wife, when de babies was sick or somethin." You go an make yourself look nice. I like you to look prettier n any of dem town girls when you go in. De young folks must have some fun, an I'm goin' to look out fur you, Polly."

That kind, reassuring grip on her elbows, the old man's funny bright eyes, made Polly want to drop her head on his shoulder for a second. She restrained herself, but she lingered in his grasp at the door of her room, murmuring tearfully. "You always lived in the city when you were young, didn't you? Don't you ever get lonesome out here?"

As she turned round to him, her hand fell naturally into his, and he stood holding it and smiling into her face with his peculiar, knowing, indulgent smile without a shadow of reproach in it. "Dem big cities is all right fur de rich, but dev is terrible hard fur de poor"

"I don't know Sometimes I think I'd like to take a chance You lived in New York, didn't you?"

'An' London Da's bigger still I learned my trade dere Here's Rudolph comin', you better hurry."

"Will you tell me about London sometime?"

"Maybe Only I am't no talker, Polly Run an' dress yourself up"

The bedroom door closed behind her, and Rudolph came in from the outside, looking anxious. He had seen the car and was sorry any of his family should come just then Supper hadn't been a very pleasant occasion Halting in the doorway, he saw his father in a kitchen apron, carrying dishes to the sink. He flushed crimson and something flashed in his eve Rosicky held up a warning finger

"I brought de car over fur you an' Polly to go to de picture show, an' I made her let me finish here so s. you won't be late. You go put on a clean shirt, quick!" "But don't the boys want the car, father?"

"Not tonight dey don't" Rosicky fumbled under his apron and found his pants pocket. He took out a silver dollar and said in a hurried whisper. You go an' buy dat girl some ice cream an' candy tonight, like you was courtin' She's awful good friends wid me.'

Rudolph was very short of cash, but he took the money as if it hurt him. There had been a crop failure all over the county. He had more than once been sorry he'd married this year

In a few minutes the young people came out, looking clean and a little stiff Rosicky hurried them off, and then he took his own time with the dishes. He scoured the pots and pans and put away the milk and swept the kitchen. He put some coal in the stove and shut off the draughts, so the place would be warm for them when they got home late at night. Then he sat down and had a pipe and listened to the clock tick

Generally speaking marrying an American girl was certainly a risk. A Czech should marry a Czech. It 50 was lucky that Polly was the daughter of a poor widow woman, Rudolph was proud, and if she had a prosperous family to throw up at him, they could never make it go Polly was one of four sisters and they all worked, one was book-keeper in the bank, one taught music, and Polly and her younger sister had been clerks, like Miss Pearl All four of them were musical, had pretty voices, and sang in the Methodist choir, which the eldest sister directed

Polly missed the sociability of a store position. She so missed the choir and the company of her sisters. She didn't dislike housework but she disliked so much of it. Rosicky was a little anxious about this pair He was afraid Polly would grow so discontented that Rudy would quit the farm and take a factory job in Omaha. He had worked for a winter up there, two years ago, to get money to marry on. He had done very well, and they would always take him back at the stockyards. But to Rosicky that meant the end of everything for his son. To be a landless man was to to be a wage-earner, a slave, all your life, to have nothing, to be nothing

Rosicky thought he would come over and do a little carpentering for Polly after the New Year. He guessed she needed jollying. Rudolph was a serious sort of chap, serious in love and serious about his work

Rosicky shook out his pipe and walked home across the fields. Ab and of him the lamplight shone from his kitchen windows. Suppose he were still in a tailor shop on Vese; Street with a bunch of pale, narrow- 80 chested sons working on machines, all coming home tired and sullen to eat supper in a kitchen that was a parlour also, with another crowded, angry family quarrelling just across the dumb-waiter shaft, and squeaking pulleys at the windows where dirty washings hung on dirty lines above a court full of old brooms and more and ash-cans

He stopped by the windmill to look up at the frosty winter stars and draw a long breath before he went inside That kitchen with the shiring windows was 90 dear to him but the sleeping fields and bright stars and the noble darkness were dearer still

On the day before Christmas the weather set in very cold, no snow, but a bitter, bitting wind that whistled and sang over the flat land and lashed one's face like fine wires. There was baking going on in the Rosicky kitchen all day, and Rosicky sat inside, making over a coat that Albert had outgrown into an overcoat for John Mary had a big red geranium in bloom for Christmas, and a row of Jerusalem cherry trees, full of berries. It was the first year she had ever grown these, Doctor Ed brought her the seeds from Omaha when he went to some medical convention. They reminded Rosicky of plants he had seen in England, and all afternoon, as he stitched, he sat thinking about those two years in London, which his mind usually shrank from even after all this while.

He was a lad of eighteen when he dropped down into London, with no money and no connexions except the address of a cousin who was supposed to be working at a confectioner's When he went to the pastry shop, 20 however, he found that the cousin had gone to America. Anton tramped the streets for several days, sleeping in doorways and on the Embankment, until he was in utter despair He knew no English, and the sound of the strange language all about him confused him By chance he met a poor German tailor who had learned his trade in Vienna, and could speak a little Czech. This tailor, Lifschnitz, kept a repair shop in a Cheapside basement, underneath a cobbler. He didn't much need an apprentice, but he was sorry for the boy and 30 took him in for no wages but his keep and what he could pick up. The pickings were supposed to be coppers given you when you took work home to a customer But most of the customers called for their clothes themselves, and the coppers that came Anton's way were very few. He had, however, a place to sleep The tailor's family lived upstairs in three rooms, a kitchen, a bedroom, where Lifschnitz and his wife and five children slept, and a living-room. Two corners of this living-100m were cuitained off for lodgers, in one 10 Rosicky slept on an old horsehair sofa, with a feather quilt to wrap himself in. The other corner was rented to a wretched, dirty boy, who was studying the violin. He actually practised there Rosicky was dirty, too. There was no way to be anything else Mrs Lifschnitz got the water she cooked and washed with from a pump in a brick court, four flights down. There were bugs in the place, and multitudes of fleas, though the poor woman did the best she could Rosicky knew she often went empty to give another potato or a spoonful of dripping to the two hungry, sad-eyed boys who lodged with her. He used to think he would never get out of there, never get a clean shirt to his back again. What would he do, he wondered, when his clothes actually dropped to pieces and the worn cloth wouldn't hold patches any longer?

It was still early when the old farmer put aside his sewing and his recollections. The sky had been a dark grey all day, with not a gleam of sun, and the light failed at four o'clock. He went to shave and change his shirt while the turkey was roasting. Rudolph and a Polly were coming over for supper.

After supper they sat round in the kitchen, and the younger boys were saying how sorry they were it hadn't snowed. Everybody was sorry. They wanted a deep snow that would lie long and keep the wheat warm, and leave the ground soaked when it melted.

"Yes, sir!" Rudolph broke out fiercely, "if we have another dry year like last year, there's going to be hard times in this country."

Rosicky filled his pipe "You boys don't know what a hard times is You don't owe nobody, you got plenty to eat an' keep warm, an' plenty water to keep clean When you got them, you can't have it very hard"

Rudolph frowned, opened and shut his big right hand, and dropped it clenched upon his knee "Tve got to have a good deal more than that, Father, or Ill quit this farming gamble. I can always make good wages railroading, or at the packing house, and be sure of my money."

"Maybe so," his father answered dryly

Mary, who had just come in from the pantry and was wiping her hands on the roller towel, thought Rudy and his father were getting too serious. She brought her darning-basket and sat down in the middle of the group.

"I ain't much afraid of hard times, Rudy," she said heartily "We've had a plenty, but we've always come through Your father wouldn't never take nothing very hard, not even hard times. I got a mind to tell you a story on him Maybe you boys can't hardly remember the year we had that terrible hot wind, that burned everything up on the Fourth of July? All the corn an'the gardens. An' that was in the days when we didn't have alfalfa yet,—I guess it wasn't invented

"Well, that very day your father was out cultivatin' corn, and I was here in the kitchen makin' plum preserves. We had bushels of plums that year I noticed it was terrible hot, but it's always hot in the kitchen when you're preservin', an' I was too busy with my plums to mind. Anton come in from the field about three o'clock, an I asked him what was the matter.

"'Nothin',' he says, 'but it's pretty hot, an' I think I won't work no more today'. He stood round for a few minutes, an' then he says. 'Ain't you near through? I want you should git up a nice supper for us tonight It's Fourth of July'.

"I told him to git along, that I was right in the middle of preservin', but the plums would taste good on hot biscuit 'I'm goin' to have fried chicken, too,' he says, and he went off an' killed a couple. You three oldest boys was little fellers, playin' round outside, real hot an' sweaty, an' your father took you to the horse tank down by the windmill an' took off your clothes an' put you in. Them two box-elder trees was little then, but they made shade over the tank. Then he took off all his own clothes, an' got in with you While he was playin' in the water with you, the Methodist preacher drove into our place to say how all the neighbours was goin' to meet at the schoolhouse that night, to pray for rain. He drove right to the windmill, of course, and there was your father and you three with no clothes on I was in the kitchen door, an' I had to laugh, for the preacher acted like he ain't never seen a naked man before He surely was embarrassed, an' your father couldn't git to his clothes, they was all hangin' up on the windmill to let the sweat dry out of 'em So he laid in the tank where he was, an' put one of you boys on top of him to cover him up a little, « an' talked to the preacher

"When you got through playin' in the water, he put clean clothes on you and a clean shirt on himself, and by that time I'd begun to get supper He says It's too hot in here to eat comfortable Let's have a picnic in the orchard We'll eat our supper behind the mulberry hedge, under them linden trees'

"So he carried our supper down, an a bottle of my wild-grape wine, an everything tasted good, I can tell you. The wind got cooler as the sun was goin down, and it turned out pleasant, only I noticed how the so leaves was curled up on the linden trees. That made me think, an I asked your father if that hot wind all day hadn't been terrible hard on the gardens an the corn

"'Corn, he says, 'there ain't no corn

"What you talkin about?" I said 'Ain't we got forty acres?

"We ain't got an ear," he says, 'nor nobody else ain't got none. All the corn in this country was cooked by three o clock today, like you'd roasted it in an oven."

"'You mean you won't get no crop at all?' I asked 60 him. I couldn't believe it, after he'd worked so hard

"'No crop this year,' he says "That's why we're havin a picnic. We might as well enjoy what we got."

"An' that's how your father behaved, when all the neighbours was so discouraged they couldn't look you in the face. An' we enjoyed ourselves that year, poor as we was, an' our neighbours wasn't a bit better off for bein' miserable. Some of 'em grieved till they got poor digestions and couldn't relish what they did have."

The younger boys said they thought their father had the best of it. But Rudolph was thinking that, all the same, the neighbours had managed to get ahead more, in the fifteen years since that time. There must be something wrong about his father's way of doing things. He wished he knew what was going on in the back of Polly's mind. He knew she liked his father, but he knew, too, that she was afraid of something When his mother sent over coffce-cake or prune tarts or a loaf of fresh bread, Polly seemed to regard them 80 with a certain suspicion. When she observed to him that his brothers had nice manners, her tone implied that it was remarkable they should have. With his mother she was stiff and on her guard. Mary's hearty frankness and gusts of good humour irritated her Polly was afraid of being unusual or conspicuous in any way, of being "ordinary," as she said!

When Mary had finished her story, Rosicky laid aside his pipe

"You boys like me to tell you about some of dem % hard times I been through in London?" Warmly encouraged, he sat rubbing his forehead along the deep creases It was bothersome to tell a long story in English (he nearly always talked to the boys in Czech), but he wanted Polly to hear this one.

"Well, you know about dat tailor shop I worked in in London? I had one Christmas dere I ain't never forgot Times was awful bad before Christmas, de boss ain't got much work, an' have it awful hard to pay his rent It ain't so much fun, bein' poor in a big city like London, I'll say! All de windows is full of good tings to eat, an' all de pushcarts in de streets is full, an' you smell 'em all de tume, an' you ain't got no money,—not a damn bit I didn't mind de cold so much, though I didn't have no overcoat, chust a short jacket I'd outgrowed so it wouldn't meet on me, an' my hands was chapped raw But I always had a good appetite, like you all know, an' de sight of dem pork pies in de windows was awful fur me!

"Day before Christmas was terrible foggy dat year, an' dat fog gits into your bones and makes you all damp like Mrs Lifschnitz didn't give us nothin' but a little bread an' drippin' for supper, because she was savin' to try for to give us a good dinner on Christmas Day After supper de boss say I can go an' enjoy myself, so I went into de streets to listen to de Christmas singers Dey sing old songs an' make very nice music, an' I run round after dem a good ways, till I got awful hungry I t'ink maybe if I go home, I can sleep till morning an' forgit my belly

"I went into my corner real quiet, and roll up in my fedder quilt. But I ain't got my head down, till I smell somer'ing good. Seem like it git stronger an' stronger, an' I can't git to sleep noway. I can't understand dat smell. Dere was a gas light in a hall across de court, dat always shine in at my window a little. I got up an' look round. I got a little wooden box in my corner fur a stool, cause I ain't got no chair. I picks up dat box, and under it dere is a roast goose on a platter! I can't believe my eyes. I carry it to de window where de light comes in, an' touch it and smell it to find out, an' den I taste it to be sure. I say, I will eat chust one little bite of dat goose, so I can go to sleep, and to-morrow I won't eat none at all. But I tell you, boys, when I stop, one half of dat goose was gone!"

The narrator bowed his head, and the boys shouted But little Josephine slipped behind his chair and kissed him on the neck beneath his ear "Poor little Papa, I don't want him to be hungry!"
"Da's long ago, child I ain't never been hungry since I had your mudder to cook fur me."

"Go on and tell us the rest, please,' said Polly

"Well, when I come to realize what I done, of course I felt terrible I felt better in de stomach, but very bad in de heart. I set on my bed wid dat platter on my knees, an' it all come to me, how hard dat poor woman save to buy dat goose, and how she get some neighbour to cook it dat got more fire, an' how she put i' in my corner to keep it away from dem hungry children. Dey was an old carpet hung up to shut my corner off, an' de children wasn't allowed to go in dere. An' I know she put it in my corner because she trust me more'n she did de violin boy. I can't stand it to tace more in she did de Violin boy. I can't stand it to tace after I spoil de Christmas. So I put on my shoes and go out into de city. I tell myself I better throw myself in de river, but I guess I ain't dat kind of a bot myself in de river, but I guess I ain't dat kind of a bot.

"It was after twelve o'clock, an' terrible cold, an I start out to walk about London all night I walk along de river awhile, but dey was lots of drunks all along, men, and women too I chust move along to keep away from the police I git onto de Strand, an den over to New Oxford Street, where dere was a big German restaurant on de ground floor, wid big windows all fixed up fine an' I could see de people havin' parties inside While I was lookin' in, two men and two ladies come out, laughin' and talkin' and feelin happi about all dey been eatin' an' drinkin', and dey was speakin' Czech,—not like de Austrians, but like de home folks talk it

"I guess I went crazy, an' I done what I ain't never done before nor since. I went right up to dem gav people an' begun to beg dem. 'Fellow countrymen for God's sake give me moncy enough to buy a goose'.'

"Dey laugh, of course but de ladies speak awful kind to me, an' dey take me back into de restaurant and give me hot coffee and cakes, an' make me tell all about how I happened to come to London, an' what I was doin' dere. Dey take my name and where I work down on paper an' both of dem ladies give me ten shillings.

"De big market at Covent Garden ain't very far away. an' by dat time it was open. I go dere an' buy a big 82 goose an' some pork pies an potatoes and onions, an' cakes an' oranges fur de children,—all I could carry'

When I git home, everybody is still asleep I pile all I bought on de kitchen table, an' go in an' lay down on my bed, an I ain't waken up till I hear dat woman scream when she come out into her kitchen My goodness, but she was surprise! She laugh an' cry at de same time, an' hug me and waken all de children She ain't stop fur no breakfast, she git de Christmas dinner ready dat morning, and we all sit down an' eat all we can hold. I ain't never seen dat violin boy have all he can hold before

Two three days after dat, de two men come to hunt me up, an' dey ask my boss, and he give me a good report an' tell dem I was a steady boy all right. One of dem Bohemians was very smart an' run a Bohemian newspaper in New York, an' de odder was a rich man, in de importing business, an dey been travelling togedder. Dev told me how tings was easier in New York, an' offered to pay my passage when dey was goin' home soon on a boat. My boss say to me. 4 You go You ain't got no chance here, an' I like to see you git ahead, fur you always been a good boy to my woman, and fur dat fine Christmas dinner you give us all.' An' da's how I got to New York."

That night when Rudolph and Polly, arm in arm, were running home across the fields with the bitter wind at their backs, his heart leaped for joy when she said she thought they might have his family come over for supper on New Year's Eve "Let's get up a nice supper, and not let your mother help at all make her be company for once"

"That would be lovely of you, Polly," he said humbly He was a very simple, modest boy, and he, too, felt vaguely that Polly and her sisters were more experienced and worldly than his people

The winter turned out badly for farmers. It was bitterly cold, and after the first light snows before Christmas there was no snow at all,—and no rain. March was as bitter as February. On those days when the wind fairly punished the country, Rosicky sat by his window. In the fall he and the boys had put in a big wheat planting, and now the seed had frozen in the ground. All that land would have to be ploughed up and planted over again, planted in corn. It had happened before, but he was younger then, and he never worried about what had to be. He was sure of himself and of Mary; he knew they could bear what they had to bear, that they would always pull through somehow. But he was not so sure about the young ones, and he felt troubled because Rudolph and Polly were having such a hard start.

Sitting beside his flowering window while the panes rattled and the wind blew in under the door, Rosicky gave himself to reflection as he had not done since those Stindays in the loft of the furniture-factory in New York, long ago. Then he was trying to find whathe wanted in life for himself, now he was trying to find what he wanted for his boys, and why it was he so hungered to feel sure they would be here, working this very land, after he was gone.

They would have to work hard on the farm, and as probably they would never do much more than make a living. But if he could think of them as staying here on the land, he wouldn't have to fear any great un kindness for them. Hardships certainly, it was a hardship to have the wheat freeze in the ground when seed was so high, and to have to sell your stock because you had no feed But there would be other years when everything came along right, and you caught up. And what you had was your own You didn't have to choose between bosses and strikers, and go wrong either way 70 You didn't have to do with dishonest and crucl people They were the only things in his experience he had found terrifying and horrible, the look in the eves of a dishonest and crafty man of a scheming and rapacious woman

In the country, if you had a mean neighbour, you could keep off his land and make him keep off yours. But in the city, all the foulness and misery and brutality of your neighbours was part of your life. The worst things he had come upon in his journey through the so world were human,—depraved and poisonous specimens of man. To this day he could recall certain terrible faces in the London streets. There were mean people everywhere, to be sure, even in their own country town here. But they weren't tempered, hardened, sharpened, like the treacherous people in cities who live by grinding or cheating or poisoning their fellow-men. He had helped to bury two of his fellow-workmen in the tailoring trade, and he was distrustful of the organized industries that see one out of the world in big. 50 cities Here, if you were sick, you had Doctor Ed to look after you; and if you died, fat Mr Haycock, the kindest man in the world, buried you

It seemed to Rosicky that for good, honest boys like his, the worst they could do on the farm was better than the best they would be likely to do in the city If he'd had a mean boy, now, one who was crooked and sharp and tried to put anything over on his brothers, then town would be the place for him But he had no such boy. As for Rudolph, the discontented one, he would give the shirt off his back to anyone who touched his heart. What Rosicky really hoped for his boys was that they could get through the world without ever knowing much about the cruelty of human beings. "Their mother an' me ain't prepared them for that," he sometimes said to himself

These thoughts brought him back to a grateful consideration of his own case. What an escape he had had, to be sure! He, too, in his time, had had to take money for repair work from the hand of a hungry child who let it go so wistfully, because it was money due his boss. And now, in all these years, he had never had to take a cent from anyone in bitter need,—never had to look at the face of a woman become like a wolf's from struggle and famine. When he thought of these things, Rosicky would put on his cap and jacket and slip down to the barn and give his work-horses a little extra oats, letting them eat it out of his hand in their slobbery fashion. It was his way of expressing what he felt, and made him chuckle with pleasure.

The spring came warm, with blue skies,—but dry, dry as a bone. The boys began ploughing up the wheat-fields to plant them over in corn. Rosicky would stand at the fence corner and watch them, and the earth was so dry it blew up in clouds of brown dust that hid the horses and the sulky plough and the driver. It was a bad outlook

The big alfalfa-field that lay between the home place and Rudolph's came up green, but Rosicky was worto ried because during that open windy winter a great many Russian thistle plants had blown in there and lodged. He kept asking the boys to rake them out; he was afraid that their seed would root and "take the alfalfa" Rudolph said that was nonsense. The boys were working so hard planting corn, their father felt he couldn't insist about the thistles, but he set great store by that big alfalfa field. It was a feed you could depend on,—and there was some deeper reason, vague, but strong The peculiar green of that clover woke early memories in old Rosicky, went back to some thing in his childhood in the old world. When he was a little boy, he had played in fields of that strong blue-green colour

One morning, when Rudolph had gone to town in the car, leaving a work-team idle in his barn, Rosicky went over to his son's place, put the horses to the buggs rake, and set about quietly raking up those thistles. He behaved with guilty caution, and rather enjoyed stealing a march on Doctor Ed, who was just then taking his first vacation in seven years of practice and was attending a clinic in Chicago. Rosicky got the thistles raked up, but did not stop to burn them. That would take some time, and his breath was pretty short, so he thought he had better get the horses back to the born

He got them into the barn and to their stalls, but the pain had come on so sharp in his chest that he didn't try to take the harness off. He started for the house bending lower with every step. The cramp in his chest was shutting him up like a jack-knife. When he reached the windmill, he swayed and caught at the ladder. He was awayed to saw Polly coming down the hill, running with the swiftness of a slim greyhound. In a flash she had her shoulder under his armpit.

"Lean on me, Father, hard! Don't be afraid We can get to the house all right"

Somehow they did, though Rosicky became blind with pain, he could keep on his legs, but he couldn't steer his course. The next thing he was conscious of was lying on Polly's bed, and Polly bending over him wringing out bath towels in hot water and putting them s' on his chest. She stopped only to throw coal into the stove, and she kept the tea-kettle and the black pot going. She put these hot applications on him for nearly an hour, she told him afterwards, and all that time he was drawn up stiff and blue, with the sweat pouring off him.

As the pain gradually loosed its grip, the stiffness went out of his jaws, the black circles round his eyes disappeared, and a little of his natural colour came back. When his daughter-in-law buttoned his shirt over still his chest at last, he sighed.

"Da's fine, de way I feel now, Polly It was a awful bad spell, an' I was so sorry it all come on you like it did" Polly was flushed and excited. "Is the pain really gone? Can I leave you long enough to telephone over to your place?"

Rosicky's eyelids fluttered. "Don't telephone, Polly. It ain't no use to scare my wife It's nice and quiet here, an' if I ain't too much trouble to you, just let me lay still till I feel like myself I ain't got no pain now It's nice here"

Polly bent over him and wiped the moisture from his tace "Oh, I'm so glad it's over!" she broke out impulse sively "It just broke my heart to see you suffer so, Father"

Rosicky motioned her to sit down on the chair where the tea-kettle had been, and looked up at her with that lively affectionate gleam in his eyes. "You was awful good to me, I won't ever forgit dat. I hate it to be sick on you like dis. Down at de barn I sav to myself, dat young girl ain't had much experience in sickness, I don't want to scare her, an' maybe she's got a baby comin' or somet'ing."

2: Polly took his hand He was looking at her so intently and affectionately and confidingly, his eyes seemed to caress her face, to regard it with pleasure. She frowned with her funny streaks of eyebrows, and then smiled back at him.

"I guess maybe there is something of that kind going to happen But I haven't told anyone yet, not my mother or Rudolph You'll be the first to know"

His hand pressed hers. She noticed that it was warm again. The twinkle in his yellow-brown eyes seemed to come nearer.

"I like mighty well to see dat little child, Polly," was all he said. Then he closed his eyes and lay halfsmiling But Polly sat still, thinking hard She had a sudden feeling that nobody in the world, not her mother, not Rudolph, or anyone, really loved her as much as old Rosicky did It perplexed her She sat frowning and trying to puzzle it out. It was as if Rosicky had a special gift for loving people, something that was like an ear for music or an eye for colour It was quiet, 40 unobtrusive, it was merely there You saw it in his eyes,-perhaps that was why they were merry You felt it in his hands, too After he dropped off to sleep, she sat holding his warm, broad, flexible brown hand She had never seen another in the least like it. She wondered if it wasn't a kind of gypsy hand, it was so alive and quick and light in its communications,-very strange in a farmer Nearly all the farmers she knew had huge lumps of fists, like mauls, or they were knotty and bony and uncomfortable-looking, with stiff fingers. But Rosicky's hand was like quicksilver, flexible, muscular, about the colour of a pale cigar, with deep, deep creases across the palm. It wasn't nervous, it wasn't a stupid lump, it was a warm brown human hand, with some cleverness in it, a great deal of generosity, and something else which Polly could only call "gypsylike, —something nimble and lively and sure, in the way that animals are

Polly remembered that hour long afterward, it had been like an awakening to her. It seemed to her that she had never learned so much about life from anything 40 as from old Rosicky's hand. It brought her to herself, it communicated some direct and untranslatable message.

When she heard Rudolph coming in the car, she ran out to meet him

"Oh, Rudy your father's been awful sick! He raked up those thistles he's been worrying about and afterwards he could hardly get to the house. He suffered so I was afraid he was going to die."

Rudolph jumped to the ground "Where is he now?" 70 "On the bed He's asleep 1 was terribly scared, because, you know, I'm so fond of your father." She slipped her arm through his and they went into the house. That afternoon they took Rosicky home and put him to bed, though he protested that he was quite well again.

The next morning he got up and dressed and sat down to breakfast with his family. He told Mary that his coffee tasted better than usual to him, and he warned the boys not to bear any tales to Doctor Ed when he Bu got home. After breakfast he sat down by his window to do some patching and asked Mary to thread several needles for him before she went to feed her chickens. -her eyes were better than his, and her hands steadier He lit his pipe and took up John's overalls. Mary had been watching him anxiously all morning, and as she went out of the door with her bucket of scraps, she saw that he was smiling. He was thinking, indeed, about Polly, and how he might never have known what a tender heart she had if he hadn't got sick over there on Girls nowadays didn't wear their heart on their sleeve. But now he knew Polly would make a fine woman after the foolishness wore off. Either a woman had that sweetness at her heart or she hadn't You couldn't always tell by the look of them, but if they had that, everything came out right in the end.

After he had taken a few stitches, the cramp began in his chest, like yesterday. He put his pipe cautiously down on the window-sill and bent over to ease the pull No use,—he had better try to get to his bed if he could He rose and groped his way across the familiar floor, which was rising and falling like the deck of a ship. At the door he fell. When Mary came in, she found him lying there, and the moment she touched him she knew that he was gone.

Docto: Ed was away when Rosicky died, and for the first few weeks after he got home he was hard driven. Every day he said to himself that he must get out to see the family that had lost their father. One soft, warm moonlight night in early summer he started for the farm. His mind was on other things, and not until his road ran by the graveyard did he realize that Rosicky wasn't over there on the hill where the red amplight shone, but here, in the moonlight. He stopped his car, shut off the engine, and sat there for a while.

A sudden hush had fallen on his soul Everything here seemed strangely moving and significant, though signifying what, he did not know Close by the wire fence stood Rosicky's moving-machine, where one of the boys had been cutting hay that afternoon; his own work-horses had been going up and down there. The new-cut hay perfumed all the night air. The moonlight silvered the long, billowy grass that grew over the graves and hid the fence, the few little evergreens stood a out black in it, like shadows in a pool. The sky was very blue and soft, the stars rather faint because the moon was full.

For the first time it struck Doctor Ed that this was really a beautiful graveyard. He thought of city cemeteries, acres of shrubbery and heavy stone, so arranged and lonely and unlike anything in the living world Cities of the dead, indeed, cities of the forgotten, of the "put away." But this was open and free, this little square of long grass which the wind for ever stirred 40 Nothing but the sky overhead, and the many-coloured fields running on until they met that sky. The horses worked here in summer, the neighbours passed on their way to town, and over yonder, in the cornfield, Rosicky's own cattle would be eating fodder as winter came on Nothing could be more undeathlike than this place, nothing could be more right for a man who had helped to do the work of great cities and had always longed for the open country and had got to it at last Rosicky's life seemed to him complete and beautiful

John Dos Passos

1896 •

John Dos Passos' father was a New York lawyer, the son of a Portuguese immigrant, his mother's family lived in Maryland and Virginia. Born in Chicago, Dos Passos (as he has put it) was "carted around a good deal as a child"—to Mexico, England, Europe, Washington City, tidewater Virginia. He prepared for college at Choate School in Wallingford, Connecticut, and was graduated from Harvard, cum laude, in 1916 During World War I he served first with a French ambulance unit and later in the United States Medical Corps as a private. After the war, he went to various parts of Europe and America as a newspaper correspondent

Dos Passos' literary reputation dates from the publication of Three Soldiers in 1921. His importance in modern American literature has steadily grown with the appearance of his subsequent works, the most important of which have been Manhattan Transfer (1925), The 42nd Parallel (1930), 1919 (1932), and The Big Money (1936). The last three works were published as one volume in 1937 with the title U.S.A.

Dos Passos began as an aesthete but soon developed an all-embracing social consciousness. Three Soldiers, one of the best of American novels dealing with World War I, presented the case of an artist to whom army life was intolerably repugnant. In this work, the author was largely concerned with the sympathetic portrayal of the emotional states and problems of an individual In the later works, however, he became concerned primarily with the social pattern Manhattan Transfer was an attempt to give a cross section of New York City, in the portrayal of which he employed a bewilderingly large number of characters and scenes. The technique was so kaleidoscopic that the attention of the reader could not rest for an appreciable length of time upon a single character or situation. The author's aim was a total picture of the social organism in which many individuals were obscurely merged

In the novels which make up U.S.A., Dos Passos retained the social point of view of Manhattan Transfer, but made two significant changes he enlarged his canvas to include the whole of the United States and those parts of Furope where Americans went during the first World War, and he reduced the number of characters so as to give fuller and more intelligible accounts of their lives. Despite the altered treatment, however, his characters still have little individuality and awaken in the reader only a slight interest in them as persons Their life-stories sometimes read like sociological case histories. In addition to the stories of a dozen or more fictional characters, U.S.A. contains three original features interpolated throughout the work the Newsreel. which consists of headlines from the contemporary press, the Camera Eve, which is a kind of stream-of-consciousness or interior monologue giving the narrator's relationship to passing events, and the biographical sketch, which portrays prominent contemporary Americans sometimes in the spirit of eulogy and sometimes, of bitter ironv

U/S/A is the most impressive social novel which has been written thus far in America. Although the author's sympathies are decidedly 'leftist," he is not a professing Communist. His aim is to expose folly, corruption, and injustice wherever he finds them U/S/A, presents an unflattering picture of twentieth-century Americans. One recalls Emerson's judgment on the populations of large cities a century ago. 'These are not men, but hungers, thirsts, fevers, and appetites walking." Above all in U.S.A. is the impression of the domination of individual lives by social and economic forces. Dos Passos offers no constructive solution, but he implies a radical criticism of the society which produces such unfortunate results. His style, which Kazin well calls "a hard, lean, mocking prose," is an efficient instrument for the portrayal of the modern machine age.

Two books which followed U.S.A. indicate that Dos Passos, like other modern authors, has been moving away from, instead of toward, the Communistic position Adventures of a Young Man (1939) shows a character vainly seeking in radical groups a social philosophy in which he can believe The Ground We Stand On (1941) is a series of historical studies of American leaders of the past and their contributions to American thought—for example, Roger Williams and freedom of conscience, Jefferson and civil rights, Franklin and economic opportunity. Evidently, in his search for new bases for a belief to replace his shattered faith in radicalism, Dos Passos has turned to the older American traditions The works in which his newer, more constructive attitude has been presented, however, have not equaled U.S.A. in literary interest

U. S. A

The following selections from U. S A illustrate the various kinds of elements which make up the work. "Newsreel I" is an impressionistic blending of headlines taken from the newspapers at the beginning of the present century, with special emphasis upon the American conquest of the Philippines The method of "The Camera Eye" is that known in modern literature as the "stream of consciousness'—an attempt to reproduce realistically a sequence of private thoughts. In this case, it is the consciousness of a small child—possibly the author himself. The place is Holland at the time of the war between England and the Boers of South Africa, who were of Dutch extraction The child's mother, who is really an American but is mistaken for an Englishwoman, is threatened with violence on a street in Holland "Lover of Mankind" and "Tin Lizzie" illustrate the biographical sketches which are scattered through U.S.A.: the former is an eloquent tribute to Eugene V Debs, the latter an unsympathetic portrait of Henry Ford done with sharp-edged irony

"Mac" begins the fictional story of Mac McCreary, son of a Connecticut factory worker Mac later joins the Industrial Workers of the World in the Northwest and winds up in Mexico running a radical bookstore. Interwoven with Macs story in U.S A. are the stories of J Ward Moorehouse, who attains prosperity and prominence as a New York public relations expert and as publicity director for the Red Cross during World War I; Janey Williams, Moorehouse's secretary, Eleanor Stoddard, who cultivates art at the Chicago Art Institute and in Europe, Charley Anderson, who begins life as an automobile mechanic, makes "big money" in the airplane industry, and dies in an automobile accident, Richard Ellsworth Savage, who serves on important military staffs in Europe during the war and afterward becomes a Washington lobbyist, and several others. These fictional lifehistories aim to present the experiences of representative Americans during the first quarter of the twentieth century

PREFACE

The young man walks fast by himself through the crowd that thins into the night streets, feet are tired from hours of walking, eyes greedy for warm curve of faces, answering flicker of eyes, the set of a head, the lift of a shoulder, the way hands spread and clench, blood tingles with wants, mind is a beehive of hopes buzzing and stinging, muscles ache for the knowledge of jobs, for the roadmender's pick and shovel work, the fisherman's knack with a hook when he hauls on the slithery net from the rail of the lurching trawler the swing of the bridgeman's arm as he slings down the whitehot rivet, the engineer's slow grip wise on the throttle, the dirtfarmer's use of his whole body when, whoaing the mules, he yanks the plow from the furrow. The young man walks by himself searching through the crowd with greedy eyes greedy ears taut to hear, by himself, alone

The streets are empty People have packed into subways, climbed into streetcars and buses, in the stations they've scampered for suburban trains, they've filtered into lodgings and tenements, gone up in elevators into apartmenthouses. In a showwindow two sallow window-dressers in their shirtsleeves are bringing out a dummy girl in a red evening dress, at a corner welders in masks lean into sheets of blue flame repairing a cartrack, a few drunk bums shamble along, a sad streetwalker infidgets under an arclight. From the river comes the deep rumbling whistle of a steamboat leaving dock. A tug hoots far away

The young man walks by himself, fast but not fast enough, far but not far enough (faces slide out of sight talk trails into tattered scraps, footsteps tap fainter in alleys), he must catch the last subway, the streetcar, the bus, run up the gangplanks of all the steamboast register at all the hotels, work in the cities, answer the want ads, learn the trades, take up the jobs, live in all the boardinghouses, sleep in all the beds. One bed is not enough, one job is not enough, one life is not enough. At night, head swimming with wants, he walks by himself alone.

No job, no woman, no house, no city.

Only the ears busy to catch the speech are not alone, the ears are caught tight, linked tight by the tendrils of phrased words, the turn of a joke, the singsong fade of a story, the gruff fall of a sentence; linking tendrils of speech twine through the city blocks, spread over pavements, grow out along broad parked avenues, 40 speed with the trucks leaving on their long night runs over roaring highways, whisper down sandy byroads past wornout farms, joining up cities and fillingstations, roundhouses, steamboats, planes groping along airways, words call out on mountain pastures, drift slow down rivers widening to the sea and the hushed beaches

It was not in the long walks through jostling crowds at night that he was less alone, or in the training camp at Allentown, or in the day on the docks at Seattle, or in the empty reck of Washington City hor boyhood so summer nights, or in the meal on Market Street, or in the swim off the red rocks at San Diego, or in the bed full of fleas in New Orleans, or in the cold razor-wind off the lake, or in the gray faces trembling in the grind of gears in the street under Michigan Avenue, or in the smokers of limited expresstrains, or walking across country, or riding up the dry mountain canyons, or the night without a sleepingbag among frozen beartracks in the Yellowstone, or canoeing Sundays on the Ouinnipiac.

but in his mother's words telling about longago, in his father's telling about when I was a boy, in the kidding stories of uncles, in the lies the kids told at school, the hired man's yarns, the tall tales the doughboys told after taps, it was the speech that clung to the ears, the link that tingled in the blood, U.S.A.

U S A is the slice of a continent U S A is a group of holding companies, some aggregations of trade unions, a set of laws bound in calf, a radio network, 70 a chain of moving picture theatres, a column of stock-quotations rubbed out and written in by a Western Union boy on a blackboard, a publiclibrary full of old newspapers and dogeared historybooks with protests scrawled on the margins in pencil U S A is the world's greatest rivervalley fringed with mountains and hills, U S A is a set of bigmouthed officials with too many bankaccounts U S A is a lot of men buried in their uniforms in Arlington Cemetery U S A is the letters at the end of an address when you are away from home Bur mostly U S A is the speech of the people

General Miles with his gaudy uniform and spirited charger was the center for all eyes especially as his steed was extremely restless Just as the band passed the Commanding General his horse stood upon his 10 hind legs and was almost erect. General Miles instantly reined in the frightened animal and dug in his spurs in an endeavor to control the horse which to the horror of the spectators, fell over backwards and landed squarely on the Commanding General Much to the gratification of the people General Miles was not injured but considerable skin was scraped off the flank of the horse Almost every inch of General Miles's overcoat was covered with the dust of the street and between the shoulders a hole about an inch in diameter was punctured 20 Without waiting for anyone to brush the dust from his garments General Miles remounted his horse and reviewed the parade as if it were an everyday occurrence

The incident naturally attracted the attention of the crowd, and this brought to notice the fact that the Commanding General never permits a flag to be carried past him without uncovering and remaining so until the colors have past

Responding to a toast, Hail Columbia! at the Columbia Club banquet in Indianapolis, Ind., ex-President Benjamin Harrison said in part. I have no argument to make here or anywhere against territorial expansion, but I do not, as some do, look upon territorial expansion as the safest and most attractive avenue of national development. By the advantages of abundant and cheap coal and iron, of an enormous overproduction of tood products and of invention and economy in production, we are now leading by the nose the original and the greatest of the colonizing nations.

When the wind set from the silver factories across the river the air of the grav fourfamily frame house where Fainy McCreary was born was choking all day with the smell of whaleoil soap. Other days it smelt of cabbage and babies and Mrs. McCreary's washboilers Fainy could never play at home because Pop, a lame cavechested man with a whispy blondegray mustache, was nightwatchman with a whispy blondegray mustache, was nightwatchman to the Chadwick Mills and slept all day. It was only round five o'clock that a curling whiff of tobacco smoke would seep through from the front room into the kitchen. That was a sign that Pop was up and in good spirits, and would soon be wanting his supper.

Then Fainy would be sent running out to one of two corners of the short muddy street of identical frame houses where they lived

To the right it was half a block to Finley's where he would have to wait at the bar in a forest of mudsplattered 70 trouserlegs until all the rank brawling mouths of grown-ups had been stopped with beers and whiskeys. Then he would walk home, making each step very carefully, with the handle of the pail of suds cutting into his hand.

To the left it was half a block to Maginnis's Fancy Groceries, Home and Imported Products Fainy liked the cardboard Cream of Wheat darkey in the window, the glass case with different kinds of salami in it, the barrels of potatoes and cabbages, the brown smell of sugar, sawdust, ginger, kippered herring, ham, vinegar, bread, pepper, lard

"A loaf of bread, please, mister, a half pound of butter and a box of ginger snaps."

Some evenings when Mom felt poorly, Fainy had to go further, round the corner past Maginnis's, down Riverside Avenue where the trolley ran, and across the red bridge over the little river that flowed black between icy undercut snowbanks in winter, yellow and spuming in the spring thaws, brown and oily in summer Across the river all the way to the corner of Riverside and Main, where the drugstore was, lived Bohunks and Polaks Their kids were always fighting with the kids of the Murphys and O'Haras and O'Flanagans who lived on Orchard Street

Fainy would walk along with his knees quaking, the medicine bottle in its white paper tight in one mittened hand. At the corner of Quince was a group of boys he'd have to pass Passing wasn't so bad, it was when he was about twenty yards from them that the first snowball would hum by his ear. There was no comeback. If he broke into a run, they'd chase him. If he dropped the medicine bottle he'd be beaten up when he got home. A soft one would plunk on the back of his head and the snow began to trickle down his neck. When he was a half a block from the bridge he d take a chance and run for it. "Scared car." Shory, Irish a Paralle of the property of the same and run for it.

"Scared cat Shanty Irish Bowlegged Murphy Running home to tell the cop" would yell the Polak and Bohunk kids between snowballs. They made their snowballs hard by pouring water on them and leaving them to freeze overnight, if one of those hit him it drew blood

The backyard was the only place you could really feel safe to play in. There were brokendown fences, dented garbage cans, old pots and pans too nearly sieves to mend, a vacant chickencoop that still had feathers and droppings on the floor, hogweed in summer, mud in winter, to but the glory of the McCreary's backyard was Tony Harriman's rabbit hutch, where he kept Belgian hares. Tony Harriman was a consumptive and lived with his mother on the ground floor left. He wanted to raise all sorts of other small animals too, raccoons, otter, even silver fox, he'd get rich that way. The day he died nobody could find the key to the big padlock on the door of the rabbit hutch. Fainy fed the hares for several days by pushing in cabbage and lettuce leaves through the double thickness of chickenwire Then came a week of sleet and rain when he didn't go out in the yard The first fine day, when he went to look, one of the hares was dead Fainy turned white, he tried to tell himself the hare was asleep, but it lay gawkily stiff, not asleep. The other hares were huddled in a corner looking about with twitching noses, their big ears flopping helpless over their backs Poor hares Fainy wanted to cry He ran upstairs to his mother's kitchen, ducked under the ironing board and got the hammer out of the drawer in the kitchen table. The first time he tried he mashed his finger, but the second time he managed to jump the padlock. Inside the cage there was . a funny, sour smell Fainy picked the dead hare up by its ears Its soft white belly was beginning to puff up, one dead eye was scaringly open Something suddenly got hold of Fainy and made him drop the hare in the nearest garbage can and run upstairs Still cold and trembling, he tiptoed out onto the back porch and looked down Breathlessly he watched the other hares By cautious hops they were getting near the door of the hutch into the yard One of them was out It sat up on its hind legs, limp ears suddenly stiff. Mom called him to bring her a flatiron from the stove. When he got back to the porch the hares were all gone

That winter there was a strike in the Chadwick Mills and Pop lost his job. He would sit all day in the front room smoking and cursing

"Ablebodied man by Jesus, if I couldn't lick any one of those damn Polaks with my crutch tied behind my back. I says so to Mr Barry, I ain't goin' to join no strike Mr Barry, a sensible quiet man, a bit of an invalid with a wife an' kiddies to think for Eight years I've been watchman, an' now you give me the sack to take on a bunch of thugs from a detective agency. The dirty pugnosed son of a bitch."

"If those damn lousy furreners hadn't a walked out," somebody would answer soothingly

The strike was not popular on Orchard Street It meant that Mom had to work harder and harder, doing bigger and bigger boilersful of wash, and that Fainy and his older sister Milly had to help when they came home from school. And then one day Mom got sick and had to go back to bed instead of starting in on the ironing, and lay with her round white creased face whiter than the pillow and her watercreased hands in a knot under her chin. The doctor came and the district nurse, and all three rooms of the flat smelt of doctors and nurses and drugs, and the only place Fainy and Milly could find to sit was on the stairs. There they sat and cried quietly together Then Mom's face on the pillow shrank into a little creased white thing like a rumpled up handkerchief and they said that she was dead and took her away

The funeral was from the undertaking parlors on 10 Riverside Avenue on the next block Fainy felt very proud and important because everybody kissed him and patted his head and said he was behaving like a little man He had a new black suit on, too, like a grownup suit with pockets and everything, except that it had short pants There were all sorts of people at the undertaking parlors he had never been close to before, Mr Russell, the butcher and Father O'Donnell and Uncle Tim O Hara who'd come on from Chicago, and it smelt of whisky and beer like at Finley's Uncle Tim was a skinny man 20 with a knobbed red face and blurry blue eyes. He wore a loose black silk tie that worried Fainy, and kept leaning down suddenly, bending from the waist as if he was going to close up like a jackknife, and whispering in a thick voice in Fainv's ear

"Don't you mind 'em, old sport, they're a bunch o' bums and hypocrytes, stewed to the ears most of 'em already Look at Father O'Donnell the fat swine already figurin' up the burial fees. But don't you mind 'em, remember you're an O'Hara on your mother's side. I don't mind 'em, old sport, and she was my own sister by birth and blood."

When they got home he was terribly sleepy and his feet were cold and wet. Nobody paid any attention to him He sat whimpering on the edge of the bed in the dark. In the front room there were voices and a sound of knives and forks, but he didn't dare go in there. He curled up against the wall and went to sleep. Light in his eyes woke him up. Uncle Tim and Pop were standing over him talking loud. They looked funny and didn't seem to be standing very steady. Uncle Tim held the lamp.

"Well, Fainy, old sport," said Uncle Tim giving the lamp a perilous wave over Fainy's head "Fenian O'Hara McCreary, sit up and take notice and tell us what you think of our proposed removal to the great and growing city of Chicago Middletown's a terrible bitch of a dump if you ask me . . . Meanin' no offense John Bur Chicago . . Jesus God, man, when you get there you'll think you've been dead and nailed up in a coffin all these years"

Fainy was scared He drew his knees up to his chin and 50 looked tremblingly at the two big swaying figures of men lit by the swaying lamp. He tried to speak but the words dried up on his lips

"The kid's asleep, Tim, for all your speechifyin' Take your clothes off, Fainy, and get into bed and get a good night's sleep. We're leaving in the mornin'."

And late on a rainy morning, without any breakfast, with a big old swelltop trunk tied up with rope joggling perilously on the roof of the cab that Fainy had been sent to order from Hodgeson's Livery Stable, they set out 60 Milly was crying. Pop didn't say a word but sucked on an unlit pipe. Uncle Tim handled everything, making little jokes all the time that nobody laughed at, pulling a roll of bills out of his pocket at every juncture, or taking great gurgling sips out of the flask he had in his pocket Milly cried and cried. Fainy looked out with big dry eyes at the familiar streets, all suddenly odd and lopsided, that rolled past the cab, the red bridge, the scabshingled houses where the Polaks lived, Smith's and Smith's corthere was Billy Hogan just coming 70 out with a package of chewing gum in his hand. Playing hookey again. Fainy had an impulse to yell at him, but something froze it . Main with its elms and street cars, blocks of stores round the corner of Church, and then the fire department. Fainy looked for the last time into the dark cave where shone entrancingly the brass and copper curves of the engine, then past the cardboard fronts of the First Congregational Church, The Carmel Baptist Church, St. Andrew's Episcopal Church built of brick and set catercornered on its lot instead of straight 80 with a stern face to the street like the other churches, then the three castiron stags on the lawn in front of the Commercial House, and the residences, each with its lawn, each with its scrollsaw porch, each with its hydrangea bush Then the houses got smaller, and the lawns disappeared, the cab trundled round past Si npson's Grain and Feed Warehouse, along a row of barbershops, saloons and lunchrooms, and they were all getting out at the station

At the station lunchcounter Uncle Tim set everybody up to breakfast. He dried Milly's tears and blew Fainy's so nose in a big new pockethandkerchief that still had the tag on the corner and set them to work on bacon and eggs.

and coffee. Fainy hadn't had coffee before, so the idea of sitting up like a man and drinking coffee made him feel pretty good. Milly didn't like hers, said it was bitter. They were left all alone in the lunchroom for sometime with the empty plates and empty coffee cups under the beady eyes of a woman with the long neck and pointed face of a hen who looked at them disapprovingly from behind the counter. Then with an enormous, shattering rumble, sludgepuff sludge — puff, the train came into the station. They were scooped up and dragged across the platform and through a pipesmoky car and before they knew it the train was moving and the wintry russet. Connecticut landscape was clattering by.

LOVER OF MANKIND

Debs was a railroad man, born in a weather-boarded shack at Terre Haute

He was one of ten children

His father had come to America in a sailingship in '49, an Alsatian from Colmar, not much of a money-maker, fond of music and reading.

20 he gave his children a chance to finish public school and that was about all he could do

At fifteen Gene Debs was already working as a machinist on the Indianapolis and Terre Haute Railway. He worked as locomotive fireman

clerked in a store

joined the local of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, was elected secretary, traveled all over the country as organizer

He was a tall shamblefooted man, had a sort of 30 gusty rhetoric that set on fire the railroad workers in their pineboarded halls made them want the world he wanted, a world brothers might own where everybody would split even

I am not a labor leader I don't want you to follow me or anyone else. If you are looking for a Moses to lead you out of the capitalist wilderness you will stay right where you are I would not lead you into this promised land if I could, because if I could lead you so in, someone else would lead you out.

That was how he talked to freighthandlers and gandywalkers, to firemen and switchmen and engineers, telling them it wasn't enough to organize the railroadmen, that all workers must be organized, that all workers must be organized in the workers' cooperative commonwealth

Locomotive fireman on many a long night's run, under the smoke a fire burned him up, burned in gusty words that beat in pineboarded halls, he wanted his brothers to be free men.

That was what he saw in the crowd that met him at the Old Wells Street Depot when he came out of jail after the Pullman strike, those were the men that chalked up nine hundred thousand votes for him in nineteen twelve and scared the frockcoats and the tophats and diamonded hostesses at Saratoga Springs, Bar Harbor, Lake Geneva with the bogy of a socialist president

But where were Gene Debs' brothers in nineteen eighteen when Woodrow Wilson had him locked up in Atlanta for speaking against war.

where were the big men fond of whisky and fond of each other, gentle rambling tellers of stories over bars in small towns in the Middle West, quiet men who wanted a house with a porch to putter around and a fat wife to cook for them, a few drinks and cigars, a garden to dig in, cronies to chew the rag with and wanted to work for it and others to work for it, where were the locomotive firemen and engineers when they hustled him oft to Atlanta Penitentiary?

And they brought him back to die in Terre Haute to sit on his porch in a rocker with a cigar in his mouth.

Mr Ford the automobileer" the featurewriter wrote in 1900,

"Mr. Ford the automobileer began by giving his steed three or four sharp jerks with the level at the righthand side of the seat; that is, he pulled the level up and down sharply in order, as he said, to mix ur with gasoline and drive the charge into the exploding cylinder Ford slipped a small electric switch handle and there followed a puff. puff. puff The puffing of the machine assumed a higher key. She was flying along about eight miles an hour The ruts in the road were deep, but the machine certainly went with a dieamlike smoothness. There was none of the humping common even to a streetcar. . . By this time the houlevard had been reached, and the automobilees, letting a lever fall a little, let her out Whiz! She picked up speed with infinite rapidity. As she ran on there was a clattering behind, the new noise of the automobile

For twenty years or more, ever since he'd left his father's farm when he was sixteen to get a job in a Detroit machineshop, Henry Ford had been nuts about machinery. First it was watches, then he designed a steamtractor, then he built a horseless carriage with in engine adapted from the Otto gisengine he diread about in The World of Science, then a mechanical buggs with a onecylinder fourcycle motor that would run forward but not back, at last, in ninctyeight he felt he was far enough along to risk throwing up his job with the Detroit Edison Company, where he'd worked his way up from night 30 fireman to chief engineer, to put all his time into working on a new gasonine engine.

on the late eighties hed met Edison at a meeting of electriclight employees in Atlantic City. He'd gone up to Edison after Edison had delivered an address and asked him if he thought gasoline was practical as a motor fuel. Edison had said ves. If I dison said it, it was true Edison was the great admiration of Henry Ford's life), and in driving his mechanical buggy, sitting there is at the lever jauntily dressed in a tightbuttoned jacket and a high collar and a derby hat, back and forth over the level illpived streets of Detroit,

¹ Mr Ford Henry Ford was born in 1862 • 33 Edison, Thomas A Edison (1847-1931), the electrical wizard

He was the eldest son of an Irish immigrant who during the Civil War had married the daughter of a prosperous Pennsylvania Dutch farmer and settled down to farming near Dearborn in Wayne County, Michigan:

like plenty of other Americans, young Henry grew up hating the endless sogging through the mud about the chores, the hauling and pitching manure, the kerosene lamps to clean, the irk and sweat and solitude of 10 the farm

He was a slender, active youngster, a good skater, clever with his hands, what he liked was to tend the machinery and let the others do the heavy work. His mother had told him not to drink, smoke, gamble or go into debt, and he never did

When he was in his early twenties his father tried to get him back from Detroit, where he was working as mechanic and repairman for the Drydock Engine Company that built the engines for steamboats, by giving 20 him forty acres of land

Young Henry built himself an uptodate square white dwellinghouse with a false mansard roof and married and settled down on the farm.

but he let the hired men do the farming, he bought himself a buzzsaw and rented a stationary engine and cut the timber off the woodlots

He was a thrifty young man who never drank or smoked or gambled or coveted his neighbor's wife, but he couldn't stand living on the farm

He moved to Detroit, and in the brick barn behind his house tinkered for years in his spare time with a mechanical buggy that would be light enough to run over the clayey wagonroads of Wayne County, Michigan

By 1900 he had a practicable car to promote

He was forty years old before the Ford Motor Company was started and production began to move

Speed was the first thing the early automobile manufacturers went after Races advertised the makes of cars Henry Ford himself hung up several records at the 40 track at Grosse Pointe and on the ice on Lake St Clair In his 999 he did the mile in thirtynine and fourfifths seconds

But it had always been his custom to hire others to do the heavy work. The speed he was busy with was speed in production, the records records in efficient output He hired Barney Oldfield, a stunt bicyclerider from Salt Lake City, to do the racing for him.

Henry Ford had ideas about other things than the designing of motors, carburetors, magnetos, jigs and fixtures, punches and dies, he had ideas about sales, that the big money was in economical quantity production, quick turnover, cheap interchangeable easilyreplaced standardized parts, it wasn't until 1909, after years of arguing with his partners, that Ford put out the first Model T

Henry Ford was right

That season he sold more than ten thousand tin lizzies, ten years later he was selling almost a million a year

In these years the Taylor Plan was stirring up plantmanagers and manufacturers all over the country Efficiency was the word. The same ingenuity that went into improving the performance of a machine could go into improving the performance of the workmen producing the machine

In 1913 they established the assemblyline at Ford's That season the profits were something like twentyfive million dollars, but they had trouble keeping the men on the job, machinists didn't seem to like it at Ford's

Henry Ford had ideas about other things than 7 production

He was the largest automobile manufacturer in the world, he paid high wages, maybe if the steady workers thought they were getting a cut (a very small cut) in the profits, it would give trained men an inducement to stick to their jobs, wellpaid workers might save enough money to buy a tin lizzie, the first day Ford's announced that cleancut properlymarried American workers who wanted jobs had a chance to make five bucks a day (of course it & turned out that there were strings to it, always there were strings to it)

⁶⁰ Taylor Plan, the science of industrial management founded by Frederick W Taylor (1856 1915) such an enormous crowd waited outside the Highland Park plant

all through the zero January night that there was a riot when the gates were opened; cops broke heads, jobhunters threw bricks, property, Henry Ford's own property, was destroyed. The company dicks had to turn on the firehose to beat back the crowd.

The American Plan, automotive prosperity seeping to down from above, it turned out there were strings to it.

But that five dollars a day paid to good, clean American workmen who didn't drink or smoke cigarettes or read or think, and who didn't commit adultery and whose wives didn't take in boarders, made America once more the Yukon of the sweated workers of the world made all the tin lizzies and the automotive age, and incidentally, made Henry Ford the automobileer, the admirer of Edison, the birdlover, the great American of his time

But Henry Ford had ideas about other things besides assemblylines and the livinghabits of his employees. He was full of ideas. Instead of going to the city to make his fortune, here was a country boy who'd made his fortune by bringing the city out to the farm. The precepts he'd learned out of McGuffey's Reader, his mother's prejudices and preconceptions, he had preserved clean and unworn as freshprinted bills in the safe in a bank.

He wanted people to know about his ideas, so he bought the Dearborn Independent and started a campaign against cigarettesmoking

When war broke out in Europe, he had ideas about that too. (Suspicion of armymen and soldiering were part of the midwest farm tradition, like thrift, stickativeness, temperance and sharp practice in money matters.) Any intelligent American mechanic could see that if the Europeans hadn't been a lot of ignorant underpaid foreigners who drank, smoked, were loose about women and wasteful in their methods of production, the war could never have happened

When Rosika Schwimmer broke through the stockade of secretaries and servicemen who surrounded Henry Ford and suggested to him that he could stop the war, he said sure they'd hire a ship and go over and get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas

He hired a steamboat, the Occar II, and filled it up with pacifists and socialworkers.

to go over to explain to the princelings of Europe that what they were doing was vicious and silly

It wasn't his fault that Poor Richard's commonsense no lenger rules the world and that most of the pacifists were nuts,

goody with headlines

When William lennings Bryan went over to Hoboken to see him off, somebody handed William Jennings Bryan a squirrel in a cage, William Jennings Bryan made a speech with the squirrel under his arm. Henry Ford so threw American Beauty roses to the crowd. The band played I. Daln t. Ratte. My Boy to Be a Soldier. Practical jokers let loose more squirrels. An eloping couple was married by a platoon of ministers in the saloon, and Mr. Zero, the flophouse humanitarian, who reached the dock too late to sail.

dove into the North River and swam after the boat The Otear II was described as a floating Chautauqua, Henry Ford said it felt like a middlewestern village, but by the time they reached Christiansand in Norway, the reporters had kidded him so that he had gotten cold feet and gone to bed. The world was too crazy outside of Wayne County, Michigan. Mrs. Ford and the management sent an Episcopal dean after him who brought him home under wraps, and the pacifists had to speechify without him

Two years later Ford's was manufacturing munitions, Eagle boats, Henry Ford was planning oneman tanks, and oneman submarines like the one tried out in the Revolutionary War. He announced to the press that he'd 80 turn over his war profits to the government,

²⁸ McGuffey's Reader, the most popular of all schoolbooks in the United States during the nineteenth century • 44 Rosika Schwimmer, a Hungarian feminist and pacifist, largely responsible for the idea of the 'peace ship.' • 47 ship. Ford's peace ship'' sailed from Hoboken, December 4, 1915

but there's no record that he ever did

One thing he brought back from his trip was the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

He started a campaign to enlighten the world in the Dearborn Independent; the Jews were why the world wasn't like Wayne County, Michigan, in the old horse and buggy days;

the Jews had started the war, Bolshevism, Darwinism, Marxism, Nietzsche, short skirts and lipstick. They 10 were behind Wall Street and the international bankers, and the whiteslave traffic and the movies and the Supreme Court and ragtime and the illegal liquor business.

Henry Ford denounced the Jews and ran for senator and sued the Chicago Tribune for libel, and was the laughingstock of the kept metropolitan press;

but when the metropolitan bankers tried to horn in on his business

he thoroughly outsmarted them

In 1918 he had borrowed on notes to buy out his minority stockholders for the picayune sum of seventyfive million dollars

In February, 1920, he needed cash to pay off some of these notes that were coming due A banker is supposed to have called on him and offered him every facility if the bankers' representative could be made a member of the board of directors. Henry Ford handed the banker his hat, and went about raising the money in his own way he shipped every car and part he had in his plant to his dealers and demanded immediate cash payment Let the other fellow do the borrowing had always been a cardinal principle. He shut down production and canceled all orders from the supplyfirms. Many dealers were ruined, many supplyfirms failed, but when he reopened his plant, he owned it absolutely,

the way a man owns an unmortgaged farm with the taxes paid up.

In 1922 there started the Ford boom for President (high wages, waterpower, industry scattered to the small towns) that was skillfully pricked behind the scenes by another crackerbarrel philosopher, but in 1922 Henry Ford sold one million three hundred and thirtytwo thousand two hundred and nine tin lizzies; he was the richest man in the world.

Calvin Coolidge;

Good roads had followed the narrow ruts made in the mud by the Model T. The great automotive boom was on. At Ford's production was improving all the time, less waste, more spotters, strawbosses, stool pigeons (fifteen minutes for lunch, three minutes to go to the toilet, the Taylorized speedup everywhere, reach under adjust washer, screw down bolt, shove in cotterpin reachunder adjustwasher, screwdown bolt, reachunderadjustwasher, screwdown bolt, reachunderadjustscrewdownreachunderadjust until every ounce of life was sucked off into production and at night the workmen went home grey shaking husks).

Ford owned every detail of the process from the ore in the hills until the car rolled off the end of the assemblyline under its own power, the plants were rationalized to the last tenthousandth of an inch as measured by the Johansen scale;

in 1926 the production cycle was reduced to eightyone hours from the ore in the mine to the finished salable car proceeding under its own power, but the Model T was obsolete.

New Era prosperity and the American Plan

(there were strings to it, always there were strings to it) had killed Tin Lizzie.

Ford's was just one of many automobile plants.

When the stockmarket bubble burst,

Mr Ford the crackerbarrel philosopher said jubilantly,

"I told you so

Serves you right for gambling and getting in debt The country is sound."

But when the country on cracked shoes, in frayed trousers, belts tightened over hollow bellies, idle hands cracked and chapped with the cold of that coldest March day of 1932,

John Steinbeck

1902 •

The foremost young American novelist of the Great Depression, which is to say of the decade between 1930 and 1940, was a Californian, John Steinbeck What he had to say, basically, was that life goes on, is indestructible, although its forms may change and vast numbers of individual lives may be snuffed out by the catastrophic and inscrutable forces of nature. The world of Steinbeck, like that of Robinson Jeffers, is cruelly impersonal, but the conclusions of the two writers.

are almost diametrically opposed. Jeffers finds the human race little short of contemptible, Steinbeck, fully aware of the meanness and impotence of humanity, is temperamentally hopeful, an admirer of the infinite manifestations of adaptability in living organisms. It is not surprising that Steinbeck found an eager audience in an era everywhere darkened by bankruptcy, unemployment, and a sense of possible failure in the struggle for survival. He was called "Communist" and "left-wing visionary" by men angered by his tenderness for the victims of change and his broad hint of social revolution, but time has made it clear that Steinbeck is something more than a "proletarian" novelist He is as close to being a philosopher as any popular living writer.

Steinbeck was born at Salinas, California, in 1902. He grew up in a rich but strike-tormented valley where he learned at first hand of the life of the agricultural and factory workers. From 1919 through 1925 he attended Stanford University, taking the courses that attracted him without worrying about degree requirements and dropping out now and then to work as a common laborer. Already determined to be a writer, he contributed to the university magazines and, after leaving Stanford, worked briefly as a reporter in New York City. Illness helped send him back to California and a job as caretaker on a mountain estate. His first published book, Cup of Gold, is said to be the fourth that he wrote. It appeared in August 1929, the month before the collapse of the stock market.

Cup of Gold is a fictionized biography of Sir Henry Morgan, a seventeenth-century buccaneer, it is chiefly noteworthy for its foreshadowing of Steinbeck's fondness for symbolic and poetic techniques. It was followed by The Pastures of Heaven (1932), a series of short stories about the folk of a California valley, and by To a God Unknown (1933), a mystical novel about a man's passion for the land which he was determined to make his permanent home. None of these books attracted much attention.

Steinbeck's popularity began with Tortilla Flat (1935), although we are told that nine publishers rejected it before it was accepted by Covici. A series of stories about the paisano of the Monterey peninsula, it remains a favorite with many of his readers. In Dubious Battle, a strike novel which is Steinbeck's most clearly "proletarian" story, appeared in 1936, Of Mice and Men, a novelette in 1937, The Long Valley, a collection of short stories, in 1938. Of Mice and Men was selected by the Book-of-the-Month Club for distribution in February 1937 and was soon a best seller, by the end of the year a dramatic version was packing in the customers in a New York theater. Steinbeck's most widely known work, however, is The Grapes of Wrath (1939), a novel on the migration of agricultural workers from the Oklahoma dust bowl to the green but preempted fields and groves of California. It roused the wrath of Oklahomans and owning-class Californians, awakened the rest of the country to the economic plight of dispossessed farmers, and was in due course awarded the Pulitzer Prize for fiction.

In some ways the best introduction to the mature Steinbeck are two books which appeared in 1941 The Forgotten Village is a book of photographs with brief accompanying captions Based upon a documentary film on the clash between magic and medical science in a small Mexican village, it is a vivid exemplification of Steinbeck's abiding confidence that man can be improved by patience and genuine affection Sea of Cortez. written in collaboration with Edward T. Ricketts, a marine biologist, is an account of an expedition to the Gulf of California and perhaps the fullest revelation of Steinbeck's preoccupation with the philosophy of science

Other and more popular works in the last few years are The Moon Is Down (1942), a short novel on the Nazi occupation of Norway which was made into a successful play and (like several of the earlier stories) a moving picture, Bombs Augy (1942), an account of the life of a British-based air squadron, and Canners Row (1945), a series of stories of Monterey, similar in many ways to Tortilla Flat. At the present time there is probably no American writer more "established" than John Steinbeck He had his years of discouragement but he was fortunate in never cultivating the somewhat meretricious fluency which often succeeds in the popular magazines Now, well free of the economic pressure which produces potboilers, he can write what he wishes to write with assurance that he will be read with respect Since he has something to say about modern life, his work stands out as honest and frequently memorable

Because he deals often in symbols and abstract ideas, he is sometimes a puzzle to the critics. Most often, perhaps, Steinbeck has been called a primitivist, and it is true that he tends to glorify rudimentary folk, people who, as he said in 1937 in a Foreword to Tortilla Flat. "merge successfully with their habitat." Yet Steinbeck combines, as Frederick Ives Carpenter has pointed out, several of the great skeins of American thought the mystical monism which gave

Emerson his trust in the essential goodness of the common man, the sense of the mass or the social democracy with which Whitman tempered Emersonian individualism, and that recognition of the necessity of effective action which is the core of pragmatism, sometimes called the most characteristic of American philosophical positions. A sensitive and intelligent man, fully aware of the enormity of human failure, Steinbeck still finds a core of goodness in men and women, a zest in living which is perhaps more essential for survival than an understanding of life

The Pirate

How Danny's Friends Became a Force for Good.

How They Succored the Poor Pirate

In 1937, writing a Foreword to The Modern Library edition of Tortilla Flat, Steinbeck remarked that had he known that his stories of the paisanos would be considered quaint he might not have written them He liked Danny and his Monterey friends, and his original Preface compared them to the knights of the Round Table-a group of men "from which came sweetness and joy, philanthropy and, in the end, a mystic sorrow." The book consists of seventeen chapters, of which the following is the seventh Danny, "a mixture of Spanish, Indian, Mexican, and assorted Caucasian bloods," has returned from the war (he broke mules in Texas) to find that he is a property owner, having inherited two small houses from his grandfather. His friends join him-first Pilon, then Pablo, then Jesus Maria Corcoran When the house that they have rented from Danny burns down, they move in with him and, in a grateful moment, swear that there will always be food in the house for Danny. It is this yow which explains Pilon's concern about the Pirate The simple phythmical style, the suggestion of Spanish speech in the dialogue, and the affectionate characterization are typical of the entire book.

A great many people saw the Pirate every day, and some laughed at him, and some pitted him, but no one knew nim very well, and no one interfered with him. He was a huge, broad man, with tremendous black and bushy beard. He wore jeans and a blue shirt, and he had no hat In town he wore shoes. There was a shrinking in the Pirate's eyes when he confronted any grown person, the secret look of an animal that would like to run away if it dared turn its back long enough. Because of this expression, the pusanos of Monterey knew that his head had not grown up with the rest of his body. They called him The Pirate because of his beard. Every day people saw him wheeling his barrow of pitchwood about the streets until he sold the load. And always in a cluster at his heels walked his five dogs.

Enrique was rather houndish in appearance, although his tail was bushy. Pajarito was brown and curly, and these were the only two things you could see about him. Rudolph was a dog of whom passers-by said, "He is an American dog." Fluft was a Pug and Señor Alec Thompson seemed to be a kind of an Airedale. They walked in a squad behind the Pirate, very respectful toward him, and very solicitous for his happiness. When he sat down to rest from wheeling his barrow, they all tried to sit in his lap and have their ears scratched.

Some people had seen the Pirate early in the morning on Alvarado Street, some had seen him cutting pitchwood, some knew he sold kindling, but no one except Pilon knew everything the Pirate did Pilon knew everybody and everything about everybody

The Pirate lived in a deserted chicken house in the yard of a deserted house on Tortilla Flat. He would have thought it presumptuous to live in the house itself. The dogs lived around and on top of him, and the Pirate liked this, for his dogs kept him warm on the coldest nights If his feet were cold, he had only to put them against the warm belly of Señor Alec Thompson. The chicken house was so low that the Pirate had to crawl in on his hands and knees

Early every morning, well before daylight, the Pirate crawled out of his chicken house, and the dogs followed him, roughing their coats and sneezing in the cold air Then the party went down to Monterey and worked 10 along an alley Four or five restaurants had their back doors on this alley The Pirate entered each one, into a restaurant kitchen, warm and smelling of food Grumbling cooks put packages of scraps in his hands at each place They didn't know why they did it

When the Pirate had visited each back door and had his arms full of parcels, he walked back up the hill to Munroe Street and entered a vacant lot, and the dogs excitedly swarmed about him. Then he opened the parcels and fed the dogs. For himself, he took bread or a piece of meat out of each package, but he did not pick the best for himself. The dogs sat down about him, licking their lips nervously, and shifting their feet while they waited for food. They never fought over it and that was a surprising thing. The Pirate's dogs never fought each other, but they fought everything else that wandered the streets of Monterey on four legs. It was a fine thing to see the pack of five, hunting fox-terriers and Pomeranians like rabbits.

Daylight had come by the time the meal was over 30 The Pirate sat on the ground and watched the sky turn blue with the morning Below him he saw the schooners put out to sea with deckloads of lumber He heard the bell buoy ringing sweetly off China Point. The dogs sat about him and gnawed at the bones. The Pirate seemed to be listening to the day rather than seeing it, for while his eyes did not move about, there was an air of attentiveness in him. His big hands strayed to the dogs and his fingers worked soothingly in the coarse hair After about half an hour, the Pirate went to the corner 40 of the vacant lot, threw the covering of sacks from his wheelbarrow and dug up his ax out of the ground where he buried it every evening. Then up the hill he pushed the barrow, and into the woods, until he found a dead tree, full of pitch. By noon he had a load of fine kindling, and then, still followed by his dogs, he walked the streets until he had sold the load for twenty-five cents

It was possible to observe all this, but what he did with the quarter, no one could tell. He never spent it. In the night, guarded from danger by his dogs, he went into the woods and hid the day's quarter with hundreds of a others. Somewhere he had a great hoard of money

Pilon, that acute man, from whom no details of the life of his fellows escaped, and who was doubly delighted to come upon those secrets that nestled deep in the brains of his acquaintances, discovered that Pirate's hoard by a logical process Pilon reasoned thus "Every day that Pirate has a quarter If it is two dimes and a nickel, he takes it to a store and gets a twenty-five cent piece. He never spends any money at all. Therefore, he must be hiding it."

Pilon tried to compute the amount of the treasure For years the Pirate had been living in this way. Six days a week he cut pitchwood, and on Sundays he went to church. His clothes he got from the back doors of houses his food at the back doors of restaurants. Pilon puzzled with the great numbers for a while, and then gave it up "The Pirate must have at least a hundred dollars," he thought

For a long time Pilon had considered these things But it was only after the foolish and enthusiastic promise to feed Danny that the thought of the Pirate's hoard gained any personal significance to Pilon

Before he approached the subject at all, Pilon put his mind through a long and stunning preparation. He felt very sorry for the Pirate "Poor little half-formed one." he said to himself "God did not give him all the brain he should have That poor little Pirate cannot look after himself For see, he lives in filth in an old chicken house. He feeds upon scraps fit only for his dogs. His clothes are thin and ragged. And because his brain is a not a good one, he hides his money."

Now, with his groundwork of pity laid. Pilon moved on to his solution "Would it not be a thing of merit," he thought, "to do those things for him which he cannot do for himself? To buy him warm clothes to feed him food fit for a human? But," he reminded himself, "I have no money to do these things, although they lie squirming in my heart. How can these charitable things be accomplished?"

Now he was getting somewhere. Like the car, which somewhere a long hour closes in on a sparrow, Pilon was ready for his pounce. "I have it," his brain cried, "It is like this: The Pirate has money, but he has not the brain to use it. I have the brain! I will offer my brain to his use. I will give freely of my mind. That shall be my charity toward this poor little half-made man.

It was one of the finest structures Pilon had ever built. The urge of the artist to show his work to an audience came upon him. "I will tell it to Pablo," he thought But he wondered whether he would dare do such a thing Was Pablo strictly honest? Would he not want to divert some of this money to his own ends? Pilon decided not to take the chance, right then, anyway.

It is astounding to find that the belly of every black and evil thing is as white as snow. And it is saddening to discover how the concealed parts of angels are leprous. Honor and peace to Pilon, for he had discovered how to uncover and to disclose to the world the good that lay in every evil thing. Nor was he blind, as so many saints are, to the evil of good things. It must be admitted with sadness that Pilon had neither the stupidity, the self-righteousness nor the greediness for reward ever to become a saint. Enough for Pilon to do good and to be rewarded by the glow of human brotherhood accomplished.

That very night he paid a visit to the chicken house where the Pirate lived with his dogs. Danny, Pablo and Jesus Maria, sitting by the stove, saw him go and said nothing. For, they thought delicately, either a vapor of love had been wafted to Pilon or else he knew where he could get a little wine. In either case it was none of their business until he told them about it.

It was well after dark, but Pilon had a candle in his pocket, for it might be a good thing to watch the expression on the Pirate's face while he talked. And Pilon had a big round sugar cookie in a bag that Susie Francisco, who worked in a bakery, had given him in return for a formula for getting the love of Charlie Guzman Charlie was a Postal Telegraph messenger and rode a motorcycle, and Susie had a man's cap to put on backward in case Charlie should ever ask her to ride with him. Pilon thought the Pirate might like the sugar cookie.

The night was very dark Pilon picked his way along a narrow street bordered with vacant lots and with weedgrown, neglected gardens

Galvez' bad bulldog came snarling out of Galvez' yard, and Pilon spoke soothing compliments to him

"Nice dog," he said gently, and "Pretty dog," both of them palpable lies. They impressed the bulldog, however, for he retured into Galvez' yard.

Pilon came at last to the vacant property where the Pirate lived. And now he knew he must be careful, for the Pirate's dogs, if they suspected ill of anyone toward their master, were known to become defending furies. As Pilon stepped into the yard, he heard deep and threatening growls from the chicken house "Pirate," he called "It is thy good friend Pilon, come to talk with thee"

There was silence The dogs stopped growling. "Pirate, it is only Pilon."

A deep surly voice answered him, "Go away. I am 60 sleeping now The dogs are skeping. It is dark, Pilon. Go to bed."

"I have a candle in my pocket," Pilon called "It will make a light as bright as day in thy dark house. I have a big sugar cookie for thee, too"

A faint scuffling sounded in the chicken house "Come then," the Pirate said. "I will tell the dogs it is all right."

As he advanced through the weeds, Pilon could hear the Pirate talking softly to his dogs, explaining to them to that it was only Pilon, who would do no harm. Pilon bent over in front of the dark doorway and scratched a match and lighted his candle

The Pirate was seated on the dirt floor, and his dogs were all about him Enrique growled, and had to be reassured again "That one is not so wise as the others," the Pirate said pleasantly. His eyes were the pleased eyes of an amused child. When he smiled his big white teeth glistened in the candlelight.

Pilon held out the bag "It is a fine cake for you," he 80 said

The Pirate took the bag and looked into it, then he smiled delightedly, and brought out the cookie. The dogs all grinned and faced him, and moved their feet and licked their lips. The Pirate broke his cookie into seven pieces. The first he gave to Pilon, who was his guest. "Now, Enrique," he said. "Now Fluff. Now Señor Alec Thompson." Each dog received his piece and gulped it and looked for more. Last, the Pirate ate his and held up his hands to the dogs. "No more, you so see," he told them. Immediately the dogs lay down about him.

Pilon sat on the floor and stood the candle on the ground in front of him The Pirate questioned him self-consciously with his eyes Pilon sat silently, to let many questions pass through the Pirate's head. At length he said, "Thou art a worry to thy friends."

The Pirate's eyes filled with astonishment. "I? To my friends? What friends?"

Pilon softened his voice "Thou hast many friends who think of thee. They do not come to see thee because thou art proud. They think it might hurt thy pride to have them see thee living in this chicken house, clothed in rags, eating garbage with thy dogs. But these friends of thine worry for fear the bad life may make thee ill."

The Pirate was following his words with breathless astonishment, and his brain tried to realize these new things he was hearing. It did not occur to him to doubt them, since Pilon was saying them. "I have all these friends?" he said in wonder. "And I did not know, Pilon. I would not have worried them if I had known." He swallowed to clear his throat of emotion. "You see, Pilon, the dogs like it here. And I like it because of them. I did not think I was a worry to my friends." Tears came into the Pirate's eyes.

"Nevertheless," Pilon said, "thy mode of living keeps all thy friends uneasy."

The Pirate looked down at the ground and tried to think clearly, but as always, when he attempted to cope with a problem, his brain grew gray and no help came from it, but only a feeling of helplessness. He looked to his dogs for protection, but they had gone back to sleep, for it was none of their business. And then he looked earnestly into Pilon's eyes "You must tell me what to do, Pilon 1 did not know these things."

It was too easy Pilon was a little ashamed that it should be so easy. He hesitated, nearly gave it up, but then he knew he would be angry with himself if he did. "Thy friends are poor," he said. "They would like to help thee, but they have no money. If thou hast money hidden, bring it out into the open. Buy thyself some clothes. Eat food that is not cast out by other people. Bring thy money out of its hiding place, Pirate."

Pilon had been looking closely at the Pirate's face while he spoke He saw the eyes droop with suspicion and then with sullenness. In a moment Pilon knew two things certainly, first, that the Pirate had money hidden, and second, that it was not going to be easy to get at it. He was pleased at the latter fact. The Pirate had become a problem in tactics such as Pilon enjoyed.

Now the Pirate was looking at him again, and in his eyes was cunning, and on top of that, a studied ingenuousness "I have no money anywhere," he said

"But every day, my friend, I have seen thee get a quarter for thy wood, and never have I seen thee spend it"

This time the Pirate's brain came to his rescue "I give it to a poor old woman," he said. "I have no money anywhere." And with his tone he closed a door tightly on the subject.

"So it must be guile," Pilon thought So those gifts, a that in him were so sharpened, must be called into play He stood up and lifted his candle. "I only thought to tell thee how thy friends worry," he said critically "If thou wilt not try to help, I can do nothing for thee"

The sweetness came back into the Pirate's eyes "Tell them I am healthy," he begged "Tell my friends to come and see me. I will not be too proud I will be glad to see them any time Wilt thou tell them for me Pilon?"

"I will tell them," Pilon said ungraciously "But thy friends will not be pleased when they see thou dost nothing to relieve their minds" Pilon blew out his candle and went away into the darkness. He knew that the Pirate would never tell where his hoard was. It must be found by stealth, taken by force and then all the good things given to the Pirate. It was the only way

And so Pilon set himself to watch the Pirate He followed him into the forest when he went to cut kindlings. He lay in wait outside the chicken house at night. He talked to him long and earnestly, and nothing came of it. The treasure was as far from discovery as ever Either it lay buried in the chicken house or it was hidden deep in the forest, and was only visited at night.

The long and fruitless vigils wore out the patience of Pilon. He knew he must have help and advice. And who could better give it than those comrades, Danny, Pablo and Jesus Maria? Who could be so stealthy, so guileful? Who could melt to kindness with more ease?

Pilon took them into his confidence, but first he prepared them, as he had prepared himself. The Pirate's o poverty, his helplessness, and finally—the solution. When he came to the solution, his friends were in a philanthropic frenzy. They applauded him. Their faces shone with kindness. Pablo thought there might be well over a hundred dollars in the hoard

When their joy had settled to a working enthusiasm, they came to plans.

"We must watch him," Pablo said

"But I have watched him," Pilon argued "It must be that he creeps off in the night, and then one cannot follow too close, for his dogs guard him like devils. It is not going to be so easy."

"You've used every argument?" Danny asked. "Yes. Every one"

In the end it was Jesus Maria, that humane man, who found the way out. "It is difficult while he lives in that chicken house," he said "But suppose he lived here, with us? Either his silence would break under our kindness, or else it would be easier to know when he goes out at night."

The friends gave a good deal of thought to this suggestion "Sometimes the things he gets out of restaurants are nearly new," mused Pablo "I have seen him with a steak out of which only a little was missing"

"It might be as much as two hundred dollars," said Pilon

Danny offered an objection "But those dogs—he would bring his dogs with him"

"They are good dogs," said Pilon "They obey him exactly. You may draw a line around a corner and say, 'Keep thy dogs within this line' He will tell them, and those dogs will stay."

"I saw the Pirate one morning, and he had nearly half a cake, just a little bit damp with coffee," said Pablo

The question settled itself. The house resolved itself into a committee, and the committee visited the Pirate.

It was a crowded place, that chicken house, when they all got inside. The Pirate tried to disguise his happiness with a gruff tone

"The weather has been bad," he said socially And,
"You wouldn't believe, maybe, that I found a tick as to big as a pigeon's egg on Rudolph's neck." And he spoke disparagingly of his home, as a host should "It is 'oo small," he said. "It is not a fit place for one's friends to come. But it is warm and snug, especially for the dogs."

Then Pilon spoke. He told the Pirate that worry was killing his friends, but if he would go to live with them, then they could sleep again, with their minds at ease

It was a very great shock to the Pirate. He looked at his hands And he looked to his dogs for comfort, but 50 they would not meet his glance. At last he wiped the happiness from his eyes with the back of his hand, and he wiped his hand on his big black beard.

"And the dogs?" he asked softly, "You want the dogs, too? Are you friends of the dogs?"

Prion nodded "Yes, the dogs, too There will be a whole corner set aside for the dogs."

The Pirate had a great deal of pride He was afraid he might not conduct himself well "Go away now," he said pleadingly "Go home now Tomorrow I will 60 come"

His friends knew how he felt. They crawled out of the door and left him alone

"He will be happy with us, that one," said Jesus Maria

"Poor little lonely man," Danny added "If I had known, I would have asked him long ago, even if he had no treasure"

A flame of joy burned in all of them

They settled soon into the new relationship Danny, 70 with a piece of blue chalk, drew a segment of a circle, enclosing a corner of the living room, and that was where the dogs must stay when they were in the house. The Pirate slept in that corner too, with the dogs.

The house was beginning to be a little crowded, with five men and five dogs, but from the first, Danny and his friends realized that their invitation to the Pirate had been inspired by that weary and anxious angel who guarded their destinies and protected them from evil

Every morning, long before his friends were awake, 80 the Pirate arose from his corner and, followed by his dogs, he made the rounds of the restaurants and the wharves. He was one of those for whom every one feels a kindliness. His packages grew larger. The paisanos received his bounty and made use of it fresh fish, half pies, untouched loaves of stale bread, meat that required only a little soda to take the green out. They began really to live

And their acceptance of his gifts touched the Pirate more deeply than anything they could have done for 100 him. There was a light of worship in his eyes as he watched them eat the food he brought.

In the evening, when they sat about the stove and discussed the doings of Tortilla Flat with the lazy voices of fed gods, the Pirate's eyes darted from mouth to mouth, and his own lips moved, whispering again the words his friends said. The dogs pressed in about him jealously.

These were his friends, he told himself in the night when the house was dark, when the dogs snuggled close to him so that all might be warm. These men loved him to so much that it worried them to have him live alone. The Pirate had often to repeat this to himself, for it was an astounding thing, an unbelievable thing. His wheelbarrow stood in Danny's yard now, and every day he cut his pitchwood and sold it. But so afraid was the Pirate that he might miss some word his friends said in the evening, might not be there to absorb some stream of the warm companionship, that he had not visited his hoard for several days to put the new coins there.

His friends were kind to him. They treated him with a sweet courtesy, but always there was some eye open and upon him. When he wheeled his barrow into the woods, one of the friends walked with him, and sat on a log while he worked. When he went into the gulch, the last thing at night, Danny or Pablo or Pilon or Jesus Maria kept him company. And in the night he must have been very quiet to have crept out without a shadow behind him.

For a week, the friends merely watched the Pirate But 30 at last the inactivity tired them. Direct action was out of the question, they knew. And so one evening the subject of the desirability of hiding one's money came up for discussion

Pilon began it. "I had an uncle, a regular miser, and he hid his gold in the woods And one time he went to look at it, and it was gone. Some one had found it and stolen it. He was an old man, then, and all his money was gone, and he hanged himself." Pilon noticed with some satisfaction, the look of apprehension that came upon to the Pirate's face.

Danny noticed it, too; and he continued, "The viejo, my grandfather, who owned this house, also buried money. I do not know how much, but he was reputed a rich man, so there must have been three or four hundred dollars. The viejo dug a deep hole and put his money in it, and then he covered it up, and then he strewed pine needles over the ground until he thought no one could see that anything had been done there. But when he went back, the hole was open, and the money was gone"

The Pirate's lips followed the words. A look of terror had come into his face His fingers picked among the neck hairs of Señor Alec Thompson. The friends exchanged a glance and dropped the subject for the time being. They turned to the love life of Cornelia Ruiz

In the night the Pirate crept out of the house, and the dogs crept after him; and Pilon crept after all of them The Pirate went swiftly into the forest, leaping with sure feet over logs and brush Pilon floundered behind him But when they had gone at least two miles, Pilon was a winded, and torn by vines He paused to rest a moment, and then he realized that all sounds ahead of him had ceased. He waited and listened and crept about, but the Pirate had disappeared.

After two hours, Pilon went back again, slowly and tiredly. There was the Pirate in the house, fast asleep among his dogs. The dogs lifted their heads when Pilon entered, and Pilon thought they smiled satirically at him for a moment.

A conference took place in the gulch the next morning

"It is not possible to follow him," Pilon reported "He vanished. He sees in the dark. He knows every tree in the forest. We must find some other way."

"Perhaps one is not enough," Pablo suggested "If all of us should follow him, then one might not lose track of him."

"We will talk again tonight," said Jesus Maria, "only worse. A lady I know is going to give me a little wine," he added modestly. "Maybe if the Pirate has a little wine in him, he will not disappear so easily." So it was left

Jesus Maria's lady gave him a whole gallon of wine What could compare with the Pirate's delight that evening when a fruit jar of wine was put into his hand, when he sat with his friends and sipped his wine and listened to the talk? Such joy had come rarely into the Pirate's life. He wished he might clasp these dear people to his breast and tell them how much he loved them. But that was not a thing he could do, for they might think he was drunk. He wished he could do some tre mendous thing to show them his love.

"We spoke last night of burying money," said Pilon "Today I remembered a cousin of mine, a clever man If any one in the world could hide money where it would never be found, he could do it. So he took his money and hid it. Perhaps you have seen him, that poor little one who crawls about the wharf and begs fish heads to make soup of. That is my cousin. Some one stole his buried money."

The worry came back into the Pirate's face

Story topped story, and in each one all manner of evil dogged the footsteps of those who hid their money

"It is better to keep one's money close, to spend some now and then, to give a little to one's friends," Danny finished

They had been watching the Pirate narrowly, and in the middle of the worst story they had seen the worry go from his face, and a smile of relief take its place Now he sipped his wine and his eyes glittered with joy

The friends were in despair. All their plans had failed. They were sick at heart. After all their goodness and their charity, this had happened. The Pirate had in some way escaped the good they had intended to confer upon him. They finished their wine and went moodily to bed.

Few things could happen in the night without Pilon's knowledge. His ears remained open while the rest of him slept. He heard the stealthy exit of the Pirate and his dogs from the house. He leaped to awaken his friends, and in a moment the four were following the Pirate in the direction of the forest. It was very dark when they entered the pine forest. The four friends ran into trees, tripped on berry vines, but for a long time. They could hear the Pirate marching on ahead of them. They followed as far as Pilon had followed the night before, and then, suddenly, silence, and the whispering forest and the vague night wind. They combed the woods and the brush patches, but the Pirate had disappeared again.

At last, cold and disconsolate, they came together and trudged wearily back toward Monterey The dawn came before they got back. The sun was already shining on the bay. The smoke of the morning fires arose to them out of Monterey.

The Pirate walked out on the porch to greet them, and his face was happy. They passed him sullenly, and filed into the living room. There on the table lay a large canvas bag

The Pirate followed them in "I lied to thee, Pilon," he said. "I told thee I had no money, for I was afraid, so I did not know about my friends, then. You have told how hidden money is so often stolen, and I am afraid again. Only last night did a way out come to me. My money will be safe with my friends. No one can steal it if my friends guard it for me."

The four men stared at him in horror "Take thy money back to the woods and hide it," Danny said savagely "We do not want to watch it."

'No, said the Pirate "I would not feel safe to hide it. But I will be happy knowing my friends guard it 60 for me. You would not believe it, but the last two nights some one followed me into the forest to steal my money."

Terrible as the blow was, Pilon, that clever man, tried to escape it "Before this money is put into our hands, maybe you would like to take some out," he suggested smoothly

The Pirate shook his head. No 1 cannot do that It is promised. I have nearly a thousand two-birses. When I have a thousand I will buy a gold candle-stick for San Francisco de Assisi.

"Once I had a nice dog, and that dog was sick, and I promised a gold candle-stick of one thousand days if that dog would get well. And," he spread his great hands, "that dog got well."

"Is it one of these dogs?" Pilon demanded

No," said the Pirate "A truck ran over him a little later"

So it was over, all hope of diverting the money. Danny and Pablo morosely lifted the heavy bag of silver quarters, took it in the other room and put it under the 80 pillow of Danny's bed. In time they would take a certain pleasure in the knowledge that this money lay under the pillow, but now their defeat was bitter. There was nothing in the world they could do about it. Their chance had come, and it had gone.

The Pirate stood before them, and there were tears of happiness in his eyes, for he had proved his love for his friends

"To think," he said, "all those years I lay in that chicken house, and I did not know any pleasure But 50 now," he added "oh, now I am very happy"

The Grapes of Wrath

The Grapes of Wrath is both a tract and a story. As a tract, it studies the still unsettled problem of the migrant agricultural workers—the men, women, and children who may be seen crowded into trucks and rattletrap cars in all sections of the country, on their way to pick fruit or cotton or vegetables or to weed onions or sugar beets Often desperately needed for farm production, they are nearly everywhere feared The landowners and managers worry lest they organize and demand high wages, local officials regard them as possible public charges or vagrants, settled and prosperous citizens thoughtlessly dismiss them as mere riffraff Steinbeck's position is that they have a right to work without being exploited, a right to self-respect and a just share of the means of subsistence Land, he says, must not be allowed to be accumulated in the hands of the few and kept out of production while the many starve He attacks, in short, the "economy of scarcity" in a land where scientific agriculture has made possible the production of ample food for all In Chapter Twenty-five he presents the picture of the destruction of grapes and cotton and coffee and pigs because overproduction has depressed the price below the margin of profit, although there are hungry, despairing people to be fed and clothed. This is, he says, the path to revolution "In the souls of the people the grapes of wrath are filling and growing heavy, growing heavy for the vintage." His title is an echo of Julia Ward Howe's Civil War poem, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic". "Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord / He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored

The Grapes of Wrath differs from late nineteenth-century novels on the same theme (Bellamy's Looking Backward and Howells' A Traveler from Altruria, for example) in that it emphasizes the class struggle. Its story is typical of the 1930's, when the effects of the depression were aggravated by the years of drought and dust storms which impoverished large areas in Oklahoma and neighboring states Specifically, it is the story of the Joads, native Americans who have lived for years near Sallisaw. in east central Oklahoma Although they are poor people. concerned with little more than their animal wants, they are a family, a unit, with the pride and the generosity and the humanity, the pleasures and the courage, that make life meaningful Ma is their balance wheel, although she ordinarily leaves the dignity of making decisions to her husband Her charges include Grampa and Granma, Uncle John, who is given to melancholia, Tom, on parole after a stretch in state prison for killing a man in the anger of a fight, Noah, gentle but feeble-minded, Al, a cocksure adolescent. Rose of Sharon, who is married to a weak youth named Connie, and two half-grown children, Ruthie and Winfield

The novel begins with a dust storm. The reader then meets Tom Joad, on his way home from prison. Tom encounters Jim Casy, a former preacher with a penchant for philosophizing, and they go together to the Joad farm. They find the house deserted, but learn from Muley Bates that the family is at Uncle John's. Going there next day they find Ma and the rest preparing to go to California, where they have been told that there is plenty of work and the chance for a fresh start. They have been dispossessed of their marginal land by the drought and the foreclosure of mortgages, only by large-scale mechanization can such land now be farmed profitably.

Three chapters of the novel are reprinted in the following pages. Chapter Thirteen describes the first stages of the trip, with the succession of sudden tragedies which foreshadow the later disillusion and disintegration of the family. Chapter Fourteen, with its use of biological terminology, typifies the generalizations inserted by Steinbeck at intervals throughout the novel to alternate with the Joad story. Chapter Fifteen, frequently reprinted as a separate unit, exemplifies Steinbeck's keen observation of the surface details of contemporary life and his sure grasp of the idiom of the common people. The entire section is representative of the peculiar juxtaposition of realism and sentiment which is Steinbeck's talent.

Throughout the remainder of the novel the Joads are beset by one catastrophe after another, with infrequent interludes of hope that somehow something can be worked out Before they reach the farmlands of California, Noah wanders off and Granma dies. The promised work does not often materialize and when it does the rate of pay is determined by the number of workers available. Only in a government camp are the Joads momentarily free from the brutality and suspicion of sheriffs and deputies, and they cannot afford to stay there and starve. Connie runs away from his pregnant wife. Casy is killed when he tries, none too expertly, to lead a strike, and Tom kills the man who struck down Casy. Since Tom has broken his parole by leaving Oklahoma, he becomes a fugitive, although it is suggested that he will carry on the work of organizing the wandering workers. In the final scene Rose of Sharon is delivered of a stillborn baby in a flooded boxcar but, since life must go on, gives her milk to a starving mon.

Some readers will be offended by Steinbeck's social philosophy, others are likely to object to the animality of the life of the Joads and their friends and feel that Steinbeck has given a distorted picture of migrant workers' conditions in California at that time, still others will dislike the somewhat melodramatic incidents by which the story advances. Few, however, will deny that life is too often like this, that the improvement of the social and economic system should be the constant concern of those who live in a democracy. The Joads are not to be lightly dismissed as foreigners or poor whites, they are Americans, and their condition may readily determine the quality of life in these United States.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

The ancient overloaded Hudson creaked and grunted to the highway at Sallisaw and turned west, and the sun was blinding. But on the concrete road Al built up his speed because the flattened springs were not in danger any more. From Sallisaw to Gore is twenty-one miles and the Hudson was doing thirty-five miles an hour. From Gore to Warner thirteen miles, Warner to Checotah fourteen miles, Checotah a long jump to Henrietta—thirty-four miles, but a real town at the end of it. Henrietta to Castle nineteen miles, and the sun was overhead, and the red fields, heated by the high sun, vibrated the air.

Al, at the wheel, his face purposeful, his whole body listening to the car, his restless eyes jumping from the road to the instrument panel. Al was one with his engine, every nerve listening for weaknesses, for the thumps or squeals, hums and chattering that indicate a change that may cause a breakdown. He had become the soul of the car

Granma, beside him on the seat, half slept, and whim- 20 pered in her sleep, opened her eyes to peer ahead, and then dozed again. And Ma sat beside Granma, one elbow out the window, and the skin reddening under the fierce sun. Ma looked ahead too, but her eyes were flat and did not see the road or the fields, the gas stations, the little eating sheds. She did not glance at them as the Hudson went by

Al shifted himself on the broken seat and changed his grip on the steering wheel. And he sighed, "Makes a racket, but I think she's awright. God knows what 30 she'll do if we got to climb a hill with the load we got. Got any hills 'tween here an' California, Ma?"

Ma turned her head slowly and her eyes came to life "Seems to me they's hills, she said." 'Course I dunno But seems to me I heard they's hills an' eyen mountains Big ones'.

Granma drew a long whining sigh in her sleep

Al said "We'll burn right up if we got climbin' to do. Have to throw out some a' this stuff. Maybe we shouldn' a brang that preacher."

'You'll be glad a that preacher 'fore we're through," said Ma 'That preacher'll help us." She looked ahead at the gleaming road again

Al steered with one hand and put the other on the vibrating gear-shift lever. He had difficulty in speaking. His mouth formed the words silently before he said them aloud 'Ma—" She looked slowly around at him her head swaying a little with the car's motion 'Ma, you scared a goin' You scared a goin' to a new place?"

Her eyes grew thoughtful and soft "A little," she said 'Only it ain't like scared so much I'm jus a settin' here waitin' When somepin happens that I got to do somepin—I'll do it"

"Ain't you thinkin' what's it gonna be like when we get there? Ain't you scared it wont be nice like we thought?"

"No," she said quickly "No, I ain't You can't do that I can't do that It's too much—livin' too many lives. Up ahead they's a thousan' lives we might live, 60 but when it comes, it'll on'y be one. If I go ahead on all of 'em, it's too much. You got to live ahead 'cause you're so young, but—it's jus' the road goin' by for me An' it's jus' how soon they gonna wanta eat some more pork bones". Her face tightened. "That's all I can do I can't do no more. All the rest'd get upset if I done any more in that. They all depen' on me jus' thinkin' about that."

Granma yawned shrilly and opened her eyes She looked wildly about 'I got to get out, praise Gawd," 10 she said

"First clump a brush," said Al "They's one up ahead"
"Brush or no brush, I got to git out, I tell ya" And she began to whine, "I got to git out I got to git out"

Al speeded up, and when he came to the low brush he pulled up short Ma threw the door open and half pulled the struggling old lady out beside the road and into the bushes And Ma held her so Granma would not fall when she squatted

On top of the truck the others stirred to life. Their faces were shining with sunburn they could not escape Tom and Casy and Noah and Uncle John let themselves wearily down. Ruthie and Winfield swarmed down the side-boards and went off into the bushes. Connie helped Rose of Sharon gently down. Under the canvas, Grampa was awake, his head sticking out, but his eyes were drugged and watery and still senseless. He watched the others, but there was little recognition in his watching. Tom called to him, "Want to come down, Grampa?"

The old eyes turned listlessly to him "No," said 30 Grampa For a moment the fierceness came into his eyes "I ain't a-goin', I tell you Gonna stay like Muley" And then he lost interest again Ma came back, helping Granma up the bank to the highway

"Tom," she said "Get that pan a bones, under the canvas in back We got to eat somepin" Tom got the pan and passed it around, and the family stood by the roadside, gnawing the crisp particles from the pork bones

"Sure lucky we brang these along," said Pa "Git to so stiff up there can't hardly move Where's the water?"

"Ain't it up with you?" Ma asked "I set out that gallon jug"

Pa climbed the sides and looked under the canvas "It ain't here. We must a forgot it"

Thirst set in instantly. Winfield moaned, "I wanta drink I wanta drink" The men licked their lips, suddenly conscious of their thirst And a little panic started

Al felt the fear growing "We'll get water first service station we come to. We need some gas too." The family swarmed up the truck sides; Ma helped Granma in and got in beside her. Al started the motor and they moved on Castle to Paden twenty-five miles and the sun passed the zenith and started down. And the radiator cap began to jiggle up and down and steam started to whish our Near Paden there was a shack beside the road and two gas pumps in front of it, and beside a fence, a water faucet and a hose. Al drove in and nosed the Hudson up to the hose. As they pulled in, a stout man, red of face and arms, got up from a chair behind the gas pumps and moved toward them. He wore brown corduroys, and suspenders and a polo shirt, and he had a cardboard sun helmet, painted silver, on his head. The sweat beaded on his nose and under his eyes and formed streams in the wrinkles of his neck. He strolled toward the truck, looking truculent and stern.

"You folks aim to buy anything? Gasoline or stuff?" he asked

Al was out already, unscrewing the steaming radiator cap with the tips of his fingers, jerking his hand away to escape the spurt when the cap should come loose 'Need some gas, mister'

"Got any money?"

'Sure Think we're beggin'?'

The truculence left the fat man's face "Well, that' all right, folks He'p yourself to water" And he hastened to explain "Road is full a people, come in, use water, dirty up the toilet, an' then, by God, they'll steal stuff an' don't buy nothin'. Got no money to buy with Come beggin' a gallon gas to move on"

Tom dropped angrily to the ground and moved toward the fat man "We're payin' our way," he said fiercely 'You got no call to give us a goin'-over We ain't asked you for nothin'."

"I am't," the fat man said quickly. The sweat began to soak through his short-sleeved polo shirt. "Jus' he'p yourself to water, and go use the toilet if you want"

Winfield had got the hose He drank from the end and then turned the stream over his head and face and emerged dripping "It ain't cool," he said

"I don't know what the country's comin' to," the fat man continued His complaint had shifted now and he was no longer talking to or about the Joads. "Fifty-sixty cars a folks go by ever' day, folks all movin' west with kids an' househol' stuff. Where they goin'? What they gonna do?"

"Doin' the same as us," said Tom "Goin' someplace to live. Tryin' to get along That's all "

"Well, I don't know what the country's comin' to I jus' don' know. Here's me tryin' to get along, too Think any them big new cars stops here? No, sir! They go on to them yella-painted company stations in town. They don't stop no place like this. Most folks stops here ain't got nothin'."

Al flipped the radiator cap and it jumped into the air with a head of steam behind it, and a hollow bubbling sound came out of the radiator. On top of the truck, the suffering hound dog crawled timidly to the edge of the load and looked over, whimpering, toward the water. Uncle John climbed up and lifted him down by the scruff of the neck. For a moment, the dog staggered on stiff legs, and then he went to lap the mud under the faucet. In the highway the cars whizzed by, glistening in the heat, and the hot wind of their going fanned into the service-station yard. Al filled the radiator with the hose.

'It ain't that I'm tryin' to git trade outa rich folks," the fat man went on 'I'm jus' tryin' to git trade Why, the folks that stops here begs gasoline an they trades for gasoline. I could show you in my back room the stuff they'll trade for gas an' oil beds an' baby buggies an' pots an' pans. One family traded a doll their kid had for a gallon. An' what'm I gonna do with the stuff, open a junk shop? Why, one fella wanted to gimme his shoes for a gallon. An' if I was that kinda fella I bet I could git—' He glanced at Ma and stopped.

Jim Casy had wet his head, and the drops still coursed down his high forehead, and his muscled neck was wet, and his shirt was wet. He moved over beside Tom "It ain't the people's fault," he said. "How d you like to sell the bed you sleep on for a tankful a gas."

"I know it ain't their fault Ever' person I talked to is on the move for a damn good reason. But what's the country comin' to? That's what I wanta know. What's it comin to? Fella can't make a livin' no more Folks can't make a livin' farmin'. I ask you, what's it comin' to? I can't figure her out. Ever'body I ask, they can't figure her out. Fella wants to trade his shoes so he can git a hunderd miles on. I can't figure her out. He took off his silver hat and wiped his forehead with his palm. And Tom took off his cap and wiped his forehead with it. He went to the hose and wet so the cap through and squeezed it and put it on again. Ma worked a tin cup out through the side bars of the truck, and she took water to Granma and to Grampa on top of the load. She stood on the bars and handed the cup to Grampa, and he wet his lips and then shook his head and refused more. The old eyes looked up at Ma in pain and bewilderment for a moment before the awareness receded again.

Al started the motor and backed the truck to the gas pump. Fill her up. Shell take about seven," said so Al. 'We'll give her six so she don't spill none."

The fat man put the hose in the rank 'No, sir, he said 'I jus' don't know what the country's comin to. Relief an all."

Casy said, "I been walkin aroun in the country Ever'-body's askin that What we comin to? Scens to me we don't never come to nothin. Always on the way Always goin and goin. Why don't folks think about that? They smovement now People moving. We know why, an we know how Movin cause they got to 70 That's why folks always move. Movin cause they want somepin better'in what they got. An that's the on'y way they'll ever git it. Wantin it an needin it, they'll go out an git it. It's bein hurt that makes folks mad to fightin. I been walkin aroun the country, an hearin folks talk like you.

The fat man pumped the gasoline and the needle turned on the pump dial, recording the amount "Yeah, but what's it comin' to? That's what I want ta know"

Tom broke in irritably. Well, you ain't never gonna 80 know. Casy tries to tell ya an' you jest ast the same thing over. I seen fellas like you before. You ain't askin' nothin', you're jus' singin' a kinda song. What we comin' to? You don' wanta know. Country's movin' aroun' goin' places. They's folks dyin' all aroun'. Maybe you'll die pretty soon, but you won't know nothin'. I seen too many fellas like you. You don't want to know nothin'. Just sing yourself to sleep with a song—'What we comin' to?'.' He looked at the gas pump, rusted and old, and at the shack behind it, built of old lumber, 50 the nail holes of its first use still showing through the paint that had been brave, the brave yellow paint that had tried to imitate the big company stations in town. But the paint couldn't cover the old nail holes and the old cracks in the lumber, and the paint could not be renewed The imitation was a failure and the owner had known it was a failure. And inside the open door of the shack Tom saw the oil barrels, only two of them, and the candy counter with stale candies and licorice whips turning brown with age, and cigarettes He saw the broken chair and the fly screen with a rusted hole 10 in it And the littered yard that should have been graveled, and behind, the corn field drying and dying in the sun Beside the house the little stock of used tires and retreaded tires. And he saw for the first time the fat man's cheap washed pants and his cheap polo shirt and his paper hat He said, "I didn' mean to sound off at ya, mister It's the heat You ain't got nothin' Pretty soon you'll be on the road yourse'f And it ain't tractors'll put you there It's them pretty yella stations in town Folks is movin'," he said ashamedly "An' 20 you'll be movin', mister"

The fat man's hand slowed on the pump and stopped while Tom spoke He looked worriedly at Tom "How'd you know?" he asked helplessly "How'd you know we was already talkin about packin up an movin west?"

Casy answered him "It's ever'body," he said "Here's me that used to give all my fight against the devil cause I figured the devil was the enemy But they's somepin worse'n the devil got hold a the country, an' it ain't gonna let go till it's chopped loose. Ever see one a them Gila monsters take hold, mister? Grabs hold, an' you chop him in two an' his head hangs on. Chop him at the neck an' his head hangs on. Got to take a screw-driver an' pry his head apart to git him loose. An' while he's layin' there, poison is drippin' an' drippin' into the hole he's made with his teeth." He stopped and looked sideways at Tom

The fat man stared hopelessly straight ahead His hand started turning the crank slowly "I dunno what we're comin' to," he said softly.

Over by the water hose, Connie and Rose of Sharon stood together, talking secretly Connie washed the tin cup and felt the water with his finger before he filled the cup again Rose of Sharon watched the cars go by on the highway. Connie held out the cup to her "This water ain't cool, but it's wet," he said

She looked at him and smiled secretly She was all secrets now she was pregnant, secrets and little silences that seemed to have meanings. She was pleased with herself, and she complained about things that didn't really matter. And she demanded services of Connie that were silly, and both of them knew they were silly. Connie was pleased with her too, and filled with wonder that she was pregnant. He liked to think he was in on the secrets she had. When she smiled slyly, he smiled slyly too, and they exchanged confidences in whispers. The world had drawn close around them, and they were in the center of it, or rather Rose of Sharon was in the center of it with Connie making a small orbit about her. Everything they said was a kind of secret.

She drew her eyes from the highway "I ain't very thirsty," she said daintily "But maybe I ought to drink"

And he nodded, for he knew well what she meant She took the cup and rinsed her mouth and spat and then drank the cupful of tepid water "Want another?" he asked

"Jus' a half." And so he filled the cup just half, and gave it to her. A Lincoln Zephyr, silvery and low, whisked by She turned to see where the others were and saw them clustered about the truck Reassured she said, "How'd you like to be goin' along in that?"

Connie sighed, "Maybe—after" They both knew what he meant "An' if they's plenty work in California we'll git our own car But them"—he indicated the disappearing Zephyr—"them kind costs as much as a good size house. I ruther have the house."

"I like to have the house an one a them," she said "But 'course the house would be first because—" And they both knew what she meant. They were terribly excited about the pregnancy

"You feel awright?" he asked

"Tar'd Jus' tar'd ridin' in the sun"

"We got to do that or we won't never get to California"

"I know," she said

The dog wandered, sniffing, past the truck, trotted to the puddle under the hose again and lapped at the muddy water. And then he moved away, nose down and ears hanging. He sniffed his way among the dusty weeds beside the road, to the edge of the pavement. He raised his head and looked across, and then started over. Rose of Sharon screamed shrilly. A big swift car whisked near, tires squealed. The dog dodged helplessly, and with a shriek, cut off in the middle, went under the wheels The big car slowed for a moment and faces looked back, and then it guthered greater speed and disappeared And the dog, a blot of blood and tangled, burst intestines, kicked slowly in the road

Rose of Sharon's eyes were wide "Dyou think it'll hurt?" she begged "Think it'll hurt?"

Connie put his arm around her "Come set down, to he said 'It wasn't nothin'

"But I felt it hurt I felt it kinda jar when I velled "Come set down It wasn't nothin. It won't hurt." He led her to the side of the truck away from the dying dog and sat her down on the running board.

Tom and Uncle John walked out to the mess. The last quiver was going out of the crushed body. Tom took it by the legs and dragged it to the side of the road. Uncle John looked embarrassed, as though it were his fault. "I ought to tied him up," he said.

Pa looked down at the dog for a moment and then he turned away. "Le's get outa here," he said, "I don' know how we was gonna feed 'im anyways Just as well, maybe"

The fat man came from behind the truck I m sorry, folks," he said "A dog jus' don' last no time near a highway. I had three dogs run over in a year Don't keep none, no more." And he said, "Don't you folks worry none about it I'll take care of 'im Bury 'im out in the corn field"

Ma walked over to Rose of Sharon, where she sat, still shuddering, on the running board "You all right, Rosasharn?" she asked "You feelin' poorly?"

"I seen that. Give me a start"

"I heard ya yıp," said Ma "Git yourself laced up now."
"You suppose it might of hurt?"

"No," said Ma "'F you go to greasin' yourself an' feelin' sorry, an' tuckin' yourself in a swalla's nest, it might. Rise up now, an he'p me get Granma comf'table Forget that baby for a minute He'll take care a hisself"

"Where is Granma?" Rose of Sharon asked

"I dunno. She's aroun' here somewheres Maybe in the outhouse."

The girl went toward the toilet, and in a moment she came out, helping Granma along. She went to sleep in there, said Rose of Sharon.

Granma grinned. "It's nice in there," she said. They got a patent toilet in there an' the water comes down. I like it in there," she said contentedly "Would of took a good nap if I wasn't woke up"

"It am't a nice place to sleep,' said Rose of Sharon, so and she helped Granma into the car Granma settled herself happily "Maybe it ain't nice for purty, but it's nice for nice, she said

Tom said, "Le's go We got to make miles

Pe whistled shrilly "Now where'd them kids go?" He whistled again, putting his fingers in his mouth

In a moment they broke from the corn field, Ruthie ahead and Winfield trailing her "Eggs! Ruthie cried 'Look!" A dozen soft, grayish-white eggs were in her grubty hand. And as she held up her hand, her eyes so fell upon the dead dog beside the road. 'Oh!" she said Ruthie, and Winfield walked slowly toward the dog They inspected him.

Pa called to them, "Come on, you 'less you want to git left."

They turned solemnly and walked to the truck. Ruthie looked once more at the gray reptile eggs in her hand, and then she threw them away. They climbed up the side of the truck. "His eyes was still open," said. Ruthie in a hushed tone.

But Winfield gloried in the scene. He said boldly, 'His guts was just strowed all over—all over—he was silent for a moment—"strowed—all—over," he said, and then he rolled over quickly and vomited down the side of the truck. When he sait up again his eyes were watery and his nose running. 'It ain't like killin' pigs," he said in explanation.

Al had the hood of the Hudson up, and he checked the oil level. He brought a gallon can from the floor of the front seat and poured a quantity of cheap black 80 oil into the pipe and checked the level again.

Tom came beside him "Want I should take her a piece?" he asked

'I ain't tired," said Al

Well, you didn't get no sleep las' night I took a snooze this morning. Get up there on top. I'll take her."

'Awight," Al said reductantly 'But watch the oil gauge pretty close. Take her slow. An' I been watchin' for a short. Take a look a the needle now an' then 90 'F she jumps to discharge it's a short. An' take her slow, Tom. She's overloaded

Tom laughed. "I'll watch her," he said. "You can res' easy."

The family piled on top of the truck again Ma settled herself beside Granma in the seat, and Tom took his place and started the motor. "Sure is loose," he said, and he put it in gear and pulled away down the highway.

The motor droned along steadily and the sun receded down the sky in front of them. Granma slept steadily, and even Ma dropped her head forward and dozed. Tom pulled his cap over his eyes to shut out the blinding sun.

Paden to Meeker is thirteen miles, Meeker to Harrah is fourteen miles, and then Oklahoma City—the big city Tom drove straight on. Ma waked up and looked at the streets as they went through the city And the family, on top of the truck, stared about at the stores, at the big houses, at the office buildings And then the buildings grew smaller and the stores smaller and the wrecking yards and hot-dog stands, the out-city dance halls.

Ruthie and Winfield saw it all, and it embarrassed them with its bigness and its strangeness, and it frightened them with the fine-clothed people they saw. They did not speak of it to each other. Later—they would, but not now. They saw the oil derricks in the town, on the edge of the town, oil derricks black, and the smell of oil and gas in the air. But they didn't exclaim It was so big and so strange it frightened them.

suit He wore white shoes and a flat straw hat She touched Connie and indicated the man with her eyes, and then Connie and Rose of Sharon giggled softly to themselves, and the giggles got the best of them They covered their mouths. And it felt so good that they looked for other people to giggle at Ruthie and Winfield saw them giggling and it looked such fun that they tried to do it too—but they couldn't. The giggles wouldn't come. But Connie and Rose of Sharon were breathless and red with suffing laughter before they could stop. It got so bad that they had only to look at each other to start over again.

The outskirts were wide spread Tom drove slowly and carefully in the traffic, and then they were on 66—the great western road, and the sun was sinking on the line of the road. The windshield was bright with dust. Tom pulled his cap lower over his eyes, so low that he had to tilt his head back to see out at all. Granma slept on, the sun on her closed eyelids, and the veins on her temples were blue, and the little shright veins on her cheeks were wine-colored, and the old brown marks on her face turned darker.

Tom said, "We stay on this road right straight through."

Ma had been silent for a long time "Maybe we better fin' a place to stop 'fore sunset," she said "I got to get some pork a-boilin' an' some bread made That takes time."

"Sure," Tom agreed. "We ain't gonna make this trip in one jump Might's well stretch ourselves."

Oklahoma City to Bethany is fourteen miles

Tom said, "I think we better stop fore the sun goes down. All got to build that thing on the top. Sun'll kill the folks up there."

Ma had been dozing again. Her head jerked upright "Got to get some supper a-cookin," she said And she said, "Tom, your pa tol me about you crossin the State line——"

He was a long time answering "Yeah? What about it, Ma^{γ} "

"Well, I'm scairt about it It'll make you kinda runnin' away Maybe they'll catch ya."

Tom held his hand over his eyes to protect himself from the lowering sun "Don't you worry," he said "I figgered her out They's lots a fellas out on parole an' they's more goin in all the time. If I get caught for anything else out west, well, then they got m pitcher an' my prints in Washington. They'll sen' me back. But if I don't do no crimes, they won't give a damn."

"Well, I'm a-scarrt about it Sometimes you do a crime, an' you don't even know it's bad. Maybe they got crimes in California we don't even know about. Maybe you gonna do somepin an' it's all right, an' in California it ain't all right."

"Be jus' the same if I wasn't on parole," he said "On'y if I get caught I get a bigger jolt'n other folks Now you quit a-worryin'," he said "We got plenty to worry about 'thout you figgerin' out things to worry about"

"I can't he p it," she said. "Minute you cross the line you done a crime."

"Well, that's better'n stickin' aroun' Sallisaw an' starvin' to death," he said "We better look out for a place to stop."

They went through Bethany and out on the other side In a ditch, where a culvert went under the road an old touring car was pulled off the highway and a little tent was pitched beside it, and smoke came out of a stove pipe through the tent. Tom pointed ahead There's some folks campin'. Looks like as good a a place as we seen. He slowed his motor and pulled to a stop beside the road. The hood of the old touring car was up, and a middle-aged man stood looking down at the motor. He wore a cheap straw sombrero, a blue shirt, and a black, spotted vest, and his jeans were stiff and shiny with dirt. His face was lean, the deep cheek-lines great furrows down his face so that his cheek bones and chin stood out sharply. He looked up at the Joad truck and his eyes were puzzled and angry

Tom leaned out of the window "Any law 'gainst folks stoppin' here for the night?"

The man had seen only the truck His eyes tocused down on Tom "I dunno," he said "We on's stopped here 'cause we couldn't git no further."

'Any water here?"

The man pointed to a service-station shack about a quarter of a mile ahead "They's water there they'll let ya take a bucket of"

Tom hesitated "Well, ya s'pose we could camp at down 'longside'"

The lean man looked puzzled 'We don't own it," he said. "We on'y stopped here 'cause this goddamn ol' trap wouldn' go no further"

Tom insisted "Anyways you're here an' we ain't You got a right to sav if you wan' neighbors or not"

The appeal to hospitality had an instant effect. The lean face broke into a smile "Why, sure, come on off the road. Proud to have ya". And he called, 'Sairy, there's some folks goin' ta stay with us. Come on out an' say how d'ya do. Sairy ain't well," he added. The tent flaps opened and a wizened woman came out—a face wrinkled as a dried leaf and eyes that seemed to flame in her face, black eyes that seemed to look out of a well of horror. She was small and shuddering. She held herself upright by a tent flap, and the hand holding onto the canvas was a skeleton covered with wrinkled skin

When she spoke her voice had a beautiful low timbre, soft and modulated, and yet with ringing over- 50 tones "Tell 'em welcome," she said "Tell 'em good an' welcome."

Tom drove off the road and brought his truck into the field and lined it up with the touring car. And people boiled down from the truck. Ruthie and Winneld too quickly, so that their legs gave way and they shrieked at the pins and needles that ran through their limbs. Ma went quickly to work. She untied the three gallon bucket from the back of the truck and approached the squealing children. "Now you go git water—right 60 down there. Ask nice. Say, 'Please, kin we git a bucket of water?" and say, "Thank you. An' carry it back to gether helpin', an' don't spill none. An' if you see stick wood to burn, bring it on." The children stamped iway toward the shack.

By the tent a little embarrassment had set in, and social intercourse had paused before it started. Pa said, 'You ain't Oklahomy folks?"

And Al, who stood near the car, looked at the license plates "Kansas," he said

The lean man said, 'Galena, or right about there Wilson, Ivy Wilson."

"We're Joads," said Pa "We come from right near Sallisaw"

Well, we're proud to meet you folks," said Ivy Wilson "Sairy, these is Joads"

"I knowed you wasn't Oklahomy folks You talk queer kinda—that ain't no blame, you understan'."

Ever'body says words different " said Ivy "Arkansas folks says 'em different, and Oklahomy folks says 'em 80 different. And we seen a lady from Massachusetts, an' she said 'em differentest of all Couldn' hardly make out what she was sayin'"

Noah and Uncle John and the preacher began to unload the truck. They helped Grampa down and sat him on the ground and he sat limply, staring ahead of him. "You sick, Grampa" Noah asked

"You goddamn right ' said Grampa weakly "Sicker'n hell"

Sairy Wilson walked slowly and carefully toward 90 him "How'd you like ta come in our tent?" she asked "You kin lay down on our mattress an rest."

He looked up at her, drawn by her soft voice "Come on now," she said. "You'll git some rest We'll he'p you over."

Without warning Grampa began to cry. His chin wavered and his old lips tightened over his mouth and he sobbed hoarsely. Ma rushed over to him and put her arms around him. She lifted him to his feet, her broad back straining, and she half lifted, half helped him into the tent.

Uncle John said, "He must be good an' sick He ain't never done that before. Never seen him blubberin' in my life." He jumped up on the truck and tossed a mattress down.

Ma came out of the tent and went to Casy. "You been aroun' sick people," she said "Grampa's sick Won't you go take a look at him?"

Casy walked quickly to the tent and went inside A double mattress was on the ground, the blankets spread neatly, and a little tin stove stood on iron legs, and the fire in it burned unevenly. A bucket of water, a wooden box of supplies, and a box for a table, that was all The light of the setting sun came pinkly through the tent walls. Sairy Wilson knelt on the ground, beside the mattress, and Grampa lay on his back. His eyes were open, staring upward, and his cheeks were flushed. He breathed heavily

Casy took the skinny old wrist in his fingers "Feeling kinda tired, Grampa?" he asked The staring eyes moved toward his voice but did not find him. The lips practiced a speech but did not speak it. Casy felt the pulse and he dropped the wrist and put his hand on Grampa's forehead. A struggle began in the old man's body, his legs moved restlessly and his hands stirred He said a whole string of blurred sounds that were not words, and his face was red under the spiky white whiskers.

Sairy Wilson spoke softly to Casy "Know what's wrong?"

He looked up at the wrinkled face and the burning 40 eyes. "Do you?"

"I-think so."

"What?" Casy asked.

"Might be wrong I wouldn' like to say."

Casy looked back at the twitching red face "Would you say—maybe—he's workin' up a stroke?"

"I'd say that," said Sairy. "I seen it three times before."

From outside came the sounds of camp-making, wood chopping, and the rattle of pans Ma looked through the flaps "Granma wants to come in Would she better?"

The preacher said, "She'll just fret if she don't"

"Think he's awright?" Ma asked

Casy shook his head slowly Ma looked quickly down at the struggling old face with blood pounding through it. She drew outside and her voice came through "He's awright, Granma" He's jus' takin' a little res'."

And Granma answered sulkily, "Well, I want ta see him He's a tricky devil He wouldn't never let ya know." And she came scurrying through the flaps She stood over the mattresses and looked down. "What's the matter'th you?" she demanded of Grampa And again his eyes reached toward her voice and his lips writhed "He's sulkin'," said Granma. "I tol' you he was tricky. He was gonna sneak away this mornin' so he wouldn't have to come. An' then his hip got a-hurtin'," she said disgustedly. "He's jus' sulkin'. I seen him when he wouldn't talk to nobody before."

Casy said gently, "He ain't sulkin', Granma He's sick"

"Oh!" She looked down at the old man again "Sick bad, you think?"

"Purty bad, Granma"

For a moment she hesitated uncertainly "Well," she said quickly, "why ain't you prayin'? You're a preacher ain't you?"

Casy's strong fingers blundered over to Grampa's wrist and clasped around it "I tol' you, Granma I ain't a preacher no more"

"Pray anyway," she ordered "You know all the stuff by heart"

"I can't," said Casy "I don't know what to pray for ε or who to pray to "

Granma's eyes wandered away and came to rest on Sairy "He won't pray," she said "DI ever tell ya how Ruthie prayed when she was a little skinner? Says, 'Now I lay me down to sleep I pray the Lord my soul to keep An' when she got there the cupboard was bare. an' so the poor dog got none Amen' That's jus' what she done." The shadow of someone walking between the tent and the sun crossed the canvas

Grampa seemed to be struggling; all his muscles twitched And suddenly he jarred as though under a heavy blow. He lay still and his breath was stopped

Casy looked down at the old man's face and saw that it was turning a blackish purple Sairy touched Casy's shoulder. She whispered, "His tongue, his tongue, his tongue."

Casy nodded. "Get in front a Granma" He pried the tight jaws apart and reached into the old man's throator the tongue. And as he lifted it clear, a rattling breath came out, and a sobbing breath was indrawn Casy found a stick on the ground and held down the tongue with it, and the uneven breath rattled in and out

Granma hopped about like a chicken "Pray," she said "Pray, you Pray, I tell ya" Sairy tried to hold her back. "Pray, goddamn you!" Granma cried

Casy looked up at her for a moment The rasping breath came louder and more unevenly "Our Father which are in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name——"

"Glory!" shouted Granma

'Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done—on earth—as it is in Heaven'

"Amen"

A long gasping sigh came from the open mouth, and then a crying release of air

"Give us this day—our daily bread—and forgive us—" The breathing had stopped Casy looked down into Grampa's eyes and they were clear and deep and penetrating, and there was a knowing serene look in them

Hallelujah!" said Granma "Go on"

"Amen," said Casy

Granma was still then And outside the tent all the noise had stopped. A car whished by on the highway Casy still knelt on the floor beside the mattress. The people outside were listening, standing quietly intent on the sounds of dying. Sairy took Granma by the arm and led her outside, and Granma moved with dignity and held her head high. She walked for the family and held her head straight for the family Sairy took her to a mattress lying on the ground and sat her down on it. And Granma looked straight ahead, proudly, for she was on show now. The tent was still, and at last. Casy spread the tent flaps with his hands and

Pa asked softly, 'What was it?"

stepped out

"Stroke," said Casy "A good quick stroke"

Life began to move again. The sun touched the horizon and flattened over it. And along the highway there came a long line of huge treight trucks with red sides. They rumbled along, putting a little earthquake in the ground, and the standing exhaust pipes sputtered blue smoke from the Diesel oil. One man drove each 50 truck, and his relief man slept in a bunk high up against the ceiling. But the trucks never stopped, they thundered day and night and the ground shook under their heavy march.

The family became a unit. Pa squatted down on the ground, and Uncle John beside him. Pa was the head of the family now. Ma stood behind him. Noah and Tom and Al squatted, and the preacher sat down, and then reclined on his elbow. Connie and Rose of Sharon walked at a distance. Now Ruthie and Winfield, clattering up with a bucket of water held between them, felt the change, and they slowed up and set down the bucket and moved quietly to stand with Ma.

Granma sat proudly, coldly until the group was tormed until no one looked at her, and then she lay down and covered her face with her arm. The red sun set and left a shining twilight on the land, so that faces were bright in the evening and eyes shone in reflection of the sky. The evening picked up light where it could

Pa said, 'It was in Mr Wilson's tent'
Uncle John nodded "He loaned his tent"

'Fine friendly folks "Pa said softly

Wilson stood by his broken car, and Sairy had gone to the mattress to sit beside Granma, but Sairy was careful not to touch her

Pa called, Mr Wilson! The man scuffed near and squatted down, and Sairy came and stood beside him Pa said, We're thankful to you folks."

"We're proud to help," said Wilson

"We're beholden to you," said Pa

"There's no beholden in a time of dying," said Wilson, and Sairy echoed him, 'Never no beholden'

Al looked proud that he could return the family's obligation

"We could use some help." Wilson admitted the retiring of the obligation

Pa said, "We got to figger what to do They's laws You got to report a death, an when you do that, they either take forty dollars for the undertaker or they 90 take him for a pauper"

Uncle John broke in, "We never did have no paupers."

Tom said, "Maybe we got to learn. We never got booted off no land before, neither."

"We done it clean," said Pa. "There can't no blame be laid on us. We never took nothin' we couldn' pay; we never suffered no man's charity. When Tom here got in trouble we could hold up our heads He only done what any man would a done"

"Then what'll we do?" Uncle John asked

"We go in like the laws says an they ll come out for him. We only got a hundred an fifty dollars. They take forty to bury Grampa an we won't get to California—or else they'll bury him a pauper." The men stirred restively, and they studied the darkening ground in front of their knees.

Pa said softly, "Grampa buried his pa with his own hand, done it in dignity, an' shaped the grave nice with his own shovel. That was a time when a man had the right to be buried by his own son an' a son had the right to bury his own father."

"The law says different now," said Uncle John

"Sometimes the law can't be foller'd no way," said Pa. "Not in decency, anyways They's lots a times you can't When Floyd was loose an' goin' wild, law said we got to give him up—an' nobody give him up Sometimes a fella got to sift the law. I'm sayin' now I got the right to bury my own pa Anybody got somepin to say?"

The preacher rose high on his elbow. "Law changes," he said, "but 'got to's' go on. You got the right to do 30 what you got to do"

Pa turned to Uncle John. "It's your right too, John. You got any word against?"

"No word against," sud Uncle John "On'y it's like hidin' him in the night Grampa's way was t'come out a-shootin'."

Pa said ashamedly, "We can't do like Grampa done We got to get to California 'fore our money gives out"

Tom broke in, 'Sometimes fellus workin' dig up a man an' then they ruse hell an' figger he been killed 40 The gov'ment's got more interest in a dead man than a live one. They'll go hell-scrapin' tryin' to fin' out who he was and how he died. I offer we put a note of writin' in a bottle an' lay it with Grampa, tellin' who he is an' how he died, an' why he's buried here."

Pa nodded agreement "That's good Wrote out in a nice han' Be not so lonesome too, knowin his name is there with 'im, not jus' a old fella lonesome under ground. Any more stuff to say?" The circle was silent

Pa turned his head to Ma. "You'll lay 'im out?"

"I'll lay 'im out," said Ma "But who's to get supper.' Sairy Wilson said, "I'll get supper. You go right ahead Me an' that big girl of yourn."

"We sure thank you," said Ma. 'Noah, you get into them kegs an' bring out some nice pork. Salt won't be deep in it yet, but it'll be right nice eatin."

"We got a half sack a potatoes said Sairy.

Ma said, "Gimme two half-dollars" Pa dug in his pocket and gave her the silver. She found the basin filled it full of water, and went into the tent. It was nearly dark in there. Sairy came in and lighted a candle and stuck it upright on a box and then she went out. For a moment Ma looked down at the dead old man And then in pity she tore a strip from her own apron and tied up his jaw. She straightened his limbs, folded his hands over his chest. She held his eyelids down and laid a silver piece on each one. She buttoned his shirt and washed his face.

Sairy looked in, saying. "Can I give you any help? Ma looked slowly up "Come in." she said "I like to talk to ya"

"That's a good big girl you got," said Sairy "She's right in peelin' potatoes What can I do to help?"

"I was gonna wash Grampa all over," said Ma, "but he got no other closes to put on An' 'course your quilt's spoilt. Can't never get the smell a death from a quilt I seen a dog growl an' shake at a mattress m ma died on, an' that was two years later We'll wrop' im in your quilt We'll make it up to you We got a quilt for you"

Sairy said, "You shouldn' talk like that We're proud to help I ain't felt so—safe in a long time People needs—to help."

Ma nodded "They do, she said She looked long into the old whiskery face, with its bound jaw and silver eyes shining in the candlelight "He ain't gonna look natural We'll wrop him up"

"The ol' lady took it good"

"Why, she's so old," said Ma, "maybe she don't even rightly know what happened Maybe she won't really know for quite a while Besides, us folks takes a pride holdin' in My pa used to say, 'Anybody can break down It takes a man not to.' We always try to hold in." She folded the 'quilt neatly about Grampa's legs and around his shoulders. She brought the corner of the quilt over his head like a cowl and pulled it down over his face. Sarry handed her half-a-dozen big safety pins, and she pinned the quilt neatly and tightly about the long package. And at last she stood up "It won to be a bad burying," she said. "We got a preacher to see him in, an' his folks is all aroun'." Suddenly she swayed a little, and Sairy went to her and steadied her "It's sleep—" Ma said in a shamed tone. "No, I'm awright We been so busy gettin' ready, you see."

"Come out in the air," Sairy said.

"Yeah, I'm all done here' Sairy blew out the candle and the two went out.

A bright fire burned in the bottom of the little gulch And Tom, with sticks and wire, had made supports from which two kettles hung and bubbled furiously and good steam poured out under the lids. Rose of Sharon knelt on the ground out of range of the burning heat, and so she had a long spoon in her hand. She saw Ma come out of the tent, and she stood up and went to her "Ma," she said, "I got to ask."

"Scared again?" Ma asked "Why, you can't get through nine months without sorrow"

"But will it-hurt the baby?"

Ma said, "They used to be a sayin', 'A chile born out a sorrow'll be a happy chile' Isn't that so, Mis' Wilson?"

"I heard it like that," said Sairy "An' I heard the so other 'Born outa too much joy'll be a doleful boy'"
"I'm all jumpy inside," said Rose of Sharon

"Well, we ain't none of us jumpin' for fun," said Ma. "You jes' keep watchin' the pots"

On the edge of the ring of firelight the men had gathered For tools they had a shovel and a mattock Pa marked out the ground—eight feet long and three feet wide. The work went on in relays Pa chopped the earth with the mattock and then Uncle John shoveled it out. Al chopped and Tom shoveled. Noah chopped and Connie shoveled. And the hole drove down, for the work never diminished in speed. The shovels of dirt flew out of the hole in quick spurts. When Tom was shoulder deep in the rectangular pit, he said, "How deep, Pa?"

"Good an' deep A couple feet more You get out now, Tom, and get that paper wrote"

Tom boosted himself out or the hole and Noah took his place. Tom went to Ma, where she tended the fire "We got any paper an pen, Ma?"

Ma shook her head slowly, "No-o That's one thing 50 we didn' bring." She looked toward Sairy. And the little woman walked quickly to her tent. She brought back a Bible and a half pencil. "Here," she said. "They's a clear page in front. Use that an' tear it out." She handed book and pencil to Tom.

Tom sat down in the firelight. He squinted his eyes in concentration, and at list wrote slowly and carefully on the end paper in big clear letters. "This here is William James Joad, died of a stroke, old old man His fokes bured him becaws they got no money to pay 60 for funerls. Nobody kilt him. Just a stroke an he dyed." He stopped. "Ma, listen to this here." He read it slowly to her.

"Why, that soun's nice," she said "Can't you stick on somepin from Scripture so it'll be religious? Open up an' git a sayin', somepin outa Scripture"

"Got to be short," said Tom "I ain't got much room lef' on the page"

Sarry said, "How 'bout 'God have mercy on his soul'?"
"No," said Tom "Sounds too much like he was hung 70

I'll copy somepin." He turned the pages and read, mumbling his lips, saying the words under his breath. "Here's a good short one," he said. "'An' Lot said unto them. Oh, not so, my Lord."

"Don't mean nothin'," said Ma "Long's you're goinna put one down, it might's well mean somepin"

Sairy said, "Turn to Psalms, over further You kin always get somepin outa Psalms"

Tom flipped the pages and looked down the verses. Now here is one," he said. "This here's a nice one, so just blowed full a religion. 'Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.' How's that?"

"That's real nice," said Ma "Put that one in"

Tom wrote it carefully. Ma rinsed and wiped a fruit jar and Tom screwed the lid down tight on it. "Maybe the preacher ought to wrote it," he said.

Ma said, "No, the preacher wan't no kin." She took the jar from him and went into the dark tent. She unpinned the covering and slipped the fruit jar in under the thin cold hands and pinned the comforter so tight again. And then she went back to the fire.

The men came from the grave, their faces shining with perspiration "Awright," said Pa. He and John and Noah and Al went into the tent, and they came out carrying the long, pinned bundle between them. They carried it to the grave. Pa leaped into the hole and received the bundle in his arms and laid it gently down. Uncle John put out a hand and helped Pa out of the hole. Pa asked, "How about Granma?"

"Til see," Ma said She walked to the mattress and looked down at the old woman for a moment Then to she went back to the grave "Sleepin"," she said "Maybe she'd hold it against me, but I ain't a-gonna wake her up. She's tar'd."

Pa said, "Where at's the preacher? We ought have a prayer."

Tom said, "I seen him walkin' down the road. He don't like to pray no more."

"Don't like to pray?"

"No," said Tom "He ain't a preacher no more He figgers it ain't right to fool people actin' like a preacher when he ain't a preacher. I bet he went away so nobody wouldn' ast him"

Casy had come quietly near, and he heard Tom speaking "I didn' run away," he said "I'll he'p you folks, but I won't fool ya"

Pa said, "Won't you say a few words' Ain't none of our folks ever been buried without a few words"

"I'll say 'em," said the preacher

Connie led Rose of Sharon to the graveside, she reluctant "You got to," Connie said "It ain't decent 30 not to It'll jus' be a little"

The firelight tell on the grouped people, showing their faces and their eyes, dwindling on their dark clothes All the hats were off now. The light danced, jerking over the people

Casy said, "It'll be a short one." He bowed his head, and the others followed his lead Casy said solemnly "This here of man jus' lived a life an jus' died out of it. I don't know whether he was good or bad, but that don't matter much He was alive, an that's what 40 matters An now he's dead, an that don't matter Heard a fella tell a poem one time, an he says. 'All that lives is holy 'Got to thinkin', an purty soon it means more than the words says. An I wouldn' pray for a of fella that's dead He's awright He got a job to do, but it's all laid out for 'im an' there's on'y one way to do it. But us, we got a job to do, an' they's a thousan' ways, an' we don't know which one to take. An' if I was to pray, it'd be for the folks that don' know which way to turn. Grampa here, he got the easy straight An' now cover im up and let 'im get to his work'. He raised his head

Pa said, "Amen," and the others muttered, "A-men." Then Pa took the shovel, half filled it with dirt, and spread it gently into the black hole. He handed the shovel to Uncle John, and John dropped in a shovelful Then the shovel went from hand to hand until every man had his turn. When all had taken their duty and their right, Pa attacked the mound of loose dirt and hurriedly filled the hole. The women moved back to the fire to see to supper Ruthie and Winfield watched, absorbed.

Ruthie said solemnly, 'Grampa's down under there' And Winfield looked at her with horrified eyes. And then he ran away to the fire and sat on the ground and sobbed to himself

Pa half filled the hole, and then he stood panting with the effort while Uncle John finished it. And John was shaping up the mound when Tom stopped him "Listen," Tom said. "'F we leave a grave, they'll have it open in no time. We got to hide it. Level her off an' we'll strew dry grass. We got to do that."

Pa said, "I didn think a that It ain't right to leave a grave unmounded"

"Can t he'p it," said Tom 'They'd dig im right up, an' we'd get it for breakin' the law You know what I get if I break the law"

"Yeah," Pa said "I forgot that" He took the shovel from John and leveled the grave "She'll sink, come winter," he said.

"Can't he'p that," said Tom "We'll be a long ways a off by winter Tromp her in good, an' we'll strew stuff over her"

When the pork and potatoes were done the families sat about on the ground and ate, and they were quiet staring into the fire Wilson, tearing a slab of meat with his teeth, sighed with contentment "Nice eatin pig," he said

"Well," Pa explained, "we had a couple shoats, an' we thought we might's well eat 'em. Can't get nothin' for them When we get kinda use' ta movin' an' Ma can set up bread, why, it'll be pretty nice, seein' the country an' two kags a' pork right in the truck. How long you folks been on the road?"

Wilson cleared his teeth with his tongue and swallowed. "We ain't been lucky," he said. 'We been three weeks from home."

"Why, God Awmighty, we aim to be in California in ten days or less."

Al broke in, "I dunno, Pa. With that load we're packin', we maybe ain't never gonna get there Not if they's mountains to go over."

They were silent about the fire. Their faces were turned downward and their hair and foreheads showed in the firelight. Above the little dome of the firelight the summer stars shone thinly, and the heat of the day was gradually withdrawing. On her mattress, away from the fire, Granma whimpered softly like a puppy. The heads of all turned in her direction.

Ma said, "Rosasharn, like a good girl go lay down with Granma She needs somebody now She's know-20 in', now."

Rose of Sharon got to her feet and walked to the mattress and lay beside the old woman, and the murmur of their soft voices drifted to the fire Rose of Sharon and Granma whispered together on the mattress

Noah said, "Funny thing is—losin' Grampa ain't made me feel no different than I done before I ain't no sadder than I was

"It's just the same thing," Casy said "Grampa an' the old place, they was jus' the same thing."

Al said, "It's a goddamn shame He been talkin' what he's gonna do, how he gonna squeeze grapes over his head an' let the juice run in his whiskers, an' all stuff like that"

Casy said, "He was foolin', all the time I think he knowed it. An' Grampa didn' die tonight He died the minute you took 'im off the place"

"You sure a that?" Pa cried

"Why, no. Oh, he was breathin'," Casy went on,
"but he was dead. He was that place, an' he knowed

Uncle John said, "Did you know he was a-dyin'?"
"Yeah," said Casy. "I knowed it."

John gazed at him, and a horror grew in his face. "An' you didn' tell nobody?"

"What good?" Casy asked.

"We-we might of did somepin."

"What?"

"I don' know, but---"

"No," Casy said, "you couldn' a done nothin'. Your way was fixed an' Grampa didn' have no part in it. so He didn' suffer none Not after fust thing this mornin'. He's jus' stayin' with the lan' He couldn' leave it."

Uncle John sighed deeply

Wilson said, "We hadda leave my brother Will." The heads turned toward him "Him an' me had forties side by side. He's older'n me. Neither one ever drove a car. Well, we went in an' we sol' ever'thing. Will, he bought a car, an they give him a kid to show 'im how to use it. So the afternoon 'fore we're gonna start, Will an' Aunt Minnie go a-practicin'. Will, he comes so to a bend in the road an' he yells. Whoa' an' yanks back, an' he goes through a fence. An' he yells 'Whoa, you bastard' an' tromps down on the gas an' goes over into a gulch. An' there he was Didn't have nothin' more to sell an' didn't have no car. But it were his own damn fault, praise. God. He's so damn mad he won't come along with us, jus' set there a-cussin' an' a-cussin'."

"What's he gonna do?"

I dunno He's 100 mad to figger. An' we couldn't wait. Only had eighty-five dollars to go on We couldn' 70 set an' cut it up, but we et it up anyways. Didn' go a hundred mile when a tooth in the rear end bust, an' cost thirty dollars to get he' fix', an' then we got to get a tire, an' then a spark plug cracked, an' Sairy got sick. Had ta stop ten days. An' now the goddamn cai is bust aguin, an' money's gettin' low. I dunno when we'll ever get to California. 'F I could on'y fix a car, but I don't know nothin' about cars.''

Al asked importantly, "What's the matter?"

"Well, she jus' won't run Starts an' farts an' stops 80 In a minute she'll start again, an' then 'fore you can git her goin', she peters out again."

"Runs a minute an' then dies?"

"Yes, sir An I can't keep her a-goin' no matter how much gas I give her Got worse an' worse, an' now I cain't get her a-movin' a-tall."

Al was very proud and very mature, then "I think you got a plugged gas line. I'll blow her out for ya,"

And Pa was proud too "He's a good hand with a car," Pa said

"Well, I'll sure thank ya for a han'. I sure will Makes a fella kinda feel--like a little kid, when he can't fix nothin'. When we get to California I aim to get me a nice car. Maybe she won't break down."

Pa said, "When we get there. Gettin' there's the trouble."

"Oh, but she's worth it," said Wilson "Why, I seen han' bills how they need folks to pick fruit, an' good wages Why, jus' think how it's gonna be, under them shady trees a-pickin' fruit an' takin' a bite ever' once in a while Why, hell, they don't care how much you to eat 'cause they got so much An' with them good wages, maybe a fella can bet hisself a little piece a land an' work out for extra cash Why, hell, in a couple years I bet a fella could have a place of his own"

Pa said, "We seen them han'bills I got one right here." He took out his purse and from it took a folded orange handbill. In black type it said, "Pea Pickers Wanted in California. Good Wages All Season. 800 Pickers Wanted."

Wilson looked at it curiously. "Why, that's the one 20 I seen. The very same one You s'pose—maybe they got all eight hunderd awready?"

Pa said, "This is jus' one little part a California Why, that's the secon' biggest State we got S'pose they did get all them eight hundred. They's plenty places else I rather pick fruit anyways. Like you says, under them trees an pickin' fruit—why, even the kids d like to do that."

Suddenly Al got up and walked to the Wilsons touring car He looked in for a moment and then came 30 back and sat down

"You can't fix her tonight," Wilson said

"I know I'll get to her in the morning"

Tom had watched his young brother carefully "I was thinkin' somepin like that myself," he said

Noah asked, "What you two fellas talkin' about?"

Tom and Al went silent, each waiting for the other "You tell em," Al said finally

"Well, maybe it's no good, an maybe it ain't the same thing Al's thinking. Here she is, anyways. We got a coverload, but Mr and Mis' Wilson ain't. If some of us folks could ride with them an take some a their light stuff in the truck, we wouldn't break no springs an we could git up hills. An me an' Al both knows about a car, so we could keep that car a-rollin'. We'd keep together on the road an' it'd be good for everbody."

Wilson jumped up "Why, sure Why, we'd be proud We certain'y would You hear that. Sairy?"

"It's a nice thing," said Sairy "Wouldn' be a burden on you folks?"

"No, by God," said Pa "Wouldn't be no burden at all You'd be helpin' us "

Wilson settled back uneasily "Well, I dunno." "What's a matter, don' you wanta?"

"Well, ya see—I on'y got 'bout thirty dollars lef', an' I won't be no burden"

Ma said, "You won't be no burden Each'll help each, an' we'll all git to California Sairy Wilson he'ped lay Grampa out," and she stopped The relationship was plain

Al cried, "That car'll take six easy. Say me to drive, an' Rosasharn an' Connie and Granma Then we take the big light stuff an' pile her on the truck. An' we'll trade off ever' so often "He spoke loudly, for a load of worry was lifted from him.

They smiled shyly and looked down at the ground Pa fingered the dusty earth with his fingertips. He said, "Ma tavors a white house with oranges growin' around They's a big pitcher on a calendar she seen."

Sairy said, "If I get sick again you got to go on an' get there. We ain't a goin' to burden."

Ma looked carefully at Sairy, and she seemed to see for the first time the pain-tormented eyes and the face that was haunted and shrinking with pain. And Ma said "We gonna see you get through You said yourself, you can't let help go unwanted."

Sairy studied her wrinkled hands in the firelight "We got to get some sleep tonight" She stood up

"Grampa—it's like he's dead a year," Ma said

The families moved lazily to their sleep, yawning luxuriously Ma sloshed the tin plates off a little and rubbed the grease free with a flour sack. The fire died down and the stars descended. Few passenger cars went by on the highway now, but the transport trucks thundered by at intervals and put little earthquakes in the ground. In the ditch the cars were hardly visible under the starlight A tied dog howled at the service station down the road. The families were quiet and sleeping, and the field mice grew bold and scampered about among the mattresses. Only Sairy Wilson was awake. She stared into the sky and braced her body firmly against pain.

The western land, nervous under the beginning change The Western States, nervous as horses before a thunder storm The great owners, nervous, sensing a change knowing nothing of the nature of the change. The great owners, striking at the immediate thing, the widening government the growing labor unity, striking at new taxes, at plans, not knowing these things are results not causes Results, not causes, results not causes. The causes he deep and simple—the causes are a hunger in a so mach, multiplied a million times, a hunger in a single soul, hunger for joy and some security multiplied a million times, muscles and mind aching to grew to work, to create, multiplied a million times. The last clear definite function of man-muscles aching to work minds aching to create beyond the single need-this is man. To build a wall, to build a house a dam, and in the wall and house and dam to put something of Munself, and to Manself take back somerhing of the wall, the house the dam, to take hard muscles from the lifting, to take the clear lines and form from conceiving. For man unlike any other thing organic or in organic in the universe grows beyond his work walks up the stairs of his concepts, emerges ahead of his accomplishments. This you may say of man-when theories change and crash when schools, philosophies, when narrow dark alleys of thought national, religious, economic, grow and disintegrate man reaches, stumbles forward, painfully mistakenly sometimes. Having stepped forward, he may slip back but only half a step, never the full step back. This you may say and know it and know it. This you may know when the bombs plummet out of the black planes on the market place, when prisoners are stuck like pigs when the crushed bodies drain filthily in the dust. You may know it in this way If the step were not being taken if the stumbling-forward ache were not alive the bombs would not fall, the throats would not be cut. Fear the time when the bombs stop falling while the bombers live-for every bomb is proof that the spirit has not died. And fear the time when the strikes stop while the great owners live-40 for every little beaten strike is proof that the step is being taken. And this you can know-fear the time when Manself will not suffer and die for a concept for this one quality is the foundation of Manself and this one quality is man, distinctive in the universe.

The Western States nervous under the beginning change Texas and Okiahoma, Kansas and Arkansas, New Mexico, Arizona, California. A single family moved from the land. Pa borrowed money from the bank, and now the bank wants the land. The land company-that's the bank when it has land-wants tractors not families on so the land is a tractor bid is the power that turns the long fuctows wrong? If this tractor were ours it would be gued-not mine, but ours It our tractor turned the long rerrows of our land it would be good. Not my land, but ours. We could love that tractor then as we have loved this land when it was ours. But this tractor does two things-it turns the land and turns us off the land There is little difference between this tractor and a tank The people are driven intimidated, hurt by both We must think about this

One man, one family driven from the land this rusty car creaking along the highway to the west. I lost my fund a single tractor took my land I am alone and I am bewildered. And in the night one family camps in a ditch and another family pells in and the tents come out. The two men squat on their hams and the women and children listen. Here is the node you who hate change and fear revolution. Keep these two squatting men apart, make them hate fear suspect each other. Here is the anlage of the thing you fear. This is the zygote. For here. I lost my. 70 land is changed, a cell is split and from its splitting grows the thing you hate- We lost our land. The danger is here for two men are not as lonely and perplexed as one. And from this first, we, there grows a still more dangerous thang. I have a little food plus. I have none. It from this problem the sum is. We have a little food the thing is on its way the movement has direction. Only a little multiplication now and this land, this tractor are ours. The two men squatting in a ditch, the little fire the side-meat stewing in a single pot, the silent, 80 stone-cycl women behind the children listening with their souls to words their minds do not understand. The night draws down. The baby has a col.' Here, take this blanket. It's wood Ir was my mother's blanket-take it for the baby. This is the thing to bomb. This is the beginning-from T to 'wc'

If you who own the things people must have could understand this, you might preserve yourself. If you could separate causes from results if you could know that Paine, Marx. Jefferson, Lenin, were results, not causes, 50 you might survive. But that you cannot know. For the quality of owning freezes you forever into "I," and cuts you off forever from the "we."

The Western States are nervous under the beginning change. Need is the stimulus to concept, concept to action. A half-million people moving over the country; a million more restive, ready to move, ten million more feeling the first nervousness

And tractors turning the multiple furrows in the va- 10 cant land

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Along 66 the hamburger stands—Al & Susy's Place— Carl's Lunch-Joe & Minnie-Will's Eats Board-andbat shacks Two gasoline pumps in front, a screen door, a long bar, stools, and a foot rail Near the door three slot machines, showing through glass the wealth of nickels three bars will bring And beside them, the nickel phonograph with records piled up like pies, ready to swing out to the turntable and play dance music, "Ti-pi-ti-pitin," "Thanks for the Memory," Bing Crosby, Benny 20 Goodman At one end of the counter a covered case; candy cough drops, cafferne sulphate called Sleepless, No-Doze, candy, cigarettes, razor blades, aspirin, Bromo-Seltzer, Alka-Seltzer The walls decorated with posters, bathing girls, blondes with big breasts and slender hips and waxen faces, in white bathing suits, and holding a bottle of Coca-Cola and smiling—see what you get with a Coca-Cola Long bar, and salts, peppers, mustard pots, and paper napkins Beer taps behind the counter, and in back the coffee urns, shiny and steaming, with glass 30 gauges showing the coffee level. And pies in wire cages and oranges in pyramids of four And little piles of Post Toasties, corn flakes, stacked up in designs

The signs on cards, picked out with shining mica. Pies Like Mother Used to Make Credit Makes Enemies Let's Be Friends Ladies May Smoke But Be Careful Where You Lay Your Butts Eat Here and Keep Your Wife for a Pet IITYWYBAD?

Down at one end the cooking plates, pots of stew potatoes, pot roast, roast beef, gray roast pork waiting to be sliced.

Minnie or Susy of Mae, middle-aging behind the counter, hair curled and rouge and powder on a sweating face Taking orders in a soft low voice, calling them to the cook with a screech like a peacock. Mopping the counter with circular strokes, polishing the big shining coffee urns. The cook is Joe or Carl or Al, hot in a white coat and apron, beady sweat on white forehead, below the white cook's cap, moody, rarely speaking, looking up for a moment at each new entry. Wiping the griddle, slapping down the hamburger. He repeats Mae's orders a gently, scrapes the griddle, wipes it down with burlap Moody and silent.

Mae is the contact, smiling, irritated, near to outbreak, smiling while her eyes look on past-unless for truck drivers. There's the backbone of the joint. Where the trucks stop, that's where the customers come Can't fool truck drivers, they know They bring the custom. They know. Give 'em a stale cup of coffee an' they're off the joint. Treat em right an' they come back. Mae really smiles with all her might at truck drivers. She bridles a $\,^6$ little, fixes her back hair so that her breasts will lift with her raised arms, passes the time of day and indicates great things, great times, great jokes. Al never speaks. He is no contact. Sometimes he smiles a little at a joke, but he never laughs. Sometimes he looks up at the vivaciousness in Mae's voice, and then he scrapes the griddle with a spatula, scrapes the grease into an iron trough around the plate. He presses down a hissing hamburger with his spatula He lays the split buns on the plate to toast and heat. He gathers up stray onions from the plate and heaps π them on the meat and presses them in with the spatula He puts half the bun on top of the meat, paints the other half with melted butter, with thin pickle relish. Holding the bun on the meat, he slips the spatula under the thin pad of meat, flips it over, lays the buttered half on top. and drops the hamburger on a small plate Quarter of a dill pickle, two black olives beside the sandwich. Al skims the plate down the counter like a quoit And he scrapes his griddle with the spatula and looks moodily at the stew kettle.

I'd take a Zephyr myself. You ain't ridin' no fortune, but you got class an' speed. Give me a Zephyr.

Well, sir, you may get a laugh out this—I'll take a Buick-Puick. That's good enough.

But, hell, that costs in the Zephyr class an' it ain't got the sap.

I don't care. I don't want nothin' to do with nothing of Henry Ford's I don't like 'im. Never did Got a brother worked in the plant Oughta hear him tell

The big cars on the highway Languid, heat-raddled ladies, small nucleuses about whom revolve a thousand accouterments, creams, ointments to grease themselves, coloring matter in phials—black, pink, red, white, green, silver—to change the color of hair, eyes, lips nails brows, lashes, lids Oils, seeds, and pills to make the bowels move A bag of bottles, syringes, pills, powders, fluids, jellies to make their sexual intercourse safe, odorless, and unproductive. And this apart from clothes What a hell of a nuisance!

Lines of weariness around the eyes, lines of discontent down from the mouth, breasts lying heavily in little hammocks, stomach and thighs straining against cases of rubber. And the mouths panting, the eyes sullen, disliking sun and wind and earth, resenting food and weariness, hating time that rarely makes them beautiful and always makes them old.

Beside them, little pot-bellied men in light suits and panama hats, clean, pink men with puzzled, worried eyes, with restless eyes. Worried because formulas do not work out, hungry for security and yet sensing its disappearance from the earth. In their lapels the insignia of lodges and service clubs, places where they can go and, by a weight of numbers of little worried men, reassure themselves that business is noble and not the curious ritualized thievery they know it is, that business men are intelligent in spite of the records of their stupidity, that they are kind and charitable in spite of the principles of sound business; that their lives are rich instead of the thin tiresome routines they know, and that a time is coming when they will not be afraid any more

And these two, going to California going to sit in the lobby of the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel and watch people they envy go by, to look at mountains—mountains, mind you, and great trees—he with his worried eves and she thinking how the sun will dry her skin Going to look at the Pacific Ocean, and I'll bet a hundred thousand dollars

And he, "I talked to good sound business men out there They don't see a chance till we get rid of that fellow in the V7hite House" And, "I got it from a man in the know—she has philis, you know She was in that Warner picture Man said she's slept her way into pictures Well, she got what she was looking for "But the worried eyes are never calm, and the pouting mouth is never glad. I want a cold drink

Well, there's something up ahead Want to stop?

Do you think it would be clean?

Clean as you're going to find in this God-forsaken country

Well, maybe the bottled soda will be all right

The great car squeals and pulls to a stop. The fat worried man helps his wife out

Mae looks at and past them as they enter. Al looks up from his griddle, and down again. Mae knows. They'll 70 drink a five-cent soda and crab that it ain't cold enough. The woman will use six paper napkins and drop them on the floor. The man will choke and try to put the blame on Mae. The woman will snift as though she smelled rotting meat and they will go out again and tell forever afterward that the people in the West are sullen. And Mae, when she is alone with Al, has a name for them.

Truck drivers That's the stuff

Here's a big transport comin'. Hope they stop, take 80 away the taste of them shitheels. When I worked in that hotel in Albuquerque. Al, the way they steal—ever' darn thing. An' the bigger the car they got, the more they steal—towels silver, soap dishes, I can't figger it.

Mae squeaks with laughter, harsh screeching laughter Al, slicing onions carefully on a board, looks up and smiles, and then looks down again. Truck drivers, that's the stuff. Gonna leave a quarter each for Mae. Fifteen cents for pie an' coffee an' a dime for Mae. An' they ain't tryin' to make her, neither.

Sitting together on the stools, spoons sticking up out of the coffee mugs. Passing the time of day. And Al. rubbing down his griddle, listening but making no comment. Bing Crosby's voice stops. The turntable drops down and the record swings into its place in the pile. The purple light goes off. The nickel, which has caused all this mechanism to work, has caused Crosby to sing and an orchestra to play—this nickel drops from between the contact points into the box where the profits go. The nickel, unlike most money, has actually done a job of work, has been physically responsible for a $_{\rm g}$ reaction

Steam spurts from the valve of the coffee urn The compressor of the ice machine chigs softly for a time and then stops. The electric fan in the corner waves its head slowly back and forth, sweeping the room with a warm breeze. On the highway, on 66, the cars whiz by

They was a Massachusetts car stopped a while ago, said Mae

Big Bill grasped his cup around the top so that the spoon stuck up between his first and second fingers. He drew in a snort of air with the coffee, to cool it "You ought to be out on 66 Cars from all over the country. All headin' west. Never seen so many before. Sure some honeys on the road."

"Wonder where they all go to," said Mae Come here for gas sometimes, but they don't hardly never buy nothin else People says they steal We ain't got nothin' layin' around They never stole nothin' from us"

Big Bill, munching his pie, looked up the road through the screened window "Better tie your stuff down. I think you got some of 'em comin' now."

A 1926 Nash sedan pulled wearily off the highway

The back seat was piled nearly to the ceiling with sacks, with pots and pans, and on the very top, right up against the ceiling, two boys rode. On the top of the car, a mattress and a folded tent, tent poles tied along the running board. The car pulled up to the gas pumps A darkhaired, hatchet-faced man got slowly out. And the two boys slid down from the load and hit the ground.

Mae walked around the counter and stood in the door. The man was dressed in gray wool trousers and a blite shirt, dark blue with sweat on the back and under the arms. The boys in overalls and nothing else, ragged patched overalls. Their hair was light, and it stood up evenly all over their heads, for it had been roached. Their faces were streaked with dust. They went directly to the mud puddle under the hose and dug their toes into the mud.

The man asked, "Can we git some water ma'am?"

A look of annoyance crossed Mae's face 'Sure, go ahead' She said softly over her shoulder 'Tll keep my eye on the hose" She watched while the man slowly unscrewed the radiator cap and ran the hose in

A woman in the car, a flaxen-haired woman, said, "See if you can't git it here"

The man turned off the hose and screwed on the cap again. The little boys took the hose from him and they up-ended it and drank thirstily. The man took off his dark, stained hat and stood with a curious humility in front of the screen. "Could you see your way to sell us a loaf of bread, ma'am?"

Mae said, "This ain't a grocery store. We got bread to make san'widges."

"I know, ma'm" His humility was insistent. We need bread and there ain't nothin' for quite a picce, they say"

"'F we sell bread we gonna run out ' Mae's tone was faltering

"We're hungry," the man said

"Whyn't you buy a san'widge? We got nice san'widges hamburgs"

"We'd sure admire to do that, ma'am But we can't We got to make a dime do all of us" And he said embarrassedly, "We ain't got but a little"

Mae said, "You can't get no loaf of bread for a dime We only got fifteen-cent loafs"

From behind her Al growled God Almighty Mae give 'em bread''

"We'll run out 'fore the bread truck comes"

"Run out then, goddamn it," said Al And he looked sullenly down at the potato salad he was mixing

Mae shrugged her plump shoulders and looked to the 50 truck drivers to show them what she was up against

She held the screen door open and the man came in, bringing a smell of sweat with him. The boys edged in behind him and they went immediately to the candy case and stated in—not with craving or with hope or even with desire, but just with a kind of wonder that such things could be. They were alike in size and their faces were alike. One scratched his dusty ankle with the toe nails of his other toot. The other whispered some soft message and then they straightened their arms so that 60 their clenched fists as the overall pockets showed through the thin blue cloth.

Mae opened a drawer and took out a long waxpaperwrapped loaf. 'This here is a fifteen-cent loaf.'

The man put his hat back on his head. He answered with inflexible humility, 'Won't you—can't you see your way to cut off ten cents worth?'

Al said snadingly, "Goddamn it, Mae. Give cm the loef."

The man turned toward Al. "No, we want ta buy ten 20 cents worth of it. We got it figgered awful close, mister to get to California."

Mac said resignedly, 'You can have this for ten cents. That d be robbin you maam.

Go ahead—Al says to take it. She pushed the waxpapered loaf across the counter. The man took a deep leather pouch from his rear pocket, untied the strings, and spread it open. It was heavy with silver and with greasy bills.

May soun furnly to be so tight, he apologized "We 86 got a thousan miles to go, an we don't know if we'll make it." He dug in the pouch with a forefinger, located a dime, and pinched in for it. When he put it down on the counter he had a penny with it. He was about to drop the penny back into the pouch when his eye fell on the boys frozen before the candy counter. He inoved slowly down to them. He pointed in the case, 't big long sticks of stripted peppermint. Is them penny candy, ma'ama'."

Mac moved down and looked in Which ones?"

There, them stripy ones"

The little boys raised their eyes to her face and they stopped breathing, their mouths were partly opened, their half-naked bodies were rigid

"Oh-them Well, no-thems two for a penny"

"Well, gimme two then, ma'am." He placed the copper cent carefully on the counter The boys expelled their held breath softly. Mae held the big sticks out

"Take 'em," said the man

They reached timidly, each took a stick, and they held them down at their sides and did not look at them. But they looked at each other, and their mouth corners smiled rigidly with embarrassment.

"Thank you, ma'am" The man picked up the bread and went out the door, and the little boys marched stiffly behind him, the red-striped sticks held tightly against their legs. They leaped like chipmunks over the front seat and onto the top of the load, and they burrowed back out of sight like chipmunks.

The man got in and started his car, and with a roaring motor and a cloud of blue oily smoke the ancient Nash climbed up on the highway and went on its way to the west

From inside the restaurant the truck drivers and $M_{\rm ac}$ and Al stared after them

Big Bill wheeled back "Them wasn't two-for-a-cent candy," he said.

"What's that to you?" Mae said fiercely

"Them was a nickel apiece candy," said Bill

"We got to get goin," said the other man "We're droppin time." They reached in their pockets. Bill put a coin on the counter and the other man looked at it and reached again and put down a coin. They swung around and walked to the door.

30 "So long," said Bill

Mae called, "Hey! Wait a minute You got change" "You go to hell," said Bill, and the screen door slammed

Mae watched them get into the great truck, watched it lumber off in low gear, and heard the shift up the whining gears to cruising ratio "Al—" she said softly

He looked up from the hamburger he was patting thin and stacking between waxed papers "What ya want?"

"Look there ' She pointed at the coins beside the cups—two-half-dollars. Al walked near and looked, and then the went back to his work."

"Truck drivers," Mae said reverently, "an' after them shitheels"

Flies struck the screen with little bumps and droned away. The compressor chugged for a time and then stopped. On 66 the traffic whizzed by, trucks and fine streamlined cars and jalopies, and they went by with a vicious whiz. Mae took down the plates and scraped the pie crusts into a bucket. She found her damp cloth and wiped the counter with circular sweeps. And her eyes were on the highway, where life whizzed by.

Al wiped his hands on his apron. He looked at a paper pinned to the wall over the griddle. Three lines of marks in columns on the paper. Al counted the longest line. He walked along the counter to the cash register, rang "No Sale," and took out a handful of nickels.

"What ya doin"?" Mae asked Number three's ready to pay off," said Al He went to the third slot machine and played his nickels in, and on the fifth spin of the wheels the three bars came up and the jackpot dumped out into the cup. Al gathered up the big handful of coins and went back of the counter. He dropped them in the drawer and slammed the cash register. Then he went back to his place and crossed out the line of dots. Number three gets more play in the others, he said. "Maybe I ought to shift 'em around." He lifted a lid and stirred the slowly simmering stew.

"I wonder what they'll do in California?" said Mae

"Them folks that was just in"

"Christ knows," said Al

"S pose they'll get work?"

'How the hell would I know?" said Al.

She stared eastward along the highway. "Here comes a transport, double Wonder if they stop? Hope they do 'And as the huge truck came heavily down from the highway and parked, Mae seized her cloth and wiped the whole length of the counter. And she took a few swipes at the gleaming coffee urn too, and turned up the bottlegas under the urn. All brought out a handful of little turnips and started to peel them. Mae's face was gay when the door opened and the two uniformed truck drivers entered.

"Hi, sister!"

"I won't be a sister to no man," said Mae. They laughed and Mae laughed "What II it be, boys?"

"Oh, a cup of Java What kinda pie ya got?"

"Pineapple cream an banana cream an' chocolate cream an' apple "

"Give me apple No, wait—what's that big thick one?"

Mae picked up the pie and smelled it. "Pineapple cream," she said

"Well, chop out a hunk a that"

The cars whizzed viciously by on 66

Thomas Wolfe

1900 • 1938

Thomas Wolfe was born and grew up in Asheville, North Carolina, which is situated high in the Smokies and is described with remarkable completeness in his Look Homeward, Angel. After graduating from the University of North Carolina, Wolfe studied at Harvard, taught at New York University, and traveled in England and France. His Of Time and the River is the best account in literature of a Southerner's discovery of the world outside the South and his loneliness, his feeling of strangeness, in alten places

Wolfe's reputation rests securely upon four powerful books. Look Homeward, Angel (1929) and Of Time and the River (1935) tell the story of Eugene Gant, The Web and the Rock (1939) and You Can't Go Home Again (1940) tell the story of George Webber Both Gant and Webber are obviously the author himself If the third and fourth volumes show a growing maturity of thought and style, they have less of the poetic fire, the romantic abandon, which made the first and second volumes such remarkable works. It is doubtful if a romantic genius is ever improved by sobriety For Wolfe was a great romantic genius with all of the vitality, the exuberance, the undisciplined ardor which the name implies. He was Wordsworth's "creature moving about in worlds not realized." His closest affinities were with Coleridge, whom he often quoted, and with Whitman, whom he obviously emulated His prose at its best has a lyrical exaltation; at its worst, it is so unpruned as to verge on the bombastic. His books have the vices as well as the virtues of great romantic writing

Wolfe attempted a synthesis of America. His aim. like Whitman's, was to absorb America into himself and to express America subjectively and emotionally through his own life-experience. He possessed enormous capacities for feeling and passionate living "It was not his quality as a romantic, he declared of Eugene Gant, "to escape out of life, but into it. Men do not escape from life because life is dull, but life escapes from men because men are little." Wolfe was not concerned with political and social reform. Of Gant, he said, 'He had no greater need for rebellion than have most Americans, which is none at all." Except toward the end of his last book (where he spoke, somewhat vaguely, of the need for "the complete revision of the structure of society as we know it"), Wolfe's great concern was to crowd into every moment the maximum of vital experience He was convinced that the world—and preeminently America which, unlike the expatriates of his generation, he was never tempted to renounce-"was full of pleasant places, enchanted places" More cloquently than any other writer since Whitman, Wolfe restated the American dream the right of every man "to live, to work, to be himself, to become whatever thing his manhood and his vision can combine to make him"

Of Time and the River

The following selection recalls, with certain differences, Whitman's "Song of Myself" (see p. 162). Notable, among other things, are the rich sense impressions, the passionate attachment to the South ("the hills of home"), and the great fondness for trains, which were important to Wolfe as a means of exploration and adventure and as a symbol not only of these but of American achievement and of American unity

YOUNG FAUSTUS

We are so lost, so naked and so lonely in America Immense and cruel skies bend over us, and all of us are driven on forever and we have no home. Therefore, it is not the slow, the punctual sanded dip of the unnumbered days that we remember best, the ash of time, nor is it the huge monotone of the lost years, the unswerving schedules of the lost life and the well-known faces, that we remember best. It is a face seen once and lost forever in a crowd, an eye that looked, a face that smiled and vanished on a passing train, it is a prescience of snow upon a certain night, the laughter of a woman in a summer street long years ago, it is the memory of a single moon seen at the pine's dark edge in old October—and all of our lives is written in the twisting of a leaf upon a bough, a door that opened, and a stone

For America has a thousand lights and weathers and we walk the streets, we walk the streets forever, we walk the streets of life alone

It is the place of the howling winds, the hurrying of the leaves in old October, the hard clean falling to the earth of acorns. The place of the storm-tossed moaning of the wintry mountainside, where the young men cry out in their throats and feel the savage vigor, the rude strong energies, the place also where the trains cross rivers

It is a fabulous country, it is the one place where miracles not only happen, but where they happen all the time.

It is the place of exultancy and strong joy, the place of the darkened brooding air, the smell of snow it is the place of all the fierce, the bitten colors in October, when all of the wild, sweet woods flame up, it is also the place of the cider press and the last brown oozings of the York Imperials. It is the place of the lovely girls with good jobs and the husky voices, who will bey a round of drinks, it is the place where the women with fine legs and silken underwear lie in the pullman berth below you, it is the place of the dark-green snore of the pullman cars, and the voices in the night-time in Virginia.

It is the place where great boats are baying at the at harbor's mouth, where great ships are putting out to sea, it is the place where great boats are blowing in the gulf of night, and where the river, the dark and secret river full of strange time, is forever flowing by us to the sea

The tigs keep baying in the river: at twelve o'clock the Berengaria moans, her lights slide gently past the piers heyond Eleventh Street, and in the night a tall tree falls in Old Catawha, there in the hills of home

It is the place of autumnal moons hung low and orange at the frosty edges of the pines, it is the place of frost st and silence, of the clean dry shocks and the opulence of enormous pumpkins that yellow on hard clotted earth, it is the place of the stil and feathery stumble of the hens upon their roost, the frosty, broken barking of the dogs, the great barnshapes and solid shadows in the running sweep of the moon-whited countryside, the wailing whistle of the fast express. It is the place of flares and steamings on the tracks, and the swing and bob and tottering dance of lanterns in the yards, it is the place of dings and knellings and the sudden glare 60 of mighty engines over sleeping faces in the night, it is the place of the terrific web and spread and smouldering, the distant glare of Philadelphia and the solid rumble of the sleepers, it is also the place where the Transcontinental Limited is stroking eighty miles an hour across the continent and the small dark towns whip by like bullets, and there is only the fanlike stroke of the secret, immense and lonely earth again

I have foreseen this picture many times I will buy passage on the Fast Express

⁴⁸ Catawba, a county in western North Carolina

It is the place of the wild and exultant winters morning and the wind, with the powders snow, that has been howling all night long, it is the place of solitude and the branches of the spruce and hemlock piled with snow, it is the place where the Fall River boats are tethered to the wharf, and the wild gray snow of furious, secret, and storm-whited morning whips across them. It is the place of the lodge by the frozen lake and the sweet breath and amorous flesh of sinful woman it is the place of the tragic and lonely beauty of New England. it is the place of the red bain and the sound of the stabled hooves and of bright tatters of old circus posters. it is the place of the immense and pungent smell of breakfast, the country sausages and the ham and eggs the smoking wheat cakes and the fragrant coffee and of lone hunters in the frosty thickets who whistle to their lop-eared hounds

Where is old Doctor Ballard now with all his dogs? He held that they were sacred, that the souls of all the sold dead went into them. His youngest sisters soil sat on the seat beside him, she had long ears and her eyes were sad. Two dozen of his other cherished dead trotted around the higgy as he went up the hill past home. And that was eleven years ago, and I was nine years old and I stared gravely out the window of my father's boase at old Doctor Ballard.

It is the place of the straight stare, the cold white bellies and the buried lust of the lovely Boston girls, it is the place of ripe brainless blondes with tender lips and a flowery smell, and of the girls with shapely arms who stand on ladders picking oranges, it is also the place where large slow-bodied girls from Kansas City, with big legs and milky flesh, are sent East to school by their rich fathers, and there are also immense and lovely girls, with the grip of a passionate bear who have such names as Neilson, Lundquist Jorgenson and Brandt

I will go up and down the country, and back and forth across the country on the great trains that thunder over America. I will go out West where States are square. Oh, I will go to Boise, and Helena and Albuquerque I will go to Montana and the two Dekotas and the unknown blaces.

It is the place of violence and sudden death, of the fast shots in the night, the club of the Irish cop, and the smell of brains and blood upon the pavement it is the place of the small-town killings, and the men who shoot the lovers of their wives, it is the place where the Negroes slash with razors and the hillmen kill in the mountain meadows, it is the place of the ugly drunks 50 and the snarling voices and of foul-mouthed men who want to fight, it is the place of the loud word and the foolish boast and the violent threat it is also the place of the deadly little mea with white faces and the eyes of reptiles who kill quickly and estably in the dark, it is the liveless land that feeds on murder

"Drd you know the two I we golv?" he asked. "Yes," I said. They he ed in Bilthian by the river, and one of them was drowned in the flood. She was a cripple, and she wheeled hersel' along in a chair. She was strong as 60 a tall. That y the gol," he said.

It is the place of the crack athletes and of the runners who limber up in March, it is the place of the ten-second men and the great jumpers and vaulters it is the place where Spring comes and the young birch trees have white and tender barks, of the thaw of the earth, and the feathery smoke of the tices, it is the place of the burst of grass and bud the wild and sudden tenderness of the wilderness and of the crews out on the river and the coaches coming down behind them in the motorboats, 76 the surges rolling out behind when they are gone with heavy sudden wash. It is the place of the baseball players, and the casy lob, the soft spring smackings of the glove and mit, the crack of the bat, it is the place of the great batters fielders and pitchers, of the nigger boys and the white drawling, shirt-sleeved men, the bleachers and the resinous smell of old worn wood, it is the place of Rube Waddell, the mighty untamed and ill-fated pitcher when his left arm is swinging like a lash. It is the place of the fighters, the crafty Jewish lightweights and the 80 mauling Italians, Leonard, Tendler Rocky Kansas, and Dundee, it is the place where the champion looks over his rival's shoulder with a bored expression

I shall wake at morning in a foreign land thinking I heard a horse in one of the streets of home

It is the place where they like to 21n always, and boast about their vectories it is the place of quick money and sudden loss it is the place of the mile-long freights with their strong, solid, clanking, heavy loneliness at night, and of the silent freight of cars that % curve away among raw piney desolations with their promise of new lands and unknown distances—the huge attentive gape of emptiness. It is the place where the bums come singly from the woods at sunset, the huge stillness of the watertower, the fading light, the rails, secret and alive, and trembling with the oncoming train; it is the place of the great tramps, Oklahoma Red, Fargo Pete, and the Jersey Dutchman, who grab fast rattlers for the Western shore, it is the place of old blown bums who come up in October skirls of dust and wind and crumpled newspapers and beg. with canned heat on their breaths "Help Old McGuire. McGuire's a good guy, kid You're not so tough, kid McGuires your pal, kid How about McGuire, McGuire—?"

It is the place of the poolroom players and the drugstore boys, of the town whore and her paramour, the tough town driver, it is the place where they go to the woods on Sunday and get up among the laurel and dogwood bushes and the rhododendron blossoms, it is the place of the cheap hotels and the kids who wait with chattering lips while the nigger goes to get them their first woman, it is the place of the drunken college boys who spend the old mans money and wear fur coats to the football games, it is the place of the lovely girls up North who have rich fathers, of the beautiful wives of business men

The train broke down somewhere beyond Manassas, and I went forward along the tracks with all the other 30 passengers. "What's the matter?" I said to the engineer. The eccentric strap is broken, son," he said. It was a very cold day, windy and full of sparkling sun. This was the farthest north I'd ever been, and I was twelve years old and on my way to Washington to see Woodrow Wilson maugurated. Later I could not forget the face of the engineer and the words "eccentric strap."

It is the place of the immense and lonely earth, the place of fat ears and abundance where they grow cotton, corn, and wheat, the wine-red apples of October, and the good tobacco.

It is the place that is savage and cruel, but it is also the innocent place, it is the wild lawless place, the vital earth that is soaked with the blood of the murdered men, with the blood of the countless murdered men, with the blood of the unavenged and unremembered murdered men, but it is also the place of the child and laughter, where the young men are torn apart with ecstasy, and cry out in their throats with joy, where they hear the howl of the wind and the rain and smell the thunder and the soft numb spitting of the snow, where they are drunk with the bite and sparkle of the air and mad with the solar energy, where they believe in love and victory and think that they can never die.

It is the place where you come up through Virginia on the great trains in the night-time, and rumble slowly across the wide Potomac and see the morning sunlight on the nation's dome at Washington, and where the fat man shaving in the pullman washroom grunts, "What's this' What's this we're coming to—Washington?"—And the thin man glancing out the window says, "Yep. this is Washington. That's what it is, all right You gettin' off here?"—And where the fat man grunts, "Who—me' Naw—I'm goin' on to Baltimore." It is the place where you get off at Baltimore and find your brother waiting.

Where is my father sleeping on the land? Buried: Dead these seven years? Forgotten, rotten in the ground-Held by his own great stone? No, no! Will I say. "Father when I come to him? And will be call me, "Son"? Oh, no, he'll never see my face: we'll never speak except to say—

It is the place of the fast approach, the hot blind smoky passage, the tragic lonely beauty of New England and the web of Boston, the place of the mighty station there, and engines passive as great cats, the straight dense plumes of engine smoke, the acrid and exciting smell of trains and stations, and of the man-swarm passing ever in its million-footed weft, the smell of the sea in harbors and the thought of voyages—and the place of the goat cry, the strong joy of our youth, the magic city, when we knew the most fortunate life on earth would certainly be ours, that we were twenty and could never die.

And always America is the place of the deathless and enraptured moments, the eye that looked, the mouth that smiled and vanished, and the word, the stone, the leaf the door we never found and never have forgotten. And these are the things that we remember of America, for we have known all her thousand lights and weathers, and we walk the streets, we walk the streets forever, we walk the streets of life alone.

You Can't Go Home Again

In an age which was becoming more and more collectivistic in its political and social thinking, Wolfe argued for the prerogatives of the individual. He feared that collectivism would reduce the individual to anonymity. To him as to Milton, "Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise." Deprived of "that last infirmity" he thought, man would no longer be capable of the highest aspirations and achievements.

THE PROMISE OF AMERICA

For four years George Webber lived and wrote in Brooklyn, and during all this time his life was about as solitary as any that a modern man can know Loneliness, far from being a rare and curious circumstance, is and always has been the central and inevitable experience of every man. Not only has this been true of the greatest poets, as evidenced by the huge unhappiness of their published grief, but now it seemed to George to apply with equal force to all the nameless ciphers who swarmed about him in the streets. As he saw them in their strident encounters with each other, and overheard their nevervarying exchanges of abuse contempt, distriust and hatred, it became increasingly clear to him that one of the contributing causes of their complaint was loneliness.

To live alone as George was living a man should have the confidence of God, the tranquil faith of a monastic saint, the stern impregnability of Gibraltar. Lacking these, he finds that there are times when anything, everything, all and nothing the most trivial incidents, the most casual words, can in an instant strip him of his armor, palsy his hand, constrict his heart with frozen horror, and fill his bowels with the grey substance of shuddering impotence and desolation. Sometimes it would be a sly remark dropped by some all-knowing literary soothsayer in the columns of one of the more leftish reviews, such as:

"Whatever has become of our autobiographical and volcanic friend, George Webber? Remember him? Remember the splish he made with that so-called 'novel' of his a few years back? Some of our esteemed col- 30 leagues thought they detected signs of promise there. We ourselves should have welcomed another book from him, just to prove that the first was not an accident. But tempus fugit, and where is Webber? Calling Mr. Webber' No answer? Well a pity, perhaps, but then, who can count the number of one-book authors? They shoot their bolt, and after that they go into the silence and no more is heard from them. Some of us who were more than a little doubtful about that book of Webber's, but whose voices were drowned out by the Oh's and Ah's 10 of those who rushed headlong to proclaim a new star rising in the literary firmament, could now come forward, if we weren't too kindly disposed toward our more emotional brethien of the critical fratering, and modestly say, We told you so!

Sometimes it would be nothing but a shadow passing on the sun sometimes nothing but the gelid light of March falling on the limitless, naked, sprawling ugliness and squalid decencies of Brooklyn streets. Whatever it was, at such a time all joy and singing would go instantly so out of day. Webber's heart would drop out of him like a leaden plummer hope, confidence, and conviction would seem lost forever to him, and all the high and shining truth that he had ever found and lived and known would now turn false to mock him. Then he would feel like one who walked among the dead, and it would be as if the only things that were not false on earth were the creatures of the death-in-life who moved forever in the changeless lights and weathers of red waning, weary.

These hideous doubts, despairs, and dark confusions of the soul would come and go and George knew them as every lonely man must know them. For he was united to no image save that image which he himself created. He was bolstered by no knowledge save that which he gathered for himself out of his own life. He saw life with no other vision save the vision of his own eyes and brain and senses. He was sustained and cheered and aided by no party, was given comfort by no creed, and had no faith in him except his own.

That faith, though it was made up of many articles, was at bottom a faith in himself, a faith that if he could only succeed in capturing a fragment of the truth about the life he knew, and make it known and felt by others, it would be a more glorious accomplishment than anything else he could imagine. And through it all, animating this faith and sustaining it with a promise of rewards to come, was a belief—be it now confessed—that if he could only do this, the world would thank him for it, and would crown him with the laurel of its fame.

The desire for fame is rooted in the hearts of men. It is one of the most powerful of all human desires, and perhaps for that very reason, and because it is so deep and secret, it is the desire that men are most unwilling to admit, particularly those who feel most sharply its keen and piercing spur.

The politician, for example, would never have us think that it is love of office, the desire for the notorious elevation of public place, that drives him on No, the thing that governs him is his pure devotion to the common weal, his selfless and high-minded statesmanship, his love of his fellow man, and his burning idealism to turn out the rascal who usurps the office and betrays the public trust which he himself, as he assures us, would so gloriously and devotedly maintain

So, too, the soldier It is never love of glory that inspires him to his profession. It is never love of battle, love of war, love of all the resounding titles and the proud emoluments of the heroic conqueror. Oh, no It is devotion to duty that makes him a soldier. There is no personal motive in it. He is inspired simply by the selfless aidor of his patriotic abnegation. He regrets that he has but one life to give for his country.

So it goes through every walk of life. The lawyer assures us that he is the defender of the weak, the guardian of the oppressed, the champion of the rights of defrauded widows and beleaguered orphans, the upholder of justice, the unrelenting enemy, at no matter what cost to himself, of all forms of chicanery, fraud, theft, violence, and crime. Even the business man will not admit a selfish motive in his money-getting. On the contrary, he is the developer of the nation's resources. He is the benevolent employer of thousands of working men who would be lost and on the dole without the organizing genius of his great intelligence. He is the defender of the American ideal of rugged individualism, the shining exemplat to youth of what a poor country boy may achieve in this nation through a devotion to the national virtues of thrift, industry, obedience to duty, and business integrity. He is, he assures us, the backbone of the country, the man who makes the wheels go round, the leading citizen, Public Friend No 1

All these people lie, of course. They know they lie and everyone who hears them also knows they lie The lie, however, has become a part of the convention of American life People listen to it patiently, and if they smile at it, the smile is weary, touched with resignation and the indifferent dismissals of fatigue

Curiously enough, the lie has also invaded the world of creation—the one place where it has no right at all to exist. There was a time when the poet, the painter, the musician, the artist of whatever sort, was not ashamed to confess that the desire for fame was one of the driving forces of his life and labor. But what a transformation from that time to this! Nowadays one will travel far and come back fruitless if he hopes to find an artist who will admit that he is devoted to anything except the service of some ideal—political, social economic, religious, or æsthetic—which is outside himself, and to which his own humble fameforsaking person is reverently and selflessly consigned.

Striplings of twenty assure us that the desire for fame is naively childish, the fruit of an outworn cult of "romantic individualism". From all the falseness and self-deception of this cult these young gentlemen tell us they are free—without troubling to explain, however by what process of miraculous purgation they achieved their freedom. It took Goethe, the strongest soul of modern times, some three and eighty years to free his mighty spirit of this last infirmity. Milton, old and blind forsaken, and past fifty, is said to have won free of it by the end of Cromwell's revolution, in whose employment he destroyed his sight. And yet, can we be sure that even he was ever wholly clear, for what is the tremendous edifice of Panadise Lost except a man's final and triumphant suit against eternity?

Poor, blind Milton!

Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise (That last infirmity of Noble mind)

⁸⁸ Fame ... meed, from Milton's "Lycidas," 11 70-84 The title Look Homeward, Angel is from the same poem, I 163

To scorn delights, and live laborious dayes; But the fair Guerdon when we nope to find, And think to burst out into sudden blaze. Comes the blind Fury with th'abhorred shears. And slits the thin-spun life. But not the praise. Phoebus repli'd, and touch'd my trembling ears, Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil, Nor in the glistering foil Set off to th'world, nor in broad rumour lies. But lives and spreds aloft by those pure eyes. And perfet witnes of all judging Jove, As he pronounces lastly on each deed, Of so much fame in Heav'n expect thy meed

Deluded man! Poor vassal of corrupted time. How fair a thing for us to know that we are not such men as he and Goethe were! We live in more stirring times, and our very striplings are secure in their collective self-lessness. We have freed ourselves of all degrading varieties, choked off the ravening desire for individual immortality, and now, having risen out of the ashes of our father's earth into the untainted ethers of collective consecration, we are clear at last of all that vexed, corrupted earth—clear of the sweat and blood and sorrow, clear of the grief and joy, clear of the hope and fear and human agony of which our father's flesh and that of every other man alive before us was ever wrought.

And yet, having achieved this glorious emancipation, having laid all petty dreams aside, having learned to think of life, not in terms of ourselves, but in terms of 30 the whole mass, having learned to think of life, not as it is today, but as it is going to be five hundred years from now, when all the revolutions have been made. and all the blood has been shed, and all the hundreds of millions of vain and selfish little lives, each concerned with its own individual and romantic breath, have been ruthlessly wiped out in order to usher in the collective glory that will be-having become marvelously and, as it were, overnight such paragons of collective selflessness and such scorners of the vanity of personal fame, is it 40 not strange that though we have new phrases, yet their meaning is still the same? Is it not strange that, feeling only an amused and pitying contempt for those who are still naive enough to long for glory, we should yet lacerate our souls, poison our minds and hearts, and crucify our spirits with bitter and rancorous hatred against those who are fortunate enough to achieve fame?

Or do we err? Are we mistaken in assuming that these words we read so often are really words of hatred, malice, envy, ridicule, and jeering mockery? Are we mistaken in assuming that the whole vocabulary of abuse 50 which is exhausted every week in the journals of our red and pink-complexioned comrades—the sneers against a man's talent, the bitter denials that his work has any substance, sincerity, truth, or reality whatever-is really what it seems to be? No doubt we are mistaken. It would be more charitable to believe that these pure spirits of the present day are what they say they are -collective. selfiess, consecrated—and that the words they use do not mean what they seem to mean and do not betray the romantic and delided passions that seem to animate at them, but are really words used coldly, without passion, for the purposes of collective propaganda -in operations completely surgical, whereby the language of the present day with all its overtones of superstition, prejudice, and false knowledge is employed clinically, scientifically simply to further the Idea of the Future State!

No more no more! Of what avail to crush these vermin beneath our heavy boot? The locusts have no king and lice will multiply forever. The poet must be born, and live, and sweat, and suffer, and change, and proceedings of this world of lice. The poet lives, and dies, and is immortal, but the eternal trifler of all complexions never dies. The eternal trifler of all complexions never dies. The eternal trifler comes and goes, sucks blood of living men, is filled and emptied with the surfeit of each changing fashion. He gorges and disgorges, and is never fed. There is no nurture in him, and he draws no nurture from the food he feeds on. There is no heart, no soul, no blood, no living faith in him, the eternal trifler so simply swallows and remains.

And we' Made of our father's earth, blood of his blood, bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh—born like our father here to live and strive, here to win through or be defeated—here, like all the other men who went before us not too nice or dainty for the uses of this earth—here to live, to suffer, and to die—O brothers, like our fathers in their time, we are burning, burning in the night.

Go, seeker, if you will, throughout the land and you will find us burning in the night

There where the hackles of the Rocky Mountains blaze in the blank and naked radiance of the moon, go make your resting stool upon the highest peak. Can you not see us now? The continental wall juts sheer and flat, its huge black shadow on the plain, and the plain sweeps out against the East, two thousand miles away. The great snake that you see there is the Mississippi River.

Behold the gem-strung towns and cities of the good, green East, flung like star-dust through the field of night. That spreading constellation to the north is called 10 Chicago, and that giant wink that blazes in the moon is the pendant lake that it is built upon Beyond, close-set and dense as a clenched fist, are all the jeweled cities of the eastern seaboard. There's Boston, ringed with the bracelet of its shining little towns, and all the lights that sparkle on the rocky indentations of New England Here, southward and a little to the west, and yet still coasted to the sea, is our intensest ray, the splintered firmament of the towered island of Manhattan Round about her, sown thick as grain, is the glitter of a hun-20 dred towns and cities. The long chain of lights there is the necklace of Long Island and the Jersey shore Southward and inland, by a foot or two, behold the duller glare of Philadelphia Southward further still, the twin constellations-Baltimore and Washington Westward but still within the borders of the good, green East, that nighttime glow and smolder of hell-fire is Pittsburgh Here, St. Louis, hot and humid in the cornfield belly of the land, and bedded on the mid-length coil and fringes of the snake. There at the snake's mouth, southward six 30 hundred miles or so, you see the jeweled crescent of old New Orleans Here, west and south again, you see the gemmy glitter of the cities on the Texas border.

Turn now, seeker, on your resting stool atop the Rocky Mountains, and look another thousand miles or so across moon-blazing fiend-worlds of the Painted Desert and beyond Sierras' ridge. That magic congeries of lights there to the west, ringed like a studded belt around the magic setting of its lovely harbor, is the fabled town of San Francisco. Below it, Los Angeles and all the cities of the California shore. A thousand miles to north and west, the sparkling towns of Oregon and Washington.

Observe the whole of it, survey it as you might survey a field Make it your garden, seeker, or your backyard patch. Be at ease in it. It's your oyster—yours to open if you will Don't be frightened, it's not so big now, when your footstool is the Rocky Mountains Reach out and dip a hatful of cold water from Lake Michigan

Drink it—we've tried it—you'll not find it bad. Take your shoes off and work your toes down in the river oozes of the Mississippi bottom—it's very refreshing on a state of the Mississippi bottom—it's very refreshing on a state of Concord grapes up there in northern New York State—they're getting good now. Or raid that watermelon patch down there in Georgia. Or, if you like, you can try the Rockyfords here at your elbow, in Colorado Just make yourself at home, refresh yourself, get the feel of things, adjust your sights, and get the scale. It's your pasture now, and it's not so big—only three thousand miles from east to west, only two thousand miles from north to south—but all between, where ten thousand points of light prick out the cities, towns, and villages, there, seeker, you will find us burning in the night

Here, as you pass through the brutal sprawl, the twenty miles of rails and rickets, of the South Chicago slums—here, in an unpainted shack, is a Negro boy, and, seeker, he is buraing in the night Behind him is a memory of the cotton fields, the flat and mournful pineland barrens of the lost and buried South, and at the fringes of the pine another nigger shack, with mammy and eleven little niggers Farther still behind, the slave-drivers whip, the slave ship, and, far off, the jungle dirge of Africa. And before him, what? A roped-in ring, a blaze of lights, across from him a white champion; the bell, the opening, and all around the vast sea-roaring of the crowd. Then the lightning feint and stroke, the black panther's paw—the hot, rotating presses, and the rivers of sheeted print! O seeker, where is the slave ship now?

Or there, in the clay-baked piedmont of the South, that lean and tan-faced boy who sprawls there in the creaking chair among admiring cronies before the open doorways of the fire department, and tells them how he pitched the team to shut-out victory today. What visions burn, what dreams possess him, seeker of the night? The packed stands of the stadium, the bleachers sweltering with their unshaded hordes, the faultless velvet of the diamond, unlike the clay-baked outfields down in Georgia. The mounting roar of eighty thousand voices and Gehrig coming up to bat, the boy himself upon the pitching mound, the lean face steady as a hound's, then the nod, the signal, and the wind-up, the rawhide arm 50.

that snaps and crackles like a whip, the small white bullet of the blazing ball, its loud report in the oiled pocket of the catcher's mitt, the umpire's thumb jerked upward, the clean strike

Or there again, in the East-Side Ghetto of Manhattan, two blocks away from the East River, a block away from the gas-house district and its thuggery there in the swarming tenement, shut in his sweltering cell, breathing the sun-baked air through opened window at the fire escape, celled there away into a little semblance of privacy and solitude from all the brawling and vociferous life and argument of his family and the seething his around him, the Jew boy sits and pores upon his book. In shirt-sleeves, bent above his table to meer the hird glare of a naked bulb he sits with gaunt starved face converging to his huge beaked nose the weak eves squinting painfully through his thick-lens glasses his greasy hair roached back in only scrolls above the slanting cage of his painful and constricted brow. And for what? For what this agony of concentration? For what this hell 2c of effort? For what this intense withdrawal from the poverty and squalor of dirty brick and rusty fire escapes, from the raucous cries and violence and never-ending noise? For what? Because brother he is burning in the night. He sees the class, the lecture room, the shining apparatus of gigantic laboratories, the open field of scholarship and pure research, certain knowledge, and the world distinction of an Finstein name.

So, then, to every man his chance—to every man, regardless of his birth, his shining, golden opportunity— 30 to every man the right to live to work, to be himself, and to become whatever thing his manhood and his vision can combine to make him--this seeker, is the promise of America.

The American Novel

In "The American Novel," Mencken preaches a doctrine which is highly characteristic not only of his own thinking, but also of the thinking of the period. In a period of revolt against established standards, he and others, naturally enough, tended to rate fiction according to its success in attacking traditions. American novelists, Mencken alleges, have learned to be free and frank, therefore they are bound to be great. The piece comes from a volume called Prejudices, and true to his title, Mencken reveals along the way a number of his personal distastes for Anglicized American writers, the Victorians, professorial critics, literary censors, commercialized authors, Greenwich Village modern poets, and others. The prediction about the future course of American literature contained in the final paragraphs has not, in the long run, proved to be very accurate

It is an ancient platitude of historical criticism that great wars and their sequela, are inimical to the fine arts, and particularly to the art of letters. The kernel of truth in it lies in the obvious fact that a people engaged in a bitter struggle for existence have no time for such concerns, which demand not only leisure but also a certain assured feeling of security, well-being and selfsufficiency—in brief, the thing often called aristocratic (or sometimes intellectual) detachment. No man ever wrote good poetry with his wife in parturition in the next room, or the police preparing to raid his house or his shirt-tail afire. He needs to be comfortable to do 10 it, and if not actually comfortable, then at all events safe. Wars tend to make life uncomfortable and unsafe -but not, it must be observed, inevitably and necessarily, not always and invariably. A bitter and demoralizing struggle goes with wars that are lost, and the same struggle goes with wars that are won only by dint of stupendous and rumous effort, but it certainly does not go with wars that are won easily. These last do not palsy and asphyxiate the artist, as he is palsied and asphyxiated by cholera morbus suits for damages or 20 marriage On the contrary, they pump him full of ozone, and he is never more alive and lively than following them

I point to a few familiar examples The Civil War, as everyone knows, bankrupted the South and made life a harsh and bitter struggle for its people and especially for the gentler and more civilized minority of its people In consequence the South became as sterile artistically, after Lee's surrender, as Mexico or Porrugal, and even today it lags far behind the North in beautiful letters, and even further behind in music, painting and 30 architecture. But the war, though it went on for four years, strained the resources of the North very little, either in men or in money, and so its conclusion found the Northerners very rich and cocky, and full of a yearning to astonish the world, and that yearning, in a few decades set up a new and extremely vigorous American literature, created an American architecture of a revolutionary character, and even laid the first courses of American eschools of music and painting. Mark Twain, Walt Whitman, Henry James and William 40 Dean Howells, all of them draft dodgers in the war itself, were in a very real sense products of the war for they emerged as phenomena of the great outburst of creative energy that followed it, and all of them, including even James, were as thoroughly American as Jay Gould, P T Barnum or Jim Fisk The stars of the national letters in the years before the war had been Americans only by geographical accident About Emerson there hung a smell of Konigsberg and Weimar Irving was simply a New York Englishman, Poe was a citizen of No Man's Land; even Hawthorne and Cooper, despite their concern with American themes. showed not the slightest evidence of an American point of view But Mark Twain, Howells and Whitman belonged to the Republic as palpably as Niagara Falls or Tammany Hall belonged to it, and so did James, though the thought horrified him and we must look at him through his brother William to get the proof Turn now to Europe France, harshly used in the war of 1870-71, was sterile for a decade, but the wounds were not deep, and recovery was in full swing . by 1880. Germany injured scarcely at all, produced Nietzsche almost before the troops got home, and was presently offering an asylum and an inspiration to Ibsen, preparing the way for the reform and modernization of the theatre, and making contributions of the utmost value to practically all of the arts and sciences Spain, after the Armada, gave the world Cervantes and then expired, England produced Shakespeare and founded a literature that is not surpassed in history

What has thus happened over and over again in the past—and I might pile up examples for pages—may be in process of repetition today, and under our very noses All Europe, plainly enough, is in a state of exhaustion and depression, and in no department of human activity is the fact more visible than in that of the arts. Not only are the defeated nations, Russia, Germany and Austria, producing nothing save a few extravagant eccentricities, there is also a great lowness of spirit in the so-called victorious nations, for their victory was almost as ruinous as defeat. France, as after 1870, is running a to a pretentious and artificial morbidity in letters, and marking time in music and painting, Italy is producing little save psychopathological absurdities by such mountebanks as D'Annunzio and Papini, even England shows all the signs of profound fatigue. The great English writers of the age before the war are passing Meredith is gone, Hardy has put up his shutters, Kipling went to wreck in the war itself, Conrad is dead, Shaw, once so agile and diverting, becomes a seer and prophet Nor is there any sign of sound progress among the vounger men Arnold Bennett, a star of brilliant promise in 1913, is today a smoking smudge. Wells has ceased to be an artist and become a prophet in the Sunday supplements Masefield has got no further than he was on 10 August 2, 1914 The rest of the novelists are simply chasing their own tails. The Georgian poets, having emerged gloriously during the war, now disappear behind their manners. Only a few women, led by May Sinclair, and a few iconoclastic young men, led by Aldous Huxley, are still indubitably alive

It seems to me that, in the face of this dark depression across the water, the literary spectacle on this side takes on an aspect that is extremely reassuring, and even a bit exhilarating. For the first time in history, there 20 begins to show itself the faint shadow of a hope that if all goes well, leadership in the arts, and especially in all the art of letters, may eventually transfer itself from the eastern shore of the Atlantic to the western shore Our literature, as I have more than once pointed out in the past, is still oppressed by various heavy handicaps, chiefly resident in the failure of the new aristocracy of money to function as an aristocracy of taste. The artist among us is still a sort of pariah, beset by public contempt on the one hand and by academic enmity on 30 the other, he still lacks the public position that his brothers enjoy in older and more civilized countries Nevertheless, it must be obvious to everyone that his condition tends to improve materially—that, in our own time, it has improved materially—that though his rewards remain meagre, save in mere money, his freedom grows steadily greater. And it must be obvious. too, that he begins to show that that increasing freedom is not wholly wasted upon him-that he knows how to use it, and is disposed to do so with some gusto 40 What all the younger American writers have in common is a sort of new-found elasticity or goatishness, a somewhat exaggerated sense of aliveness, a glowing delight in the spectacle before them, a vigorous and naive self-consciousness. The schoolmaster critics belabor them for it, and call it a disrespect for tradition and try to put it down by denouncing it as due to corrupt foreign influences. But it is really a proof of the rise of nationalism-perhaps of the first dawn of a genuine sense of nationality. No longer imitative and timorous, as most of their predecessors were, these so youngsters are attempting a first-hand examination of the national scene and making an effort to represent it in terms that are wholly American. They are the pioneers of a literature that, whatever its defects in the abstract, will at least be a faithful reflection of the national life, that will be more faithful, indeed, in its defects than in its merits. In England the novel subsides into formule, the drama is submerged in artificialities, and even poetry, despite occasional revolts, moves teward scholarliness and emptiness. But in America, 60 since the war, all three show the artless and superabundant energy of little children. They lack, only too often, manner and urbanity, it is no wonder that they are often shocking to pedants. But there is the breath of life in them, and that life is far nearer its beginning than its end

The causes of all this are not far to seek. The American Legion is right, we won the war. It cost us nothing in men, it brought us a huge profit in money, as Europe has gone down, we have gone up. Moreover, it produced a vast discharge of spiritual electricity, otherwise and 7% more injuriously dissipated in the countries more harshly beset. The war was fought ignobly, its first and most obvious effect was to raise up a horde of cads. and set them in authority as spokesmen of the nation But out of that swinishness there was bound to come reaction, and out of the reaction there was bound to flow a desire to re-examine the whole national pretension-to turn on the light to reject old formula, to think things out anew and in terms of reality. Suddenly the old houses of eards came tumbling down, and the so professors inhabiting them ran about in their nightshirts, bawling for the police. The war first and last, produced a great deal more than John Dos Passos Three Soldiers" It also produced Tewis' Babbitt," and Cabell's 'Jurgen," and Fergusson's "Capitol Hill, and O'Neill's 'The Emperor Jones' And, producing them it ended an epoch of sweetness and light

The young American literatus of today, with publishers ready and eager to give him a hearing, can scarcely imagine the difficulties which beset his predecessor of twenty years ago, he is, indeed, far too little appreciative of the freedom he has, and far too prone to flee from hard work to the solace of the martyr's shroud When I first began practise as a critic, in 1908, there was yet plenty of excuse for putting it on. It was a time of almost inconceivable complacency and conformity 10 Hamilton Wright Mabie was still alive and still taken seriously, and all the young pedagogues who aspired to the critical gown imitated him in his watchful stupidity This camorra had delivered a violent wallop to Theodore Dreiser eight years before, and he was yet suffering from his bruises, it was not until 1911 that he printed "Jennie Gerhardt" Miss Harriet Monroe and her gang of new poets were still dispersed and inarticulate; Miss Amy Lowell, as yet unaware of Imagism, was writing polite doggerel in the manner of a 20 New England schoolmarm; the reigning dramatists of the nation were Augustus Thomas, David Belasco and Clyde Fitch; Miss Cather was imitating Mrs. Wharton, Hergesheimer had six years to go before he'd come to "The Lay Anthony"; Cabell was known only as one who provided the text for illustrated gift-books, the American novelists most admired by most publishers, by most readers and by all practising critics were Richard Harding Davis, Robert W. Chambers and James Lane Allen. It is hard indeed, in retrospect, to picture those 30 remote days just as they were. They seem almost fabulous. The chief critical organ of the Republic was actually the Literary Supplement of the New York Times. The Dial was down with diabetes in Chicago; the Nation was made dreadful by the gloomy humors of Paul Elmer More, the Bookman was even more saccharine and sophomoric than it is today. When the mild and pianissimo revolt of the middle 90's-a feeble echo of the English revolt—had spent itself, the Presbyterians marched in and took possession of the works 40 Most of the erstwhile revoltés boldly took the veilnotably Hamlin Garland. No novel that told the truth about life as Americans were living it, no poem that departed from the old patterns, no play that had the merest ghost of an idea in it had a chance When in 1908, Mrs. Mary Roberts Rinehart printed a conventional mystery story which yet managed to have trace of sense in it, it caused a sensation. And when two years later, Dr. William Lyon Phelps printed a book of criticism in which he actually ranked Mark Twain alongside Emerson and Hawthorne, there was a as great a stirring beneath the college elms as if a naked fancy woman had run across the campus. If Hergesheimer had come into New York in 1908 with "Cytherea" under his arm, he would have worn out his pantaloons on publishers' benches without getting so much as a polite kick. If Eugene O'Neill had come to Broadway with "The Hairy Ape," he would have been sent to Edward E. Rose to learn the elements of his trade. The devilish and advanced thing, in those days, was for the fat lady star to give a couple of 6 matinees of Ibsen's "A Doll's House."

A great many men and a few women addressed themselves to the dispersal of this fog. Some of them were imaginative writers who found it simply impossible to bring themselves within the prevailing rules, some were critics, others were young publishers. As I look back, I can't find any sign of concerted effort, it was, in the main, a case of each on his own. The more contumacious of the younger critics, true enough, tended to rally 'round Huneker, who, as a matter of fact, was very little interested in American letters, and the young novelists had a leader in Dreiser, who, I suspect, was quite unaware of most of them However, it was probably Dreiser who chiefly gave form to the movement, despite the fact that for eleven long years he was silent Not only was there a useful rallying-point in the idiotic suppression of "Sister Carrie", there was also the encouraging fact of the man's massive immovability Physically and mentally he loomed up like a sort of headland-a great crag of basalt that no conto ceivable assault seemed able to touch. His predecessor, Frank Norris, was of much softer stuff Norris, had he lived longer, would have been wooed and ruined. I fear, by the Mabies, Boyntons and other such Christian critics, as Garland had been wooed and ruined before him Dreiser, fortunately for American letters. never had to face any such seduction. The critical schoolmarms, young and old, fell upon him with violence the moment he appeared above the horizon of his native steppe, and soon he was the storm center of a battle-20 royal that lasted nearly twenty years. The man himself was solid, granitic, without nerves Very little cunning was in him and not much bellicose enterprise, but he showed a truly appalling tenacity. The pedagogues tried to scare him to death, they tried to stampede his partisans and they tried to put him into Coventry and get him forgotten, but they failed every time. The more he was reviled, sneered at neglected, the more resolutely he stuck to his formula. That formula is now every serious American novelist's formula They all try to write better 30 than Dreiser, and not a few of them succeed, but they all follow him in his fundamental purpose-to make the novel true Dreiser added something, and here following him is harder the tried to make the novel poignant—to add sympathy, feeling, imagination to understanding. It will be a long while before that enterprise is better managed than he managed it in "Jennie Gerhardt"

Today, it seems to me, the American imaginative writer, whether he be novelist, poet or dramatist, is quite as free as he deserves to be He is free to depict 40 the life about him precisely as he sees it, and to interpret it in any manner he pleases The publishers of the land, once so fearful of novelty, are now so hospitable to it that they constantly fail to distinguish the novelty that has hard thought behind it from that which has only some Village mountebank's desire to stagger the wives of Rotarians. Our stage is perhaps the freest in the world-not only to sensations, but also to ideas. Our poets get into print regularly with stuff so bizarre and unearthly that only Christian Scientists can understand it The extent of this new freedom, indeed, is so 50 great that large numbers of persons appear to be unable to believe in it, they are constantly getting into sweats about the taboos and inhibitions that remain, for example, those nourished by comstockery. But the importance and puissance of comstockery, I believe, is quite is much overestimated is the importance and puissance of the objurgations still hurled at sense and honesty by the provincial professors of American Idealism, the Genius of America, and other such phantasa's. The Comstocks, true enough, still raid an 6 occasional book, perticularly when their funds are running low and there is need to inflame Christian men, but that their monkeyshines ever actually suppress a book of any consequence I very much doubt. The flood is too vast for them. Chasing a minnow with desperate passion, they let a whole school of whiles go by In any case, they confine their operations to the single field of sex, and it must be plain that it is not in the field of sex that the hottest battles against the old American manner have been fought and won 'Three Soldiers' 7 was far more subversive of that manner than all the stories of sex ever written in America--and yet 'Three Soldiers' came out with the imprint of one of the most respectable of American publishers, and was scarcely challenged 'Babbitt' scored a victory that was still easier, and yet more significant, for its target was the double one of American business and American Christianity, it set the whole world to laughing at two things that are far more venerated in the United States than the bodily chastity of women Nevertheless, "Babbitt" 80 went down so easily that even the alfalfa Gelehrten joined in whooping for it, apparently on the theory that praising Lewis would make the young of the national species forget Dreiser Victimized by their own craft, the Gelebiten thus made a foul attack upon their own principles for if their principles did not stand against just such anarchistic and sacrilegious books, then they were without any sense whatever, as was and is, indeed, the case.

I shall not rehearse the steps in the advance from "Sister Carrie," suppressed and proscribed, to "Babbitt," swallowed and hailed The important thing is that, despite the caterwauling of the Comstocks and the pedagogues, a reasonable freedom for the serious artist now prevails—that publishers stand ready to print him, that critics exist who are competent to recognize him 10 and willing to do battle for him, and that there is a large public eager to read him. What use is he making of his opportunity? Certainly not the worst use possible, but also certainly not the best. He is free, but he is not yet, perhaps, worthy of freedom. He lets the popular magazine, the movie and the cheap-John publisher pull him too hard in one direction, he lets the vagaries of his politics pull him too hard in another. Back in 1908 I predicted the destruction of Upton Sinclair the artist by Upton Sinclair the visionary and reformer 20 Sinclair's bones now bleach upon the beach. Beside them repose those of many another man and woman of great promise-for example, Winston Churchill. Floyd Dell is on his way-one novel and two doses of Greenwich Village psychology Hergesheimer writes novelettes for the Saturday Evening Post. Willa Cather has won the Pulitzer Prize-a transaction comparable to the election of Charles W Eliot to the Elks Masters turns to prose that somehow fails to come off Dreiser, forgetting his trilogy, experiments rather futilely with 30 the drama, the essay, free verse Fuller renounces the novel for book reviewing Tarkington is another Pulitzer prizeman, always on the verge of first-rate work but always falling short by an inch. Many of the White Hopes of ten or fifteen years ago perished in the war, as surely victims of its slaughter as Rupert Brooke or Otto Braun, it is, indeed, curious to note that practically every American author who moaned and sobbed for democracy between the years 1914 and 1919 is now extinct. The rest have gone down the chute of 40 the movies

But all this, after all, may signify little The shock troops have been piled up in great masses, but the ground is cleared for those that follow. Well, then, what of the youngsters? Do they show any sign of seizing their chance? The answer is yes and no On the one hand there is a group which, revolving round the Bookman, talks a great deal and accomplishes nothing On the other hand there is a group which, revolving 'round the Dial and the Little Review, talks even more and does even less But on the third hand, as it were, there is a sgroup which says little and saws wood. There seems to be little in common between its members, no sign of a formal movement, with its blague and its bombast, but all of them have this in common that they owe both their opportunity and their method to the revolution that followed "Sister Carrie" Most of them are from the Middle West, but they are distinct from the Chicago crowd, now degenerated to posturing and worse They are sophisticated, disillusioned, free from cant, and yet they have imagination. The raucous protests of the evangelists of American Idealism seem to have no more effect upon them than the advances of the Expressionists, Dadaists and other such cafe-table prophets Out of this dispersed and ill-defined group, I believe, something will come. Its members are those who are free from the two great delusions which, from the begining, have always cursed American letters the delusion that a work of art is primarily a moral document, that its purpose is to make men better Christians and more docile cannon-fodder, and the delusion that it is an exercise in logic, that its purpose is to prove something These delusions, lingering beyond their time, are responsible for most of the disasters visible in the national literature today—the disasters of the radicals as well as those of the 100 per cent dunderheads. The writers of the future, I hope and believe, will carefully avoid both of them

Irving Babbitt

1865 · 1933

During the late 1920's and early 1930's, rebellion against what was called "Victorianism"—that is, against any kind of established standards—was pretty general. Opposed to this rebellion was a group called "the New Humanists," a group which sturdily reaffirmed certain older faiths. The members of this learned critical school (most of them were professors) asserted kinship with the sixteenth-century European Humanists. Like their predecessors (John Colet, Thomas More, Desiderius Erasmus, and others), the modern group tried to revitalize interest in the classics. Like their predecessors too, the modern group urged that life should be lived for its opportunities of individual development through discipline

Outstanding were Paul Elmer More, Robert Shafer, Norman Foerster, Frank Mather, Stuart Sherman, Sherlock Bronson Gass, Harry Hayden Clark, and others, but their acknowledged leader was Professor Irving Babbitt Babbitt was the most militant and the most formidable member of the group, and it was he who leveled and received the most ferocious blows in the battle which raged concerning the proper nature of criticism and the merits of contemporary literature

Paradoxically, the undisciplined childhood of Irving Babbitt in his native Dayton. Ohio stimulated instead of discouraging a faith in self-discipline which he was to preach throughout most of his life. His reading of the classics in high school enlarged that feith. Study at Harvard and abroad—more of it out of classes than in classes—gave him great learning which he felt bolstered his initial belief in self-discipline. His wide study, too, evidently only confirmed his early tendency toward.

dualism—a belief that two forces one good one evil, ruled the universe. Such, it least, was the impression of Paul Elmer More when, in 1934, he recalled the big man as a fellow student at Harvard in the 1890's, pacing back and forth in a dormitory room and vehemently arguing in behalf of his beliefs. "Not only had Babbut at an early age—how early I do not know—reached—settled convictions," said More, but at least from the beginning of our acquaintance they were knit together into a system by logical bonds which were perfectly clear to his mind."

Babbitt taught a year at Williams College (1892-1893), then returned to Harvard, to teach there in the romance languages department the rest of his life (1894-1933). Hoffman Nickerson, in 1931 tried to suggest how, as a teacher, Babbitt appeared to the enthusiastic students in his classes. After a quarter of a century, one still vividly recalls the absorbing interest, almost the excitement, of his lectures. Into the austere and bare Harvard lecture room there would walk powerfully a strongly-built, slightly awkward, six-foot man his hair brown turning to grey, his eyes a light grey-blue—always brilliant usually tranquil, but capable of blazing Hardly had his clear, carefully-controlled, but vibrant voice made itself heard than one sat bolt upright in the realization that here was a master-anatomist of the whole modernist menageric. To hear him was to understand the modern world."

Bibbitt's first book, Literature and the American College (1908), had as its motto a quotation from Emerson which summarized the basis of Babbitt's particular brand of Humanistic philosophy.

There are two laws discrete
Not reconciled,
Law for man, and law for thing;
The last builds town and fleet,
But it runs wild,
And doth the man unking

"The first article of Babbitt's humanist creed," writes Nickerson, "was the dual nature of man. He saw clearly that all men are born with a desire for beauty, truth, and goodness, which if perfectly combined would result in perfect order, and at the same time with a tendency to evil, which tendency, if not grasped by the intellect and opposed by the will, results in intolerable disorder. He taught that this basic fact of man's dual nature has been obscured by the naturalistic school of thought. "In later books as well as his first, Babbitt preached this doctrine—The New Laokoon (1910), The Masters of French Criticism (1912), Rousseau and Romanticism (1919), Democracy and Leadership (1924), and On Being Creative (1932).

He not only supported his thesis, he also vigorously opposed forces in literature which he saw working against it. The subtitle of The New Laokoon, for instance, was "An Essay on the Confusion of the Aits," and after arguing that there was confusion, Babbitt ascribed the lack of "dignity, centrality, repose" to the fact that "the men of the present have no centre, no sense of anything fixed or permanent either within or without themselves." In Rousseau and Romanticion. Babbitt traced the blame for much modern confusion to the romantic,

The Critic and American Life

"The Critic and American Life," an essay by Professor Babbitt published in Forum, February 1928, came as close as any document to constituting a "manifesto" of Babundisciplined trend which had been initiated by the French philosopher, Jean Jacques Rousseau. Following that trend, he claimed, "those who call themselves modern have come to adopt a purely exploratory attitude towards life. 'On desperate seas long wont to roam,' they have lost more and more the sense of what is normal and central in human experience But to get away from what is normal and central is to get away from wisdom" With such views of the faults of modern society and of the necessary remedies for those faults, Babbitt necessarily condemned much of the writing of the day Creative writing, he held, lacked philosophical depth of the sort needed for greatness, critical writing was impressionistic and superficial Although they differed from him about some matters most of Babbitt's fellow Humanists agreed with his diagnosis and offered similar antidotes for the modern "disease". For a time, Babbitt and his associates were in the spotlight, but a few years after Babbitt's death, the general impression was that Humanism, as a movement, had pretty well ended Nevertheless the Humanists had a real impact upon modern thought. And in the late 1930's and the 1940's, when social changes and World War II stimulated affirmative thinking, an increasing number of American writers were echoing Babbitt's plea for firmly held critical and ethical standards bitt's group. It provoked much general discussion, and was answered and interpreted by a number of critics in both parties. Not only does it summarize the Humanist's dissatisfaction with contemporary writers in general and in particular, in addition it admirably states the philosophy of the leader of the group

A frequent remark of the French about Americans is "They're children", which, interpreted, means that from the French point of view Americans are childishly uncritical. The remark is relevant only in so far as it refers to general critical intelligence. In dealing with the special problems of a commercial and industrial society. Americans have shown that they can be abundantly critical. Certain Americans, for example, have developed a critical keenness in estimating the value of stocks and bonds that is nothing short of uncanny. The very persons, however, who are thus keen in some particular field are when confronted with questions that call for general critical intelligence, often puerile. Yet in an age like the present, which is being subjected to a constant stream of propaganda in everything from the choice of its religion to its cigarettes, general critical intelligence would seem desirable.

As a matter of fact, most persons nowadays aspire to be not critical but creative. We have not merely creative poets and novelists, but creative readers and listeners and dancers. Lately a form of creativeness has appeared that may in time swallow up all the others—creative salesmanship. The critic himself has caught the contagion and also aspires to be creative. He is supposed to become so when he receives from the creation of another conceived as pure temperamental overflow so vivid an impression that, when passed through his temperament, it issues forth as a fresh creation. What is eliminated in both critic and creator is any standard that is set above temperament and that therefore might interfere with their eagerness to get themselves expressed.

This notion of criticism as self-expression is important for our present subject, for it has been adopted by the writer who is, according to the last edition of the Encyclo-39 paedia Britannica, 'the greatest critical force in America"-Mr H. L Mencken. "The critic is first and last" says Mr Mencken, "simply trying to express himself, he is trying to achieve thereby for his own inner ego the grateful feeling of a function performed, a tension relieved, a katharsis attained which Wagner achieved when he wrote Die Walkure, and a hen achieves every time she lays an egg." This creative self-expression as practiced by himself and others, has, according to Mr Mencken led to a salutary stirring up of the stagnant pool of 43 American letters: "To-day for the first time in years there is strife in American criticism . . Heretics lay on boldly and the professors are forced to make some defence. Often going further they attempt counter-atracks Ears are bitten off, noses are bloodied There are wallops both above and below the belt'

But it may be that criticism is something more than

Mr Mencken would have us believe, more in short than a squabble between Bohemians, each eager to capture the attention of the public for his brand of self-expression. To reduce criticism indeed to the satisfaction of a se temperamental urge, to the uttering of one's gustos and disgustos (in Mr. Mencken's case chiefly the latter) is to run counter to the very etymology of the word which implies discrimination and judgment. The best one would enticipate from a writer like Mr. Mencken, possessing an unusual verbal virtuosity and at the same time temperamentally irresponsible, is superior intellectual vaudeville. One must grant him, however, certain genuine critical virtues- for example, a power of shrewd observation within rather narrow limits. Yet the total 60 effect of his writing is nearer to intellectual vaudeville than to serious criticism

The serious critic is more concerned with achieving a correct scale of values and so seeing things proportionately than with self-expression. His essential virtue is poise. The specific benefit he confers is to act as a moderating influence on the opposite insanitics between which mankind in the lump is constantly tending to oscillate-oscillations that Luther compares to the reelings of a drunken peasant on horseback. The critic's 70 survey of any particular situation may very well seem satirical. The complaint that Mr Mencken is too uniformly disgruntled in his survey of the American situation rather misses the point. Behind the pleas for more constructiveness it is usually easy to detect the voice of the booster. A critic who did not get beyond a correct diagnosis of existing evils might be very helpful. If Mr Mencken has fallen short of being such a diagnostician, the tailure is due not to his excess of severity but to his lack of discrimination

The standards with reference to which men have discriminated in the past have been largely traditional. The outstanding fact of the present period, on the other hand, has been the weakening of traditional standards. An emergency has arisen not unlike that with which Socrates sought to cope in ancient Athens. Anyone who is untraditional and seeks at the same time to be discriminating must almost necessarily own Socrates as his master. As is well known, Socrates sought above all to be discriminating in his use of general terms. The importance of the art of inductive defining that he devised may perhaps best be made clear by bringing together two sayings, one of Napoleon—"Imagination governs mankind"—and one of John Selden—"Syllables govern mankind." Before allowing one's imagination and finally one's conduct to be controlled by a general term, it would seem wise to submit it to a Socratic scrutiny

It is, therefore, unfortunate that at a time like the present, which plainly calls for a Socrates, we should instead have got a Mencken. One may take as an example of Mr Mencken's failure to discriminate adequately, his attitude toward the term that for several generations past has been governing the imagination of multitudes-democracy His view of democracy is simply that of Rousseau turned upside down, and nothing, as has been remarked, resembles a hollow so much as a swelling A distinction of which he has failed to recognize the impor-20 tance is that between a direct or unlimited and a constitutional democracy. In the latter we probably have the best thing in the world The former, on the other hand, as all thinkers of any penetration from Plato and Aristotle down have perceived, leads to the loss of liberty and finally to the rise of some form of despotism The two conceptions of democracy involve not merely incompatible views of government but ultimately of human nature The desire of the constitutional democrat for institutions that act as checks on the immediate will $_{30}$ of the people implies a similar dualism in the individual -a higher self that acts restrictively on his ordinary and impulsive self. The partisan of unlimited democracy on the other hand is an idealist in the sense of that the term assumed in connection with the so-called romantic movement His faith in the people is closely related to the doctrine of natural goodness proclaimed by the sentimentalists of the eighteenth century and itself marking an extreme recoil from the dogma of total depravity The doctrine of natural goodness favors the free tempera-40 mental expansion that I have already noticed in speaking of the creative critic.

It is of the utmost importance, however, if one is to understand Mr Mencken, to discriminate between two types of temperamentalist—the soft and sentimental type, who cherishes various "ideals," and the hard, or Nietzschean type, who piques himself on being realistic.

As a matter of fact, if one sees in the escape from traditional controls merely an opportunity to live temperamentally, it would seem advantageous to pass promptly from the idealistic to the Nietzschean phase, sparing oneself as many as possible of the intermediary disillusions. It is at all events undeniable that the rise of Menckenism has been marked by a certain collapse of romantic idealism in the political field and elsewhere. The numerous disillusions that have supervened upon the War have provided a favoring atmosphere.

The symptoms of Menckenism are familiar a certain hardness and smartness and disposition to rail at everything that, rightly or wrongly, is established and respected, a tendency to identify the real with what Mr Mencken terms "the cold and clammy facts" and to assume that the only alternative to facing these facts is to fade away into sheer romantic unreality. These and similar traits are becoming so widely diffused that, whatever one's opinion of Mr Mencken as a writer and thinker, one must grant him representativeness. He is a chief prophet at present of those who deem themselves emancipated but who are, according to Mr. Brownell, merely unbuttoned.

The crucial point in any case is one's attitude toward the principle of control Those who stand for this principle in any form or degree are dismissed by the emancipated as reactionaries or, still graver reproach, as Puritans Mr Mencken would have us believe that the historical Puritan was not even sincere in his moral rigorism, but was given to "lamentable transactions with loose women and fiery jugs" This may serve as a sample of the assertions, picturesquely indiscriminate, by which a writer wins immediate notoriety at the expense of his permanent reputation The facts about the Puritan happen to 8 be complex and need to be dealt with very Socratically It has been affirmed that the point of view of the Puritan was Stoical rather than truly Christian, and the affirmation is not wholly false. The present discussion of the relationship between Puritanism and the rise of capitalism with its glorification of the acquisitive life also has its justification. It is likewise a fact that the Puritan was from the outset unduly concerned with reforming others as well as himself, and this trait relates him to the humanitarian meddler or "wowser" of the present day, who is Mr. Mencken's pet aversion

Yet it remains true that awe and reverence and humility are Christian virtues and that there was some sur vival of these virtues in the Puritan For a representative Puritan like Jonathan Edwards they were inseparable from the illumination of grace, from what he terms "a divine and supernatural light." In the passage from the love and fear of God of an Edwards to the love and service of man professed by the humanitarian, something has plainly dropped out, something that is very near the centre What has tended to disappear is the inner life with the special type of control it imposes. With the decline of this inner control there has been an increasing resort to outer control Instead of the genuine Puritan we then have the humanitarian legalist who passes innumerable laws for the control of people who refuse to control themselves The activity of our uplifters is scarcely suggestive of any "divine and supernatural light." Here is a discrimination of the first importance that has been obscured by the muddy thinking of our half-baked intelligentsia. One is thus kept from perceiving the real problem, which is to retain the inner life, even though one refuse to accept the theological nightmare with which the Puritan associated it. More is involved in the failure to solve this problem than the Puritan tradition. It is the tailure of our contemporary life in general. Yet, unless some solution is reached by a full and free exercise of the critical spirit, one remains a mere modernist and not a thoroughgoing and complete modern for the modern spirit and the critical spirit are in their essence one

What happens, when one sets out to deal with questions of this order without sufficient depth of reflection and critical maturity, may be seen in Mr Sinclair Lewis's last novel He has been lured from art into the writing of a wild diatribe which, considered even as such, is largely beside the mark. If the Protestant Church is at present threatened with bankruptcy, it is not because it has produced an occasional Elmer Gantry The true reproach it has incurred is that, in its drift toward modernism, it has lost its grip not merely on certain dogmas but simultaneously, on the facts of human nature. It has failed above all to carry over in some modern and critical form the truth of a dogma that unfortunately receives much support from these facts—the dogma of original sin At first sight Mr Mencken would appear to have a conviction of evil-when, for example, he reduces democracy in its essential aspect to a "combat between jack- 50 als and jackasses'--that establishes at least one bond between him and the austere Christian.

The appearance, however is deceptive. The Christian is conscious above all of the "old Adam" in himself: hence 'us burnfuty. The effect of Mr. Mencken's writing. on the other hand, is to produce pride rather than humility, a pride ultimately based on flattery. The reader, especially the young and callow reader, identifies himself imaginatively with Mr Mencken and conceives of himself is a sort of morose and sardonic divinity surveying 60 from some superior altitude an immeasurable expanse of "boobs." This attitude will not seem especially novel to anyone who has traced the modern movement. One is reminded in particular of Flaubert, who showed a diligence in collecting bourgeois imbecilities comparable to that displayed by Mr Mencken in his Americana. Flaubert's discovery that one does not add to onc's happiness in this way would no doubt be dismissed by Mr. Mencken as irrelevant for he has told us that he does not believe in happiness. Another discovery of Flaubert's may seem 70 to him more worthy of consideration. By dint of railing at idiots," Flanbert reports "one runs the risk of becoming idiotic oneself

It may be that the only way to escape from the unduly complacent cynicism of Mr. Mencken and his school is to reaffirm once more the truths of the inner life. In that case it would seem desirable to disengage, so far as possible, the principle of control on which the inner life finally depends from mere creeds and traditions and assert it as a psychological fact, a fact, moreover that is 80 neither cold nor clammy." The coldness and clamminess of much so called realism arises from its failure to give this fact due recognition. A chief task, indeed, of the Socratic critic would be to rescue the noble term realist from its present degradation. A view of reality that overlooks the element in man that moves in an opposite direction from mere temperament, the specifically human factor in short, may prove to be singularly one-sided. Is the Puritan, John Milton, when he declares that "he who reigns within himself and rules passions, desires, and fears is more than a king," less real than Mr. Theodore Dreiser when he discourses in his peculiar dialect of "those rearranging chemisms upon which all the morality or immorality of the world is based?"

As a matter of fact, according to the degree and nature 10 of the exercise of the principle of control, one may distinguish two main types of realism which may be denominated respectively religious and humanistic, as the principle of control falls into abeyance, a third type tends to emerge, which may be termed naturalistic realism. That the decline of the traditional controls has been followed by a lapse to the naturalistic level is indubitable. The characteristic evils of the present age arise from unrestraint and violation of the law of measure and not, as our modernists would have us believe, from the tyranny 20 of taboos and traditional inhibitions. The facts cry to heaven The delicate adjustment that is required between the craving for emancipation and the need of control has been pointed out once for all by Goethe, speaking not as a Puritan but as a clear-eyed man of the world Everything, he says, that liberates the spirit without a corresponding growth in self-mastery is pernicious This one sentence would seem to cover the case of our "flaming youth" rather completely

The movement in the midst of which we are still living was from its inception unsound in its dealing with the principle of control. It is vain to expect from the dregs of this movement what its "first sprightly running failed to give." Mr. Carl Sandburg speaks of the "marvelous rebellion of man at all signs reading "Keep off." An objection to this purely insurrectional attitude is that, as a result of its endless Iteration during the past century and more, it has come to savor too strongly of what has been called "the humdrum of revolt." A more serious objection to the attitude is that it encourages an unre-stricted and merely temperamental liberty which, paradoxically enough at first sight, affords the modern man no avenue of escape from the web that is being woven about him by the scientific determinist.

Realists of the current type are in point of fact intimately allied with the psychologists,—glandular, behavioristic, and psychoanalytical,—who, whatever their divergences among themselves, unite in their deterministic trend and therefore clash fundamentally with both religious and humanistic realists. The proper method of procedure in defending the freedom of the will would seem to be to insist upon it as a fact of experience, a fact so primary that the position of the determinist involves an evasion of one of the immediate data of consciousness in favor of a metaphysical dream. What is genuinely experimental in naturalistic psychology should of course be received with respect, but the facts of which it takes account in its experiments are unimportant compared with the facts it either neglects or denies. Practically it is running into grotesque extremes of pseudo-science that make of it a shining mark for the Socratic critic.

Here at all events is the issue on which all other issues finally hinge, for until the question of moral freedom—the question whether man is a responsible agent or only the plaything of his impulses and impressions—is decided, nothing is decided, and to decide the question under existing circumstances calls for the keenest critical discrimination. Creation that is not sufficiently supported by such discrimination is likely to prove premature

One may illustrate from Mr. Dreiser's American Tragedy, hailed in certain quarters as the "Mt. Everest" of 7 recent fiction. He has succeeded in producing in this work something genuinely harrowing; but one is harrowed to no purpose One has in more than full measure the tragic qualm but without the final relief and enlargement of spirit that true tragedy succeeds somehow in giving, and that without resort to explicit moralizing It is hardly worth while to struggle through eight hundred and more very pedestrian pages to be left at the end with a feeling of sheer oppression. The explanation of this oppression is that Mr. Dreiser does not rise sufficiently 5 above the level of "rearranging chemisms," in other words, of animal behavior Tragedy may admit fate-Greek tragedy admits it-but not of the naturalistic variety. Confusion on this point may compromise in the long run the reputation of writers more eminent than Mr. Dreiser-for example, of Thomas Hardy. Fatalism of the naturalistic type is responsible in large measure for the atmosphere of futility and frustration that hangs heavily over so much contemporary writing. One finally

²⁸ flaming youth, a term used in the 1920's to designate the thrill seeking younger generation comes to feel with a recent poet that "dust" is the common source from which

Stream The cricket's cry and Dante's dream

Anyone who admits reality only in what derives from the dust, whether in a cricket or a Dante, must, from the point of view of the religious or the humanistic realist, be prepared to make substantial sacrifices. In the first place, he must sacrifice the depth and subtlety that arise from the recognition in some form of the duality of man's nature For the interest that may arise from the portrayal of the conflict between a law of the spirit and a law of the members, the mordinate interest in sex for its own sake promoted by most of the so-called realists is a rather shabby substitute. A merely naturalistic reclism also involves the sacrifice of beauty in almost any sense of that elusive term. Closely related to this sacrifice is the sacrifice of delicacy, elevation, and distinction. The very word realism has come to connote the opposite of these a qualities When we learn, for example, that someone has written a realistic study of a great man, we are sure in advance that he has devoted his main effort to proving that "Plutarch lied." The more the great man is reduced to the level of commonplace or worse, the more we feel he has been "humanized."

Mr Sherwood Anderson has argued ingeniously that, in as much as we ourselves are crude, our literature, if it is not to be unreal and factitious, should be crude likewise. But the writer who hopes to achieve work of im-30 portance cannot afford to be too deeply immersed in the atmosphere of the special place and passing moment Still less can be afford to make us feel, as writers like Mr Anderson and Mr. Dreiser and Mr. Sinclair Lewis do, that, if there were any lack of vulgarity in what they are depicting they would be capable of supplying the defect from their own abundance. More is involved here than mere loss of distinction. We have come, indeed, to the supreme sacrifice that every writer must make who does not transcend a naturalistic realism. He must forego the 40 hope of the enduring appeal—the hope that every writer worthy of his salt cherishes in some degree. In the absence of humanistic or religious standards, he is prone to confound the real with the welter of the actual and so to miss what Dr. Johnson terms the "grandeur of generality."

Certain books in the current mode are so taken up with the evanescent surfaces of life that they will survive, it at all, not as literature but as sociological documents The very language in which they are written will, in a generation or two, require a glossary So far 50 from imposing an orderly pattern on the raw material of experience, they rather emphasize the lack of pattern. The resulting effect, to borrow a phrase from the late Stephen Crane, who has had a marked influence on the recent movement, is that of a "cluttered incoherency" As an extreme example of the tendency one may cite Mannattan Transfer by John Dos Passos. In the name of reality, Mr. Dos Passos has perpetrated a literary nightmare. Such a work would seem to have slight value even as a sociological document, unless, indeed, one is pre- so pared to admit that contemporary Manhattan is inhabited chiefly by epileptic Bohemians

"It is as much a trade," says La Bruvere, "to make a book as it is to make a clock', in short literature is largely a matter of technique. The technique of Man battan Transfer is as dubious as its underlying philoso phy Neither can be justified save on the assumption that the aim of art is to exaggerate the clutter and incoherency of the mundane spectacle instead of eliciting its deeper meaning. Technique counts for even more 76 in poetry than in prose. It would be possible to base on technical grounds alone a valid protest against the present preposterous overestimate of Walt Whitman Fundamental questions need, in these very untraditional days, to be critically clucidated with a view to right definition if the poet is not to lack technique or still worse, if he is not, like certain recent practitioners of free verse, to be hagridden by a false technique. It evidently concerns both the form and substance of poetry, whether one define it with Aristotle as the portrayal of representative 8% human action, or whether one define it with Mr Carl Sandburg as a "mystic, sensuous mathematics of fire, smokestacks, waffles, pansies, people, and purple sunsets"

There is no doubt much in the America of to-day that suggests a jazzy impressionism. Still our naturalistic deliquescence has probably not gone so far as one might infer from poetry like that of Mr. Sandburg or fiction like that of Mr. Dos Passos. The public response to some of the realistic novels has been considerable, allowance must be made however for the succès de scandale, also for the skill attained by the modern publisher in the art of merchandising. The reputation of certain books one might mention may be regarded as a triumph of "creative" advertising What has been created is a mirage of masterpieces where no masterpieces are. It is well also to 10 remember in regard to some of the works that have been most discussed that, so far from being an authentic reflection of the American scene, they are rather a belated echo of certain European movements For it is as certain that in our literary and artistic modes we follow Europe -usually at an interval of from five to forty years-as it is that we lead Europe in our bathtubs and sanitary plumbing. Any one who resided in Paris in the nineties and later in America, will, as I can testify from personal experience, have the sense of having lived through the 20 same literary fads twice Mr Dreiser reminds one of Zola and his school The technique of Mr Dos Passos recalls that of the Goncourts. Our experimenters in free verse have followed in the wake not merely of Walt Whitman but of the French symbolists, and so on

We shall presently begin to hear of certain new developments in French literature and critical thought that point, though indecisively as yet, to a radical departure from what has been the main current since the eighteenth century and in some respects since the Renaissance. It is 30 well that we should become familiar with the writers who reveal in different ways this latest trend,-notably with Maritain, Maurras, Lasserre, Seillière, and Benda; for they give evidence of a quality of cerebration that is rare in our own literati. At the same time we should not adopt with our usual docility the total outlook of any of these writers for no one of them has worked out a point of view exactly adapted to our requirements. In general, it is not fitting that a great nation at the very height of its power should go on indefinitely trailing after Europe 40 It is time for us to initiate something of our own. This does not mean that we should proceed forthwith to inbreed our own "originality". It means almost the exact opposite The most original thing one could do nowadays would be to question the whole theory of originality as mere temperamental overflow and self-expression that has prevailed from the "geniuses" of the eighteenth century down to one of our youthful and very minor bards who aspires to "spill his bright illimitable soul"

A genuinely critical survey would make manifest that so the unsatisfactoriness of our creative effort is due to a lack of the standards that culture alone can supply. Our cultural crudity and insignificance can be traced in turn to the inadequacy of our education, especially our higher education. Mr. Mencken's attack on the "professors" is therefore largely justified; for if the professors were performing their function properly. Mr. Mencken himself would not be possible. One must add in common justice that the professors themselves, or at least some of them, are becoming aware that all is not well with existing conditions. One could not ask anything more perspicacious than the following paragraph from a recent report of Committee G to the American Association of University Professors.

American education has suffered from the domination, conscious or unconscious, direct or indirect, of political and sentimental, as well as educational, theories that are demonstrably false. If the views of some men are to prevail the intellectual life of the country is doomed, everybody except the sheer idiot is to go to college and puisue chiefly sociology, nature study. child study, and community service—and we shall have a society unique only in its mediocrity, ignorance and vulgarity. It will not do to dismiss lightly even so extreme a view as this it is too indicative. Such influences are very strong-their pressure is constant, and if education has largely failed in America it has been due primarily to them.

In short, as a result of the encroachments of an equalistarian democracy, the standards of our higher education have suffered in two distinct particulars: first, as regards the quality of students, second, as regards the quality of the students pursue. The first of these evils is generally recognized. There is even some prospect of remedial measures Certain institutions, Harvard, for example, without being as yet severely selective, are becoming more critical of the incompetent student. On the other hand, there seems to be less hope than ever of any righting of the second and more serious evil—the failure to distinguish qualitatively between studies. The main drift is still toward what one may term the blanket de gree (Dartmouth, for example, has just merged its bachelor of arts and bachelor of science) Yet rather than blur certain distinctions it would have been better one might suppose, to use up all the letters of the alphabet devising new degrees to meet the real or supposed educational needs of the modern man. To bestow the A.B. degree indiscriminately on a student for whom education has meant primarily a specialization in chemistry and on one for whom it has meant primarily an assimilation of the masterpieces of Greek literature is to empty it of any effective meaning. At the present rate, indeed the time : may come when the A B will not throw much more light on the cultural quality of its recipient than it would, if as has been suggested it were bestowed on every American child at birth

It goes without saying that those who have been lowering and confusing educational standards have been profuse in their professions of "service". A critical examination, not merely of American education but of American life at the present time will almost necessarily hinge on this term. The attitude of the Socratic critic toward it is not to be confounded with that of Mr. Mencken and the 'hard-boiled" contingent. When a gang of real estite agents," says Mr. Mencken, "bond salesmen, and automobile dealers gets together to sob for Service it takes no Freudian to surmise that someone is about to be swindled." But if one entertain doubts about this current American gospel, why waste one's immunition on inv such small fry? Other and more exalted personages than the members of the Rotary Club at Zenith have in Mr Sinclair Lewis's elegant phrase been yipping for Service" If one is to deal with this idea of service Socratically, one needs to consider it in its relation to the two figures who have rightly been taken to be the most representative in our cultural background-Benjamin Franklin and Jonathan Edwards Franklin's idea of service is already humanitarian Edwards' idea is still traditionally Christian service not of man but of God What Franklin stood for is flourishing prodigiously at the present moment, so much so that he may perhaps be defined in his chief line of influence as the great superrotarian. What Edwards stood for is on the other hand, largely so obsolete or survives only in the form of habits, which, lacking doctrinal support, are steadily declining along with the whole Puritin culture.

Intermediary types are possible. One may in one's character reflect the Poritan background and at the same time in one's idea of service derive rather from Franklin Precisely that combination is found in the most influential of our recent educational leakers—the late President Hiot. A legitimate admiration for his personal qualities should not interfere with the keenest critical so scrutary of his views about education, for the two things stand in no necessary connection. Practically this means to scrutinize the hum intarian idealism that he probably did more than any other man of his generation to promote. In this respect most of the heads of our institutions of learning have been and still are understudies of President Elio.

In an address on the occasion of his ninetieth birthday President Hiot warned his hearers against introspection lest it divert them from a whole-hearted devotion to 22 service. Between this attitude and a religious or humanistic attitude there is a clash of first principles. Both humanism and religion require introspection as a prerequisite of the inner life and its appropriate activity. With the disappearance of this activity what is left is the outer activity of the utilitarian, and this leads straight to the one-sided cult of material efficiency and finally to the standardization that is, according to nearly all foreign critics and many of our own, a chief American danger We cannot return to the introspection of the Puritan 86 We shudder at the theology on I dwards would impose as the condition of his 'divine and supernatural light Yet it does not follow, as I have already suggested, that we should reject the inner life itself along with this theology. One may recognize innumerable incidental advantages in the gospel of service and yet harbor an uneasy suspicion withal that in the passage from the older religion to the modern humanitarian dispensation something viral has disappeared, something of which neither the outer working of the utilitarian nor again the expan- % sive sympathy of the sentimentalist can offer an equivalent

The problem of the inner life is very much bound up with two other problems that are now pressing for solution in our higher education and have as yet found none the problem of the specialist and the problem of leisure The man of leisure is engaged in an inner and specifically human form of activity, a form that is, according to Aristotle, needful if he is to compass the end of ends-10 his own happiness The question is whether one should consent like the specialist to forego this activity and to live partially and as a mere instrument for the attainment of some outer end—even though this end be the progress of humanity We are beginning to hear a great deal nowadays about the "menace" of leisure It has been estimated that with the perfecting of mechanical devices the man of the future will be able to satisfy his material wants by working not more than four hours a day. It is vain to anticipate that the rank and file will use this re-20 lease from outer activity intelligently unless the leaders, notably those in high academic station, show the way The notion of true leisure is the ultimate source of the standards of any education that deserves to be called liberal When even a few of our college and university presidents show that they are thinking to some purpose on the nature of leisure it will be time enough to talk of "America's coming of age"

As it is, our institutions of learning seem to be becoming more and more hotbeds of "idealism". Their failure, 30 on the whole, to achieve standards as something quite distinct from ideals on the one hand, and standardization on the other, may prove a fact of smister import for the future of American civilization. The warfare that is being waged at the present time by Mr Sinclair Lewis and others against a standardized Philistinism continues in the main the protest that has been made for several generations past by the temperamentalists, hard or soft, against the mechanizing of life by the utilitarian. This protest has been, and is likely to continue to be, inef-40 fectual The fruitful opposite of the standardized Philistine is not the Bohemian, nor again the hard temperamentalist or superman, as Mr Mencken conceives him, but the man of lessure Lessure involves an inner effort with reference to standards that is opposed to the sheer expansion of temperament, as it is to every other form of sheer expansion are less popular in this country than the ideals of the humanitarian is that these standards set bounds to the acquisitive life, whereas it seems possible to combine 4 s. perfect idealism with an orgy of unrestricted commercialism. It is well for us to try to realize how we appear to others in this matter. Our growing unpopularity abroad is due no doubt in part to envy of our material success, but it also arises from the proneness of the rest of the world to judge us, not by the way we feel about ourselves, but by our actual performance. If we are in our own eyes a nation of idealists, we are, according to our most recent French critic, M. André Siegfried, a "nation of Pharisees.' The European, M Siegfried would & have us believe, still has a concern for the higher values of civilization, whereas the American is prepared to sacrifice these values ruthlessly to mass production and material efficiency.

It is easy to detect under this assumption the latest form of a "certain condescension in foreigners". The breakdown of cultural standards is European as well as American It is not clear that M Siegfried himself has an adequate notion of the form of effort that can alone serve as a counterpoise to the one-sided activity of the 7. utilitarian His assertion that Europe, appalled at the American excess of standardization, is inclined to turn from Henry Ford to Gandhi is more picturesque than convincing At the same time his anatomy of our favorite ideal of service is not without interest. This ideal opposes no effective barrier to our expansiveness. An unchecked expansiveness on the national scale is always im penalistic Among the ingredients of a possible American imperialism M. Siegfried enumerates the American's "great self-satisfaction, his rather brutal sense of his own interests, and the consciousness, still more dangerous, of his 'duties' towards humanity." M Siegtried admits however that our imperialism is likely to be of a new and subtle essence, not concerned primarily with territorial aggrandizement

A proper discussion of Mr Siegfried's position as well as of other issues I have been raising would transcend the limits of an article. My end has been accomplished if I have justified in some measure the statement with which I started as to the importance of cultivating a general critical intelligence. James Russell Lowell's dictum that before having an American literature we must have an American criticism was never truer than it is to-day. The obvious reply to those who call for more creation and less criticism is that one needs to be critical above all in examining what now passes for creation. A scrutiny of this kind would, I have tried to show, extend beyond the bounds of literature to various aspects of our national life and would converge finally on our higher education. We cannot afford to accept as a substitute for this true criticism the self-expression of Mr. Mencken and his school, unless indeed we are to merit the comment that is, I am told, made on us by South Americans. They are not a very serious people! To be sure, the reader may reflect that I am myself a critic, or would-be critic. I can only express the hope that, in my magnifying of the critical function, I do not offer too close a parallel to the dancing-master in Molière who averred, it will be remembered, that 'all the mistakes of men, the fatal reverses that fill the world's annals, the shortcomings of a stresmen, and the blunders or great captains arise from book howing how to dance

Literature and the Modern World

"Literature and the Modern World" is a good example of Eliot's later philosophical essays. Here he points out the dangers of an all-absorbing social consciousness. Religion and poetry, Eliot believes, languish in the completely socialized state, they are of great importance in the modern world both as expressions of, and as aids to, a proper balance between the individual person and society.

People may be conscious of their age without knowing very much about it I believe that most of us are influenced, more than we realize, by a kind of deterministic conception of history. That may be all right for the Marxian, who has a reasoned theory about it, but it has no advantage as an unconscious assumption. The assumption of the inevitability of progress has, we all know, been discarded in its nineteenth century form. it is the butt of popular philosophers like Dean Inge But actually, what we have discarded is a particular variety in of the theory of progress, that which is associated with Darwin Tennyson, free-trade and the industrial development of the latter part of the last century in short, with Liberalism Our beliefs have been shaken in detail for instance, no one now is convinced of the automatic heneficence of scientific invention. Invention may be applied to destructive, rather than to creative activity, and it throws people out of work and it stimulates production while it diminishes consumption these are com-

monplaces Nevertheless, we retain the essential of the doctrine of progress we have no faith in the present

In popularizing the belief in the future in a crude form we have, I think, a good deal for which to thank Mr H G Wells. His superficial philosophy has had an extensive influence Whatever Mr Wells may explicitly disclaim, I think that the effect of his writing has been something like this to propagate a belief that the value of the present resides in its service to the fu-10 ture, and nowhere else Morality consists in working to forward the happiness of future generations, 'happiness" of a not remarkably spiritualized kind. We are to find our happiness in scientific work which will benefit future humanity, and for the rest get anything out of life that we can I do not want to let my words be twisted to suggest that we should take no concern with the lives of future generations. It is very much our business. What I object to is the complete dislocation of values. It is important not only that we should 20 try to want the right things for the future. It is important also that we should have just as much respect for ourselves, and remember that we, as human beings, are individually just as valuable as the men of the future Mr Wells seems to propagate a strange false humility of evolutionism as the higher apes are to us, he says in effect, so are we to the men of the future, and as we regard our animal ancestors, whether apes, lemurs or opossums, so will they of the future regard us. This is, of course, the quite natural corollary of a nait faith in per-30 petual evolution, combined with a denial of any sharp dividing line between the human and the unimal that is, a denial of the human soul

Now, one effect of this is to justify a contempt for humanity as we find it today, and the admission of any means, at whatever cost to human dignity, which will bring about the kind of future which Mr. Wells contemplates with such rapture. I confess that I cannot see who we should take such pains to produce a race of men millennia hence, who will only look down upon 1/1 as apes, lemurs, or opossums. It seems a thankless labor. We must affirm that there is no more value in the future than there is in the present. That is to say, we must affirm the eternal against the transient; the eternal which has been realized in the past, can be realized in the present, and it is our business to try to bring about a future in which the obstacles to this realization will be less, for the mass of humanity, than they are today. And these obstacles are not all of a material kind, they are in ourselves too. Our attitude may seem less ambitious than that of Mr Wells, but it is more definite. It is simply that of the shumble parent who wants his child to have a better chance in life than he had, and to lead a better life than he has led

I said at the beginning that this modern eschatology begins in optimism and easily ends in despair But I do not draw the moral of the proprietor whose granary was full. We are obviously at the end of an age, oppressed by the sense of corruption and decay, and fearful of the kinds of change which may come, since some change must. And since our minds must needs be filled with a thought about the future, thought affecting our own action tomorrow perhaps, and our consciences disturbed by what we find about us and within us, it is all the more important to keep our heads our sense of values, all the more important that we should hold fast to the things which were, and are, and shall be, world without end

My immediate occupation, however, is with the effect upon modern literature of this dislocation of values and this moral subservience of the present to the future. As a kind of consultant, as well as a potential impresario, I have to see a good deal of what is being written, in some forms, by those much younger than myself. In the better writers there is strongly developed a kind of social conscience, a notion that literature ought to be useful to society. In the inferior writers this conscience may of course, take the form merely of a determination not to miss the boar, but I confidently assure you of the existence of a fair proportion of sincerity. Now this devotion to society may involve precisely the same dislocation of values as the devotion to the future, and I propose to try $\,\epsilon$ to come to a conclusion about the proper relation of the poet today to himself and to society. The preoccupation of which I speak is inevitable, it is right, but how is it to be adjusted to the permanent values which literature is supposed to realize?

Here we get to the point. Should a literary artist have this acute sense of a social duty obliging him to convey a message; and if so, when is the "message beneficial and when detrimental to the "art"?

⁵ H G Wells [1860-1940], English novelist, historian, and popular scientist, famour for such works as Tono-Bungay, The Outline of History, and The War of the Worlds • 56 moral an allusion to the story of Joseph, whose storehouses had been well stocked with grain adainst the famine years [see Genesis 41]. The moral may be that, unlike Joseph, the modern liberal is ill-prepared for reversals

I believe that the man of letters at the present day ought to have this sense But the great danger for the artist is always that of conscientiously trying to feel what he does not feel. I will venture the following formulation. What is desirable is a harmony between the individual and sub-individual passions of the artist, and the social ideas and feelings which he wishes to propagate. In this harmony, he neither exploits the conscious doctrine as a vehicle for his personality, nor cr. mps or distorts his personality to adapt it to a social doctrine. This requires some little amplification.

A man is both an individual and a member Instead of "individual" I shall use the word 'person" His person ality is unique and not to be violated, but he is equally created to be a member of society. When society is conceived as merely a sum of individuals, you get the chaos of liberal democracy When the person is wholly sub-20 ordinated to society, you get the dehumanization of fas cism or communism. The extremes, however, may meet For what liberal democracy really recognizes is a sum not of persons, but of individuals that is to say, not the variety and uniqueness of persons, but the purely material individuation of the old-fashioned or Democritean atom And this is a disrespect to the person. For the person is no longer a person if wholly isolated from the community; and the community is no longer a community if it does not consist of persons. A man is not himself 30 unless he is a member, and he cannot be a incmber unless he is also something alone Man's membership and his solitude must be taken together. There are moments, perhaps not known to everyone, when a man may be nearly crushed by the terrible awareness of his isolation from every other human being, and I pity him if he finds himself only alone with himself and his meanness and futility alone without God. It is after these moments, alone with God and aware of our worthiness, but for Grace, of nothing but damnation, that we turn with most thankfulness 40 and appreciation to the awareness of our membership for we appreciate and are thankful for nothing fully until we see where it begins and where it ends. All that I have been saying is recognized by the Church, and the balance is maintained only by the Church it is not recognized but is made manifest by, the endless seesaw of political tendency between anarchy and tyranny a seesaw which, in the secular world. I believe has no end

Now all this may sound perfectly irrelevant to my subject, but it is not so. This same balance ought to exist, on its plane, in the activity of the artist. For the artist cannot devote himself truly to any cause unless by that devotion he is also most truly being, and becoming, himself. The artist may as Remy de Gourmont profoundly says, "in writing himself write his age, but I think that we should add that he may sometimes in writing his age, write himself which will come to the same thing. But it is from himself that he mist start. It is sometimes helpful to put things in an extreme, and therefore dangerous way. So I may say that in one aspect the true artist may be said to be simply exploiting the things he oblicives in for the purpose of miking art—only if he does this convenient) is he a false artist.

Whereas a man like D. H. Lawrence is in danger of manipulating his philosophy to fit his private needs and to justify his private weaknesses, the adherent of an objective creed is in danger of denying, or distorting himself to fit his beliefs, and the opposite insincerity becomes pessible. This is equally a danger for the Christian and for the communist, and especially at those moments when personal inspiration fails. How far can one go in identi- 70 fying a creed with oneself, or oneself with a creed? The development of the person may be twisted, or the purity of the creed may be polluted. I believe naturally that the Christian if he understands his Christianity, has safe guards which the mere social revolutionist cannot have safeguards of the personal emotion. For instance, social enthusiasm alone, however intense does not seem to have the substance needed to make poetry. What is the difference between Danie's denunctation of the vices of his time and Shelley's denunciation of kings tyrants, and as priests? Shelley's excitement is in his head, and therefore emits rather shrill and inapplicable head noises, whereas Dance's is involved with all his own sufferings-definite grievances and definite humiliations at the hands of particular people, of all of which he is conscious selfinterested grudges and deprivations, carraly if you like, but primarily real and that is the first thing. Only the greatest, the Hebrew Prophets, seem to be utterly caught up and possessed by God as mouthpieces; in ordinary human poets the human personal loss, the private grievance and bitterness and loneliness, must be present. Even when the poet is aware of nothing, interested in nothing, beyond his personal feelings, these may have, by their intensity, a representative value, so that we envisage him, like Villon, not as wrapped up in his private griefs, but reliving them, holding nothing back, in a passionate cry to God—and there is, in the end, no one else to cry to But in the greatest poets these private passions are completed in a passionate belief in objective moral values, in a striving towards justice and the life of the spirit among men

Now the tendency of secular revolution today seems to me to be to diminish the value of the person Of what importance, we may say currently, is all this expression of personal feeling and private suffering, in a world of so much general injustice and oppression? and this is the 20 secular point of view of what importance one man, when the life of society is at stake! We are back with the modern eschatology of which Mr Wells is the popular preacher The present order is damned, let us snatch what satisfaction we can, say some, and, the present order is damned, let us sacrifice-not our pleasure, but our selves—to the future, say others, and one may perhaps maintain both conclusions at once And behind is the master idea which has been working unobtrusively throughout our time, an idea which in the 30 forms of heresy has always been waiting for us the idea of the "group consciousness"-modest, and scientific and certain it sounds under that name

In a recent article called "The Real Issue," which I have read with interest and approval, Mr Christopher Dawson makes some pertinent remarks about the position of the individual in the classless society the orthodox Communist will deny that this total subordination and sacrifice of humanity to the State machine is of the essence of Communism, for did not Marx and Lenin expressly teach that the dictatorship of the prolectatiat is only a temporary phase, and that the State itself will eventually wither away and give place to a classless and Stateless society? But how will this end be attained? Only when the individual is so completely socialized that he will instinctively devote all his energies to working for society and will be unable to conceive of any other end than that of the economic organism of which he forms part In such an order there will be no need for a State any more than it is necessary for ants or bees to have a State But is it a human order, and is it possible for humanity to rise or sink to such a level?

I do not, any more than Mr Dawson, think such a consummation likely, but if I did not think it possible I should not take the trouble of attacking the idea of it. It would be brought about, not by the diabolic cleverness of scheming philosophers and politicians, but by the natural aversion of human beings to the responsibility and strain of being human. For we must remember that it is a great strain for the erect animal to persist in being erect, a physical and still more a moral strain With or without mechanical aids of movement and noise, most people spend a good deal of their time avoiding the human responsibility, and we only remain human because of the continual vicarious sacrifice of a few dedicated lives And the "group consciousness," the heresy bred within the antithetical heresy of liberalism, has a great seductive charm, for it helps to release us from the burden of responsibility. It would more likely, I think, be a reversion to a lower kind of consciousness, than an ascent to a higher one, it is largely, in fact, to the speculations, which profess to be based on the study of primitive races, of such writers as Durkheim and Lévy-Bruhl, that we owe the conceptions That such a state of humanity would be unfavorable to poetry follows from what I have said earlier. That is not perhaps of the utmost importance in itself, there are matters more important than the perpetual production of new poetry, though we must remember that a $\boldsymbol{\epsilon}$ people which ceases to create the new will also lose the power to appreciate the old. What is important is that the creation of poetry depends upon the maintenance of the person, of the person in relation to other individuals, to God, and to society

There is much, however, in the aspirations of poetry today with which I am in full sympathy. When we compare the state of poetry now with that of forty years ago, towards the end of the last century, I think we may see, without drawing any comparison between the merits of individual poets (and even if that comparison were to result to our disadvantage), that the social earnestness and dissatisfaction which have been lately expressing themselves have been all to the good; and poetry has taken on a new seriousness and a new social importance It is perhaps not insignificant that the one great poet we 10 have who belongs to both periods, Mr William Butler Yeats, has been writing his finest poetry within recent years. With all we owe him, I find it difficult to regard Mr. Yeats as anything but a contemporary; and if anyone said that of me, when I arrive at his present age, I should consider it the highest of compliments What I think we have missed, and have been struggling for is the recognition of poetry as something other than exquisite pleasure for a small number of people who have the taste for it—as something having a function of social 20 value The poet must assume his rôle of moralist and thus manifest his relation to society

I think however that the passion for social righteousness will prove in the end not enough in itself. The danger of what I have called the modern eschatology, the danger of neglecting the permanent for the transitory, the personal for the social, is one to which the poet is exposed in common with everyone else. but he has a peculiar responsibility not to be deluded Yer I would ask you to have some sympathy with his difficulties. An age of change, and a period of incessant 30 apprehension of war, do not form a favorable environment. There is a temptation to welcome change for its own sake, to sink our minds in some desperate philosophy of action; and several such philosophies are being urged upon us. Contempt for the past, and even ignorance of it, is on the increase, and many are ready for the unlimited experiment. We cannot effect intelligent change, unless we hold fast to the permanent essentials, and a clear understanding of what we should hold fast to, and what abandon, should make us all the 40 better prepared to carry out the changes that are needed Thus we can look back upon the past without regret and to the future without fear

Narcissus as Narcissus

"Narcissus as Narcissus" first appeared in The Virginia Quarterly Review, Winter 1938, and was reprinted in Reason in Madness (1941). The close attention to the nature of poetry and poetic structure— well exemplified in Tate's essay—is typical of much modern criticism

On this first occasion, which will probably be the last, of my talking about my own verse, I could plead the example of Edgar Allan Poe, who wrote an essay entitled. The Philosophy of Composition. But in our age the appeal to authority is weak, and I am of my age. I prefer to leave the propriety of self-discussion to the reader. You will remember the Englishman who refuted an American's criticism of Drinkwater, who had, on the opening night of his 'Robert E Lee." permitted Grant to appear in gray and Lee in blue. "Oh, I should think that Drinkwater would know about that." I am willing to let Drinkwater know about that, with the reminder to the reader that what I happen to know about the poem I shall discuss is limited. I remember merely my intention in writing it, I do not know whether the poem is good, and I do not know its obscure origins.

How does one come to write a poem where does it come from? That is the question asked by the psychologists or the geneticists of poetry Of late I have not been able to read any of their theories through years ago I read one by Mr Conrad Aiken, another, I think, by Mr Robert Graves, but I have forgotten them I am not throwing off on verbal mechanisms, dreams, or repressions as origins of poetry, all three of them and more besides may have a great deal to do with it. Nor should I ignore Mr I A Richards, whose theories I have read 20 a great deal to him a poem seems to be a kind of ideal harmony among the greatest number of our appetites which ordinarily jangle, and the reader gets the same harmony or 'ordering of the mind" second-hand-only it is really as good as first-hand since the poet differs from the mere reader by the hair of a talent for constructing appetitive harmonies in words. While this theory may be false, I can only say that given a few premises which I shall not discuss, it is logical. I do not care whether it is false or true

Other psychological theories today-I speak from rusty acquaintance-say a good deal about compensation A poem is an indirect effort of a shaky man to justify himself to happier men, or to present a superior account of his relation to a world that allows him but little certainty, and would allow as little to the happier men if they did not wear blinders-according to the poet For example, a poet might be a tellow who could not get enough self-justification out of being an automobile salesman (whose certainty is a fixed quota of cars every 10 month) to rest comfortably upon it. So the poet, who wants to be something that he cannot be, and is a failure in plain life, makes up fictitious versions of his predicament that are interesting even to other persons because nobody is a perfect automobile salesman. Everybody, alas I constantly read this kind of criticism suffers a little of my own verse. According to its doctors, my one intransigent desire is to have been a Confederate general and because I could not or would not become anything else, I set up for poet and began to invent fictions about the personal ambitions that my society has no use for

Although a theory may not be "true," it may make certain insights available for a while, and I have deemed it proper to notice theories of the genetic variety because a poet talking about himself is often expected, as the best authority, to explain the origins of his poems But persons interested in origins are seldom quick to use them Poets, in their way, are practical men, they are interested in results. What is the poem, after it is written? That is the question Not where it came from, or why The Why and Where can never get beyond the guessing stage because, in the language of those who think it can, poetry cannot be brought to "laboratory conditions" The only real evidence that any critic may bring before his gaze is the finished poem. For some reason most critics have a hard time fixing their minds directly under their noses, and before they see what is there they use a telescope upon the horizon to see where it came from They are woodcutters who do their job by finding out where the ore came from in the iron of the steel of the blade of the axe that Jack built. I do not 7 say that this procedure is without its own contributory insights, but the insights are merely contributory and should not replace the object that gives rise to them A poem may be an instance of morality, of social conditions, of psychological history, it may instance all its qualities, but never one of them alone, nor any two or three, nor ever less than all In making women "instances" of sex we make them whores

Genetic theories, I gather, have been cherished academically with detachment Among "critics" they have been useless and not quite disinterested. I have myself tound them applicable to the work of poets whom I did not like. That is the easiest way.

I say all this because it seems to me that my verse or anybody else's is merely a way of knowing something if the poem is a real creation, it is a kind of knowledge that we did not possess before—It is not knowledge "about" something else, the poem is the fulness of that knowledge. We know the particular poem, not what it says that we can restate. In a manner of speaking, the poem is its own knower, neither poet nor reader knowing anything that the poem says apart from the words of the poem. I have expressed this view elsewhere in other terms, and it has been accused of æstheticism or art for art's sake But let the reader recall the historic position of Catholicism nilla salus extra ecclesiam. That must be oreligionism. There is probably nothing wrong with art for art's sake if we take the phrase seriously, and not take it to mean the kind of poetry written in England forty years ago Religion always ought to transcend any of its particular uses, the true art for art's sake view can be held only by religious persons who are always looking for something that they can respect apart from use (though it may be useful) like poems, fly-rods and formal gardens . . These are negative postulates and I am going to illustrate them with some commentary on a poem . called "Ode to the Confederate Dead"

That poem is "about' solipsism or Narcissism, or any other 15m that denotes the failure of the human personality to function properly in nature and society Society (and "nature" as modern society constructs it) appears to offer limited fields for the exercise of the whole man who wastes his energy piecemeal over separate functions that ought to come under a unity of being (Until the last generation, only certain women were whores, having been set aside as special instances of sex amid a social scheme that held the general belief that sex must be part of a whole, now the general belief is that sex must be special) Without unity we get the remarkable self consciousness of our age Everybody is talking about this evil, and a great many persons know what ought to be done to correct it As a citizen I have my own prescription, but as a poet I am concerned with the experience of solipsism. And an experience of it is very different from a theory about it

I should have trouble connecting solipsism and the Confederate dead, as a rational thesis, I should make a fool of myself in the discussion, because I know no more of the Confederate dead or of solipsism than hundreds of other people. (Possibly less the dead Confederates may be presumed to have a certain privacy, and as for solip-sism, I blush to the philosophers who know all about Bishop Berkeley, I use the term here in its strict etymology.) And it I call this interest in one's ego Narcissism, I make myself a logical ignoramus, as well as a loose-mouth with mythology. I use Narcissism to mean only preoccupation with self, it may be love or hate so But a good psychiatrist knows that it means self-love only and otherwise he can talk about it more coherently, knows more about it thin I ever hope or desire to know. He would look at me professionally if I piped up with the remark that the modern squirrel cage of our sensibility, the extreme introspection of our time, has anything whatever to do with the Confederate dead.

But when the doctor looks at literature it is a question whether he sees it the sea boils and pigs have wings because in poetry all things are possible-if, as the drug-store cowboys would put it you are min enough They are possible because in poetry the disparate elements are not combined in logic which can combine only under cerrun categories and under the law of contradiction, they are combined rather as experience, and experience has decided to ignore logic except perhaps is another field of experience. Experience means conflict our natures being what they are and conflict means drama. Dramatic experience is not logical, it may be subdued to the kind of coherence that we indicate a when we speak in criticism, of form. Indeed as experience, this conflict is always a logical contradiction, or philosophically an antinomy. Scrious poetry deals with the fundamental conflicts that cannot be logically resolved, we can state the conflicts rationally, but reason does not relieve us of them. Their only final coherence is the formal re-creation of art, which freezes' the experience as permanently as a logical formula, but without, like the formula, leaving all but the logic out

Narcissism and the Confederate dead cannot be a connected logically, or even historically even were the connection an historical fact, they would not stand connected as art for no one experience, raw history. The proof of the connection must lie, if anywhere. In the experienced conflict which is the poem itself. Since one set of references for the conflict is the historic Confederates, the poem, if it is successful, is a certain section of history made into experience, but only on this occasion, and on these terms even the author of the poem has no experience of its history apart from the occasion and the terms

It will be understood that I do not claim even a 10 partial success in the junction of the two "ideas" in the poem I am about to discuss I am describing an intention, and the labor of revising the poem-a labor spread over ten years-fairly exposes the lack of confidence that I have felt and still feel in it. All the tests of its success in style and versification would come in the end to a single test, an answer, yes or no, to the question Assuming that the Confederates and Narcissus are not yoked together by mere violence, has the poet convinced the reader that, on the specific occasion of this 20 poem, there is a necessary yet hitherto undetected relation between them? By necessary I mean dramatically relevant, a relation "discovered" in terms of the particular occasion, not historically argued or philosophically deduced Should the question that I have just asked be answered yes, then this poem or any other with its specific problem could be said to have form what was previously a merely felt quality of life has been raised to the level of experience—it has become specific, local dramatic, "formal'—that is to say in-formed a man stopping at the gute of a Confederate graveyard on a late autumn afternoon. The leaves are falling, his first impressions bring him the "rumor of mortality"; and the desolation barely allows him, at the beginning of the second stanza, the heroically conventional surmise that the dead will enrich the earth, "where these memories grow.' From those quoted words to the end of that passage he pauses for a baroque meditation on the ravages of time, concluding with the figure of the "blind to crab." This creature has mobility but no direction, energy but no purposeful world to use it in in the entire poem there are only two explicit symbols for the locked-in ego, the crab is the first and less explicit symbol, a mere hint, a planting of the idea that will become overt in its second instance—the jaguar towards the end. The crab is the first intimation of the nature of the moral conflict upon which the drama of the poem develops the cut-off-ness of the modern "intellectual man" from the world.

The next long passage or "strophe," beginning "You know who have waited by the wall," states the other term of the conflict. It is the theme of heroism, not merely moral heroism, but heroism in the grand style, elevating even death from mere physical dissolution into a formal ritual this heroism is a formal ebullience of the human spirit in an entire society, not private, romantic illusion-something better than moral heroism, great as that may be, for moral heroism, being personal and individual, may be achieved by certain men in all ages, even ages of decadence But the late Hart Clane's a commentary is better than any I can make "The theme of chivalry, a tradition of excess (not literally excess, rather active faith) which cannot be perpetuated in the fragmentary cosmos of today—'those desires which should be yours tomorrow,' but which, you know, will not persist nor find any way into action"

The structure then is a tension between the two themes, "active faith" which has decayed, and the "fragmentary cosmos" which surrounds us (I must repeat here that this is not a philosophical thesis, it is an impressionistic rendering of a conflict that is concrete within the poem) In contemplating the heroic theme the man at the gate never quite commits himself to the illusion of its availability to him. The most that he can allow himself is the fancy that the blowing leaves are charging soldiers, but he rigorously returns to the refrain "Only the wind '-or the "leaves flying" I suppose it is a commentary on our age that the man at the gate never quite achieves the illusion that the leaves are heroic men, so that he may identify himself with them, a as Keats and Shelley easily and beautifully did with nightingales and west winds More than this, he cautions himself, reminds himself repeatedly of his subjective prison, his solipsism, by breaking off the half-illusion and coming back to the refrain of wind and leaves—a refrain that, as Hart Crane said is necessary to the "subjective continuity."

These two themes struggle for mastery up to the passage.

We shall say only the leaves whispering In the improbable mist of nightfall which is near the end. It will be observed that the passage begins with a phrase taken from the wind-leaves refrain—the signal that it has won. The refrain has been fused with the main stream of the maits reflections, dominating them, and he cannot return even to an ironic vision of the heroes. There is nothing but death, the mere naturalism of death at that Autumn and the leaves are death, the men who exemplified in a grand style an "active faith" are dead, there are only the leaves.

Shall we then worship death?

20

. set up the grave
In the house? The ravenous grave that will take us before our time? The question is not answered, although as a kind of romanticism it might, if answered affirmatively, provide an illusory solution to the solipsism of the man, but he cannot accept it Nor has he been able to live in his immediate world, the fragmentary cosmos. There is no practical solution, no solution offered for the edification of moralists. (To those who may identify the man at the gate with the author of the poem I would say. He differs from the author in not accepting a "practical solution," for the author's dilemma is perhaps not quite so exclusive as that of the meditating man.) The main intention of the poem has been to state the conflict, to concentrate it, to present it, in Mr. R. P. Blackmur's phrase, as experienced form—not as a logical dilemma.

The closing image, that of the serpent, is the ancient symbol of time, and I tried to give it the credibility of the commonplace by placing it in a mulberry bush—with the faint hope that the silkworm would somehow to be implicit. But time is also death. If that is so, then space, or the Becoming, is life, and I believe there is not a single spatial symbol in the poem. "Sea-space" is allowed the "blind crab", but the sea as appears plainly in the passage beginning, "Now that the salt of their blood . . " is life only in so far as it is the source of the lowest forms of life, the source perhaps of all life, but life undifferentiated, halfway between life and death. This passage is a contrasting inversion of the conventional."

mexhaustible bodies that are not Dead but feed the grass

the reduction of the earlier, literary concert to a more naturalistic figure derived from modern biological speculation. These buried Cassars' will not bloom in the hyacinth but will only make saltier the sea.

The wind-leaves refrain was added to the poem in 1930 nearly five years after the first draft was written I felt that the danger of adding it was small because, implicit in the long strophes of meditation, the ironic commentary on the vanished heroes was already there, 60 giving the poem such dramatic tension as it had in the earlier version. The refrain makes the commentary more explicit, more visibly dramatic and renders quite plain, as Hart Crane intimated the subjective character of the imagery throughout. But there was another reason for it, besides the increased visualization that it imparts to the dramatic conflict. It "times" the poem better, offers the reader frequent pauses in the development of the two themes, allows him occasions of assimilation, and on the whole-this was my hope and intention-the refrain makes the poem seem longer than it is and thus eases the concentration of imagery-without, I hope. sacrificing a possible effect of concentration

I have been asked why I called the poem an ode. I first called it an elegy. It is an ode only in the sense in which Cowley in the seventeenth century misunderstood the real structure of the Pindaric ode. Not only are the metre and rhyme without fixed pattern, but in another feature the poem is even further removed from Pindar than Abraham Cowley was a purely subjective medita-

34 R F Blackmur, a contemporary American critic • 54 buried hyacinth. See The Rubaiyat

I sometimes think that never blows so rea The Rose as where some buried Caesar bled, That every Hyacinth the Carden wears Dropt in her Lap from some once lovely Head tion would not in Cowley's age have been called an ode I suppose in so calling it I intended an irony—the scene of the poem is not a public celebration, it is a lone man by a gate

The dominant rhythm is 'falling,' the dominant metre iambic pentameter varied with six- four- and three-stressed lines, but this was not planned in advance for variety. I adapted the metre to the effect desired at the moment. The model for the irregular rhyming was "Lycidas," but for that other models could have served. The thymes in a given strophe I tried to adjust to the rhythm and the texture of feeling and image. For example, take this passage in the second strophe.

Autumn is desolation in the plot
Of a thousand acres where these memories grow
From the inexhaustible bodies that are not
Dead, but feed the grass row after rich row
Think of the autumns that have come and gone!—
Ambitious November with the humors of the year,
With a particular zeal for every slab,
Staining the uncomfortable angels that rot
On the slabs, a wing chipped here, an arm there
The brute curiosity of an angel's stare
Turns you, like them, to stone,
Transforms the heaving air
Till plunged to a heavier world below
You shift your sea-space blindly
Heaving, turning like the blind crab

30 There is rhymed with 16 n (to many persons perhaps only a half-rhyme), and I hoped the reader would unconsciously assume that he need not expect further use of that sound for some time. So when the line, 'The brute curiosity of an angel's stare,' comes a moment later, rhyming with year-there I hoped that the violence of image would be further reinforced by the repetition of a sound that was no longer expected. I wanted the shock to be heavy, so I felt that I could not afford to hurry the reader away from it until he had received it in 40 full. The next two lines carry on the image at a lower intensity the rhyme, "Transforms the heaving air," prolongs the moment of attention upon that passage, while at the same time it ought to begin dissipating the shock, both by the introduction of a new image and by reduction of the "meaning" to a pattern of sound, the eve-rhymes I calculated that the third use of that sound (stave) would be a surprise, the fourth a monotony I purposely made the end words of the third from last and last lines—below and crab—delayed rhymes for row and slab, the last being an internal and balf-dissonant rhyme for the sake of bewilderment and incompleteness, qualities by which the man at the gate is at the moment possessed

This is elementary but I cannot vouch for its success As the dramatic situation of the poem is the tension that I have already described so the rhythm is an attempt at a series of "modulations back and forth between a formal regularity, for the heroic emotion, and a broken rhythm, with scattering imagery, for the failure of that emotion I have pointed out that the passage, "You c know who have waited by the wall," presents the heroic theme of active faith, it will be observed that the rhythm, increasingly after 'You who have waited for the angly resolution, is almost perfectly regular lambic, with only a few initial inversions and weak endings The passage is meant to convey a plenary vision, the actual presence, of the exemplars of active faith the man at the gate at that moment is nearer to realizing them than at any other in the poem, hence the formal rhythm. But the vision breaks down, the wind-leaves refrain intervenes, and the next passage, "Turn your eyes to the immoderate past" is the irony of the preceding realization. With the self-conscious historical sense he turns his eyes into the past. The next passage after this, beginning 'You hear the shout " is the failure of the vision in both phases, the pure realization and the merely historical. He cannot "see the heroic virtues there is wind, rain, leaves. But there is sound, for a moment he deceives himself with it. It is the noise of the battles that he has evoked. Then comes the figure a of the rising sun of those battles, he is "lost in that orient of the thick and fast,' and he curses his own moment "the setting sun" The "setting sun" I tried to use as a triple image, for the decline of the heroic age and for the actual scene of late afternoon, the latter being not only natural desolation but spiritual desolation as well Again for a moment he thinks he hears the battle shout, but only for a moment, then the silence reaches him

Corresponding to the disintegration of the vision just described, there has been a breaking down of the formal rhythm. The complete breakdown comes with the images of the "mummy and the 'hound bitch' (Houna bitch because the hound is a hunter, participant of a formal ritual). The failure of the vision throws the man back upon himself, but upon himself he cannot bring to bear the force of a sustained imagination. He sees himself in random images (random to him, deliberate with the author) of semething lower than he ought to be the human image is only that of preserved death, but if he is alive he is an old hunter, dying. The passages about the mummy and the bitch are deliber ately brief—slight rhythmic stretches. (These are the only veises I have written for which I thought of the movement first, then cast about for the symbols.)

I believe the term modulation denotes in music the uninterrupted shift from one key to another. I do not know the term for change of rhythm without change of measure. I wish to describe a similar change in verse rhythm, it may be convenient to think of it as also 20 modulation of a kind. At the end of the passage that I have been discussing the final words are "Hears the wind only." The phrase closes the first main division of the poem. I have loosely called the longer passages strophes, but if I were hardy enough to impose the classical organization of the lyric ode upon a baroque poem. I should say that these words bring to an end the Strophe, after which must come the next main division or Antistrophe, which was often employed to answer the matter set forth in the Strophe or to present it from 30 another point of view. And that is precisely the significance of the next main division. But I wanted this second division of the poem to arise out of the collapse of the first. It is plain that it would not have suited my purpose to round off the first section with some sort of formal rhythm, I ended it with an unfinished line. The next division must therefore begin by finishing that line, not merely in metre but with an integral rhythm I will quote the passage

> The hound bitch Toothless and dying, in a musty cellar Hears the wind only

> Now that the salt of their blood Stiffens the saltier oblivion of the sea, Seals the malignant purity of the flood,

The cæsura, after only, is thus at the middle of the third foot. (These are the familiar terms, I should use others in an extended discussion of prosody.) The reader expects the foot to be completed by the stress on the next word, Now, as in a sense it is, but the phrase, "Now that the salt of their blood, is also the beginning of a new se movement, it is two do-tyle' creating momentarily a mounting rhythm courter to the falling rhythm that he prevailed. But with the finishing off of the line with blood the falling thythm is restored, the whole line from Hears to blood is actually an iambic pentameter with liberal inversions and substitutions that were expected to create a counter-thythm within the line From the clesura on the rhythm is new, it has--or was expected to have—an organic relation to the preceding rhythm, and it signals the rise of a new statement of 6 the theme

I have gone into this passage in detail-I might have chosen another-- not because I think it is successful, but because I labored with it it is a failure, or even an uninteresting success at ought to offer as much technical instruction to other persons as it would were it both successful and interesting. But a word more, the broader movement introduced by the new thythm was meant to correspond as a sort of Antistrophe to the earlier formal movement beginning. You know who have waited by the well. It is a new formal movement with new feeling and new imagery. The precirious illusion of the earlier movement has broken down into the personal symbols of the mummy and the hound the pathetic fallacy of the leaves as charging soldiers and the conventional 'buried Casar' theme have become rotten leaves and dead bodies warting in the earth, to return after long crosion to the sea. In the midst of this naturalism what shall the man say?--What shall all humanity say in the presence of decay? The two o themes then, have been struggling for mastery, the structure of the poem thus exhibits the development of two formal passages that contrast one two themes The two formal passages break down the first shading off into the second. (Now that the silt of their blood ") the second one concluding with the figure of the jaguar, which is presented in a distracted rhythm left hanging in the air from a weak ending—the word victim. This figure of the jaguar is the only explicit rendering of the Narcissus motif in the poem, but instead of a youth gazing into a pool, a predatory beast stares at a jungle stream, and leaps to devour himself. The next passage begins up of the two themes, now fused, into a final statement. I should see no objection to calling it the Epode. But upon the meaning of the lines from here to the end I see no need for further commentary. I have talked about the structure of the poem, not its quality. One can no more find the quality of one's own verse than one can find its value, and to try to find either is like looking into a glass for the effect that one's face has upon other persons.

What shall we say who have knowledge Carried to the heart?

If anybody ever wished to know anything about this 2, poem that he could not interpret for himself, he is still in the dark. I cannot believe that I have illuminated the difficulties that some readers have found in the style But then I cannot, have never been able to, see any difficulties of that order. The poem has been much revised I still think there is much to be said for the original barrer instead of yield in the second line, and for Novembers instead of November in line fifteen. The revisions were not undertaken for the convenience of the reader but for the poem's own clarity, so that, 3 word, phrase, line, passage, the poem might at worst come near its best expression.

I know that this long commentary has been a long presumption. But perhaps I have not been talking chiefly of the ostensible subject. At any rate, the presumption cannot be so egregious as the shorter presumption of the poem itself. There is nothing so presumptious as poetry.

THE POLITICAL STRUGGLE: Wilson, Hoover, Roosevelt

Woodrow Wilson

1856 · 1924

The ideals of the American people in World War I were most fully expressed by Woodrow Wilson, twenty-eighth President of the United States. Within a few months after the Armistice of 1918, however, Wilson's scheme to fulfill his promise to "make the world safe for democracy" had been rejected and his leadership had ended in failure as complete as that of any political figure in American history. Whose fault it was—his own, that of his enemies in the Senate, or that of the people themselves—is still acrimoniously debated. Now, after a second and far more destructive World War, it seems likely that the final measure of Wilson's greatness will be the degree to which the world succeeds in its continuing effort to substitute law for force as the ultimate settlement of international disputes. If strong armies and navies and air forces are to be the only assurance of peace, Wilson was and will remain an impractical dreamer. If an international organization capable of ending war and of dealing justly with the wrongs which cause war can be perfected. Wilson was an inspired prophet and may vet regain the vast prestige which he had in 1918 and 1919

The most remarkable thing about Wilson as a man is that he should have become a political leader. The son of a Presbyterian clergyman, he was born at Staunton, Virginia, in 1856, and brought up in Georgia and the Carolinas His biographers have made much of both the Presbyterian and the Southern background in explaining Wilson's moralistic political philosophy After a year at Davidson College in North Carolina he went to Princeton, where he was graduated in 1879. He then studied law at the University of Virginia, practicing briefly in Atlanta before deciding to prepare himself for teaching and writing on the science of politics the subject which had attracted him strongly during his undergraduate days. From 1883 until 1885 he worked at Johns Hopkins University, where he took his Ph D degree in 1886. By that time his first book, Congresstonal Government (1885), had brought him the attention of scholars, and he had begun his teaching career in a post at Bryn Mawr A long series of contributions to history and political science followed—the accompaniment of a brilliant teaching record at Bryn Mawr (1885-1888) Wesleyan (1888-1890), and Princeton (1890-1910) The State (1889), Division and Reunion, 1829-1889 (1893), George Washington (1895). A History of the American People (1902), and Constitutional Government in the United States (1908) did not exhaust his energies; he was also interested in educational reorganization and from 1902 until 1910 was the president of Princeton At fifty-four, indeed, he was the pattern of a modern college administrator. Few persons would have guessed that three years later he would be President of the United States, and that within eight years he would symbolize the hopes of peoples the world over that they would have the chance to determine for rhemselves under what government they wished to live.

Wilson's spectacular rise in politics was the result of several circumstances the need of the Democratic party for a reform candidate to chillenge the Republican leadership of Theodore Roosevelt, the widespread feeling that the Repullicans for all their 'trust-busting, had not gone far enough toward economic justice, and, most important of all the internal strife in the Republican party which resulted in the Progressive or Bull Moose" ticket of 1912. As governor of New Jersey in 1910-1912 Wilson showed himself willing to fight bossism" to the bitter end, his earnestness and honesty commended him to the rank and file throughout the nation. Unpalarable as he was to many Democratic leaders, he won enough support to win, with the assistance of William Jennings Bryan, the Presidential nomination in 1912- on the forty-sixth ballot in one of the stormiest conventions in American history Campaigning for what he called the New Freedom," a domestic program comprising conservation of natural resources, fair access to raw materials and financial credits and the elimination of all forms of monopoly, he was elected by a vast majority in the electoral college although Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft (Progressive and Republican opponents) between them polled over a million more votes than the 6,300,000 cast for Wilson. With large Democratic majorities in both houses of Congress, Wilson was offered an opportunity for practical achievement such as very seldom comes to a political scientist

Remarkable domestic legislation was soon pushed through—a sharp downward revision of the protective tariff, the Federal Reserve Act, various measures for improving the condition of farmers and workingmen Almost at once, however, Wilson was plagued by the necessity of dealing with all but insoluble problems in foreign affairs Revolution in Mexico was followed by such disorder that many Americans demanded intervention, before that matter was settled, war had broken out in Europe The familiar difficulties of neutrality followed, with a new variation provided by German submarine warfare. It is not necessary here to retell the story of the steps which led to the declaration of war against the German Empire, the sending of the American Expeditionary Force under General Pershing, and, after the Armistice, Wilson's personal participation in the framing of the Treaty of Versailles, with the League of Nations as its basic feature. Most of this tale is related in Wilson's own words. For Wilson and for the United States, however, the climax was tragic—a retirement into isolationism. Less than a generation was required to prove that the principle of national self-determination, unsupported by an effective international organization, cannot be sustained.

As a writer Wilson had the virtues and the weak-nesses of a good college lecturer. He is clear, he leaves no doubt of the organization of his material he makes effective use of allusion and the well-rounded phrase. On the other hand, he tends to overwork repetition for emphasis, intensification by superlatives, adjectives, and nouns in couplets and series, and his tone is sometimes almost arrogantly dogmatic. His rhetoric is that of the public speaker, the master of persuasion, self-confident and earnest, a little impatient, perhaps, of interruption. The style, however, is the man himself, hard to fit into precise categories and capable of widely divergent interpretation.

War Message

Address . . . Delivered at a Joint Session of the Two Houses of Congress, April 2, 1917

The circumstances of the composition and delivery of Wilson's "War Message" have been described by a number of his close associates, most notably by Colonel House (Intimate Papers), David F Houston, his secretary of agriculture (Eight Years in Wilson's Cabinet), and Frank I Cobb, editor of the New York World. Excellent summaries may be found in the fifth volume of Mark Sullivan's Our Times (1933) and in Walter Millis' Road to War America, 1914-1917 (1935). The crisis developed immediately after Wilson's second inauguration On March 9 the President called for a special session of Congress to meet on April 16; on March 21 the date was advanced by two weeks to April 2 On Saturday night, March 31, unable to sleep, Wilson carried his small typewriter to the south portico of the White House and there, in bathrobe and slippers, with a bowl of crackers and milk beside him, he wrote what is probably his greatest speech. It is well to remember that he had labored to mointain American neutrality long after great blocs of his countrymen and the majority of his cabinet and advisers were more than ready to fight. He knew that his call to arms would have great popular appeal, and he had, as more than one observer has noted, an almost unparalleled skill in the choice of emotion-laden words. His purpose, however, was not merely to create national unity, but also to turn the war frenzy to the moral level which to him was the sole justification for sending American forces to Europe. His care ful distinction between the German government and the German people was an ingenious way of waging wor with ideas, but his moralistic line of thought shows most clearly in the eloquent summary of American war aims with its promise of "a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and satety to all nations and make the world itself at last free

I have called the Congress into extraordinary session because there are serious, very serious, choices of policy to be made, and made immediately which it was neither right nor constitutionally permissible that I should as sume the responsibility of making

On the third of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the imperial German Government that on and after the first day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of 10 law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasis of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war but since April of last year the Imperial Government has somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft in conformity with its promise then given to us that passenger boats should not be sunk and that o due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to desiroy, when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats. The precautions taken were meager and haphazard enough, as was proved in dis tressing instance after instance in the progress of the cruel and unmanly business but a certain degree of restraint was observed. The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their - flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistskible marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion at our principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that n I hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of wilized nations. International Liveland its origin in the ttempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage his that law been built up with meager enough results, indeed, after all so was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except those which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them with out throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved immense and serious as that is but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of non-combatants, men, women, and children engaged in pursuits which have always even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind

It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk. American lives taken in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge, or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

When I addressed the Congress on the twenty-sixth of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms; our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable Because 20 submarines are in effect outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity indeed, to endeavour to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all. The German 30 Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ships will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual it is likely only o to produce what it was meant to prevent, it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we cannot make, we are incapable of making we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our nation and our people to be ignored or violated The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragic character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the government and people of the United States, that it formally accept the status of beiligerent which has thus been thrust upon it, and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war

What this will involve is clear It will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the governments now at war with Germany, and, as incident to that, the extension to those Governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs It will involve the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the country to supply the materials of war and serve the incidental needs of the 7. nation in the most abundant and yet the most economical and efficient way possible. It will involve the immediate full equipment of the navy in all respects but particularly in supplying it with the best means of dealing with the enemy's submarines. It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least five hundred thousand men, who should, in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation

I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty. I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

In carrying out the measures by which these things are to be accomplished we should keep constantly in mind the wisdom of interfering as little as possible in our own preparation and in the equipment of our own military forces with the duty—for it will be a very practical duty,—of supplying the nations already at war with Germany with the materials which they can obtain only from us or by our assistance. They are in the field and we should help them in every way to be effective there.

I shall take the liberty of suggesting, through the several executive departments of the Government for the consideration of your committees, measures for the accomplishment of the several objects I have mentioned. I hope that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of the Government upon which the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the nation will most directly fall

While we do these things these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world what our motives and our objects are My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last two months, and I do not believe that the thought of the nation has been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the twenty-second of January last, the same that I had in mind when I ad 40 dressed the Congress on the third of February and on the twenty-sixth of February Our object now, as then is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and selfgoverned peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles. Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world is involved and the freedom of its peoples, and the menace to that peace and freedom lies in the existence of the autocratic so governments backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that it observed among the individual citizens of civilized states.

We have no quarrel with the German people We 60 have no feeling towards them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old unhappy days when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynastics or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow-men as pawns or tools. Self-governed nations do a not fill their neighbour states with spics or set the course of intrigue to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no one has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nation's affairs.

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honour, a partnership of opinion. Intrigue would ear its vitals away, the plottings of inner circles who could plan what they would and render account to no one would be a corruption seated at its very heart. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honour steady to a common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.

Does not every American feel that assurance has been added to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? 20 Russia was known by those who knew it best to have been always in fact democratic at heart, in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude toward life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin character or purpose, and it has been shaken off and the great, generous Russian people have been added in all their native majesty 30 and might to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. Here is a fit partner for a League of Honour

One of the things that has served to convince us that the Prussian autocracy was not and could never be our friend is that from the very outset of the present war it has filled our unsuspecting communities and even our offices of government with spies and set criminal intrigues everwhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries and our commerce. Indeed it is now evident that its spies were here even before the war began, and it its unhappily not a matter of conjecture but a fact proved in our courts of justice that the intrigues which have more than once come perilously near to disturbing the peace and dislocating the industries of the country have been carried on at the instigation, with the support and even under the personal direction of official agents.

of the Imperial Government accredited to the Government of the United States. Even in checking these things and trying to extirpate them we have sought to pur the most generous interpretation possible upon them because we knew that their source lay, not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people towards us (who were, no doubt, as ignorant of them as we ourselves were), but only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing. But they have played their part in serving to convince us at last that that Government entertains no real friendship for us and means to act against our peace and security at its convenience. That it means to stir up enemies against us it our very doors the intercepted note to the German Minister at Mexico City is eloquent evidence.

We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a government, following such methods, we can never have a friend, and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world We are now about to accept gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, 7spend the whole force of the nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretence about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Just because we fight without rancour and without is selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we shall wish to share with all free peoples, we shall. I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for

I have said nothing of the Governments allied with the Imperial Government of Germany because they have not made war upon us or challenged us to defend our right and our honour. The Austro-Hungarian Gov. 20 ernment has, indeed, avowed its unqualified indorsement and acceptance of the reckless and lawless submarine waifare adopted now without disguise by the Imperial German Government, and it has therefore not been possible for this Government to receive Count Tarnowski the Ambassador recently accredited to this Government by the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hun gary, but that Government has not actually engaged in warfare against citizens of the United States on the seas. and I take the liberty, for the present at least, of post-30 poning a discussion of our relations with the authorities at Vienna. We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity towards a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early re-establishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us,—however hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present government through all these bitter months because of that friendship,-exercising a patience and forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible. We shall, happily, still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in 50 our daily attitude and actions towards the millions of men and women of German birth and native sympathy who live among us and share our life, and we shall be proud to prove it toward all who are in fact loyal to their neighbours and to the Government in the hour of test They are most of them, as true and loyal Americans as if they had never known my other fealty or allegiance They will be prompt to stand with us in rebuking and restraining the few who may be of a different mind and purpose If there should be disloyally at will be dealt with so with a firm hand of stein repression, but, if it lifts its head at all it will I is it only here and there and without countenance except from a lawless and malignant few

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, Gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There we it may be many months of fiery trial and sacrifice thead of us. It is a territal thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disistrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than 76 peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have dways carried nearest our hearts - for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have with the pride of those who know that the day 8% has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treisured. League of Nations

Address at Columbus, Ohio, September 4, 1919

Wilson's failure to make his vision of a League of Nations to end war prevail may be explained in part by the natural reaction of the American people to peace That he made innumerable mistakes which a more astute politician might have avoided cannot, however, be denied His decision to ao himself to the peace conference forced him to make compromises which from a distance he might have avoided, his egotistic by-passing of Senate leadership and prerogatives and his appeal to the people for a Democratic Congress counted heavily against him When it appeared that the Senate was likely to emasculate by reservations the treaty which he had done his best to achieve, he decided to take his case to the public. He left Washington on September 3, 1919, on a nation-wide speaking tour, with a schedule of approximately forty speeches. Although often received with great enthusiasm, he was tired and seriously ill, not always at his best. The emotional strain was so great that at Pueblo, Colorado, on September 25, he broke into tears while he was speaking, and that night on the train suffered a paralytic stroke from which he never fully recovered A year later his party and his League were rejected by the voters

The speech which follows was the first and perhaps the most characteristic of his series in explanation of the treaty. Largely extemporaneous, as is revealed by the numerous repetitions of phrases, it is nevertheless well-organized and often eloquent. It is not the speech of a tactful man, but few will deny its honesty and its essential truth. Without a strong League of Nations the Treaty of Versailles was not destined to be what Wilson thought it was; a league of some nations turned out not to be enough.

 $M_{\rm r}$ Chairman, Gov Campbell, my fellow citizens, it is with very profound pleasure that 1 find myself face to face with you. I have for a long time chafed at the confinement of Washington I have for a long time wished to fulfill the purpose with which my heart was full when I returned to our beloved country, namely, to go out and report to my fellow countrymen concerning those affairs of the world which now need to be settled. The only people I owe any report to are you and the other citizens of the United States

And it has become increasingly necessary, apparently, that I should report to you. After all the various angles at which you have heard the treaty held up, perhaps you would like to know what is in the treaty. I find it very difficult in reading some of the speeches that I have read to form any conception of that great document. It is a document unique in the history of the world for many reasons, and I think I can not do you a better service, or the peace of this world a better service, than by pointing out to you just what this treaty contains and what it seeks at to do

In the first place, my fellow countrymen, it seeks to punish one of the greatest wrongs ever done in history, the wrong which Germany sought to do to the world and to civilization, and there ought to be no weak purpose with regard to the application of the punishment. She attempted an intolerable thing, and she must be made to pay for the attempt The terms of the treaty are severe, but they are not unjust. I can testify that the men associated with me at the peace conference in Paris had it in 30 their hearts to do justice and not wrong. But they knew, perhaps, with a more vivid sense of what had happened than we could possibly know on this side of the water, the many solemn covenants which Germany had disregarded, the long preparation she had made to overwhelm her neighbors, and the utter disregard which she had shown for human rights, for the rights of women, of children, of those who were helpless. They had seen their lands devast[at]ed by an enemy that devoted himself not only to the effort at victory, but to the effort at 40 terror-seeking to terrify the people whom he fought And I wish to testify that they exercised restraint in the terms of this treaty. They did not wish to overwhelm any great nation They acknowledged that Germany was a great nation and they had no purpose of overwhelming the German people, but they did think that it ought to be burned into the consciousness of men forever that no people ought to permit its government to do what the German Government did

In the last analysis, my fellow countrymen, as we in America would be the first to claim, a people are responsible for the acts of their government. If their government purposes things that are wrong, they ought to take measures to see to it that that purpose is not execured o Germany was self-governed, her rulers had not concealed the purposes that they had in mind but they had deceived their people as to the character of the methods they were going to use, and I believe from what I can learn that there is an awakened consciousness in Germany itself of the deep iniquity of the thing that was attempted. When the Austrian delegates came before the peace conference, they in so many words spoke of the origination of the war as a crime and admitted in our presence that it was a thing intolcrable to contemplate to They knew in their hearts that it had done them the deepest conceivable wrong, that it had put their people and the people of Germany at the judgment seat of mankind and throughout this treaty every term that was applied to Germany was meant, not to humiliate Germany, but to rectify the wrong that she had done

Look even into the severe terms of reparation—for there was no indemnity. No indemnity of any sort was claimed, merely reparation, merely paving for the destruction done merely making good the losses so far as such losses could be made good which she had unjustly inflicted, not upon the governments for the reparation is not to go to the governments, but upon the people whose rights she had trodden upon with absolute absence of everything that even resembled pity. There was no indemnity in this treaty, but there is reparation, and even in the terms of reparation a method is devised by which the reparation shall be adjusted to Germany's ability to pay it

I am astonished at some of the statements I he ir made about this treaty. The truth is that they are made by persons who have not read the treaty or who if they have read it, have not comprehended it meaning. There is a method of adjustment in that treaty by which the reparation shall not be pressed beyond the point which Germany can pay, but which will be pressed to the utmost point that Germany can pay—which is just, which is righteous. It would have been intolerable if there had been anything else For, my fellow citizens, this treaty is not meant merely to end this single war. It is meant as a notice to every government which in the future will at- 50 tempt this thing that mankind will unite to inflict the same punishment. There is no national triumph sought to be recorded in this treaty. There is no glory sought for any particular nation. The thought of the statesmen collected around that table was of their people, of the sufferings that they had gone through of the losses they had incurred—that great throbbing heart which was so depressed so forlorn, so sad in every memory that it had had of the five tragical years that have gone. Let us never forget those years, my fellow countrymen. Let us never 60 forget the purpose—the high purpose the disinterested purpose-with which America lent its strength not for its own glory but for the detense of mankind

As I soid, this ticaty was not intended merely to end this war. It was intended to prevent any similar war. I wonder if some of the opponents of the legue of nations have forgotten the promises we made our people before we went to that peace table. We had taken by processes of law the flower of our youth from every household, and we told those mothers and fathers and sisters and wives A and sweethcarts that we were taking those men to fight a war which would end business of thit sort, and if we do not end it if we do not do the best that human concert of action can do to end it we are of all men the most unfaithful, the most unfaithful to the loving hearts who suffered in this war, the most unfaithful to those house holds bowed in gricf and yet lifted with the feeling that the lad laid down his life for a great thing and, among other things in order that other lads might never have to do the same thing. That is what the league of na- 80 tions is for, to end this war justly, and then not merely to service notice on governments which would contemplate the same things that Germany contemplated, but also concerning the combination of power which will prove to them that they will do it at their peril. It is idle to say the world will combine against you, because it may not, but it is persuasive to say the world is combined against you, and will remain combined against the things that Germany attempted. The league of nations is the only thing that can prevent the recurrence of this dreadful catastrophe and redeem our promises.

The character of the league is based upon the experience of this very war. I did not meet a single public man who did not admit these things that Germany would 10 not have gone into this war if she had thought Great Britain was going into it, and that she most certainly would never have gone into this war if she dreamed America was going into it. And they all admitted that a notice beforehand that the greatest powers of the world would combine to prevent this sort of thing would prevent it absolutely. When gentlemen tell you, therefore that the league of nations is intended for some other purpose than this, merely reply this to them If we do not do this thing, we have neglected the central covenant 26 that we made to our people, and there will then be no statesman of any country who can thereafter promise his people alleviation from the perils of war. The passions of this world are not dead. The rivalries of this world have not cooled. They have been rendered hotter than ever The harness that is to unite nations is more necessary now than it ever was before, and unless there is this assurance of combined action before wrong is attempted wrong will be attempted just as soon as the most am bitious nations can recover from the financial stress of 30 this war.

Now, look what else is in the treaty. This treaty is unique in the history of mankind, because the center or it is the redemption of weak nations. There never was a congress of nations before that considered the rights of those who could not enforce their rights. There never was a congress of nations before that did not seek to effect some balance of power brought about by means of serving the strength and interest of the strongest powers concerned, whereas this treaty builds up nations that 10 never could have won their freedom in any other way builds them up by gift, by largess, not by obligations, builds them up because of the conviction of the men who wrote the treaty that the rights of people transcend the rights of governments, because of the conviction of the men who wrote that treaty that the fertile source of war is wrong. The Austro-Hungarian Empire, for example, was held together by inilitary force and consisted of peoples who did not want to live together, who did not have the spirit of nationality as toward each other, who were constantly chafing at the bands that held them Hungary, though a willing partner of Austria, was willing to be a partner because she could share Austria's strength to accomplish her own ambitions, and her own ambitions were to hold under her the Jugo-Slavic peoples that lay to the south of her, Bohemia, an unhappy partner, a partner by duress, beating in all her veins the strongest national impulse that was to be found anywhere in Europe, and north of that, pitiful Poland, a great nation divided up among the great powers of Europe torn asunder kinship disregarded, natural ties treated with a contempt, and an obligatory division among sovereigns imposed upon her--a part of her given to Russia, a part of her given to Austria, a part of her given to Germany -great bodies of Polish people never permitted to have the normal intercourse with their kinsmen for fear that that fine instinct of the heart should assert itself which binds families together Poland could never have won her independence Bohemia never could have broken away from Austro-Hungarian combination The Slavic peoples to the south, running down into the great Balkan Peninsula, had again and again tried to assert their nationality and independence, and had as often been crushed, not by the immediate power they were fighting but by the combined power of Europe The old alliances, the old balances of power, were meant to see to it that no little nation asserted its right to the disturbance of the peace of Furopé, and every time an assertion of rights was attempted they were suppressed by combined influence and force

This treaty tears away all that says these people have a right to live their own lives under the governments which they themselves choose to set up. That is the American principle, and I was glad to fight for it. When strategic claims were urged, it was matter of common counsel that such considerations were not in our thought We were not now arranging for future wars. We were giving people what belonged to them. My fellow citi zens, I do not think there is any man alive who has a a more tender sympathy for the great people of Italy than I have, and a very stern duty was presented to us when we had to consider some of the claims of Italy on the Adriatic, because strategically, from the point of view of future wars. Italy needed a military foothold on the other side of the Adriatic but her people did not live there except in little spots. It was a Slavic people, and I had to say to my Italian friends. Everywhere else in this treaty we have given territory to the people who lived on it, and I do not think that it is for the advantage of Italy 20 and I am sure it is not for the advantage of the world, to give Italy territory where other people live I felt the force of the argument for what they wanted, and it was the old argument that had always prevailed, namely, that they needed it from a military point of view and I have no doubt that if there is no league of nations they will need it from a military point of view, but if there is a league of nations, they will not need it from a military point of view

If there is no league of nations the military point of 30 view will prevail in every instance, and peace will be brought into contempt but if there is a league of na tions, Italy need not fear the fact that the shores on the other side of the Adriatic tower above the lower and sandy shores on her side of the sea because there will be no threatening guns there, and the nations of the world will have concerted, not merely to see that the Slavic peoples have their rights, but that the Italian people have their rights as well. I had rather have everybody on my side than to be armed to the teeth. Every settlement that is 40 right, every settlement that is based on the principles I have alluded to, is a safe settlement, because the sympathy of mankind will be behind it

Some gentlemen have feared with regard to the league of nations that we will be obliged to do things we do not want to do. If the treaty were wrong that might be so, but if the treaty is right, we will wish to preserve right. I think I know the heart of this great people whom I, for the time being, have the high honor to represent, better than some other men that I hear talk. I have been bred, and am proud to have been bred, in the old revolu- sc tionary school which set this Government up, when it was set up as the friend of mankind, and I know if they do not that America has never lost that vision or that purpose But I have not the slightest fear that arms will be necessary if the purpose is there. If I know that my adversary is irmed and I am not. I do not press the controversy, and if any nation entertains selfish purposes set against the principles established in this treaty, and is told by the rest of the world that it must withdraw its claims it will iot press them

The heart of this treaty then my fellow extigens, is not even that it punishes Germany. That is a temporary thing. It is that it rectifies the age-long wrongs which characterized the history of Europe. There were some of us who wished that the scope of the treaty would reach some other ige-long wrongs. It was a big job, and I do not say that we wished that it were bigger but there were other wrongs elsewhere than in Europe and of the same kind which no doubt ought to be righted, and some day will be righted but which we could not draw into a the treaty because we could deal only with the countries whom the war had engulfed and affected. But so far as the scope of our authority went, we rectified the wrongs which have been the fertile source of war in Europe

Have you ever reflected, my fellow countrymen, on the real source of revolution? Men do not start revolutions in a sudden passion. Do you remember what Thomas Carlyle said about the French Revolution? He was speaking of the so-called Hundred Days Terror which reigned not only in Paris, but throughout France, at in the days of the French Revolution, and he reminded his readers that back of that hundred days lay several hundred years of agony and of wrong. The French people had been deeply and consistently wronged by their Government robbed, their human rights disregarded, and the slow agony of those hundreds of years had after awhile gathered into a hot anger that could not be suppressed Revolutions do not spring up overnight Revo-

^{/8} Thomas Carlyle (1795-1881), Snotch escayist and historias. The passage alluded to is Chap I of Bk V of the third volume of The French Revolution (1837)

lutions come from the long suppression of the human spirit. Revolutions come because men know that they have rights and that they are disregarded; and when we think of the future of the world in connection with this treaty we must remember that one of the chief efforts of those who made this treaty was to remove that anger from the heart of great peoples, great peoples who had always been suppressed, who had always been used, and who had always been the tools in the hands of govern-10 ments, generally alien governments, not their own. The makers of the treaty knew that if these wrongs were not removed, there could be no peace in the world, because, after all, my fellow citizens, war comes from the seed of wrong and not from the seed of right. This treaty is an attempt to right the history of Europe, and, in my humble judgment, it is a measurable success. I say "measurable," my fellow citizens, because you will realize the difficulty of this

Here are two neighboring peoples. The one people 20 have not stopped at a sharp line, and the settlements of the other people or their migrations have not begun at a sharp line They have intermingled There are regions where you can not draw a national line and say there are Slavs on this side [illustrating] and Italians on that [illustrating] It can not be done You have to approximate the line You have to come as near to it as you can. and then trust to the processes of history to redistribute, it may be, the people that are on the wrong side of the line There are many such lines drawn in this treaty and 30 to be drawn in the Austrian treaty, where there are perhaps more lines of that sort than in the German treaty When we came to draw the line between the Polish people and the German people-not the line between Germany and Poland, there was no Poland, strictly speaking, but the line between the German and the Polish people—we were confronted by such problems as the disposition of districts like the eastern part of Silesia, which is called Upper Silesia because it is mountainous and the other part is not Upper Silesia is chiefly Polish, and o when we came to draw the line of what should be Poland it was necessary to include Upper Silesia if we were really going to play fair and make Poland up of the Polish peoples wherever we found them in sufficiently close neighborhood to one another, but it was not perfectly clear that Upper Silesia wanted to be part of Poland. At any rate, there were Germans in Upper Silesia who said that it did not, and therefore we did there what we did in many other places. We said, "Very well, then, we will let the people that live there decide. We will have a referendum Within a certain length of time after the 5 war, under the supervision of an international commission which will have a sufficient armed force behind it to preserve order and see that nobody interferes with the elections, we will have an absolutely free vote and Upper Silesia shall go either to Germany or to Poland, as the people in Upper Silesia prefer" That illustrates many other cases where we provided for a referendum, or a plebiscite, as they chose to call it We are going to leave it to the people themselves, as we should have done, what Government they shall live under. It is none of 60 my prerogative to allot peoples to this Government or the other. It is nobody's right to do that allotting except the people themselves, and I want to testify that this treaty is shot through with the American principle of the choice of the governed

Of course, at times it went further than we could make a practical policy of, because various peoples were keen upon getting back portions of their population which were separated from them by many miles of territory, and we could not spot the map over with little pieces of separated States. I even reminded my Italian colleagues that if they were going to claim every place where there was a large Italian population, we would have to cede New York to them, because there are more Italians in New York than in any Italian city. But I hope, I believe, that the Italians in New York City are as glad to stay there as we are to have them. But I would not have you suppose that I am intimating that my Italian colleagues entered any claim for New York City.

We of all peoples in the world, my fellow citizens, a ought to be able to understand the questions of this treaty without anybody explaining them to us, for we are made up out of all the peoples of the world. I dare say that in this audience there are representatives of practically all the people dealt with in this treaty. You do not have to have me explain national aspirations to you. You have been brought up on them. You have learned of them since you were children, and it is those national aspirations which we sought to release and give an outlet to in this great treaty.

But we did much more than that This treaty contains among other things a Magna Charta of labor-a thing 10 unheard of until this interesting year of grace. There is a whole section of the treaty devoted to arrangements by which the interests of those who labor with their hands all over the world, whether they be men or women or children, are sought to be safeguarded, and next month there is to meet the first assembly under this section of the league. Let me tell you, it will meet whether the treaty is ratified by that time or not. There is to meet an assembly which represents the inferests of laboring men throughout the world Not their political interests, there 20 is nothing political about it. It is the interests of men concerning the conditions of their labor, concerning the character of labor which women shall engage in, the character of labor which children shall be permitted to engage in, the hours of labor, and incidentally, of course, the remuneration of labor, that labor shall be remunerated in proportion, of course, to the maintenance of the standard of living, which is proper, for the man who is expected to give his whole brain and intelligence and energy to a particular task. I hear very little 30 said about the Magna Charta of labor which is embodied in this treaty. It forecasts the day which ought to have come long ago, when statesmen will realize that no nation is fortunate which is not happy and that no nation can be happy whose people are not contented, contented in their lives and fortunate in the circumstances of their lives

If I were to state what seems to me the central idea of this treaty, it would be this. It is almost a discovery in international conventions that nations do not consist of their governments but consist of their people. That is a rudimentary idea. It seems to us in America to go without saying, but, my fellow citizens, it was never the leading idea in any other international congress that I ever heard of; that is to say, any international congress made up of the representatives of governments. They were always thinking of national policy, of national advantage, of the rivalries of trade, of the advantages of territorial conquest. There is nothing of that in this treaty You will notice that even the territories which are taken away from Germany, like her colonies, are not given to so anybody. There is not a single act of annexation in this treaty Territories inhibited by people not yet to govern themselves, either because of economical or other circumstances, are put under the care of powers, who are to act as trustees-trustees responsible in the forum of the world at the bar of the league of nations, and the terms upon which they are to exercise their trusteeship are outlined. They are not to use those people by way of draft to fight their wars for them. They are not to permit any form of slavery among them, or of enforced labor. They 60 are to see to it that there are humane conditions of labor with regard not only to the women and children but to the men also. They are to establish no fortifications They are to regulate the liquor and the opium traffic They are to see to it, in other words, that the lives of the people whose care they assume-not sovereignty over whom they assume—are kept clean and safe and wholesome. There again the principle of the treaty comes out that the object of the arrangement is the welfare of the people who live there, and not the advantage of nthe trustee

It goes beyond that It seeks to gather under the common supervision of the league of nations the various instrumentalities by which the world has been trying to check the evils that were in some places debasing men, like the opium traffic like the traffic—for it was a traffic—in women and children, like the traffic in other dangerous drugs, like the traffic in arms among uncivilized people who could use arms only for their own detriment. It provides for sanitation, for the work of the Red Cross Why, those clauses, my fellow citizens, draw the hearts of the world into league draw the noble impulses of the world together and make a team of them.

I used to be told that this was an a je in which mind was monarch, and my comment was that if that was true, the mind was one of those modern monarchs that reigns and does not govern, that, as a matter of fact, we were governed by a great representative assembly made up of the human passions, and that the best we could manage was that the high and fine passions should be in so a majority so that they could control the baser passions, so that they could check the things that were wrong This treaty seeks something like that In drawing the humane endeavors of the world together it makes a league of the fine passions of the world, of its philanthropic passions, of its passion of pity, of its passion of human sympathy, of its passion of human friendliness and helpfulness, for there is such a passion. It is the passion which has lifted us along the slow road of civilization. It is the passion which has made organized government possible. It is the passion which has made justice and established it in the world.

That is the treaty Did you ever hear of it before? Did you ever know before what was in this treaty? Did anybody before ever tell you what the treaty was intended to do? I beg, my fellow citizens, that you and the rest of those Americans with whom we are happy to be associated all over this broad land will read the treaty yourselves, or, if you will not take the time to do that-for it 20 is a technical document—that you will accept the interpretation of those who made it and know what the intentions were in the making of it. I hear a great deal, my fellow citizens, about the selfishness and the selfish ambitions of other governments, and I would not be doing justice to the gifted men with whom I was associated on the other side of the water if I did not testify that the purposes that I have outlined were their purposes. We differed as to the method very often. We had discussions as to the details, but we never had any serious discussion 30 as to the principle. While we all acknowledged that the principles might perhaps in detail have been better realized, we are all back of those principles. There is a concert of mind and of purpose and of policy in the world that was never in existence before. I am not saying that by way of credit to myself or to those colleagues to whom I have alluded, because what happened to us was that we got messages from our people We were under instructions, whether they were written down or not, and we did not date come home without fulfilling those instruca tions. If I could not have brought back the kind of treaty that I did bring back, I never would have come back, because I would have been an unfaithful servant, and you would have had the right to condemn me in any way that you chose to use So that I testify that this is an American treaty not only, but it is a treaty that expresses the heart of the great peoples who were associated together in the war against Germany.

I said at the opening of this informal address, my fel low citizens, that I had come to make a report to you I want to add to that a little bit. I have not come to de- 50 bate the treaty. It speaks for itself, if you will let it. The arguments directed against it are directed against it with a radical misunderstanding of the instrument itself Therefore, I am not going anywhere to debate the treaty I am going to expound it, and I am going, as I do here, now, to-day, to urge you in every vocal method that you can use to assert the spirit of the American people in support of it Do not let men pull it down Do not let them misrepresent it Do not let them lead this Nation away from the high purposes with which this war was 67 inaugurated and fought. As I came through that line of youngsters in khaki a few minutes ago I felt that I could salute them because I had done the job in the way I promised them I would do it, and when this treaty is accepted, men in khaki will not have to cross the seas again That is the reason I believe in it

I say "when it is accepted," for it will be accepted. I have never entertained a moment's doubt of that, and the only thing I have been impatient of has been the delay It is not dangerous delay except for the temper of the peoples scattered throughout the world who are waiting Do you realize, my fellow citizens, that the whole world is waiting on America? The only country in the world that is trusted at this moment is the United States, and the peoples of the world are waiting to see whether their trust is justified or not. That has been the ground of my impatience. I knew their trust was justified, but I begrudged the time that certain gentlemen wish to take in telling them so. We shall tell them so in a voice as authentic as any voice in history and in the years a to come men will be glad to remember that they had some part in the great struggle which brought this incomparable consummation of the hopes of mankind

¹³ Did you ever hear The tone of this paragraph, although intended to be ironic, is an excellent illustration of Wilson's tendency to introduce an unfortunate professorial effect.

Herbert Clark Hoover

1874 •

Ray Lyman Wilbur and Arthur Mastick Hyde preface their The Hoover Policies with a contrast between "two clashing philosophies of government" of modern times "The first proposes to find solutions through a vast turn toward centralization of government, 'economic plan ning' with its strong measures of coercion of individuals The second proposes to accomplish the same ends within the framework of a strong local as well as Federal Government and the development of understanding and voluntary co-operative action among free men. The one drives toward personal government where the state is the master of men. The other drives toward a government of laws where men are masters of the state. The one drives toward Collectivism. The other drives toward American Individualism The former these authors who were sympathetic to Hoover claimed was the concept of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the latter the concept of Hoover Many of Hoover's supporters--and at least some of his opponents-probably would have agreed that this was a proper statement of what Hoover has stood for

Herbert Clark Hoover's life up until the time when he ran for the Presidency cultivated his firm faith in what he called 'rugged individualism. His birthplace was West Branch, Iowa, and his ancestors were pioneer Quaker stock. Orphaned before he had reached his teens, he went, at twelve, to live with an uncle on the extreme frontier in Oregon. There he worked on a farm and absorbed much of the Far Western faith in thrift and industry. Later he worked his way through Stanford University, as a clerk, a distributor of newspapers and i campus entrepreneur. In 1895, after he had acquired a degree in engineering, he went to Nevada City to work is a laborer in the mines. He left this district to become associated with a prominent California mining engineer Louis Janin. Though he started as a personal secretary he soon made such an impression that Janin began to assign him to work in mines in every part of the West In 1897, at twenty-three, he was sent to Western Australia, where he successfully directed mining opera tions in the desert country. When, two years later, he went to China to carry out a new assignment, it was at a sala v of ten thousand dollars a year. By 1902 he was ready for an executive position, first as a junior partner in a London mining firm, then later in 1908 as an independent consulting engineer with offices scattered over the face of the earth. By 1914, the man who had started his career with only a few dollars had become a rich man-one who, understandably enough, believed devoutly in private industry and enterprise

His public career, which began in 1913 when he was sent abroad to arrange for exhibits at the San Francisco Exposition, established his reputation as a man who could use efficient business methods in government. In Europe when World War I began, he accepted the chairmanship of the Commission for the Relief of Belgium. After the United States became a belligerent, he became National Food Administrator. During the Presidencies of Harding and Coolidge (1921-1928), he served as secretary of commerce. His aggressive administrator.

istration, combined with his habit of introducing engineering methods to solve economic problems, won widespread admiration.

When Coolidge "did not choose to run" for reelection in 1928, Republicans thought of Hoover as his logical successor. In the election, Hoover received 444 electoral votes to the 87 of his opponent, Al Smith Hoover, as President, continued to voice his lifelong belief in individualism, yet his administration marked the beginnings of socialized economy, and several of his measures were carried forward by the Roosevelt administration The reason was that, though he thought highly of individualistic enterprise, he was, after all, an engineer who had great faith in planning Furthermore, in 1929 and the years which followed, the United States was gripped by a devastating depression. Although Hoover firmly believed that the bad state of affairs was temporary, eventually he came to believe that action was necessary Characteristically, he attempted a fusion, both in theory and in practice, of the laissez-faire philosophy and planning He conceived of government operating to help rather than to restrain business and individual enterprise which, with slight regulation, acted for social good The creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the passage of an Emergency Relief Act and the Federal Home Loan Bank Act embodied his policy. Fearing that private and local initiative would be damaged by national measures, Hoover did not develop many federal relief measures until late in his administration. The effects of the legislation adopted had not appeared sufficient, in the opinion of the voters in 1932, and he was defeated by Franklin D Roosevelt by a large majority

After his defeat, Hoover retired to his home in Palo Alto, California He did not, however, retire from the political arena. He has continued to be a power in the Republican party; he has frequently issued statements about the world food supply, and has consistently attacked both national and international Democratic policies, in books such as The Challenge to Liberty (1934), American Ideals and the New Deal (1936), and America's Way Forward (1939) as well as in numerous speeches All of these utterances set forth Hoover's political philosophy very clearly

PART I

The Choice for Youth

Address before the Young Republican League of Colorado Colorado Springs March 7, 1936

Hoover, as a rule, has been an adequate but hardly an exciting speaker. Showing little feeling for effective sentence rhythms, he has tended to use abstract or Latinate words rather than homespun or common phrases. At times, however, he uses figures of speech with some effect (Instances in this speech are the claim that youthful opportunities were being "mortgaged" and the "spilt milking" figure). And consistently, as in this address, he has given an impression of earnest belief in his principles and of abhorrence of those of his opponents

This assembly marks the anxiety which stirs the nation Never before have our young men and women so interested themselves in public questions

It was not long since we fought a great war to "make the world safe for democracy." Hardly four years ago we accepted freedom as we accepted the air we breathed. No man thought our ideals were endangered in his lifetime. Yet now men freely propose how much of liberty we shall sacrifice. Certainly your freedom and your opportunities in life are being mortgaged.

Naturally I have been interested in the New Deal replies since I began discussion of these critical issues. The President said on January 3, 1936 "We have been specific in our affirmative action. Let them be specific in their negative attack" I have tried to be obliging

But they have made no answer to facts or chapters or verses given in proofs They, however, are not tacitum as to personal remarks. I did note that one of the New Deal spokesmen in this debate seeks to justify the violation of their platform promises by claiming that I did not hold to our platform promises. There were thirty-nine promises in the Republican platform of 1928. Of these, thirty-seven were carried out even in depression by my administration. And those fulfilled promises included upholding the Constitution and the preservation of national honor. Two secondary promises broke against the obstinacy of a Democratic Congress.

I leave research into their platform promises to well-known Democratic leaders. The examination of spilt milk is of importance it shows that certain people cannot be safely entrusted with the jug

The New Deal was not included in the Democratic platform of 1932 But the interpretation of political forces does not rest alone upon platforms. It rests also upon a knowledge of the motives and aims of men and 20 the forces they represent Eight days before that election I stated that the real intention of these men was to tinker with the currency. I said their program would raise government expenditures to nine billion a year I said it was their intention to put the government into business I said it was their intention to undermine state and local government by centralization in Washington I said it was their-intention to regiment our people and undermine the American System with imported European philosophies. That was all vociferously denied. All 30 those interpretations have come true except as to that nine billion—it was only 95 per cent correct

During the past few months I have made some further interpretations of where we are now headed I hear again from the New Deal spokesmen the old catcalls of 1932—"creating fear."

The Formulas of Revolution

For many years I have studied the tactics and techniques in European countries by which Liberty has been dethroned and dictatorship erected by men greedy for power

First they ascribed the tragic miseries of the times not to the Great War, where it belongs but to some party or class. The great phrases born from the finest emotions of mankind were used to camouflage the greed for power. They made great promises. They demanded violent action against human ills that are only slowly curable. They claimed that sporadic wickedness in high places had permeated the whole system of liberty. They shouted new destructive slogans and phrases day by day to inflame the people. They implanted unreasoning hates in the souls of men. They first grasped at power 50 through elections which Liberty provided. Then began the "must emergency instruments of power," "to save the nation." The first demands were powers of dictation over industry and agriculture and finance and labor Legislatures were reduced to rubber stamps. Honest debate was shut off in the halls of deliberation A powerful government propaganda was put on the taxpayers' bill, that hates and suspicions could be further inflamed And all of these men insisted that civilization had begun all over again when they came into power

In the final stages of European degeneration Liberty died from the waters of her own well. That was when the waters of free speech were poisoned by untruth. Then have followed the last steps to dictatorship, with suppression of freedom of speech, freedom of worship, of the courts, and all other freedoms. Men were goose-stepped in a march back to the Middle Ages.

Whether they know it or not, the New Deal has imitated the intellectual and vocal technique of typical European revolution. In the talking and legislative stages 20 they made some progress. You will recollect also the claim that even civilization came to a dead stop on March 4, 1933.

But America has not reached these final stages. Thanks to a people of a great heritage to the press and the radio, free speech still lives in America. I intend to use a little more of it tonight.

PART II

The American System of Liberty

My remarks tonight are addressed in large measure to the younger generation. It is you who will have to bear these increased burdens. It is you and your children so whose opportunities are being limited.

But far beyond that, our immense objectives upon which depend the welfare of mankind require the faith, the idealism, the courage of youth that they shall not fail. This is more than an acceptance or a rejection of the collectivist ideas and blunders of the New Deal You must carry forward. The problems of today are different from those of 3 years ago or 10 years ago.

But what sort of an America do we want? What should be our foundations? What should be our ideals?

Perhaps without immodesty I can claim to have had some experience in American life. I have lived all kinds of it. I have seen it in contrast with many countries. I lived my early boyhood on an Iowa farm. I lived it later as the ward of a country doctor in Oregon. I lived among those to whom hard work was the price of existence. The opportunities of America opened out to me the public schools. They carried me to professional training of an American university. I began by working with my own hands for my daily bread. I have tasted the despair of fruitless search for a job. I know now there was an economic depression either coming or going at that time. Nobody told me of it. So I did not have the additional worry of what the government would do about it.

But I have lived the problems of labor both as a workman and with the men who had to find the payroll. I have lived in the administration of industry with its problems of production and the well-being of men

My profession took me into many foreign lands under many kinds of government, both of free men and of tyrannies. I saw the squalor of Asia, the frozen class barriers of Europe. I was not a tourist. I was associated in their working lives and problems. I had to deal with their social systems and their governments. And everywhere to the common people America was the hope of the world.

Every yearly homecoming was again to me a proof of the glory of America. I was each time refreshed by the sight of its less grinding poverty of its greater kindliness and its greater spread of opportunity to the common man. It was more than that. It was a land of self-respect that comes alone from freedom of the spirit

I participated on behalf of America in a great war io I saw untold misery and revolution I have seen liberty die and tyranny rise. I learned of its unending calamities

I have been repeatedly placed by my countrymen where I had need to deal with the hurricanes of social and economic destruction which swept the world I have had every honor that any man could want, and I have seen the worst misery that men can produce

These experiences with all these mighty forces which influence the destiny of humanity make for humility of conclusions And I recount all this to give emphasis to one great conviction.

I believe in the American System of Liberty I believe in it from thousands of experiences. I believe that upon its foundation is the one hope of the common man. It has faults. But it contains the only real ferment of progress

There are other systems of Liberty But at the heart of our American System is embedded a great ideal unique in the world. That is the ideal that there shall be an opportunity in life, and equal opportunity, for every boy and girl, every man and woman. It holds that they have the chance to rise to any position to which so their character and ability may entitle them. That ideal is limited or ended if this nation is to be goose-stepped from Washington.

About every outstanding advance which has promoted the welfare of mankind in the last century has been born in countries of free men and women. The steam engine, electricity, automobiles, telephones, airplanes, radio, free schooling, the great advances in biology, are but part of them. J. might include the adding machine but its present use by the New Deal raises doubts as to its contribution to the welfare of mankind.

On the other hand almost every one of the world's mistakes has its origin in personal government. Violation of treaties, great wars, persecution of the Jews and other religionists, and so on down to the fantastic laws by a Must Congress, and the slaughter of pigs.

Youth and American Liberty

American young men and women should have the right to plan, to live their own lives with just one limitation—that they shall not injure their neighbors. What they want of government is to keep the channels of 80 opportunity open and equal, not to block them and then charge them for doing it. They want rewards to the winners in the race. They do not want to be planed down to a pattern. To red-blooded men and women there is joy of work and joy in the battle of competition. There is the daily joy of doing something worth while, of proving one's own worth, of telling every evil person where he can go. There is the joy of championing justice to the weak and downtrodden. These are the battles which create the national fiber of self-reliance of and self-respect. That is what made America. If you concentrate all adventure in the government it does not leave much constructive joy for the governed

In economic life there is but one hope of increased security and comfort for the common man, of opportunity for all. That is to adopt every labor-saving device. every discovery, every idea to reduce waste and the cost of producing goods. We must work our machines heartlessly but not our men. Thereby goods can be sold cheaper and more people can buy. That is the only 10 sure road to a job for every man. It is the only road to restored employment. That production of a plenty can spring alone from the initiative and enterprise of free men. That is no system of robbery. It is action for the common service. That is destroyed at once by the grotesque notion that government shall limit production

We cannot operate this world of machines and men without leadership. Competent leadership can come only by the rise of men and women in a free society by the impulse of their own ambition, character, and abilities 20 That leadership cannot come by birth, or by wealth, or be nursed like queen bees. That leadership cannot be chosen by bureaucrats. It comes from the ambition of free men and women against the polishing-wheels of competition. It comes in a system of rewards America should not be divided into the "haves" and "have nots," but into the "doers" and the "do nots"

There are those who scoff at individual liberty as of no consequence to the poor or unemployed. Yet it is alone through the creative impulses of free and con-30 fident spirits that redemption of their suffering must come. It is through them alone that social security can be attained Our job is not to pull down the great majority but to pull up those who lag behind.

PART III

Business and American Liberty

And at once we come to the relation of government to economic life. I have discussed many of its phases elsewhere On this occasion time permits me to refer only to the relations of government to business. For in this field lies a large part of the choice that youth must make

We have three alternatives

First Unregulated business

Second Government-regulated business, which I believe is the American System

Third: Government-dictated business, whether by dictation to business or by government in business. This is the New Deal choice These ideas are dipped from cauldrons of European Fascism or Socialism

Unregulated Business

While some gentlemen may not agree, we may dismiss any system of unregulated business. We know from experience that the vast tools of technology and mechanical power can be seized for purposes of oppression They so have been used to limit production and to strangle competition and opportunity $\hat{W}'\varepsilon$ can no more have economic power without checks and balances than we can have political power without checks and balances. Either one leads to tyranny

And there must be regulation of the traffic even when it is honest. We have too many people and too many devices to allow them to riot all over the streets of commerce. But a traffic policeman must only enforce the rules. He will block the traffic if he stands on the 60 corner lemanding to know their business and telling them how to run it

The American System of Regulation

I am one who believes that the only system which will preserve liberty and hold open the doors of opportunity is government-regulated business. And this is as far from government-dictated business as the two poles Democracy can regulate its citizens through law and judicial bodies. No democracy can dictate and survive as a democracy. The only way to preserve individual initiative and enterprise is for the government to make 76 the same rules for everybody and act as umpire

But if we are to preserve freedom we must face the fact that ours is a regulatory system

And let us be definite once and for all as to what we mean by a system of regulation. It looms up more clearly against the past three years

- 1 A great area of business will regulate its own prices and profits through competition. Competition is also the restless pillow of progress. But we must compel honest competition through prevention of monopolies at and unfair practices That is indirect regulation.
- 2 The semi-yet natural monopolies, such as railways and utilities, must be directly regulated as to rates to prevent the misuse of their privilege
 - 3 Banking, finance, public markets, and other functions of trust must be regulated to prevent abuse and misuse of trust.

The Choice for Youth 1139

The failure of the states, particularly New York, to do their part during the boom years has necessitated an extension of Federal action. The New Deal regulations of stock and security promotion in various aspects have the right objectives. They were hastily and poorly formed without proper consideration by Congress. But they point right

- 4 Certain groups must be appropriately regulated to prevent waste of natural resources
 - 5. Labor must have the right to free collective bargaining. But it must have responsibilities as well as rights
- 6 At one time we relied upon the theory of "shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves in three generations" to regulate over-accumulations of wealth. This is now guaranteed by our income and inheritance taxes. Some people feel these taxes take the shirt also

But there are certain principles that must run through these methods

- 1 The first principle of regulation is the least regulation that will preserve equality of opportunity and liberty itself. We cannot afford to stifle a thousand honest men in order to smother one evil person
- 2 To preserve Liberty the major burden of regulation must fall upon the States and local government But where the States hopelessly fail or when the problem grows beyond their powers we should call upon the Federal government Or we should invoke the machinery of interstate compacts
- Regulation should be by specific law, that all who run may read That alone holds open the doors of the courts to the citizen This must be "a government of laws and not of men"
- 4 And the American System of Liberty will not function solely through traffic policemen. The fundamental regulation of the nation is the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount

Incidentally, the government might regulate its own business by some of the standards it imposes on others

There are certain humanities which run through all business. As we become more experienced, more humane, as conditions change, we recognize things as abuses which we once passed over There are the abuses of slums, child-labor, sweated hours, and sweated wages. They have been diminishing for decades before the New Deal. They have not been solved yet. They must be solved. We must not be afraid to use the powers of government to eliminate them.

There will be periodic unemployment in any system 50 It is even so in the self-declared economic heavens of Socialism and Fascism With common sense we could provide insurance programs against it We could go further and prevent many causes of depressions

Out of medical and public health discoveries we have in eighty years increased the number of people over sixty years of age from four per cent to eight per cent That imposes another problem upon us

This American System has sprung from the spirit of our people. It has been developing progressively over 60 many generations. However grave its faults may be they are but marginal to a great area of human wellbeing. The test of a system is its comparative results with others and whether it has the impulses within to cure its faults. This system based on ordered liberty alone answers these tests.

The doors of opportunity cannot be held open by inaction That is an ideal that must be incessantly fought for These doors are partly closed by every gentleman who 70 hatches some special privilege. They are closed to somebody by every betrayal of trust. But because brickbats can be used for murder we do not need stop building houses. These doors are partly shut by every needless bureaucrat. And there is the tax collector. He stands today right in the door.

Every new invention, every new idea, every new war shifts and changes our economic life That greatest instrument of American joy, the automobile, has in twenty years shifted regulation in a hundred directions

Many obstructions and abuses have been added by the New Deal Many of them are older but no worse While the inspiration to reform comes from the human heart, it is achieved only by the intellect Enthusiastic hearts have flooded us with illusions Ideals without illusions are good Ideals with illusions are no good You may remember that youth with a banner of strange device Was it "Excelsior" or was it "Planned economy"? He froze to death

PART IV

Government-Dictated Economic Life

Young men and women have grave need to look into $_{90}$ this New Deal alternative to our American System

If anyone does not believe there is a bite in that innocent term "Planned Economy," he might re-read this paragraph from one of the leading New Deal spokesmen:

"It is . . a logical impossibility to have a planned economy and to have business operating its industries, just as it is also impossible to have one within our present constitutional and statutory structure. Modifications in both, so serious as to mean destruction and to re-beginning are required."

That is involved language but if it means anything at means that both private business and the Constitution must be modified so seriously as to mean destruction and re-beginning

The President, far from repudiating these ideas has continuously supported "Planned Feonomy" (1) one occasion he said, ". All of the proposals and all of the legislation since the fourth of March have not been just a collection of haphazard schemes but rather the orderly component parts of a connected and logical whole

The Supreme Court has removed some ten of these component parts. And rather than have the score raised to thirteen before an election we have seen three more quietly removed. However, if the New Deal is reelected they will be found to have a lot of spare parts.

Do not mistake The choice is still yours. But the New Deal has no choice The New Deal is committed to drive ahead for government dictation of our economic life. It is committed by a thousand statements, by a thousand actions. It is committed by the supporters upon whom it is dependent.

The President assures them "we will not retreat" They did mention a breathing spell. A spell is a very limited period

I have spoken at length upon these subjects elsewhere, but I may remind you of a few examples of the choice that the New Deal offers to youth. Under that 'connected and logical whole" a man could be fined and sent to jail for starting a new business of his own for refusing to sell his own products as directed, for not reducing his production, for increasing his production if his energies found a market, for selling at prices below his competitors, or for having 101 gold dollars.

Also you might note that when you ask the man with a profit and loss motive for a job, he asks just one thing "Can you do the job?" When you ask the government for a job, your ability is second to your politics, your delivery of votes and your affiliations generally That is not equality of opportunity

And what of this managed currency and this managed so credit, which threaten Liberty and opportunity with the poison of inflation? What of this governmentally raised cost of living? What of all this continued waste and folly wrought in the name of relief? What of the folly of these purchases of foreign silver? What of the debauchery of the Civil Service and the politics in relief?

What of the taxes that will once from this spending and debt all your lives?

Do not mistake. The new taxes of today are but part to of them. More of them are as inevitable as the first of the month. The only alternatives are repudation or inflation. No matter what nonsense you are told about corporations and the rich paying the bill, there will be two-thirds of it for the common man to pay after the corporations and the rich are sucked diff.

Taxation enslaves as well as diestorship. Every increased dollar in taxes is a limitation upon your opportunities. It means you have to work that many days more for the government instead of for your own ad 20 vancement. Your fireside talks in the future will be with the tax collector.

And where do we get to after all this attempt to supplant the American System? At the time of the election day in 1932 the American Federation of Labor reported 11,600,000 unemployed. Today, after three years of the New Deal, they report 11,000,000 unemployed. To get these people back to their jobs was the outstanding job of our government. It was the excuse given for all these doings. But the grim fact by remains that it has failed in its primary purpose. And fifteen billion dollars will be idded to the national debt before the New Deal is over.

PART V

What Is Real Liberalism?

We hear much as to who is a Tory, a Peactionary, a Conservative, a Liberel, or a Radical These terms when used honestly reflect an attitude of mind. The political use of them was imported from England. They do not fit well in America. However, they have certain advantages. You can elect yourself to any one of these groups if you say it often chough. If you do not like any-50 body you can consign him to the one which is most hated by your listener.

Taking a compound of definitions coming out of Washington, the impression would be that the Tories do the money-changing. The Reactionaries are members of well-warmed and well-stocked clubs The Conservatives are greedily trying to keep their jobs and their savings. The Liberals have the exclusive right to define the opinions of others The Radicals do not know what to do but do it in every direction

As a matter of serious fact, these terms have been used mostly for camouflage and for political assassination

The natural choice of youth is toward true liberalism. True liberalism seeks all legitimate freedom first, in the confident belief that without such freedom the pursuit of other blessings is in vain. Liberalism is a force true of the spirit, proceeding from the deep realization that economic freedom cannot be sacrificed if political freedom is to be preserved.

It is a false liberalism that interprets itself into dictation by government. Every step in that direction crushes the very roots of liberalism. It is the road not to liberty but to less liberty. The spirit of liberalism is to create free men. It is not the regimentation of men. It is not the extension of bureaucracy. You cannot extend the mastery of government over the daily life of a people without somewhere making it master of people's souls and thoughts.

Today, however, the term Liberal is claimed by every sect that would limit human freedom and stagnate the human soul—whether they be Fascists, Socialists, Communists, Epics, or New Dealers.

This misuse of English political terms is used to cover the confusion of thought that pumps from the New Deal Yet our American problems cut squarely across such muddy classification

If an open mind, free to search for the truth and apply it in government, is liberal, then you should be liberal

If belief in open opportunity and equal opportunity has become conservative, then you should be conservative

If belief that this can be held only in a society of orderly individual initiative and enterprise is conservative, then you should be conservative.

If opposition to those things which abuse and limit equal opportunity, such as privilege, monopolies, exploitation, or oppression whether in business or in government, is liberal, then you should be liberal.

If opposition to managed economy whether of the So- $_{50}$ cialist, Fascist, or New Deal pattern is Tory, then you should be Tory

If the humane action to eliminate such abominations as slum squalor, child labor, and sweated labor, to give greater protection from unemployment and old age is radical, then you should be radical

If the use of all the powers of the government to relieve our people from hunger and cold in calamity is radical, then you should be radical

If belief in the old-fashioned virtues of self-reliance, of thrift, government economy, of a balanced budget, of a stable currency, of fidelity of government to its obligations is reactionary, then you should be reactionary.

If holding to the Bill of Rights with its safeguards of the balance of powers and local government is Tory, then you should be Tory

If demand that change in the Constitution be by open submission to the people and not by subterfuge constitutes reaction, then again you should be reactionary

If demand that we have a government of laws and 70 not of bureaucrats is conservative, then you should be conservative

If you agree with all this, then you have shed yourselves of many "isms" or you have melted them into plain Americanism

If you add to that a belief in decency of Americans, a conception of spiritual prosperity, and a faith in the gleatness of America, you will have lifted these realities to the realms of idealism

But it all sums up to this—whether the choice of 80 youth will be to carry on that liberty for which Americans have died upon a thousand battlefields.

PART VI

Expanding Opportunities of Youth

I hear much that new opportunity for youth is gone. It occurs to me that for 150 years God-fearing people under the blessings of freedom built up quite a plant and equipment on this continent. It teems with millions of farms and homes and cattle and pigs, despite the AAA. There are railroads, highways, power plants and factories, stores and banks, and money-changers. There are towns and magnificent cities. There are newspapers, colleges, 50 libraries, orchestras, bands, radios, and other noises. It is very sad, but did it ever occur to you that all the people who live in these houses, and all those who run this complicated machine are going to die? Just as sure as death the job is yours. And there are opportunities in every inch of it

The New Deal would dim your dreams of new adventure by telling you that there is nothing to do any more but run the old plant. The President on one occasion stated "Our industrial plant is built. Our last frontier has been reached. Our task now is the sober, less dramatic business of administering the resources and plants already in hand, etc. That no doubt excepts the new government plants.

As a matter of fact, science and invention during even these troubled years since the war have given us further mighty powers of progress. These inventions will create a thousand new frontiers. You have the blood and the urge of you. American forebears. You are as good stuff as they. You are better trained and equipped than they were. I have no doubt of your character and your resolution. I know American youth is champing at the bit to take advantage of an opening world. From that, if we preserve the American System of hoerty, we could have a century of glorious opportunity to every young main and woman. We could have a century of unparalleled progress to the nation.

President Roosevelt's New Foreign Policies

The Great Debate over American foreign policy was reaching its height when Hoover addressed the Council on Foreign Relations in Chicago, February 1, 1939 Hoover spoke for more than Republicans, he spoke for millions of Americans who, quite aside from party lines, sincerely felt that the country could best save itself and serve the world by avoiding involvement in a war against Germany, Japan, and Italy The debate came to a dramatic end with the bombing of Pearl Harbor

I wish to talk on peace. We are deluged with talk of war. Our minds are being, prepared to accept war as inevitable. We need to keep our heads.

And I say this as one who in positions of responsibility saw every stage in the development of the last war. And I have seen the bitterness of its failure to bring blessings to mankind.

I have no need to recite the malevolent forces rampant in the world. In twenty nations desperate peoples have surrendered personal liberty for some form of authoritarian government. They are placing their trust in dictatorship clothed in new ideologies of Utopia. Some of them are making war or are aggressively threatening other nations. The world is taut with fear. Five times more men are under arms than before the Great War.

We in America are indignant at the brutalities of these systems and their cruel wrongs to minorities. We are fearful of the penetration of their ideologies. We are alarmed at their military preparations and their aggressiveness.

Their neighboring democracies are consciously or unconsciously flooding us with propaganda that we, too, are in danger, that we will inevitably be drawn in

We have need to strip emotion from these questions as much as we can. They are questions of life or death not only to men but also to nations.

We have need to appraise coolly these dangers. We have need of sober analytical debate upon the policies of government toward them. We must do so without partisanship

Our Foreign Policies

Amid these agitations, President Roosevelt has now announced a new departure in foreign policies

Beginning with his suggestion of fourteen months ago of quarantining dictatorships, he now states. We have learned that God-fearing democracies. cannot forever let pass without effective protest acts of aggression against sister nations. There are many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective that more words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people."

Mr Roosevelt has also proposed to the country a huge

34 quarantining dictatorships, a reference to Roosevell's speech of October 5, 1937 (see p. 1156) increase in our already large armament. Under his plans we are on the way to become possibly the largest naval power and certainly the largest air power in the world

Let me say at once that if our defense requires it every American will willingly bear that burden though it contributes to lower the standard of living of every American and though it plunges us further into debt

It does mean an increase in our military expenditure from 650 millions of only six years ago to 1400 or 1500 millions next year

But the proper degree of our military prepatedness depends first upon what our foreign policies are to be, and second, upon where and from what our dangers come. When these are determined then the size of our armameni is for our Army and Navy experts to say. Without these determinations they can give no competent advice.

Our foreign policies in these major dimensions must be determined by the American people and the Congress, 20 not by the President alone. The citizens can also in some degree appraise our dangers. After all it is the people who are made poor and who sacrifice their lives and the lives of their sons.

Our Traditional Policies

For a hundred and thirty years before the Great War and since we rejected the League of Nations our foreign policies have been simple and emphatic

First, to keep out of foreign entanglements and other peoples' wars, not to interfere in the affairs of other nations

Second, our armament is for defense, not aggression Third, that defense to include the Western Hemisphere by enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine

Fourth, to protect by force if necessary the lives of Americans who are of necessity abroad, but to depend upon the peaceful processes of negotiation to protect their rights and property.

Fifth, to cooperate in peaceful movements to promote peace and in economic movements to promote world prosperity. And to insist that neither by spirit nor action do we imply either military or economic force for these purposes.

Sixth Under the recent Neutrality Law we presumably prohibit the purchase of arms in the United States by other nations while actually at war, together with some restrictions upon credit and travel. Such purchases are without restrictions until we declare that a war exists. And let me say parenthetically that this arms provision needs immediate revision. In effect it compels us to take sides rather than be neutral.

I believe these are the full dimensions of American $_{50}$ policies that have been approved by the American people up to now.

Mr. Roosevelt's New Expansion of Foreign Policies

Mr Roosevelt now proposes to expand these policies. The sum of his proposal is that we make effective protest at acts of aggression against sister nations. He says we must use methods stronger than words and short of war. He asks for armament to back his extensions. As Daniel Webster said in his reply to Hayne, "Let me run the honorable gentleman's doctrine a little into its practical application."

First The only known effective methods short of war and more than words are that we either support one side with supplies of food, raw materials, finance and munitions, or that we deny these to the other side by embargues, boycotts or other economic sanctions

Second The aggressions against sister nations that Mr Roosevelt is discussing are not alone in the Western Hemisphere They are in reality aggressions across the Atlantic and the Pacific, in Europe and Asia

Third This new policy means that we are to deter- 70 mine who are the aggressors in the world

The determination of the who and when of aggression sounds easy. It sometimes is easy. But if one examines the history of the world the distinction between legitimate expansion and wicked aggression becomes confused The League of Nations after some years of effort failed to find even a definition of aggressor. We are to set ourselves up as the oracle of righteousness in age-old quarrels that began before our nation was born A large part of the United States was the result of aggression 80 under any definition, likewise parts of the British Empire and France The world will not remain static, for the pressures of populations, economic life, and defense are not static forces In any event, it does not seem to be a 10b that America should undertake More especially as each case must needs be debated in Congress and divided by the emotions of our racial origins

Fourth. These proposals to use some sort of coercion against nations are of course a complete departure from neutrality in other peoples' wars. It is the method of coercion, not persuasion. It is in direct violation of Secretary Hull's reaffirmation, on which the ink is but sixty days dry, of an old American policy that the intervention of any state in the internal and external affairs of another is inadmissible."

Fifth Such measures are obviously furtle unless un10 dertaken in cooperation with other nations. Without 10 joint action supplies of food or oil or cotton or munitions 12 can be obtained elsewhere. And joint action means at 13 least temporary alliances with countries in Europe or 14 Asia

Sixth. Such policies are provocative of reprisals and must be backed by armament far beyond that required for defense of the Western Hemisphere. It we are to provoke we must be prepared to enforce Seventh Economic pressures inevitably run into pres-20 sures upon civil populations. Civil populations are mostly women and children. The morals of starvation by force rank no higher than killing from the air.

Eighth Any nation which sets up such policies and builds an armament of dimensions to back them is sure to arouse fear. This idea of America sitting alone determining who and what in the world shall stop and go would make us suspect of the whole world. It is certain that combinations of power will arise against a nation which does that, no matter how good-neighborly its 30 words may be

Let me say at once that any form of direct or indirect coercion of nations is force and is the straight path to war itself. No husky nation will stand such pressures without bloody resistance

Those who think in terms of economic sanctions should also think in terms of war

It will be said that these measures will preserve peace, that if nations know we will throw our weight into the balance they will not transgress on others. That is worldwide power politics. That is the exact theory of joining in the balance of power throughout the world. That setting has in the long and tragic history of Europe inevitably exploded in war.

All this becomes the most momentous change in American policies of peace and war since we entered the Great War. Moreover the European democracies have accepted it as a complete change of national policy by the United States—If it is not a proposal to change radically our policies then they are under a misapprehension

But to determine the issue, let me propose some questions that the American people deserve to have answered

- 1 Shall we reverse our traditional policies at this time?
- 2. Shall we set ourselves up to determine who the aggressor is in the world?
- 3 Shall we engage in embargoes, boycotts, economic sanctions against aggressor nations?
- 4 Shall we do this where the Western Hemisphere is not attacked?
- 5 Shall we provide an airmament greater than that necessary to protect the Western Hemisphere from military invasion?
- 6 Shall we take collective action with other nations to make these more than words and short of war policies effective?
 - 7 Are we to be the policemen of the world?

Certainly it is due to Mr. Roosevelt to the Congress, and to the American people that we know exactly what all this means. The Congress should have this adventure in clarified before we go blindly into great increases in armament.

The Dangers of the Western Hemisphere

Before we answer these questions and before we venture into these paths of force and conflict, even short of war, we should realistically examine how serious the so-called imminent dangers are from aggressive nations

Our dangers are obviously in two forms—the penetration of their ideologies which would destroy democracies and their military aggressiveness

And their military aggressiveness has to be appraised 86 in two aspects. Lirst the direct dangers to the Western Hemisphere, and second, our further concern in the dangers to our sister democracies in Europe and Asia.

Penetration of Ideologies

The first segment of this danger is the ideologies. The penetration of these ideologies, whether it be the Communism of Russia, the National Socialism of Germany, or the Fascism of Italy, is an internal problem for each country where they penetrate. Ideas cannot be cured with battleships or aeroplanes. I say this as I do not assume that we intend to attack dictators or extirpate ideologies in their home sources. That would lead the world to worse destruction than the religious wars of the Middle Ages

Our job of defense against these un-American ideologies is to eliminate Communist, Socialist and Fascist ideas and persons from our own institutions. It is to in maintain the ideals of free men, which make this unprofitable soil for such alien seed.

I am confident that if the lamp of liberty can be kept alight these ideologies will yet die of their own falsity. They spring not from moral and spiritual inspirations but from the cupidity of men. In any event no additional appropriations for arms will settle those problems.

The Military Dangers

The second segment of danger is that of military attack of the dictatorships upon democracies

And we may first explore the imminent dangers of 20 military attack upon the Western Democracies. And again we should consider it in the light of realism rather than the irritating words that emanate from world capitals.

Our people must realize that even if there were no dictators present, the blunders in the peace treaties, the pressures of population, the impoverishment of peoples will create periodic European crises. That has been the history of Europe since long before America was born

As terrifying as these crises look in the morning paper, there are more realistic pressures for peaceful adjust-30 ments than for war

Since the Great War land fortifications for defense have increased in power faster than offensive land weapons. The dictatorships know that if they were to attack the Western Democracies they would probably find their land and sea defenses impregnable. Attack from the air offers hideous destruction, but it also brings sobering reprisals. It stiffens resolution and it does not capture capital cities. It is my belief that the Western Democracies of Europe can amply defend themselves against military attack.

And in this connection we must not close our eyes to one condition under which the American people, disregarding all other questions, might join in European war We are a humane people, and our humanity can be overstrained by brutality. That was one of the causes of our entry into the last war. For instance, if wholesale attack were made upon women and children by the deliberate destruction of cities from the air, then the indignation of the American people could not be restrained from action

I do not believe officials of any nation have become so 50 foolish or dare the depth of barbarism of such an undertaking. The indignation in the United States today at such killings in Spain and China, where it is excused as the accident of attempts to demoralize munitions supply, should be warning of the temper which would be raised

There are other realistic forces which weigh against military attack by the Dictatorships on the Democracies Despite various so-called "demands" the Dictatorships are in reality mainly interested elsewhere. The face of Germany is turned more East than toward Western Europe. The face of Japan is turned West into Asia. The Russians are amply engaged at home. The Italians claim grievances with England and France arising out of the treaties under which they came into the Great War, but these are not impossible of solution.

Beyond all this, every one of the totalitarian states has its own grave internal weaknesses

Above all, the common people in no country in Europe want war They are terrified of it

Do not think I believe the situation is not dangerous 70 in Europe Far from it. But it is not so imminent as the speeches abroad might make it appear. And what is not imminent is often preventable.

Obviously our dangers are much less than those of the overseas democracies. The Western Hemisphere is still protected by a moat of 3000 miles of ocean on the East and 6000 miles on the West. No aeroplane has yet been built that can come one-third the way across the Atlantic and one-fifth of the way across the Pacific with destructive bombs and fly home again. In any event, these dictatorships have nothing to gain by coming 3000 miles or 6000 miles to attack the Western Hemisphere. So long as our defenses are maintained they have everything to lose

That any of these dictatorships, whether Japan, Germany, Italy, or Russia, or all of them together, have the remotest idea of military attack upon the Western Hemisphere is sheer hysteria

It will be said that we must be prepared to go across the seas and enforce lawful rights for American trade by military action. I do not agree with that thesis. There always comes a time, with patience, when such ends can be accomplished by the processes of peace.

Some Ultimate Possible Consequences

There are other tactors that we need to consider also before we decide to use force beyond protection of the Western Hemisphere. We must not refuse to look at the possible ultimates before we start down these paths

If we join with force in Europe or Asia, even though it be short of war, we must consider its consequences should it lead to war. For that is the most probable result. The call to join is based upon the preservation of human liberty in the world. Our first purpose is to maintain liberty in America. It civilization based on liberty fails in the United States it is gone from the earth. We must safeguard that, not only in our own interest but in the interest of the world.

Personal liberty and free economic life are not built for modern war. A great war today is a mobilization of the whole people. That means democracy must temporarily surrender to dictatorship, no matter what one may call it, in order that we may bend our full energies to war

It means that our country must be mobilized into practically a Fascist state. It would be so organized. It went some distance in the last Great War, although we did not use that term at the time. It would have gone much farther if the war had extended longer.

I speak of this not from hearsay but as one who participated in the economic organization of the Great War 30 I saw the rise of opposition to demobilization of the interests which benefited But we secured the immediate and courageous demobilization of this economic power over the daily lives of our people because of the backing of a real lover of human liberty—Woodrow Wilson

Today the lowered vitality of free enterprise, the necessity to subordinate or repudiate our enormous peacetime national debt to make way for finance of a new war, together with the ideas of economic power which impregnate our government, all drive to the improbability of after-war demobilization of centralized power

If it were that or the loss of our national independence it would not be too great a price. But let us at least recognize that a war to save liberty would probably destrov liberty. In my view another great war will make dictatorship universal

Even if we escaped this result, yet the sacrifice of our sons and the moral and economic destruction are a bitter prospect to contemplate. Surely we learned this from the last war. As we look back over our participation in that war there is still another cup of bitterness America so can make war but we cannot make permanent peace in Furope or Asia. The peace after the Great War sowed the diagons teeth whose growth confronts us today

Conclusion

And now a word in conclusion. As a nation we must veigh all these experiences, these forces and factors as best we can. We may not agree upon the importance to lay upon any one of them. But from the total of them it is my belief that at this time the country should say an emphatic. No to the questions of chritication which I have proposed above.

This world can never reach peace by threats and force. If this is to be the blind leadership of men, nothing can save the world from a cartistrophe to civilization.

No nation has alone built this civilization. We all live by heritages which have been critiched by every nation and every century. And to save this civilization there must be a changed attitude of men. Our country standing apart can make a contribution of transcendent service in holding aloft the banner of moral relationships.

If we are to hold that banner of morals aloft the people 70 of America should express unhesitatingly their indignation against wrong and persecution. They should extend aid to the suffering

We should not be isolationists in promoting peace by the methods of peace. We should not be isolationists in proposals to join in the most healing of all processes of peace—economic cooperation to restore prosperity.

But surely all reason, all history all our own experience show that wrongs cannot be righted and durable peace cannot be imposed on nations by force, threats, economic pressures, or war. I want America to stand against that principle if it is the last natio, under that banner. I want it to stand there because it is the only hope of preserving liberty on this continent.

That is America's greatest service to mankind

Franklin Delano Roosevelt

1882 · 1945

Constantly, between 1932 and 1945, Franklin Delano Roosevelt was bitterly attacked by his opponents and enthusiastically praised by his adherents. His opponents called him a dictator, a destroyer of our capitalistic society, a warmonger. His adherents claimed that he was a great democratic leader, a preserver of free enterprise and protector of the weak. Even Roosevelt's death in 1945 did not end the fierce dispute, and it was clear that many years would have to pass before history could render an impartial verdict. Yet none denied that Roosevelt, for better or worse, had wielded tremendous influence upon the history of the world in his time.

The background of Franklin Delano Roosevelt was a rather unusual one for a political leader in recent times. His birthplace was a family estate in Hyde Park, New York, and his family was patrician and well-to-do. He was educated in Europe, in an exclusive private school—Groton, at Harvard, and in the Columbia law school. In 1905, while still in law school, he married Eleanor Roosevelt, his distant cousin, a niece of Theodore Roosevelt. The marriage was described in detail in the newspapers because it was a match between members of old families, the headmaster of Groton officiated, and President Theodore Roosevelt himself gave away the bride.

After admission to the bar, Franklin Roosevelt practiced in New York for a time. His political career began in 1910 when he was persuaded to run for state senator in the "silk stocking" Dutchess County District, which included Hyde Park. He campaigned energetically and was elected. As a legislator, he won state-wide attention by taking a stand against the New York political machine, and won reelection. When Woodrow Wilson became a Presidential candidate, he was one of the few New York delegates who staunchly supported him in the convention. He was rewarded by an appointment to an assistant secretaryship in the navy (1913-1921) and became a nationally known political figure. His association in Washington with such liberal leaders as Wilson, Bryan, and Daniels developed his political philosophy. In 1920, he was a vice-presidential candidate, but he and his running-mate, James M. Cox, were defeated

At this point, Roosevelt's career in politics might well have ended, since a defeated vice-presidential candidate might easily have been forgotten. The likelihood appeared to be increased when, in 1921, he was stricken with infantile paralysis, a disease which threatened him with death or with inaction throughout the rest of his life. His conquest over his illness was a remarkable achievement. "Once," he said later, "I spent two years lying in bed, trying to move my big toe. That was the hardest job I ever had to do. After that, anything else seems easy."

As if to establish the point, despite the lameness resulting from his sickness he became increasingly active in law, in business, and in politics. The battle with disease had given him time to study books and documents on political problems and to write many letters to fellow Democrats, and as a result he had become both well-informed and widely known when, in 1924, he made the convention speech nominating Al Smith as candidate for the Presidency In 1928 he was elected governor of New York, a state in the national limelight and a state, furthermore, which decides 45 electoral votes, when, therefore, he was reelected, in 1930, he became a logical contender for the Presidential nomination From the beginning Roosevelt excited controversy Many competent observers considered him unpromising material Walter Lippmann, a much respected newspaper commentator, called him "an amiable man with many philanthropic impulses who, without any important qualification for the office, would very much like to be president" Others maintained that as governor of New York he had been a much-needed progressive force toward social legislation. He was elected partly, of course, because of the ardent desire of the electorate to replace Hoover, whom they held responsible for the ills of the country Partly responsible for his election was a vigorous nation wide campaign during which many vorers were won over by his extraordinary personal magnetism.

His first term showed that he was capable of proposing extreme measures in an attempt to end the greatest depression in history and capable, too, of bringing about their enactment. He seemed to thrive upon controvers, he had a genius for practical politics, and when he chose to appeal for popular support in one of his radio "fueside chats" his eloquent voice was often extraordinative effective. The New Deal was eventually implemented, therefore, by a series of measures designed to stabilize commercial institutions, to encourage agriculture to administer relief, and to modify the political and economic structure of the country. The nation showed its approval of Roosevelt's domestic policies by reelecting him in 1936.

During Roosevelt's second term, additional measures similar to those of the first term were passed. During this term, too, he, among others, began to discern distressing signs of international trouble, and as early as 1937, his so-called "quarantine address' in Chicago (p. 1156) emphasized the danger. By 1940 Europe was embroiled in war, and international as well as domestic issues were stressed in the campaign that year. When he was victorious over Wendell Willkie. Roosevelt became the first man ever elected to a third term. Domestic issues yielded the place of primary importance to international issues Roosevelt hastened the strengthening of our armed forces, and urged increasing aid to Britain and then to Russia The attack on Pearl Harbor, followed by declarations of war, put an end to all national hesitation. Roosevelt became an international as well as a national leader as the United States joined her allies in a concerted assault. Supplies, aircraft, arms, and men poured across the Atlantic and the Pacific. In 1944 the nation indicated its approvid of Roosevelt's wartime administration by electing him to his fourth term. He died in the spring of 1945 a few months before Germany and Japan capitulated.

A descendant of an old and wealthy family, Roosevelt often proclaimed his enmity to privileged groups and his friendship to the 'Forgotten Min, and urged meisures in accord with these attitudes. Roosevelt therefore was disliked by many who considered him a traitor to his class. A canny politician, gifted with personal charm, he was also opposed by those who considered lem a slick finagler bent upon guning power. A proponent of a planned economy he was attacked by many for his 'socialistic tendencies. His supporters, many of them as familied as his most bitter enemies, held that he was leading a crusade for the many against the few who had disproportion ite powers and privileges. Thus the nation irgued about his domestic pelicies. In the argument about foreign affairs some saw him as a catspaw--i dupe--of other countries needlessly involving his nation in foreign controversies with which it should have no concern. Others, by contrast, saw him as a far-sighted leader who wisely perceived that the United States was destined to take its full part in the affairs of the world Thus, in times of bitter controversy. Roosevelt became a symbol for certain domestic and certain international attitudes. No other President including even Jackson and Lincoln, was the object of so much dislike and so much affection during his lifetime

Progressive Government

In September 1932, when Franklin Roosevelt gave the following address in San Francisco, the United States was suffering from the most severe economic depression the country had ever known. Factories by the hundred were closed or closing, millions of workers were unemployed and uncertain of food and shelter, farmers in frightening numbers were losing their lands in foreclosures as their markets faded—or were openly resisting officers of the law attempting to exict them. Pessimism mounting to despair was the American mood, and the nation was indeed in crisis.

Against this backdrop the Presidential contest between Herbert Hoover and Franklin Roosevelt became a conflict which voters followed with passionate interest. Mr. Hoover earnestly sought recovery in what he considered the traditional "American Way" of relatively unrestricted private enterprise, which was certainly under challenge by the developments of the day and which his personal manner, not particularly well suited to radio or newsreel, did not help to make more appealing. Mr Roosevelt espoused a "New Deal" for the "Forgotten Man," stressing redefinitions of basic American concepts, a greater rôle for government in economic affairs. He added an optimism. a warm smile, and a remarkable personal magnetism to the attraction of a philosophy toward which many in his audiences, victims of the times, were already predisposed. With such speeches as the following, Mr Roosevelt won the election by an overwhelming majority Seldom if ever did President Roosevelt, even in later years, set forth his philosophy more clearly or completely than in "Progressive Government "

My friends:

I count it a privilege to be invited to address the Commonwealth Club. It has stood in the life of this city and State, and it is perhaps accurate to add, the Nation, as a group of citizen leaders interested in fundamental problems of Government, and chiefly concerned with achievement of progress in Government through non-partisan means. The privilege of addressing you, therefore, in the heat of a political campaign, is great. I want to respond to your courtesy in terms consistent with your policy.

I want to speak nor of politics but of Government I want to speak not of parties, but of universal principles. They are not political, except in that larger sense in which a great American once expressed a definition of politics, that nothing in all of human life is foreign to the science of politics.

I do want to give you, however, a recollection of a long life spent for a large part in public office. Some of my conclusions and observations have been deeply accentuated in these past few weeks. I have traveled far—from Albany to the Golden Gate. I have seen many people, and heard many things, and today, when in a sense my journey has reached the half-way mark. I am glad of the opportunity to discuss with you what it all means to me.

Sometimes, my friends, particularly in years such as these, the hand of discouragement falls upon us. It seems that things are in a rut, fixed, settled, that the world has grown old and tired and very much out of joint. This 30 is the mood of depression, of dire and weary depression.

But then we look around us in America, and everything tells us that we are wrong America is new. It is in the process of change and development. It has the great potentialities of youth, and particularly is this true of the great West, and of this coast, and of California

I would not have you feel that I regard this as in any sense a new community. I have traveled in many parts of the world, but never have I felt the arresting thought of the change and development more than here, where 40 the old, mystic East would seem to be near to us, where the currents of life and thought and commerce of the whole world meet us. This factor alone is sufficient to cause man to stop and think of the deeper meaning of things, when he stands in this community.

But more than that, I appreciate that the membership of this club consists of men who are thinking in terms beyond the immediate present, beyond their own immediate tasks, beyond their own individual interests. I want to invite you, therefore, to consider with me in the so large, some of the relationships of Government and economic life that go deeply into our daily lives, our happiness, our future and our security.

The issue of Government has always been whether individual men and women will have to serve some system of Government or economics, or whether a system of Government and economics exists to serve individual men and women. This question has persistently dominated the discussion of Government for many generations. On questions relating to these things men 60 have 'differed, and for time immemorial it is probable that honest men will continue to differ

The final word belongs to no man, yet we can still believe in change and in progress Democracy, as a dear old friend of mine in Indiana, Meredith Nicholson, has called it, is a quest, a never-ending seeking for better things, and in the seeking for these things and the striving for them, there are many roads to follow But, if we map the course of these roads, we find that there are only two general directions

When we look about us, we are likely to forget how

⁶⁵ Meredith Nicholson (1866-), an Indiana novelist, was to serve as minister to Paraguay, to Venezuela, and to Nicaragua during Roosevelt's Presidency hard people have worked to win the privilege of Government. The growth of the national Governments of Europe was the struggle for the development of a centralized force in the Nation, strong enough to impose peace upon ruling barons. In many instances the virtory of the central Government, the creation of a strong central Government, was a haven of refuge to the individual The people preferred the master far away to the exploitation and cruelty of the smaller master near at hand But the creators of national Government were perforce ruthless men They were often cruel in their methods, but they did strive steadily toward something that society needed and very much wanted a strong central State able to keep the peace, to stamp our civil war, to put the unruly nobleman in his place, and to permit the bulk of individuals to live safely. The man of ruthless force had his place in developing a pioneer country, just as he did in fixing the power of the central Government in the development of Nations So-20 ciety paid him well for his services and its development When the development among the Nations of Europe however, had been completed, ambition and ruthlessness, having served their term, tended to overstep their mark

There came a growing feeling that Government was conducted for the benefit of a few who thrived unduly at the expense of all. The people sought a balancing—a limiting force. There came gradually through town councils, trade guilds, national parliaments by constitution 30 and by popular participation and control, limitations on arbitrary power.

Another factor that tended to limit the power of those who ruled, was the rise of the ethical conception that a ruler bore a responsibility for the welfare of his subjects

The American colonies were born in this struggle. The American Revolution was a turning point in it. After the Revolution the struggle continued and shaped itself in the public life of the country. There were those who because they had seen the confusion which attended the years of war for American independence surrendered to the belief that popular Government was essentially dangerous and essentially unworkable. They were honest people, my friends, and we cannot deny that their experience had warranted some measure of fear. The most brilliant, honest and able expone it of this point of view was Hamilton. He was too impatient of slow-moving methods. Fundamentally he believed that the safety of the republic lav in the autocratic strength of its Government, that the destiny of individuals was to serve that Government, and that fundamentally a great and 50 strong group of central institutions, guided by a small group of able and public spirited citizens, could best direct all Government.

But Mr Jefferson, in the summer of 1776, after drafting the Declaration of Independence rurned his mind to the same problem and took a different view He did not deceive himself with outward forms. Government to him was a means to an end, not an end in uself, it might be either a refuge and a help or a threat and a danger, depending on the circumstances. We find ac him carefully analyzing the society for which he was to organize a Government. We have no paupers. The great mass of our population is of laborers, our rich who cannot live without labor, either manual or professional, being few and of moderate wealth. Most of the laboring class possess property, cultivate their own lands, have families and from the demand for their labor, are enabled to exact from the rich and the competent such prices as enable them to feed abundently, clothe above mere decency, to labor moderately and raise their families 1/20

These people he considered had two sets of rights those of "personal competency and those involved in acquiring and possessing property. By "personal competency" he meant the right of free thinking, freedom of forming and expressing opinions, and freedom of forming and expressing opinions, and freedom of personal living, each man according to his own lights. To insure the first set of rights a Government must so order its functions as not to interfere with the individual. But even Jefferson realized that the exercise of the property rights might so interfere with the rights of the individual that the Government, without whose assistance the property rights could not exist must intervene not to destroy individualism, but to protect it.

You are familiar with the great political duel which followed, and how Hamilton and his friends building toward a dominant centralized power were at length defeated in the great election of 1800 by Mr Jefferson's party. Out of that duel came the two patites, Republican and Democratic, as we know them today.

So began, in American political life, the new day, the moday of the individual against the system, the day in which individualism was made the great watchword of American life. The happiest of economic conditions made that day long and splendid. On the Western frontier, land was substantially free No one, who did not shirk the task of earning a living, was entirely without opportunity to do so Depressions could, and did, come and go, but they could not alter the fundamental fact that most of the people lived partly by selling their labor and partly by extracting their livelihood from the soil, so that starvation and dislocation were practically impossible. At the very worst there was always the possibility of climbing into a covered wagon and moving 10 west where the untilled prairies afforded a haven for men to whom the East did not provide a place. So great were our natural resources that we could offer this relief not only to our own people, but to the distressed of all the world, we could invite immigration from Europe, and welcome it with open arms Traditionally, when a depression came a new section of land was opened in the West, and even our temporary misfortune served our manifest destiny

It was in the middle of the nineteenth century that a 20 new force was released and a new dream created. The force was what is called the industrial revolution, the advance of steam and machinery and the rise of the forerunners of the modern industrial plant. The dream was the dream of an economic machine, able to raise the standard of living for everyone, to bring luxury within the reach of the humblest, to annihilate distance by steam power and later by electricity, and to release everyone from the drudgery of the heaviest manual toil It was to be expected that this would necessarily 30 affect Government Heretofore, Government had merely been called upon to produce conditions within which people could live happily labor peacefully, and rest secure Now it was called upon to aid in the consummation of this new dream. There was, however, a shadow over the dream. To be made real, it required use of the talents of men of tremendous will and tremendous ambition, since by no other force could the problems of financing and engineering and new developments be brought to a consummation.

So manifest were the advantages of the machine age, however, that the United States fearlessly, cheerfully, and, I think, rightly, accepted the bitter with the sweet It was thought that no price was too high to pay for the advantages which we could draw from a finished industrial system. The history of the last half century is accordingly in large measure a history of a group of financial Titans whose methods were not scrutinized with too much care, and who were honored in proportion as they produced the results, irrespective of the means they used. The financiers who pushed the railroads to the Pacific 50 were always ruthless, often wasteful, and frequently corrupt, but they did build railroads, and we have them today. It has been estimated that the American investor paid for the American railroad system more than three times over in the process, but despite this fact the net advantage was to the United States. As long as we had free land, as long as population was growing by leaps and bounds, as long as our industrial plants were insufficient to supply our own needs, society chose to give the ambitious man free play and unlimited reward provided 60 only that he produced the economic plant so much desired.

During this period of expansion, there was equal opportunity for all, and the business of Government was not to interfere but to assist in the development of industry This was done at the request of business men themselves The tariff was originally imposed for the purpose of "fostering our infant industry," a phrase I think the older among you will remember as a political issue not so long ago. The railroads were subsidized, 70 sometimes by grants of money, oftener by grants of land, some of the most valuable oil lands in the United States were granted to assist the financing of the railroad which pushed through the Southwest A nascent merchant marine was assisted by grants of money, or by mail subsidies, so that our steam shipping might ply the seven seas Some of my friends tell me that they do not want the Government in business. With this I agree, but I wonder whether they realize the implications of the past For while it has been American doctrine that the 80 Government must not go into business in competition with private enterprises, still it has been traditional, particularly in Republican administrations, for business urgently to ask the Government to put at private disposal all kinds of Government assistance. The same man who tells you that he does not want to see the Government interfere in business-and he means it, and has plenty of good reasons for saying so-is the first to go to Washington and ask the Government for a prohibitory tariff on his product. When things get just bad 90 enough, as they did two years ago, he will go with equal speed to the United States Government and ask for a loan, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the outcome of it Each group has sought protection from the Government for its own special interests, without realizing that the function of Government must be to favor no small group at the expense of its duty to protect the rights of personal freedom and of private property of all its citizens

In retrospect we can now see that the turn of the tide came with the turn of the century. We were reaching our last frontier, there was no more free land and our industrial combinations had become great uncontrolled in and irresponsible units of power within the State Clearsighted men saw with fear the danger that opportunity would no longer be equal, that the growing corporation, like the feudal baron of old, might threaten the economic freedom of individuals to earn a living. In that hour, our anti-trust laws were born. The cry was raised against the great corporations Theodore Roosevelt, the first great Republican Progressive, fought a Presidential campaign on the issue of "trust busting" and talked freely about malefactors of great wealth. It the Government 20 had a policy it was rather to turn the clock back, to destroy the large combinations and to return to the time when every man owned his individual small business

This was impossible, Theodore Roosevelt, abandoning the idea of "trust busting," was forced to work out a difference between "good" trusts and "bad" trusts. The Supreme Court set forth the famous rule of reason' by which it seems to have meant that a concentration of industrial power was permissible if the method by which it got its power, and the use it made of that power, 30 were reasonable

Woodrow Wilson, elected in 1912, saw the situation more clearly. Where Jefferson had feared the encroachment of political power on the lives of individuals, Wilson knew that the new power was financial He saw, in the highly centralized economic system, the despot of the twentieth century, on whom great masses of individuals relied for their safety and their livelihood, and whose irresponsibility and greed (if they were not controlled) would reduce them to starvation and penury 40 The concentration of financial power had not proceeded so far in 1912 as it has today, but it had grown far enough for Mr Wilson to realize fully its implications It is interesting, now, to read his speeches. What is called "radical" today (and I have reason to know whereof I speak) is mild compared to the campaign of Mr Wilson "No man can deny, he said, "that the lines of endeavor have more and more narrowed and stiffened, no man who knows anything about the development of industry in this country can have failed to observe that the larger kinds of credit are more and so more difficult to obtain unless you obtain them upon terms of uniting your efforts with those who already control the industry of the country, and nobody can fail to observe that every man who tries to set himself up in competition with any process of manufacture which has taken place under the control of large combinations of capital will presently find himself either squeezed out or obliged to sell and allow himself to be it sorbed. Had there been no World War-had Mr Wilson been able to devote eight years to domestic so instead of to international affairs—we might have had a wholly different situation at the present time. However the then distant roar of Luropean cannon, growing ever louder, forced him to abandon the study of this issue. The problem he saw so clearly is left with us as a legacy, and no one of us on either side of the political controversy can deny that it is a matter of grave concern to the Government

A glance at the situation today only too clearly indicates that equality of opportunity as we have known 70 it no longer exists. Our industrial plant is built, the problem just now is whether under existing conditions it is not overbuilt. Our last frontier has long since been reached, and there is practically no more free land. More than half of our people do not live on the farms or on lands and cannot derive a living by cultivating their own property. There is no safety valve in the form of a Western prairie to which those thrown out of work by Eastern economic machines can go for a new start. We are not able to invite the immigration 80 from Europe to share our endless plenty. We are now providing a diab living for our own people

Our system of constantly rising tariffs has at last reacted against us to the point of closing our Canadian frontier on the north, our European markets on the east, many of our Latin-American markets to the south, and a goodly proportion of our Pacific markets on the west, through the retaliatory tariffs of those countries It has forced many of our great industrial institutions which exported their surplus production to such coun- 90 tries, to establish plants in such countries, within the tariff walls. This has resulted in the reduction of the operation of their American plants, and opportunity for employment

Just as freedom to farm has ceased, so also the opportunity in business has narrowed. It still is true that men can start small enterprises, trusting to native shrewdness and ability to keep abreast of competitors; but area after area has been preempted altogether by the great corporations, and even in the fields which still have no great concerns, the small man starts under a handicap The unfeeling statistics of the past three decades show that the independent business man is 10 running a losing race Perhaps he is forced to the wall, perhaps he cannot command credit, perhaps he is "squeezed out," in Mr Wilson's words, by highly organized corporate competitors, as your corner grocery man can tell you Recently a careful study was made of the concentration of business in the United States It showed that our economic life was dominated by some six hundred odd corporations who controlled two-thirds of American industry. Ten million small business men divided the other third More striking still, it appeared 20 that if the process of concentration goes on at the same rate, at the end of another century we shall have all American industry controlled by a dozen corporations, and run by perhaps a hundred men Put plainly, we are steering a steady course toward economic oligarchy, if we are not there already.

Clearly, all this calls for a re-appraisal of values A mere builder of more industrial plants, a creator of more railroad systems, an organizer of more corporations, is as likely to be a danger as a help. The day of the great 30 promoter or the financial Titan, to whom we granted anything if only he would build, or develop, is over Our task now is not discovery or exploitation of natural resources, or necessarily producing more goods. It is the soberer, less dramatic business of administering resources and plants already in hand, of seeking to reestablish foreign markets for our surplus production, of meeting the problem of underconsumption, of adjusting production to consumption, of distributing wealth and products more equitably, of adapting ex-40 isting economic organizations to the service of the people. The day of enlightened administration has come

Just as in older times the central Government was first a haven of refuge, and then a threat, so now in a closer economic system the central and ambitious financial unit is no longer a servant of national desire, but a danger I would draw the parallel one step faither We did not think because national Government had become a threat in the 18th century that therefore we should abandon the principle of national Government. Nor today should we abandon the principle of strong economic units called corporations, merely because their power is susceptible of easy abuse. In other times we dealt with the problem of an unduly ambitious central Government by modifying it gradually into a constitutional democratic Government So today we are modifying and controlling our economic units.

As I see it, the task of Government in its relation to business is to assist the development of an economic declaration of rights, an economic constitutional order This is the common task of statesman and business man. 6. It is the minimum requirement of a more permanently safe order of things

Happily, the times indicate that to create such an order not only is the proper policy of Government, but it is the only line of safety for our economic structures as well We know, now, that these economic units cannot exist unless prosperity is uniform, that is unless purchasing power is well distributed throughout every group in the Nation That is why even the most selfish of corporations for its own interest would be glad to 7 see wages restored and unemployment ended and to bring the Western farmer back to his accustomed level of prosperity and to assure a permanent safety to both groups That is why some enlightened industries themselves endeavor to limit the freedom of action of each man and business group within the industry in the common interest of all, why business men everywhere are asking a form of organization which will bring the scheme of things into balance, even though it may in some measure qualify the freedom of action of individual units within the business

The exposition need not further be elaborated. It is brief and incomplete, but you will be able to expand it in terms of your own business or occupation without difficulty. I think everyone who has actually entered the economic struggle—which means everyone who was not born to safe wealth—knows in his own experience and his own life that we have now to apply the earlier concepts of American Government to the conditions of today.

The Declaration of Independence discusses the problem of Government in terms of a contract. Government is a relation of give and take, a contract, perforce, if we would follow the thinking out of which it grew. Under such a contract rulers were accorded power, and the people assented to that power on consideration that they be accorded certain rights. The task of statesmanship has always been the re-definition of these rights in terms of a changing and growing social order. New conditions impose new requirements upon Government and those who conduct Government.

I held, for example, in proceedings before me as Governor, the purpose of which was the removal of the 10 Sheriff of New York, that under modern conditions it was not enough for a public official merely to evade the legal terms of official wrong-doing. He owed a positive duty as well. I said in substance that if he had acquired large sums of money, he was when accused required to explain the sources of such wealth. To that extent this wealth was colored with a public interest. I said that in financial matters, public servants should, even beyond private citizens, be held to a stern and uncompromising rectifulde.

I feel that we are coming to a view through the drift of our legislation and our public thinking in the past quarter century that private economic power is, to enlarge an old phrase, a public trust as well I hold that continued enjoyment of that power by any individual or group must depend upon the fulfillment of that trust. The men who have reached the summit of American business life know this best, happily, many of these urge the binding quality of this greater social contract

The terms of that contract are as old as the Republic, 30 and as new as the new economic order

Every man has a right to life, and this means that he has also a right to make a comfortable living. He may by sloth or crime decline to exercise that right, but it may not be denied him. We have no actual famine or dearth; our industrial and agricultural mechanism can produce enough and to spare. Our Government formal and informal, political and economic owes to everyone an avenue to possess himself of a portion of that plenty sufficient for his needs, through his own 40 work.

Every man has a right to his own property, which means a right to be assured, to the fullest extent attainable, in the safety of his savings. By no other means can men carry the burdens of those parts of life which, in the nature of things, afford no chance of labor; childhood, sickness, old age. In all thought of property, this right is paramount, all other property rights must yield to it. If, in accord with this principle, we must restrict the operations of the speculator, the manipulator, even the financier. I believe we must accept the restriction as 50 needful, not to hamper individualism but to protect it

These two requirements must be satisfied, in the main, by the ind viduals who claim and hold control of the great industrial and financial combinations which dominate so large a part of our industrial life. They have undertaken to be, not business men, but princes of property. I am not preputed to say that the system which produces them is wrong. I am very clear that they must fearlessly and competently assume the responsibility which goes with the power. So many enlightened business men know this that the statement would be little more than a platitude, were it not for an added implication.

This implication is, briefly that the responsible heads of finance and industry instead of acting each for him self, must work together to achieve the common end They must, where necessary sacrifice this or that private advantage, and in reciprocal self-denial must seek a general advantage. It is here that formal Government- political Government, if you choose-comes in. When- 70 ever in the pursuit of this objective the lone wolf, the unethical competitor, the reckless promoter the Ishmael or Insull whose hand is against every man's declines to join in achieving an end recognized as being for the public welfare, and threatens to drag the industry back to a state of anarchy, the Government may properly be asked to apply restraint. Likewise, should the group ever use its collective power contrary to the public welfare, the Government must be swift to enter and protect the public interest

The Government should assume the function of economic regulation only as a last resort, to be tried only when private initiative, inspired by high responsibility, with such assistance and balance as Government can give, has finally failed. As yet there has been no final failure, because there has been no attempt, and I decline to assume that this Nation is unable to meet the situation.

The final term of the high contract was for liberty and the pursuit of happiness. We have learned a great deal of both in the past century. We know that individual so liberty and individual happiness mean nothing unless both are ordered in the sense that one man's meat is not another man's poison. We know that the old "rights of personal competency" the right to read, to think, to speak, to choose and live a mode of life, must be respected at all hazards. We know that liberty to do anything which deprives others of those elemental rights is outside the protection of any compact, and that Government in this regard is the maintenance of a balance, within which every individual may have a place if he will take it, in which every individual may find safety if he wishes it, in which every individual may attain such power as his ability permits, consistent with his assuming the accompanying responsibility

All this is a long, slow talk. Nothing is more striking than the simple innocence of the men who insist, whenever an objective is present, on the prompt production of a patent scheme guaranteed to produce a result Human endeavor is not so simple as that. Government includes the art of formulating a policy, and using the political technique to attain so much of that policy as will receive general support, persuading, leading, sacrificing, teaching always, because the greatest duty of a statesman is to educate But in the matters of which 21 have spoken, we are learning rapidly, in a severe school The lessons so learned must not be forgotten, even in the mental lethargy of a speculative upturn. We must build toward the time when a major depression cannot occur again, and if this means sacrificing the easy profits of inflationist booms, then let them go, and good riddance

Faith in America, faith in our tradition of personal responsibility, faith in our institutions, faith in ourselves demand that we recognize the new terms of the old social accontract. We shall fulfill them, as we fulfilled the obligation of the apparent Utopia which Jefferson imagined for us in 1776, and which Jefferson, Roosevelt and Wilson sought to bring to realization. We must do so, lest a rising tide of misery, engendered by our common failure, engulf us all. But failure is not an American habit, and in the strength of great hope we must all shoulder our common load.

Address at Chicago

October 5, 1937

The so-called "Quarantine Speech" was delivered at the dedication of a new bridge over the Chicago River, constructed with Public Works Administration funds. The President was completing an eight-thousand-mile trip which had carried him into the Far West. The crowd gathered was estimated at a hundred thousand. Said a contemporary—rather unfriendly—account (Newsweek, October 18, 1937): "About as soon as he started to speak he made it plain that this would be no jovial chat peppered with complimentary local allusions. Those close enough saw that he had dropped his usual 'personality' smile: he looked over the crowd with a mien almost as set as those of the feather-crowned braves—who had come up the river in canoes to greet him with a war dance. . . .

Beneath the speaker's rostrum, telegraph keys rattled Wires flashed to every continent of the world the words of this man who looms to millions abroad as virtual dictator of the richest and most enterprising—and potentially the most formidable—of all powers. . . . In Japan, Italy, and Germany, the censor worked fast—newspapers carried little more than brief paraphrases . . . " At the time the address was delivered, a large majority, according to a national public opinion poll, favored stricter neutrality laws for keeping the United States out of war

I am glad to come once again to Chicago and especially to have the opportunity of taking part in the dedication of this important project of civic betterment

On my trip across the continent and back I have been shown many evidences of the result of commonsense cooperation between municipalities and the Federal Government, and I have been greeted by tens of thousands of Americans who have told me in every look and word that their material and spiritual well-being has made great strides forward in the past few years

And yet, as I have seen with my own eyes the prosperous farms, the thriving factories and the busy railroads as I have seen the happiness and security and peace which covers our wide land—almost inevitably I have been compelled to contrast our peace with very different scenes being enacted in other parts of the world

It is because the people of the United States under modern conditions must, for the sake of their own future give thought to the rest of the world, that I, as the responsible executive head of the nation, here chosen this great inland city and this gala occasion to speak to you on a subject of definite national importance

The political situation in the world, which of late has been growing progressively worse, is such as to cause grave concern and anxiety to all the peoples and nations who wish to live in peace and amily with their neighbors

Some nine years ago the hopes of mankind for a continuing era of international peace were raised to great heights when more than sixty nations solemnly pledged themselves not to resort to arms in furtherance of their national aims and policies. The high aspirations expressed in the Briand-Kellogg Peace Pact and the hopes for peace thus raised have of late given way to a haunting fear of calamity.

The present reign of terror and international lawlessness began a few years ago. It began through unjustified interference in the internal affairs of other nations or the invasion of alien territory in violation of treaties, and has now reached a stage where the very foundations of civilization are seriously threatened

The landmarks and traditions which have marked the progress of civilization toward a condition of law, order 30 and justice are being wiped away

Without a declaration of war and without warning or justification of any kind, civilians, including women and children, are being ruthlessly murdered with bombs from the air

In times of so-called peace, ships are being attacked and sunk by submarines without cause or notice. Nations are fomenting and taking sides in civil warfare in nations that have never done them any harm. Nations claiming freedom for themselves deny it to others.

Innocent peoples and nations are being cruelly sacrificed to a greed for power and supremacy which is devoid of all sense of justice and humane consideration

To paraphrase a recent author "Perhaps we foresee a time when men, exultant in the technique of homicide will rage so hotly over the world that every precious thing will be in danger, every book and picture and harmony, every treasure garnered through two millenniums the small, the delicate, the defenseless—all will be lost or wrecked or utterly destroyed.

If those things come to pass in other parts of the so world, let no one imagine that America will escape, that it may expect mercy, that this Western Hemisphere will not be attacked and that it will containe tranquilly and peacefully to carry on the ethics and the arts of civilization.

If those days come "there will be no safety by arms no help from authority, no answer in science. The storm will rage till every flower of culture is transpled and all hi man beings are leveled in a vast chaos."

If those days are not to come to pass—if we are to so have a world in which we can bicathe freely and live in amity without fear—the peace loving nations must make a concerted efforc to uphold laws and principles on which alone peace can test secure

The peace-loving nations must make a concerted effort in opposition to those violations of treaties and those ignorings of humane instincts which today are creating a state of international anarchy and instability from which there is no escape through mere isolation or neutrality.

Those who cherish their freedom and recognize and respect the equal right of their neighbors to be free and live in peace must work together for the triumph of law and moral principles in order that peace, justice and confidence may prevail in the world

There must be a return to a belief in the pledged word, in the value of a signed treaty. There must be recognition of the fact that national morality is as vital as private morality.

A Bishop wrote me the other day

"It seems to me that something greatly needs to be said in behalf of ordinary humanity against the present practice of carrying the horrors of war to helpless civilians, especially women and children

"It may be that such a protest might be regarded by many, who claim to be realists, as futile, but may it not be that the heart of mankind is so filled with horror at the present needless suffering that that force could be mobilized in sufficient volume to lessen such cruelty in the days ahead?

"Even though it may take twenty years, which God forbid, for civilization to make effective its corporate protest against this barbarism, surely strong voices in may hasten the day."

There is a solidarity and interdependence about the modern world, both technically and morally, which makes it impossible for any nation completely to isolate itself from economic and political upheavals in the rest of the world, especially when such upheavals appear to be spreading and not declining

There can be no stability or peace either within nations or between nations except under laws and moral standards adhered to by all International anarchy de-20 stroys every foundation for peace. It jeopardizes either the immediate or the future security of every nation, large or small

It is, therefore, a matter of vital interest and concern to the people of the United States that the sanctity of international treaties and the maintenance of international morality be restored

The overwhelming majority of the peoples and nations of the world today want to live in peace

They seek the removal of barriers against trade

They want to exert themselves in industry, in agriculture and in business, that they may increase their wealth through the production of wealth-producing goods, rather than striving to produce military planes and bombs and machine guns and cannon for the destruction of human lives and useful property

In those nations of the world which seem to be piling armament on armament for purposes of aggression, and those other nations which fear acts of aggression against them and their security, a very high proportion of the national income is being spent directly for armaments It runs from 30 to as high as 50 per cent

The proportion that we in the United States spend is far less—11 or 12 per cent

How happy we are that the circumstances of the moment permit us to put our money into bridges and boulevards, dams and reforestation, the conservation of our soil and many other kinds of useful works, rather than into huge standing armies and vast supplies of implements of war.

I am compelled and you are compelled, nevertheless, so to look ahead. The peace, the freedom and the security of 90 per cent of the population of the world is being jeopardized by the remaining 10 per cent who are threatening a break-down of all international order and law.

Surely the 90 per cent who want to live in peace under law and in accordance with moral standards that have received almost universal acceptance through the centuries can and must find some way to make their will prevail

The situation is definitely of universal concern. The questions involved relate not merely to violations of specific provisions of particular treaties; they are questions of war and of peace, of international law, and especially of principles of humanity. It is true that they involve definite violations of agreements, and especially of the Covenant of the League of Nations, the Briand-Kellogg Pact and the Nine-Power Treaty. But they also involve problems of world economy, world security and world humanity.

It is true that the moral consciousness of the world must recognize the importance of removing injustices and well-founded grievances, but at the same time it must be aroused to the cardinal necessity of honoring sanctity of treaties, of respecting the rights and liberties of others and of putting an end to acts of international aggression

It seems to be unfortunately true that the epidemic of world lawlessness is spreading

When an epidemic of physical disease starts to spread, & the community approves and joins in a quarantine of the patients in order to protect the health of the community against the spread of the disease

It is my determination to pursue a policy of peace and to adopt every practicable measure to avoid involvement in war

It ought to be inconceivable that in this modern era,

⁵³ remaining 10 per cent. The total population of Germany, Italy, and Japan was exactly 10 per cent of the estimated population of the world. • 68 Nine-Power Treaty, signed February 6, 1922, by the United States, Great Britain, France, Japan, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, Portugal, and China, had as its purpose "safeguarding the rights and the interest of China." by guaranteeing its sovereignty, independence, and territorial and administrative integrity.

and in the face of experience, any nation could be so foolish and ruthless as to run the risk of plunging the whole world into war by invading and violating, in contravention of solemn treaties, the territory of other nations that have done them no real harm and which are too weak to protect themselves adequately. Yet the peace of the world and the welfare and security of every nation is today being threatened by that very thing

No nation which refuses to exercise forbearance and to respect the freedom and rights of others can long remain strong and retain the confidence and respect of other nations. No nation ever loses its dignity or good standing by conciliating its differences, and by exercising great patience with, and consideration for, the rights of other nations.

War is a contagion, whether it be declared or un declared. It can engulf states and peoples remote from

Message Asking for Declaration of War

December 8, 1941

The radio announcement of Japan's attack upon Pearl Harbor was heard by Americans Sunday afternoon, December 7, 1941. Up to that time, the bitter debate on foreign policy had divided the people of the United States Could and should the nation remain aloof from the war in Europe, from the war in the Orient? Now the question which had divided the nation for months was settled the United States—truly united—would fight against Japan until a decision was reached. Nor was wai with Japan alone involved: even at the time it was clear that war with Germany and Italy was equally inevitable. In Washington, the President called a meeting of the cabinet at 8 30, a meeting of Congressional leaders at 9 00. After the Congressmen had left, he worked far into the night on his speech.

At noon December 8, he entered his closed car, wrapped his dark cape around his shoulders, and rode to the Capitol He arrived at 12 12 P.M. The House, the Senate, the original scene of hostilities. We are determined to keep out of war, yet we cannot insure ourselves against the disastrous effects of war and the dangers of involvement. We are adopting such measures as will minimize our risk of involvement, but we cannot have complete protection in a world of disorder in which confidence and security have broken down.

If civilization is to survive, the principles of the Prince of Peace must be restored. Shattered trust between nations must be revived.

Most important of all, the will for peace on the part of peace-loving nations must express itself to the end that nations that may be tempted to violate their agreements 30 and the rights of others will desist from such a cause. There must be positive endeavors to preserve peace.

America hates war. America hopes for peace. Theretore: America actively engages in the search for peace. 1937 the Supreme Court, and the cabinet were gathered. Micro phones were installed to carry his voice to radios throughout the nation and the world. The audience applicated and shouted as he came hefore them, then quieted as Speaker Sam Rayburn banged his heavy gavel. Roosevelt firmly gripped the reading clerk's stand. He opened his black notebook, looked out over his audience for a long silent moment, then read. At 1 PM, the Senate passed the declaration of war, 82 to 0. Half an hour later, the House passed the same bill. 388 to 1. At 410 PM, Roosevelt signed the bill in his office, and the United States was officially at year.

Roosevelt ordinarily sought to avoid the old fashioned literary devices of oratory. His diction as a rule was simple, even colloquial, and his sentence rhythms only now and then departed from those of ordinary speech. This address was one of the most factual, the most objective, the least rhetorical, he ever delivered. He was correct in believing that his audience needed no stimulus to their emotions.

Mr Vice President. Mr. Speaker, Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Yesterday, December 7th, 1941—a date which will live in infamy—the United States of America was suddenly and deliberately attacked by naval and air forces of the Empire of Japan

The United States was at peace with that nation, and, at the solicitation of Japan, was still in conversation with its government and its Emperor looking toward the maintenance of peace in the Pacific Indeed, one hour after Japanese air squadrons had commenced bombing in the American island of Oahu, the Japanese ambassador to the United States and his colleague delivered to our Secretary of State a formal reply to a recent American message. While this reply stated that it seemed useless to continue the existing diplomatic negotiations, it contained no threat or hint of war or of armed attack.

It will be recorded that the distance of Hawaii from Japan makes it obvious that the attack was deliberately planned many days or even weeks ago. During the intervening time the Japanese government has deliberately sought to deceive the United States by false statements and expressions of hope for continued peace.

The attack yesterday on the Hawatian Islands has caused severe damage to American naval and military forces. I regret to tell you that very many American lives have been lost. In addition, American ships have been reported torpedoed on the high seas between San Francisco and Honolulu

Yesterday the Japanese government also launched an attack against Malaya Last night Japanese forces attacked Hong Kong Last night Japanese forces attacked Guam. Last night Japanese forces attacked the Philippine Islands. Last night the Japanese attacked Wake Island. And this morning the Japanese attacked Midway Island.

Japan has, therefore, undertaken a surprise offensive extending throughout the Pacific area. The facts of yesterday and today speak for themselves. The people of the United States have already formed their opinions and well understand the implications to the very life and safety of our nation.

As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy I have directed that all measures be taken for our defense, but always will our whole nation remember the character of the onslaught against us. No matter how long it may take us to overcome this premeditated invasion, the American people in their righteous might will win through to absolute victory. I believe that I interpret the will of the Congress and of the people when I assert that we will not only defend ourselves to the uttermost but will make it very certain that this form of treachery shall never again endanger us Hostilities exist. There is no blinking at the fact that our people, our territory, and our interests are in grave danger. With confidence in our armed forces, 5 with the unbounded determination of our people, we will gain the inevitable triumph, so help us God.

I ask that the Congress declare that since the unprovoked and dastardly attack by Japan on Sunday, December 7th, 1941, a state of war has existed between the United States and the Japanese Empire.

Jefferson Day Address

Early in April 1945 Roosevelt went to Warm Springs, Georgia, to rest and to prepare for the United Nations Conference on International Organization which was to open April 25 in San Francisco On April 11 he prepared an address intended to be broadcast to participants in three hundred and fifty Jefferson Day dinners on April 13—the annual celebration of Jefferson's birthday by the Democratic party

On the afternoon of April 12 the President was stricken with a cerebral hemorrhage. He died within a few hours. The announcement of his death was a profound shock to a nation still in the midst of a great war, a nation which had depended upon him for leadership since 1933. The Jefferson Day dinners were, of course, canceled, but on April 13 the address was released to the newspapers.

In the use of short paragraphs, repetition, broken sentence structure, personal address, and movement toward a climax, the speech is representative of the style which Roosevelt employed in reaching the largest audience any American political leader has ever had. The address struck a note of determination and faith that the nation was to need constantly in the uncertainty of the times.

Americans are gathered together this evening in communities all over the country to pay tribute to the living memory of Thomas Jefferson—one of the greatest of all democrats, and I want to make it clear that I am spelling that word "democrats" with a small 'd'

I wish I had the power, just for this evening to be present at all these gatherings

In this historic year, more than ever before, we do well to consider the character of Thomas letterson as an Property of the world

As Minister to France, then as our first Secretary of State and as our third President, Jefferson was instrumental in the establishment of the United States as a vital factor in international affairs

It was he who first sent our Navy into far-distant waters to defend our rights. And the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine was the logical development of Jefferson's far-seeing foreign policy.

Today this nation which Jefferson helped so great-20 ly to build is playing a tremendous part in the battle for the rights of man all over the world

Today we are part of the vast Allied force—a force composed of flesh and blood and steel and spirit—which is today destroying the makers of war, the breeders of hate, in Europe and in Asia

In Jefferson's time our Navy consisted of only a handful of frigates—but that tiny Navy taught nations across the Atlantic that piracy in the Mediterranean acts of aggression against peaceful commerce and the en-30 slavement of their crews—was one of those things which among neighbors, simply was not done

Today we have learned in the agony of war that great power involves great responsibility. Today we can no more escape the consequences of German and Japanese aggression than could we avoid the consequences of attacks by the Barbary Corsairs a century and a half before

We, as Americans, do not choose to deny our responsibility

Nor do we intend to abandon our determination that within the lives of our children and our children's children, there will not be a third world war.

We seek peace—enduring peace More than an end to war, we want an end to the Leginnings of all wars—yes, an end to this brutal, inhuman and thoroughly impractical method of settling the differences between governments

The once powerful malignant Nazi state is crumbling, the Lipanese wir lords are receiving in their own homeland the retribution for which they asked when so they attecked Pearl Hubbr.

But the mere conquest of our enemies is not enough. We must go on to do all in our power to conquer the doubts and the fears the innorance and the greed, which made this horror possible.

Thomas Jefferson himself a distinguished scientist, once spoke of the 'brotherly spirit of science, which unites into one family all its votures of whitever grade, and however widely dispersed throughout the different quarters of the globe.'

Today science his brought all the different quarters of the globe so close together that it is impossible to isolate them one from another

Today we are faced with the preeminent fact that, if civilization is to survive we must cultivate the science of human relationships the ability of all peoples of ill kinds to live together and work together in the same world, at peace

Let me assure you that my hand is the steadier for the work that is to be done, that I move more firmly into 20 the risk knowing that you millions and millions of you — ire joined with me in the resolve to make this work endure.

The work, my friends is peace more than an end of this war—an end to the beginning, of all wars, yes, an end, forever, to this impractical unite listic settlement of the differences between governments by the mass killing of peoples.

Today as we move against the terrible scourge of war was we go forward toward the greatest contribu- 80 tion that any generation of human beings can make in this world—the contribution of lasting peace, I ask you to keep up your faith. I measure the sound, solid achievement that can be made at this time by the straight-edge of your own confidence and your resolve. And to you, and to all Americans who dedicate themselves with us to the making of an ibiding peace, I say

The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with strong and active faith
